Ver. 1. KOHLBRÜGG: "We come into the land as soon as we believe; then it typifies to the believer, heaven, the everlasting and full enjoyment of all blessedness, Heb. iv. 11; Eph. ii. 5, 6. It is all a free gift. It is the nature of God to give, to be good to the poor, Gal. iii. 18, 29." Ver. 2 sq. THE SAME: "Diversities of fruit. Comp. 1 Cor. xii. 4 sq.; Eph. iv. 7; Phil. i. 11; Gal. v. 22; 2 Pet. i. 8 sq. He gives a fruitful land, Eph. ii. 10; and there should not be any exotic fruits, Gal. i. 7, 8." Ver. 3. STARK: "Thanksgiving and prayer are sisters which should never be separated." KOHLBRÜGG: "The confession of the mouth disburdens and warms the heart, awakes a joyful faith. Thy God who has put thee into office to praise the name of God, His faithfulness and truth before the people,—thus from my confession to take occasion to comfort and encourage others, that God will not forsake the work of His hands. The priest takes the basket, as he must ever bring before the throne whatever the people offer, Jer. xxx. 21. The altar of burnt offering a figure of Christ and His cross." Ver. 5 sq. BAUMGARTEN: "Israel is in himself nothing more than the receptive subject of the grace of Jehovah. This is plain for all the future in the twofold beginning of his history. First, Israel the individual man, whose loneliness in the three patriarchs is three times inferred; no violent, lawless Nimrod, but an Aramman stranger and shepherd going through the regions of kings and nations (Ps. cv. 12, 13), and exposed to their assaults. As Jehovah prevented this, He alone established this beginning—for Israel, as a lost man, had no strength in himself. So also in the second beginning, where Israel became a great people, but thus given into the power of a strange and harsh king, he was lost again. In measure indeed as Israel had grown to a great mass, the grace of Jehovah became grander and more wonderful." [WORDSWORTH: "We must remember our past miseries as well as our present mercies; what we were by nature as well as what we are by grace."—A. G.] CRAMER: "Alms are not given from vanity, but from faith." RICHTER: "Ver. 7 praises the omniscience of God, ver. 8 His power and righteousness, and ver. 9 His goodness and faithfulness." Ver. 10. STARKS: "The first to God, and not to Satan. Ye young men and maidens, devote to God the bloom of your years." Ver. 11. BAUMGARTEN: "With the first fruits for the priests (Num. xviii. 18) they were to bring others also, free-will offerings and what was joined with them, ch. 12." Ver. 18 sq.: "Like the Pharisee, Luke xviii., but not the same, indeed unlike." Ver. 14. RANDGROSSE: "The sacrifice to God should be joyful, pure and holy." Ver. 15. SCHULTZ: "If a living prayer ascends to God, a certain obedience, as well as a certain experience of grace, is necessary." BAUMGARTEN: "Because He who dwells in the earthly sanctuary is at the same time enthroned in the heavenly sanctuary, so He must be called upon in every house of Israel. What freedom and variety in Israel, in connection with all earnestness for the unity of the sanctuary, and the sacredness of the priesthood and its position." Ver. 16. OSIANDER: "For the fulfilling of the commands, God requires the whole man." Ver. 17. STARKS: "Great similarity with the question in the baptismal covenant, 1 Pet. iii. 21." Ver. 19. RICHTER: "To be for the praise of God (Eph. i.) is the ultimate end of all the revelations and forms of the kingdom of God." V. GERLACH: "In the first fruits there is a continuous homage and acknowledgment with reference to all earthly possessions. The second tithe changed every Israelitish home into a sanctuary."

The Instructions for the Stone Monument as a Pause to the Second Discourse.

CHAPTER XXVII. 1-8.

- 1 AND Moses with the elders of Israel commanded the people, saying, Keep all the
- 2 commandments [the whole commandment] which I command you this day. And
- it shall be on the day when ye shall pass over Jordan unto the land which the Lord
- thy God giveth thee, that thou shalt set thee up great stones, and plaster them with
- 3 plaster: And thou shalt write upon them all the words of this law, when thou art
- passed over [in thy passing over], that thou mayest go in unto the land which the
- Lord thy God giveth thee, a land that floweth with milk and honey; as the Lord
- 4 God of thy fathers hath promised thee. Therefore it shall be when ye be gone over
- Jordan, that ye shall set up these stones which I command you this day, in mount
- 5 Ebal, and thou shalt plaster them with plaster. And there shalt thou build an altar
- unto the Lord thy God, an altar of stones: thou shalt not lift up [swing over
- 6 it] any iron tool upon them. Thou shalt build the altar of the Lord thy God of
- whole [complete] stones: and thou shalt offer [cause to ascend] burnt offerings
- [whole offerings] thereon unto the Lord thy God: And thou shalt offer peace-offer-
- 7 ings [salvation offerings], and shalt eat there, and rejoice before the Lord thy God.
- 8 And thou shalt write upon the stones all the words of this law, very plainly.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 1. And the elders—because they had it to perform (i. 1). The whole commandment is the following command for the erection, plastering, and inscribing, etc., in all its compass. Its keeping is symbolical for the keeping of all the commands generally. (KNOBEL, SCHULTZ, KEIL, of the whole law.) Comp. Introd. § 2. The time limit in ver. 2 places at once the entrance upon Canaan, to which all refers here, as the day for the fulfilment of the command, as it corresponds to the day of the command (דִּבְרֵי, דִּבְרֵי). The closer restriction follows in ver. 4. Plaster—either with gypsum or lime-wash generally—to fit them for the inscription, ver. 8; for the cementing of the stones with mortar—was either evidently included in the command for their erection, or perhaps was unnecessary from their great size. The writing follows upon the plastering, and thus is to be inserted upon the plastered stones, and not to be out in the stones, and then whitewashed or covered. For the Egyptian usage comp. HENGSTENBERG, Auth. I. p. 464 sq. They carved or painted upon the smooth surface. The inscription was not for posterity, but as a testimony to their cotemporaries. All the words of this law—Introd. § 2. The obedience to the law so declared and attested justified the conquest of Canaan to their cotemporaries. Ver. 4. A resumption of ver. 2 for the purpose of defining the locality, that the command there, should be restricted to the midst of the land. Ebal, for which the Samaritan Pentateuch designates substitutes Gerizim, on account of vers. 12-13 (xi. 29). The Samaritan temple stood upon Gerizim. Comp. HENGSTENBERG, Authen. I. 87. Ebal, which was at least a hundred feet higher than Gerizim (ROBINSON, Researches, Vol. III., and Later Researches, pp. 181, 182), and was better fitted both for the stones and the altar, ver. 6. Comp. upon Ex. xx. 22; Josh. viii. 80 sqq. (Introd. § 4). That the altar was not to be built of the stones already mentioned is the more clear since the stones of the altar are in ver. 6 whole stones (xv. 16)—thus stones untouched by human hands (1 Thess. v. 28). As the altar for the sacrifices, so it gives a more solemn stamp and completion to the symbolical transaction, vers. 2-4. Burnt offerings (Lev. i. 8 sq.) as those ascending wholly to God in the high places, designated and expressed the entire consecration of the offerer to the Lord. The peace-offerings (Shelamim) express the enjoyment of salvation the more distinctly, since here also the portion in this sacrifice belonging to the offerer for the joyful meal is expressly noticed. Comp. the similar transaction, Ex. xxiv., in the first law-giving, as also here in the repetition, Deut. v. sq. As ver. 4 resumes ver. 2, for the purpose of the local determination, so now ver. 8 resumes again ver. 3, for a closer description how the words should be written. Comp. upon i. 5, HENGSTENB. Auth. I. p. 482 sq. (ix. 21). In good, distinct characters, so that every one may see and understand.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. "In the first place, the necessity that the people should appropriate the law to itself is thus expressed. Its writing stands over against the writing of God, ver. 2; the writing of Jehovah has thus penetrated the mind of Israel. But, on the other hand, this rigid stone writing, these hard letters, show that the law, even after the preceding appropriation, remains still an external law, standing over against the people. But the sacrifices bring the act of inscribing inwardly to the consciousness—make it a real appropriation." BAUMGARTEN.

2. The paternal city of Hesiod honored his memory by engraving his great poem in full upon lead tables (PAUSANIAS 9, 81). Comp. the descriptive pillars of Darius at the Hellespont (Herod. iv. 87). Στήλη was a post or pillar erected by the state, inscribed with laws, ordinances, decrees of the council or of the people. There were also metal pillars inscribed with laws. Hence παραβήναι τῶς στήλας is a kind of proverbial expression in POLYBIUS for the transgression of the laws.

3. "That the law should be set up upon Mount

Ebal, from whence the curse should be proclaimed, has essentially the same ground, as the fact that Moses gives only the formula for the curse, ver. 15 sq., as the fire upon Sinai, as the prominent position of the threatenings in the law. The law speaks more impressively to sinful man in connection with the curse. Fear must be first awakened. The curse manifests itself throughout in human life—most unquestionably in death. To see the blessing belongs often to other eyes than those of the natural man. It was, moreover, not concealed from Moses that the curse, for the most part, should come through the law, xxxi. 16 sq. As the curse is connected more clearly with the law, so the blessing first with him whom God should send (Acts iii. 26)." SCHULTZ. According to BAUMGARTEN, "the curse appears to be wiped away through the sacrifice; for in the sacrifice Israel judged itself that it should not be condemned by God (1 Cor. xi.). Hence the eating with joy of the peace-offerings, the completing, finished offerings, and that before the face of Jehovah." KEIL (as the BERL. BIB.); in order to show how the law and economy of the Old Testament would denounce the curse lying upon the whole human race for sin, in order to awaken the desire for the Messiah, who should take away the curse and bring in the true blessing.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Ver. 1. CALVIN: "This command tends to the same end as the commands with respect to the door-posts and the fringes of the garments. The stones should be a monument in the land, from which the people should learn that they dwelt there purely to honor God. As the individual dwellings, so the whole land should be holy to God, as a sanctuary of heavenly truth." Ver. 8. PISCATOR: "God holds His law as the unchangeable rule of wisdom and righteousness, and will have it so held." The stones should speak, if Israel were silent. TUB. BIB.: "The O. T. upon the stones, the new upon the tables of the heart, Jer. xxxi.; 2 Cor. iii. 8." [The stones so inscribed were a testimony on the part of the people: 1) that they took possession of the land by virtue of the law; 2) that they held it only as obedient to the law; 3) that these stones should witness against their unfaithfulness.—A. G.] Ver. 5. LANGE: "In this simple, unartistic form, God is well pleased, for the sake of the Messiah, who presents Himself in the form of a servant, altar, priest, and sacrifice." PISCATOR: "In the service of God we should not do any thing out of mere human good intentions, but abide in the simplicity which God has prescribed." Ver. 7. J. GERHARD (just prior to his death): "Such joy is the foretaste of that eternal joy which we shall share in the other world through the death of Christ."

Transition to the Last Third Discourse.

CHAPTER XXVII. 9-26.

- 9 And Moses and the priests the Levites spake unto all Israel, saying, Take heed [keep silence] and hearken, O Israel, this day thou art become the people of the Lord thy God. Thou shalt therefore obey [hearken to] the voice of the Lord thy God, and do his commandments and his statutes which I command thee this day.
- 11, 12 And Moses charged [commanded] the people the same day, saying, These shall stand upon mount Gerizim to bless the people, when ye are come over Jordan:
- 13 Simeon, and Levi, and Judah, and Issachar, and Joseph, and Benjamin: And these shall stand upon [in] mount Ebal to curse [SCHROEDER, as the margin: for a cursing]; Reuben, Gad, and Asher, and Zebulun, Dan, and Naphtali. And the Levites shall speak [answer] and say unto all the men of Israel with a loud [high] voice, Cursed be the man that maketh any graven or molten image, an abomination unto the Lord, the work of the hands of the craftsman, and putteth [setteth it up] it in a secret place: and all the people shall answer and say, Amen. Cursed be he that setteth light by [despises] his father or his mother: and all the people shall say, Amen. Cursed be he that removeth his neighbour's land-mark: and all the people shall say, Amen. Cursed be he that maketh the blind to wander out of the way: and all the people shall say, Amen. Cursed be he that perverteth the judgment [right] of the stranger, fatherless, and widow: and all the people shall say, Amen. Cursed be he that lieth with his father's wife; because he uncovereth his father's skirt: and all the people shall say, Amen. Cursed be he that lieth with any manner of beast: and all the people shall say, Amen. Cursed be he that lieth with his sister, the daughter of his father, or the daughter of his mother: and all the people shall say, Amen. Cursed be he that lieth with his mother-in law: and all the people shall say, Amen. Cursed be he that smiteth his neighbour secretly: and all the people shall say, Amen. Cursed be he that taketh reward to slay [slay a soul, innocent blood] an innocent person: and all the people shall say, Amen. Cursed be he that confirmeth not [setteth not up] all the words of this law to do them: and all the people shall say, Amen.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 9. And the priests, etc. (Introd. §4)—because they were generally the teachers of the law, and were specially to declare the blessing and the curse respectively (x. 8; xxi. 5; Num. vi. 28sq.; v. 19sq.). As xxvi. 16 and xxvii. 6sq. allude to the covenant relation, so we have here the actual transition to it. The repetition of the law, of that which took place at Sinai, through which Israel became a people, and indeed this peculiar people which they were. Comp. v. 1sq.; chap. xxix. Ver. 10. Comp. xxvi. 17. With respect to Jehovah, it must hearken to His law (iv. 12, 30, 36), practically obey it (iv. 1sq.), and especially carry out the following commands which Moses enjoined, ver. 11, through which the erection of the stones for the law, and the setting up of the altar, as also the sacrificing in Canaan, appear not so much in their significance, as in their immediate application to Israel, through which it solemnly adjudges to itself the consequences, the blessings, or the curses, according to its character. Ver. 12. Comp. upon xi. 26sq., 29 (xxvii. 4). The blessings were previously intimated, and are to be regarded as blessings corresponding to the curses which are above delivered. The six tribes for blessing are those which sprang from Leah and Rachel (with the exception of Reuben and Zebulun). Gen. xxix. 30. Joseph appears as embracing Ephraim and Manasseh, as in Gen. xlix. 22sq. Comp. Deut. xxxiii. 18sq. The six tribes for the cursing, ver. 13, are those descending from the handmaid of Leah and then those from the handmaid of Rachel (Gen. xxx.), the first preceded by Reuben (the fallen first-born), and last by Zebulun, Leah's youngest son. Since with respect to both, the curse as the blessing, it is said only they shall stand, and accordingly the distance between comes into view, we may certainly think of a representation of the tribes, perhaps their elders, who descend from the two mountains. Through their position they represent only, do not utter, the blessing and the curse. (SEPP, Pilgerbuch II. p. 27, remarks that at all times, day and night mountains, light and shadow lands, have been distinguished. The northern half of the Meru is the Himalaya (i. e., winter); the southern the Kailasa (i. e., the summer), mountains; Horeb the hoary (frosty) stands over against Sinai, the burning; so also Ebal over against Gerizim. The Arabians call Saturn Hobal, the destroyer, and worship him under the image of the black stone in the Kaaba. Then Ebal would be called after Baal Chronos—(the god of the dead.) Ver. 14. וְעָלָה. Comp. upon xxi. 7; xxv. 9. The Levites—according to ver. 9, and also from the fact that the tribe has its place upon Gerizim, ver. 12—are the levitical priests, to whom the like position and duties are entirely fitting. Comp. Job. viii. 88 (Introd. § 4). They answer (what perhaps is yet questionable), inasmuch as in the blessings they turned to Gerizim, and in the curses to Ebal, and say to all the men of Israel, and indeed with a loud voice, as God Himself, v. 19, and as the law was to be written very plainly upon the stones (xxvii. 8). Knobel incorrectly refers the loud voice to the people. All the people in the following verses include the more widely distant, congregated masses of Israel. Ver. 15. Only curses here. Comp. Doct. and Eth. 8 and 4. The number twelve is in accordance with the twelve-tribed people. As the whole ceremony and the special form of the curses are practical, so also the inward peculiar nature of the examples selected. Gross transgressions incur the penalty, but the more secret and refined meet with the curse, "in order to show that God will in any case visit such sinners, and to instil into the hypocrite a terror of his works of darkness" (V. GEBLACH). מָרַר (kindred with מָרַר)—to sever, reject, curse; one rejected by God and men;—the separation, i. e., to death. The first instance is the secret transgression of the second commandment, whose significance for the thought of the decalogue is again made prominent in this exemplification. Comp. upon v. 8; iv. 16 and ix. 12. Neither graven nor molten. Comp. further xvii. 1; iv. 28; xiii. 7. אָמֵן—firm, faithful, certain; i. e., so be it, and so will we heartily keep it (Num. v. 22; Neh. v. 13; viii. 6; 1 Cor. xiv. 16). Do the plurals וְעָלָה and וְאָמְרוּ, not occurring in the other verses, embrace the six, and six tribes? Or do they correspond merely to the Levites? Ver. 16. Next to the character of God comes that of the parents. Upon קָלָה comp. xxv. 8. The disposition may represent itself in words or deeds, or in the general deportment (v. 16; xxi. 18 sq.; Ex. xxi. 17, 15; Lev. xx. 9). Upon ver. 17 comp. xix. 14. Ver. 18. Not: violorem, qui similis cæco, or ignarum in itinere, or spiritually, 2 Tim. iii. 13, but as Lev. xix. 14. Eye diseases are still as prevalent in Egypt as other types of diseases among us. As one, therefore, readily comprehends the eye-salve—e. g., Rev. iii. 18—so also the conception of a helpless neighbor, as of one blind. Upon ver. 19 comp. xxiv. 17. Upon ver. 20, xxiii. 1. Upon vers. 21-23, Lev. xviii. 20; Ex. xxii. 19.

Upon ver. 24 comp. xix. 11; xxi. 1 sq.; Ex. xxi. 13, 14; Num. xxxv. 20 sq. To the private he now adds ver. 25, the judicial murder embracing both the judge and witnesses. Comp. xvi. 19; xix. 10, 18. Ver. 26. Most comprehensive: to set up, as for others so for himself, as the rule of his life. Non tantum, ut sciat et rata habeat, sed ut etiam faciat. J. H. MICHAELIS (Rom. iii. 81). Comp. Matt. v. 19; James ii. 10; Gal. iii. 10; John viii. 81.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. Comp. upon the previous section 8.
2. Israel must by its own words take upon itself the results or consequences of the law (Luke xix. 22; Matt. xii. 87).
3. Although the exhibition of the curse upon Ebal is at the same time, through the altar, a representation of its being overcome or taken away, still it must ever remind Israel of its weakness and of the possibility of its fall. Thus "Reuben, who, through his fall, forfeited his birth-right, stands at the head of the curse-speaking tribes" (BAUMGARTEN).
4. "It is the office of the law pre-eminently to proclaim the condemnation" (V. GEBLACH).
5. "Every conscious transgression of the law brings the sinner under the curse of God, from which He alone can deliver us, who was made a curse for us" (V. GEBLACH).
6. "The first and last of the curses have the most comprehensive import—that relates to the outbreaking of the original sin, this embraces all transgressions of the law" (BAUMGARTEN).

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Ver. 9. "Silence and hearing, the key to the word of God, to its understanding, and to an experience of the same." Ver. 12 sq. PISCATOR: "The children of the free are for the blessing, as are believers, who are the free children of the promise and heirs of blessing." STARKE: "A type of the last judgment. Either under the blessing or under the curse. Even Levi also." Ver. 14. PISCATOR: "The faithful watcher for souls stands in the midst between the pious and the wicked." RICHTER: "Some think that the blessings are not further mentioned here, because Christ should first utter these, Matt. v." BEEL. BIS.: "They might also observe how our Saviour at another time with the blessings has also announced the curse, as He uttered the woes upon the rich, the full, etc." [Ver. 26. "WORDSWORTH": "Not the bearers of the law are justified, but the doers (Rom. ii. 13)."] Vain are the hopes of men founded upon their obedience to the law. The Amen is a condemnation upon ourselves, and shuts us up to Christ, who alone has set up, established the words of this law to do them, and in whom therefore there is blessing instead of the curse.—A. G.]

The Blessing and Curse and the Renewing of the Covenant—the Last Discourse.

CHAPTER XXVIII—CHAPTER XXX.

CHAP. XXVIII. 1-68.

- 1 AND it shall come to pass, if thou shalt hearken diligently unto the voice of the Lord thy God, to observe and to do all his commandments which I command thee this day: that the Lord thy God will set [give] thee on high above all nations of the earth: And all these blessings shall come on thee, and overtake [reach, come to, fall upon] thee, if [because (for)] thou shalt hearken unto the voice of the Lord thy God. Blessed shalt thou be<sup>1</sup> [art thou] in the city, and blessed shalt thou be [art thou] in the field. Blessed shall be [is] the fruit of thy body, and the fruit of thy ground, and the fruit of thy cattle, the increase of thy kine, and the flocks<sup>2</sup> [young] of thy sheep. Blessed shall be [is] thy basket and thy store [kneading-trough: so the margin]. Blessed shalt thou be [art thou] when thou comest in, and blessed shalt thou be [art thou] when thou goest out. The Lord shall cause [give will the Lord] thine enemies that rise up against thee to be smitten before thy face: they shall come out against thee one way, and flee before thee seven ways. The Lord shall command<sup>3</sup> [May the Lord command] the blessing upon thee [for thy companion] in thy storehouse [gathering places, treasure houses, granaries], and in all that thou settest thine hand unto: and he shall [om. he shall] bless thee in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee. The Lord shall establish thee [set thee up, confirm] an holy people unto himself, as he hath sworn unto thee, if thou shalt keep the commandments of the Lord thy God, and walk in his ways. And all people of the earth shall see that [for] thou art called by the name of the Lord; and they shall be afraid of thee. And the Lord shall make thee plenteous [superabundance will the Lord let thee have] in goods [for good, prosperity, as margin], in the fruit of thy body, and in the fruit of thy cattle, and in the fruit of thy ground, in the land which the Lord sware unto thy fathers to give thee. The Lord shall open unto thee his good treasure [his treasure, the good], the heaven to give the rain unto [of] thy land in his season, and to bless all the work of thine hand: and thou shalt lend unto many nations, and thou shalt not borrow. And the Lord shall make [give] thee the head, and not the tail; and thou shalt be [thou art] above only, and thou shalt not be beneath; if that thou hearken unto the commandments of the Lord thy God, which I command thee this day, to observe and to do them: And thou shalt not go aside from any of the words which I command thee this day, to the right hand or to the left, to go after [behind] other gods to serve them. But it shall come to pass, if thou wilt not hearken unto the voice of the Lord thy God, to observe to do all his commandments and his statutes which I command thee this day: that all these curses shall come upon thee, and overtake thee: Cursed shalt thou be [art thou] in the city, and cursed shalt thou be [art thou] in the field. Cursed shall be [is] thy basket and thy store. Cursed shall be [om. shall be] the fruit of thy body, and the fruit of thy land, the increase of thy kine, and the flocks of thy sheep. Cursed shalt thou be [art thou] when thou comest in, and cursed shalt thou be [art thou] when thou goest out. The Lord shall send upon [against] thee cursing, vexation [perplexity (confusion, consternation)], and rebuke, in all that thou settest thine hand unto for to do [which thou wouldest do], until thou be destroyed, and until thou perish quickly:<sup>4</sup> because of the wickedness of thy doings

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

<sup>1</sup> [Ver. 3. The futures, although allowable, are needless, and take from the force of the original here and in the following verses.—A. G.]

<sup>2</sup> [Ver. 4. Literally: the Ashtaroth Astartes of the flocks. See vii. 13.—A. G.]

<sup>3</sup> [Ver. 8. The verb here and in ver. 7 is in the optative, and the literal rendering should be preserved. It is not a command, but a wish.—A. G.]

<sup>4</sup> [Ver. 20. Literally: from the face of. The accents do not justify the colon here.—A. G.]

21 whereby [in respect to which; because] thou hast forsaken me. The Lord shall 22 make the pestilence cleave unto thee, until he have consumed thee from off the 23 land, whither thou goest to possess it. The Lord shall smite thee with a consump-
 24 tion, and with a fever, and with an inflammation, and with an extreme burning 25 [with a parching, withering], and with the sword, and with blasting, and with mil-26 dew [yellowing (jaundice?)]: and they shall pursue thee until thou perish. And 27 thy heaven that is over thy head shall be brass, and the earth that is under thee 28 shall be iron. The Lord shall make [give (as)] the rain of thy land powder and 29 dust: from heaven shall it come down upon thee, until thou be destroyed. The 30 Lord shall cause [give] thee to be smitten before thine enemies: thou shalt go out 31 one way against them, and flee seven ways before them; and shalt be removed<sup>a</sup> into 32 all the kingdoms of the earth. And thy carcass shall be meat unto all fowls of the 33 air [heaven], and unto the beasts of the earth, and no man shall fray them away.
 34 The Lord will smite thee with the botch [ulcer, sore (elephantiasis)] of Egypt, and 35 with the emerods [buboes, tumors], and with the scab, and with the itch, whereof thou 36 canst not be healed. The Lord shall smite thee with madness, and blindness [daz-37 zling blindness], and astonishment of heart: And thou shalt grope at noonday, as 38 the blind gropeth in darkness, and thou shalt not prosper in thy ways: and thou 39 shalt be only oppressed and spoiled evermore, and no man shall save thee. Thou 40 shalt betroth a wife, and another man shall lie with her [humble her]: thou shalt 41 build an house, and thou shalt not dwell therein: thou shalt plant a vineyard, and 42 shalt not gath-<sup>r</sup> [break, cut off] the grapes thereof. Thine ox shall be slain before 43 thine eyes, and thou shalt not eat thereof: thine ass shall be violently taken away 44 from before thy face, and shall not be restored to thee [shall not return to thee]:
 45 thy sheep shall be given unto thine enemies, and thou shalt have none to rescue
 46 them. Thy sons and thy daughters shall be given unto another people, and thine 47 eyes shall look, and fail with longing for them all the day long: and there shall be 48 no might in thine hand [and not to God is thine hand]. The fruit of thy land, and 49 all thy labours [toil], shall a nation which thou knowest not eat up: and thou shalt 50 be only oppressed and crushed always: So that thou shalt be mad for the sight of 51 thine eyes which thou shalt see. The Lord shall smite thee in the knees, and in 52 the legs, with a sore botch that cannot be healed, from the sole [ball] of thy foot
 53 unto the top of thy head. The Lord shall bring thee, and thy king which thou 54 shalt set over thee, unto a nation which neither thou nor thy fathers have known; 55 and there shalt thou serve other gods, wood and stone. And thou shalt become an 56 astonishment, a proverb, and a by-word [taunt], among all nations whither the Lord 57 shall lead thee. Thou shalt carry much seed out into the field, and shalt gather 58 but little in: for the locust shall consume it. Thou shalt plant vineyards and dress
 59 them, but [and] shalt neither drink of the wine, nor gather the grapes: for the worms
 60 shall eat them. Thou shalt have olive-trees throughout all thy coasts, but thou 61 shalt not anoint thyself [thy body] with the oil: for thine olive shall cast his fruit.
 62 Thou shalt beget sons and daughters, but thou shalt not enjoy them [they shall not 63 be for thee; belong, remain]: for they shall go into captivity. All thy trees and 64 fruit of thy land shall the locust<sup>1</sup> consume [take possession of]. The stranger that 65 is within thee shall get up above thee very high [higher and higher]; and thou 66 shalt come down very low. He shall lend to thee, and thou shalt not lend to him:
 67 he shall be the head, and thou shalt be the tail. Moreover, all these curses shall 68 come upon thee, and shall pursue thee, and overtake thee, till thou be destroyed:
 because thou hearkenedst not unto the voice of the Lord thy God, to keep his commandments and his statutes which he commanded thee. And they shall be upon

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

<sup>a</sup> [Ver. 25. Literally: for a shaking, agitation. Keri holds that  $\text{לְרָגַל}$  is here in its original uncontracted form, and not a transposed and lat. r form of  $\text{לְרָגַל}$ .—A. G.]

<sup>a</sup> [Ver. 30. Margin: prepare, use it as common food, or appropriate it to common uses.—A. G.]

<sup>1</sup> [Ver. 42. Literally: the buzzer, from  $\text{לְרָגַל}$ . They were a peculiar kind of locusts—apparently more destructive than others.—A. G.]

47 thee for a sign and for a wonder, and upon thy seed for ever. Because thou servedst not the Lord thy God with joyfulness and with gladness of heart, for the abundance 48 of all things; Therefore [So thus] shalt thou serve thine enemies which the Lord shall send against thee, in hunger, and in thirst, and in nakedness, and in want of all things: and he shall put [give] a yoke of iron upon thy neck, until he have de-49 stroyed thee. The Lord shall bring a nation against thee from far, from the end of the earth, as swift as the eagle flieth, a nation whose tongue thou shalt not under-50 stand [margin: hear]; A nation of fierce countenance [margin: strong of face], 51 which shall not regard the person of the old, nor shew favor to the young: And he shall eat the fruit of thy cattle, and the fruit of thy land, until thou be destroyed:
 which also shall not leave thee either corn, wine, or oil, or the increase of thy kine, 52 or flocks of thy sheep, until he have destroyed [utterly destroyed] thee. And he shall besiege thee in all thy gates, until thy high and fenced [firm, fortified] walls come down, wherein thou trustedst, throughout all thy land: and he shall besiege thee in all thy gates throughout all thy land which the Lord thy God hath given 53 thee. And thou shalt eat the fruit of thine own body [margin: belly], the flesh of thy sons and of thy daughters which the Lord thy God hath given thee, in the 54 siege and in the straitness wherewith thine enemies shall distress thee: So that the man that is tender among you, and very delicate, his eye shall be evil toward his brother, and toward the wife of his bosom, and toward the remnant of his children 55 which he shall leave [keep, as a remnant, save]: So that he will not give [Than that he should give] to any of them of the flesh of his children whom he shall eat:
 because he hath nothing left<sup>a</sup> him in the siege and in the straitness wherewith thine 56 enemies shall distress thee in all thy gates. The tender and delicate woman among you, which would not adventure to set the sole of her foot upon the ground for delicateness and tenderness, her eye shall be evil toward the husband of her bosom, and 57 toward her son, and toward her daughter, And toward her young one [margin: after birth] that cometh out from between her feet, and toward her children which she shall bear: for she shall eat them for want of all things secretly in the siege and 58 straitness wherewith thine enemy shall distress thee in thy gates. If thou wilt not observe to do all the words of this law that are written in this book, that thou mayest fear this glorious [revered, glorified] and fearful name THE LORD THY GOD; 59 Then the Lord will make thy plagues wonderful, and the plagues of thy seed, even great plagues, and of long continuance, and sore sicknesses, and of long continuance.
 60 Moreover, he will bring [turn back] upon thee all the diseases of Egypt, which thou 61 wast afraid of; and they shall cleave unto thee. Also every sickness, and every plague [stroke] which is not written in the book of this law, them will the Lord 62 bring [margin: cause to ascend] upon thee, until thou be destroyed. And ye shall be left few in number [in few people], whereas ye were as the stars of heaven for 63 multitude; because thou wouldest not obey the voice of the Lord thy God. And it shall come to pass, that as the Lord rejoiced over you to do you good, and to multiply you; so the Lord will rejoice over you to destroy you and to bring you to nought; and ye shall be plucked from off the land whither thou goest to possess it.
 64 And the Lord shall scatter thee among all people from the one end of the earth even unto the other; and there thou shalt serve other gods, which neither thou nor 65 thy fathers have known, even wood and stone. And among [under] these nations shalt thou find no ease, neither shall the sole of thy foot have rest: but the Lord shall give thee there a trembling heart, and failing of eyes, and sorrow of mind 66 [panting of soul]. And thy life shall hang in doubt [hang up over against thee] before thee: and thou shalt fear day and night, and shalt have none assurance of 67 thy life [believe in thy life]: In the morning thou shalt say, Would God [Who will give?] it were even! and at even thou shalt say, Would God it were morning [who will give the morning]? for the fear of thine heart wherewith thou shalt fear, and 68 for the sight of thine eyes which thou shalt see. And the Lord shall bring thee into Egypt again with ships, by the way whereof I spake unto thee, Thou shalt see it no more again: and there ye shall be sold [he will give you there for sale] unto your enemies for bond-men and bond-women, and no man shall buy you.

<sup>a</sup> [Literally: from there not being left to him, all, any thing.—A. G.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. Vers. 1-14. As the blessings were not specified in the symbolical direction with respect to Gerisim and Ebal, so the following detailed statement of the blessing and the curse occurs here in its proper place. It is inserted as a commentary upon xxvii. 12 sq., before the renewal of the covenant, xix. 1 sq., which is connected specially with xxvii. 6. Comp. the parallel passages from the earlier law-giving. Ex. xxiii. 20 sq.; Lev. xxvi. (Deut. xi. 28 sq.). Vers. 1-14. The blessing—Vers. 1, 2. Introductory. Ver. 1. Comp. vii. 12 and other passages. To hear and obey the voice of Jehovah, as to which Israel alone is taught (chap. iv.) is repeated again, ver. 2, as an indispensable condition, and in another form is emphasized in ver. 9, at the middle, and again at the close, ver. 18 sq. For the rest comp. xvi. 19, (ii. 25). In ver. 2 "the manner of the exaltation of Israel is intimated," SCHULTZ, so far as the way in which it comes to pass, for the blessing of Jehovah enriches without sorrow. Prov. x. 22. The blessings and the curses also, vers. 15, 45, are personified, because God Himself is, as it were, in them. Thus the condition, promise, and way to its fulfilment, form the introduction. Ver. 8. Within and without in its whole life. Ver. 4. Comp. vii. 18. Ver. 5. See xxvi. 2; Ex. xii. 84. Ver. 6. Comp. Num. xxvii. 17; Ps. cxxi. 8. Spoken of the individual and of the whole people. (xx. 1). Ver. 7. Comp. Lev. xxvi. 7 (ii. 25). The advance is in regular order, the flight in entire dispersion. Comp. vii. 20 sq. Seven because of the covenant. Ver. 8. The optative form renders it more suggestive and impressive. (Lev. xxv. 21). Comp. further xii. 7. Ver. 9. Comp. vii. 6; xvi. 19; Ex. xix. 5 sq., and viii. 6. As the name of the Lord is to be acknowledged by Israel, in its blessed condition in its own land, so also in ver. 10 by all the nations beyond. (iv. 6 sq.). The name of Jehovah, i. e., Jehovah Himself in His revelation, is called upon Israel, i. e., impressed upon it as the definite characteristic of the people. Not "that it is transformed into the glory of the divine nature" (KAIL) which is not taught even in Isa. lxiii. 19; Jer. xiv. 9, but simply that Jehovah is its husband (Isa. iv. 1) its king, has and holds it as His possession (xii. 5; Num. vi. 27.) The knowledge of Jehovah, His kingly power and glory, His priestly blessing is over Israel. The fear on the part of the nations is the first result, but that is only the one aspect. Comp. upon ii. 25. Ver. 11, according to OTHERS, to give the pre-eminence. Gen. xlix. 4; ut quasi primogenitus omnibus excellat, sq.; J. H. MICHE. Comp. for the rest vi. 24; x. 18. It is a return to ver. 4. Ver. 12 is to be explained according to xi. 10 (Lev. xxvi. 4). Treasure, store-house. Comp. Gen. vii. 11. Agricultural labor. Comp. xv. 6; here ver. 13 occurs in a like connection. Position of power and dignity, and indeed continually increasing. Semper sursum. Ver. 14. Comp. v. 29; xvii. 11; xi. 28; vi. 14.

2. Vers. 15-68. The curse. Ver. 15, is introductory, as vers. 1, 2. Vers. 16-19 contain a counterpart to the six-fold blessing in vers. 8-6. Ver. 17 is placed more impressively before the fruit of the body. Ver 20 is analogous in form to ver. 7. Instead of the blessing (ver. 8). As it happened to the enemy, ver. 7, so here to Israel. Comp. vii. 28. Instead of: "the threatening word of the divine wrath" (KAIL) which is scarcely fitting here, others: destruction, injury. מְשֻׁלָּח alluding to שָׁלַח, comp. ver. 8. xii. 7. Ver. 21. דָּכַר from its radical meaning to drive together as a flock, thus on account of its destruction: the pestilence. יָדָבַר represents at the same time the contagious nature of the disease. In ver. 22. שָׁחַת שְׁחָתָה shrunk, shrivelled together. Phthisis. Lev. xxvi. 16. Fever, inflammatory diseases, as also the two following terms. Sword, war, but if we read דָּרַךְ then it is heat, drought, (Gen. xxxi. 40). [Blasting and mildew, to blacken and make yellow. The former denotes the result of the scorching east wind, the latter that of an untimely blight falling on the green ear and turning it yellow." BIB. COM., KAIL.—A. G.] Ver. 23. Comp. Lev. xxvi. 19. Instead of rain, the products of the contrary, dust and ashes—or: "and ashes (עָפָר) the more coherent, although not coarser dust, as sand) shall fall from heaven upon thee." [When the heat is very great the air in Palestine is often full of dust and sand, the wind is a burning sirocco, so that the air resembles the glowing heat at the mouth of a furnace." ROBINSON II. 604.—A. G.] Ver. 25. (Lev. xxvi. 17) in opposition to ver. 7. According to others: ill usage, cruelty, i. e., thou shalt experience such treatment, or: a football, ["a ball for all the kingdoms of the earth to play with," SCHULTZ]. (2 Chron. xxix. 8). Ver. 27. Comp. vii. 15. The עֲפָלִים, as the K'ri עֲפָרִים, are ulcers, boils (עָפַל to swell up). The Rabbinical disease of the anus men, and in utero in women, is not alluded to in the text. (1 Sam. v.). לָרֹץ to rub, scratch, דָּרַס from the dryness of the skin. Ver. 28. שָׁנַע from the fettering, binding of the consciousness, thus insanity, madness. עָוָה from the drawing together, closing of the eyes. נִמְכַּח to restrain, to stop the play of the heart. [KAIL holds from the fact that blindness occurs between madness and confusion of heart, that it is mental blindness which is here threatened.—A. G.] Ver. 29. At noonday, either objectively; when the things are doubly clear. (Dualis) or subjectively when there is even to the blind some shimmer of light. As the blind, i. e., doubly helpless. Thus it neither hits upon the right nor completes it. מָא as in xvi. 15 only, utterly. Comp. further xxiv. 14. Oppressed and spoiled. Comp. further xxii. 27. Ver. 30. Comp. xx. 5, 6. 7. K'ri שָׁכְנָה, to lie with. Ver. 31. Israel must see it, as helpless, as powerless. Ver. 32. To God (no might) (Gen. xxxi. 29), i. e., thy hand may not, is not strong enough to free them from bondage. Ver. 33. יָרָא as ver. 29. Ver. 34. What it must see with the eye of the body, takes away the eye of the spirit. Ver. 35. Comp. with ver. 27. According to KNOBEL, KAIL, the joint leprosy; but the latter clause is against that view. Ver. 36. Comp. xvii. 14 sq.; xviii. 33; iv. 28. ["The leprosy excluded from fellowship with the Lord, and is hence followed by the dissolution of covenant fellowship. This thought connects ver. 36 with ver. 35." KEIL.—A. G.]. With ver. 37 at the end, comp. iv. 27. Ver. 38. See Ex. x. 4. Ver. 39. Either: not once gather, or: still less, collect, lay up. Ver. 40. Instead of fall off, cast (KNOBL, vii. 1), SCHULTZ, KEIL, "thine olives shall be rooted out," (xix. 5), by the weather, or by the hand of the enemy. (J. H. MICHAELIS). According to others: thine olive trees shall cast off (the berries). Ver. 42. צלצל from the buzzing tone, or rapid movement of the wings, a peculiar kind of locusts. Ver. 44 is a counterpart of ver. 12 sq. Ver. 45. Comp. vers 2, 15, 20. Ver. 46. Comp. xiii. 8. עולם is that which is hidden in the distant time before or after, here used in reference to the people, and not concerning the individual. [The term forever cannot with KEIL, be limited "to the generation smitten with the curse." It is rather to be limited by thy seed in distinction from the holy seed. Thy seed, seed of evil doers, involving themselves in iniquities of their fathers—upon such the curse rests forever. There is a remnant here also according to the election of grace.—A. G.]. Ver. 47. With joyfulness, which thou hadst, and it went well with thee, (vi. 11; viii. 7 sq.) or with joy and a good heart, heartily. Ver. 49. Shadowing with broad wing, flying easily and rapidly, rushing with a violent thrust upon the prey, seizing with his sharp claws, the eagle swoops upon the carcass; fitting well even to the Roman power, and to all such enemies. Assyrians, Chaldeans (Is. viii. 8; Jer. xlviii. 40). Indeed the more distant, by so much the more barbarous. As Israel would not hearken to the voice of Jehovah, which it understood, it must now hear a language of men which it could not understand, whence instead of any verbal mediation or palliation, the rough, unsoftened violence gives the blow in the case. Ver. 50. According to others: shameless countenance, or: bold in aspect, or: fierce in look. It is well rendered: of firm, hard, features immovable to any mildness, which even the weakness of old age, and the tender years of youth, cannot touch (Isa. xliii. 18; Dan. vii. 7, 23). Ver. 51. Comp. vii. 18. Ver. 52. Comp. xx. 20. Ver. 53. As the siege was so comprehensive (ver. 52, in all thy gates, through all thy land) so it will be exhaustive, there will be no provisions. Comp. 2 Kings vi. 26 sq.; Lam. ii. 20. The conquest of Jerusalem by the Romans, (Lev. xxvi. 29). בכצור ובמצוק, a paronomasia. Others: in the anguish and distress. Ver. 54. He who had formerly despised the ordinary food, grudges (xv. 9) now to those allied to him by nature, love, and fortune, any part of the flesh of his children. Ver. 55. Comp. iii. 8. Such is the eager craving of hunger. Ver. 56. The still more awful case of the woman, the mother. She who once for softness and delicacy let herself be carried, rode upon the ass or camel, or reclined upon the cushions of the litter. ХЕНОСТЕНБЕРГ, Egypt and Moses, p. 285. צ is here of the persons to whom; ver. 57: with Vav Expl. of the thing which she grudged. Others: on account of, because. Or: even towards the very young, the children just born, which she would rather consume. נִלָּשׁ is separation generally, and is not necessarily used precisely of the after birth. The description refers to a birth in helplessness and in the distress of the siege. That which is born generally, or indeed sons, of whom the mother is usually proud. Comp. further ver. 48. Ver. 58. Comp. Intro., § 2. A wider outlook to the time when the book form of Deuteronomy has completed the Pentateuch. [The book of the law, the legislative parts of the Pentateuch; including Deuteronomy.—A. G.]. (Comp. vers. 15, 45). It is in accordance with this that Jehovah appears as the name, as He who has made Himself such a name in His progressive revelation. Comp. further Lev. xxiv. 11; Ex. xiv. 4, 17; Lev. x. 8. Ver. 60; see ver. 27; vii. 15. כְּדוּרָה used as a collective noun. Comp. ix. 19. Ver. 62. Comp. xxvi. 5; i. 10. Ver. 63. Is a bold anthropomorphic figure, but spoken from the profoundest view of the truth, since righteousness on the basis of His holiness, as His mercy according to His love, is in full accordance with the nature of God. As He is glorious, so also He is fearful (ver. 58). Ver. 64. xiii. 18; iv. 27, 28. Ver. 65. Comp. Lev. xxvi. 36 sq. They could not procure rest for themselves, and others will not allow them places for rest; thus in unrest externally, as indeed first inwardly. Ver. 66. Their life hangs suspended before their eyes, as upon a thread, which may be sundered at any moment; thou wilt not be able to trust its preservation; have no confidence in it even. Ver. 67 (v. 26): Would it were evening! were morning! Ver. 68: The bringing back to Egypt! (not through the Egyptians) must form the close which Moses makes; as Egypt was the beginning in the very opposite sense. That is the highest, beyond which there is nothing, that Israel should return to Egypt, to a bondage still fresh in its recollections, and even a worse bondage. (ХЕНОСТЕНБЕРГ: "Egypt is a type of future oppressors, as Shinar in Zechariah"). Comp. also Num. xiv. 3, 4. In ships, i. e., with violence packed in slave ships, and without any possibility of escape. By the way, sq. (xvii. 16) as much as to say: back thither whence thou hast come forth never again to see it; a way which they would never have seen again had they been faithful. Even in the slave markets of Egypt, their look, the curse of God, would frighten the buyer away. The fulfillment under Titus, Hadrian. [SCHULTZ: But the word of God is not so contracted. The curses were fulfilled in the time of the Romans, in Egypt, but they were also fulfilled in a terrible manner during the middle ages, and are still in a course of fulfillment, though frequently less sensibly felt.—A. G.].

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The previously unuttered blessings are here immediately and expressly brought out. It is not however merely for the sake of exemplification, when it here, and still more fully in the curses, descends to the utmost particularity, but essentially to bring before us in such an organism of blessing and curse, the most minute providence; that it is not fortune and misfortune, as accidents, or success and failure as the result of human activity, but that in general, and particular, in all and each one, God Himself rules, works, as a savor of life unto life, and of death unto death.

2. Religion is not barely knowledge, nor merely worship, but is here experience, where one day teaches another.

3. As the blessing, "measured with an obvious moral determination or aim, takes from earthly prosperity its attractiveness; it appears as a gift which may be enjoyed with peace of conscience, as well as with a fear of desecration." (HARLESS.)

4. With a like aim or determination has the temporal distress here, its leading tendency "to repentance and conversion, and the usually morally effective character of the curse and the penalty." (BACK.)

5. "If ver. 12 points to the heavens as the good treasure of Jehovah, then God dwelling in heaven embraces all, and the rain falling from heaven is the sense image of every good and perfect gift, which with divine strength gives success to every work of the hands of men." (BAUMGARTEN.)

6. "That Israel should return to Egypt has the same force as when it is said to man that he shall return to the dust from which he was taken (Gen. iii. 19): is the abrogation and destruction of the history of Israel." (BAUMGARTEN.)

7. If we would understand these curses and blessings, we must retain in Deuteronomy the reference which in Genesis is already directed to the land and the people. This is the theological point of view for this chapter, which proceeds from the promise of God to the patriarchs.

8. [This chapter, in its prophetic declarations, which have been so strikingly fulfilled, contains clear proof of the divine foreknowledge, and of the inspiration of Moses. This is all the more clear since the prophecies relate mainly, and in their extreme and awful particularity, to the curses, which should rest upon the unfaithful people. Moses does not spare his own people, but holds before them the glass of their future defection and sufferings, as he foresaw them. There might have been a motive for dwelling particularly upon their prosperity, but there is no assignable motive for the character of this discourse, unless it is found in the clear foresight given to him of what was to occur.—A. G.]

9. [While God takes no pleasure in the death of the wicked, His holiness and justice demand the punishment of those who disobey His voice, and despise the riches of His goodness. And as He rejoices in all His perfections, so in that sense He rejoices in these displays of His judgment.—A. G.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Ver. 1 sq. TUB. BIB. : "Here is the gospel of the old covenant, which presents to us heavenly blessings under the shadow of the earthly."

Ver. 15. STARKE : "O man, thou art troubled about the future, thou questionest the stars and the calendar; take this chapter, which sets before thee blessing and happiness if thou wilt obey God, curse and distress if thou wilt not obey. The horoscope (calendar) for time and eternity."

BERL. BIB. : "In the perverted all is perverted." Vers. 29, 31 sq. RICHTER : "Believers must often suffer wrong, but they have ever a Saviour. In their hands there is might, even in prayer."

Ver. 36 sq. This is the history of the Jews, written by God Himself. The history of Israel a judgment of God. [Has not all human history this character? Is it not a process of judgment? —A. G.]

Ver. 47 sq. BERL. BIB. : "If we will not serve God, then we must be slaves of lust, serve sin, the world, and the devil, and that with a pining spirit, which can find no rest nor satisfaction therein, but must starve in it." The service of the world is a wretched service (as that of the lost son among the swine). How blessed on the other hand is the servant of God, here and hereafter—Israel under the curse of God at home, ver. 16 sq.; 38 sq.; and abroad, ver. 36 sq.; 47 sq.—Ver. 48. RICHTER : "First the stubborn neck, then the iron yoke."—Ver. 49. God has rods even far off for disobedient children.—Ver. 58. The voice out of the fire upon Sinai, to which Israel was warned continually to hearken, began with the name Jehovah; I am Jehovah. Shall we not fear before Him who is the true object of fear; it is the root of all true joyfulness, especially as Jehovah, i. e., Jesus Christ is the same yesterday, to-day and for ever.—Ver. 68. BAUMGARTEN : "It is included in the idea of all divine acts, that they are performed with perfect joy."

Ver. 66. Many of the Christian fathers have referred this verse to Christ, the life, whom Israel hung upon the cross, and in whom they would not believe. BAUMGARTEN : "This was the condition of the Jews in the Persian kingdom, according to the book of Esther, and is their condition in the Turkish empire down to the present time." (Comp. DA COSTA, Israel and the Nations, also the well-known book of KNIR for the fulfillment). [See also Dean Jackson on the Creed.

Ver. 46. For ever; yet the remnant, Rom. ix. 27; and the 11th chap. would be saved.—A. G.]

CHAPTER XXIX. 1-29.

- 1 THESE are the words of the covenant which the Lord commanded Moses to make [to close] with the children of Israel in the land of Moab, besides the covenant which he made [closed] with them in Horeb. And Moses called unto all Israel, and said unto them, Ye have seen all that the Lord did before your eyes in the land of Egypt unto Pharaoh, and unto all his servants, and unto all his land.
- 3 The great temptations which thine eyes have seen, the signs, and those great mira-

4 cles: [And (yet)] Yet the Lord hath not given you an heart to [know, understand] 5 perceive, and eyes to see, and ears to hear, unto this day. And I have led [let, made you go] you forty years in the wilderness: your clothes are not waxen old 6 upon you, and thy shoe is not waxen old upon thy foot. Ye have not eaten bread, neither have ye drunk wine or strong drink: that ye might know that [(for)] I am 7 the Lord your God. And when [Then] ye came unto this place, [and] Sihon the king of Heshbon, and Og the king of Bashan, came out against us unto battle, and 8 we smote them: And we took their land, and gave it for an inheritance unto the 9 Reubenites, and to the Gadites, and to the half-tribe of Manasseh. Keep therefore the words of this covenant, and do them, that ye may prosper in<sup>1</sup> [fix, fasten, make 10 sure] all that ye do. Ye stand this day all of you before the Lord your God; your captains of [om. of] your tribes, your elders, and your officers, with [om. with] 11 all the men of Israel, Your little ones, your wives, and thy stranger that is in thy 12 camp, from the hewer of thy wood, unto the drawer of thy water: That thou shouldest enter [margin: pass] into covenant with [the covenant of] the Lord thy God, and into his oath [curse, imprecation] which the Lord thy God maketh with 13 thee this day: That he may establish [set up] thee to-day for a people unto himself, and that he may be unto thee a God, as he hath said [promised] unto thee, 14 and as he hath sworn unto thy fathers, to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob. Neither with you only [you, you only] do I make this covenant and this oath [this 15 curse]; But with him that standeth here with us this day before the Lord our God, 16 and also with him that is not here with us this day: (For ye know [ye, ye know] how [that] we have dwelt in the land of Egypt; and how we came through the 17 nations [heathen] which ye passed by; And ye have seen their abominations, and their idols<sup>2</sup> [detestable things], wood and stone, silver and gold, which were among 18 them:) Lest there should be among you man, or woman, or family, or tribe, whose heart turneth away this day from the Lord our God, to go and serve the gods of these nations [heathen]; lest there should be among you a root that beareth gall<sup>3</sup> 19 [poison] and wormwood; And it come to pass, when he heareth the words of this curse,<sup>4</sup> that he bless himself in his heart, saying, I shall have peace [salvation, prosperity], though [for] I walk in the imagination [margin: stubbornness] of mine heart, to add<sup>5</sup> drunkenness to thirst [to the end that the drunken may carry away the thirst-20 ing]: The Lord will not spare [release from punishment, forgive] him, but then the anger of the Lord and his jealousy shall smoke against that man, and all the curses [the whole curse] that are written in this book shall lie upon him, and the 21 Lord shall blot out his name from under heaven. And the Lord shall separate him unto evil [destruction, ruin] out of all the tribes of Israel according to all the curses of the covenant that are [om. that are] written in this book of the 22 law: So that the generation to come of your children that shall rise up after you, and the stranger that shall come from a far land, shall say, when they see the plagues of that [this] land, and the sicknesses which the Lord hath 23 laid upon it<sup>6</sup> [with which Jehovah makes sick in it]: And that<sup>7</sup> the whole land thereof is brimstone, and salt, and burning, that it is not sown, nor beareth, nor any grass groweth therein, like the overthrow of Sodom, and Gomorrah, Admah, 24 and Zeboim, which the Lord overthrew in his anger and in his wrath: Even all nations [The heathen] shall say, Wherefore hath the Lord done thus unto this 25 land? what meaneth the heat of this great anger? Then men shall say [answer], Because they have forsaken the covenant of the Lord God of their fathers, which he made [closed] with them when he brought them forth out of the land of Egypt:

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

<sup>1</sup> [Ver. 9. Literally: that ye may act wisely.—A. G.]
<sup>2</sup> [Ver. 17. Margin: dungy gods, from the shape of the ordure. Literally, thin clods or balls, as that which can be rolled about.—A. G.]
<sup>3</sup> [Ver. 18. Margin and Hebrew: שִׁקְקָה, weed, a plant of bitter taste, but not necessarily poisonous. Most probably the poppy, as we speak of poppy heads.—A. G.]
<sup>4</sup> [Ver. 19. The same word rendered oath, vers. 12, 14, but which SCHAEFER renders, in every case curse.—A. G.]
<sup>5</sup> [Ver. 19. וַיִּשְׁבֹּר here is not to add—a sense which it rarely has unless followed by וַיִּשְׁבֹּר, but to sweep away, destroy, as in Num. xvi. 26; Gen. xix. 15, 17.—A. G.]
<sup>6</sup> [Ver. 22. Margin: wherewith the Lord hath made it sick.—A. G.]
<sup>7</sup> [Ver. 23. The italics should be omitted, and we should read: brimstone and salt and burning, the whole land. The nouns are in apposition with strokes, plagues, ver. 22.—A. G.]

26 For they went and served other gods, and worshipped them, gods whom they knew 27 not, and whom he had not given [literally, divided] unto them: And the anger of the Lord was kindled against this land, to bring upon it all the curses that are 28 written in this book: And the Lord rooted them out of their land in anger and in wrath, and in great indignation, and cast them into another land, as it is this day.
 29 The secret things belong unto the Lord our God: but those things which are revealed belong unto us, and to our children<sup>a</sup> for ever, that we may do all the words of this law.

<sup>a</sup> [Ver. 29. The pointing of the Hebrew here is peculiar, as if to draw attention to what is said.—A. G.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. Ver. 1. [This verse is, in most editions of the Hebrew text, added to the chap. xxviii., and regarded as a recapitulation of what had been said. Our version follows the Sept. and Vulg.—A. G.] After the command for the setting up of the law in the land (chap. xxviii. 1 sq.), and after the reception of this act in its whole bearing on the part of Israel (xxviii. 11 sq.) especially since chap. xxviii. has explained so minutely the blessing and the curse, this verse cannot be viewed as closing this full detail of the consequences of the covenant, or the whole discourse beginning with the fifth chapter. "The repetition, inculcation and completion of the divine law" (KNOBEL) cannot be viewed by the author as a "repetition and renewing of the covenant," but rather as preparatory to it, since the law itself is the foundation of the covenant at Sinai. The discourse upon the law, chap. v. sq., closes at chap. xxvi. 16 sq., with a distinct reference to chap. v. 1. This verse, as is expressly said, effects the transition, and forms the title to what follows. Where, i. e. on one side God has once more clearly made known His will, and on the other side the people say, Yea and Amen to all, there the way for the making, closing the covenant is prepared, which now therefore occurs.—These are the words, i. e. the following words constitute the covenant; only words are now necessary; Moses has merely to speak; for what was to be done besides had been done at Horeb, Ex. xxiv. and Ex. xxxiv. (comp. Deut. v. and x.). That חָצַק, to divide, out, with חָצַק, is literally: to slay the sacrifice of the covenant, does not hinder us from understanding it here according to the whole method of Deuteronomy in a figurative sense, but with a back reference to the literal. It is worthy of notice also, for what follows, that Moses forms or closes the covenant in Moab, just as God did at Horeb. Thus the instrument and the founder are connected together in the prefiguring and prefiguration of the only Messiah. (The comparison with Lev. xxvi. 46 points already to chap. xxx.)

2. Vers. 2-9. Since discourses constitute what follows, as throughout in Deuteronomy, so here, ver. 2: And Moses called, sq. (KNOBEL: "to another day;" HERXHEIMER: "to those already gathered"); comp. v. 1. The forming of the covenant now parallel to that at Horeb. But how it stands with the covenant appears here at once through the recalling that to mind which Jehovah had done for Israel. Since they are reminded of these acts, and first of that allfundamental work of the Lord in Egypt, so truly "this covenant, notwithstanding the frequent transgressions on the part of the nation, has not been abrogated on the part of God" (KELL); indeed its strength is generally, that it is the covenant of God with Israel, into which Israel has only to enter or pass (ver. 12). Comp. besides iv. 9; xi. 2. Ver. 8. Comp. iv. 34; vii. 19. Ver. 4. Comp. upon v. 28.—Hath not given—in this connection certainly much as: He could not give, therefore he hath not given. It is not said to excuse the people, but thus the ever-returning allusion to the works and wonders of God finds its ground and motives. Jehovah wrought in Egypt; but what He truly would have done to Israel—not only its external, but its inward real redemption—this gift of God was not actually bestowed; comp. viii. 8, 5. They saw indeed, but they were deficient in the right eye (Isa. vi. 10; Jer. v. 21; Matt. xiii. 13), namely, in heart-knowledge (knowledge out of the innermost life), in the eye of faith, in obedience.—[They had it not because they had not asked for it, or felt the need of it. It was not given because they were not prepared to receive the gift.—A. G.]—iv. 6 (comp. further i. 82; ix. 6; xxiii. 24). As ver. 1 shows, Moses and Jehovah work together (xi. 13 sq.). Ver. 5. Comp. viii. 2 sq. The leading through the wilderness is the building upon the foundation laid in the redemption from Egypt. Ver. 6. Comp. viii. 8; also xiv. 28. Ver. 7 sq. gives the completion of the building through the first east Jordan victories. Comp. ii. 24 sq.; chap. iii.

(iv. 48). Ver. 9. חָצַק, to make sure, firm, i. e. so that all you do may be real, have lasting existence, and satisfy you.—[The ordinary sense of the words: to act wisely, prudently, seems better here, especially as to act wisely in keeping the covenant is the sure and only way to real prosperity.—A. G.]

8. Vers. 10-15. After such an introduction, he draws nearer the case in hand.—This day, generally: the time of the deuteronomic discourses, specially according to ver. 2: the day of the words of the covenant in question. Comp. besides i. 15; xix. 12. Ver. 11. Comp. i. 39, 16. Not excluding those devoted to the most menial services, thus not even the Egyptian followers, Num. xi. 4. Ver. 12. עָבַר, to pass, enter, alluding to Gen. xv. 17 sq. (Jer. xxxiv. 18?), as also in unison with the national name (xv. 12), more distinctly than מִצְרַיִם, with צ (2 Chron. xv. 12; Neh. x. 29; Ezek. xvii. 13) of the full, hearty, entire entrance. SCHULTZ correctly says: that this covenant "is not so much between two parties as rather of one, into which the other has only to enter or pass." Thus the interpretation of this chapter is clear, that it concerns "only a new declaration of the covenant at Horeb" (KEIL), a renewing of the covenant in a discourse, warning and exhorting to faithfulness to this covenant, and does not treat of the repetition of the ceremonial. And this corresponds entirely with the character of Deuteronomy. Thence אֱלֹהִים, from firm, be strong, of the confirmatory oath, usual in the forming of covenants (Gen. xvi. 28), here nearly synonymous with בְּרִית, the oath of the covenant of God, and indeed predominantly upon the side of the curse against the transgressor, thus: the curse-oath, the oath-curse, designates the curse of the covenant (Num. v. 21; Isa. xxiv. 6); and hence as עֲנִי, so also כָּרַת is connected with it. It is not as KNOBEL: "the obligation under oath of Israel to Jehovah." Ver. 18. Comp. xxviii. 9; xxvii. 9. Ver. 14 (v. 2 sq.). Moses in the charge or commission of God. Ver. 15. So comprehensive is the method of God with men (John xvii. 20; Acts ii. 39).—[The covenant was to embrace not merely the descendants of those now living, Israel in its generations, but in its true idea and apprehension, all nations—those far off.—A. G.]

4. Vers. 16-29. Since the covenant has connected with it the oath or curse, so in connection with xxviii. 27 there must be an intimation as to the consequences of an apostasy of the nation from him who will be its God (ver. 18), and all the more so, as Israel had a sufficient experience of other gods, both of their nothingness, and of their contagious nature notwithstanding. Thus ver. 16 confirms (כִּי) what has gone before, and lays the ground for what follows. What one may learn who dwells, goes through, etc.—[Literally: ye know what we dwell, i. e., what our dwelling there showed. Vers. 15 and 16 are not a parenthesis, as in the English version, but are closely connected with what precedes and follows.—A. G.]—Ver. 17. שָׁמַר, the rejected, reprobate, hence abominable, used of the nature of idols, 1 Kings xi. 5. Similarly: מִלִּלִּים, the separated, rejected, detestable. Gzs.: logs, blocks; OTHERS: dung, filth-idols; punning upon מִלִּלִּים (the vain, nought)! Lev. xxvi. 80. Ver. 18. The power of such a spirit of the world; the danger is great, and your weakness not less (ver. 4). So! The discourse is indeed of individual men, but also of individual families, or of a tribe, and as if this day it might be true that such a שָׁמַר, literally, the first shoots of a plant in the ground (deep, root-shoot), were already existing in Israel. שָׁמַר, poison. Gzs.: of the poppy-head, שָׁמַר. The heaped up, pointed. Here bitterness appears rather to form the transition to poison. Hence the connection with wormwood, Heb. xii. 15.—[The rosh appears to have been a poisonous plant growing in the furrows of the field Hos. x. 4, bitter, Jer. xxiii. 15, and bearing berries, Deut. xxxii. 32. Anything more definite is uncertain. The view of GZSEN. is perhaps the most probable. See SMITH'S

Bib. Dict., Am. Ed., Art. Gall.—A. G.]—The heart turning away from Jehovah to heathen gods is at first compared to the root yielding this bitter evil fruit, and then ver. 18 is introduced, still more clearly speaking to itself in a soliloquy interpreted by God. The case supposed is of one who, when he heard the curse outwardly, nevertheless blessed himself inwardly; in whom thus the stubbornness of unbelief persuading itself of the utmost certainty of the very opposite of that which Jehovah had threatened against the idolater: hence caring for nothing, as seeing nothing, steadily follows the purpose of the evil lust. כָּפַח, in the following proverbial expression (as in ver. 18 in the figurative), can scarcely be anything else than: so to say, saying. כָּפַח, to remove, Isa. vii. 20; not precisely, to sweep off, Gen. xviii. 28 sq. It is not so much the results upon others which is spoken of as the person's own purpose with respect to himself. הָרָה is the richly saturated soul which has fully satisfied its lust. Hence the effort of one who has so apostatized is for a satisfaction which should remove the thirst; which should continually remove by satisfying, the constant desire. KNOBEL, KEIL: "To sweep away (to destroy) the saturated (who has drunk the poison) with the thirsty" (who is thirsting after it). (The feminine taken as a collective neuter. A transfer from the land to persons.) SCHULTZ: "to sweep in the saturated (filled with good things and courage) with the thirsting (in this respect), empty souls." BAUMGARTEN: "the watered and the thirsty, all the fruit of the land, all good and welfare, a total ruin." OTHERS: "to hurry away the righteous with the wicked (Prov. xiii. 25), understood even with reference to God;" or: that the over-eated, glutted may corrupt the temperate. The interpretation which regards כָּפַח as to add, enlarge, is not to be thought of, as e. g. JOHNSON: "that the drunkenness may increase the thirst." Comp. not ROSENMULLER, but POOL'S Synopsis. To such a purpose now follows ver. 20 sq., the judgment of Moses resting upon the impossibility of any redeeming purpose in God in this case, and carried out to the most terrible completeness.—Shall smoke be not used as a stronger term for the bated breath, but rather as the veil and proof of the fire, which since Sinai is the standing expression for the righteousness of the Holy One in Israel. Comp. upon chap. iv. Comp. for the rest xxv. 19 (Num. xv. 80). Ver. 21 refers formally to the man, but passes essentially to the family and tribe (ver. 18). Ver. 22. Comp. Lev. xxvi. 31 sq. Ver. 23. Comp. Gen. xix.—[The ruin is both physical and spiritual; is true of the land and the people. But the description is borrowed from the locality of the Dead Sea and its surroundings. See KEIL'S Land of Israel.—A. G.]—Ver. 24. An amplified continuation of ver. 22. The answer, ver. 25, is formulated by Moses, as if a reply by the questioners themselves. Ver. 26. Comp. xi. 28; iv. 19; xviii. 14. Jehovah would be the eternal portion of Israel. As Moses has inspired the previous answer, so ver. 29 is his closing word, as a drawing back, in pious submission, from so distant a look into the future. Let us rest, he will say, upon the blessing and the curse, as God has revealed them to us; and it is actual doing, and not knowledge barely, which concerns us. The puncta extraordinaria over the לנו ולבנינו are emphatic.—[But what the emphasis is, is uncertain. The points are not inspired. And the emphasis, whatever it is, is a human interpretation, and no part of the text.—A. G.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. KURTZ: "The covenant in Moab res'ns upon the covenant at Sinai, and presupposes it. Although the generation of the wilderness was rejected, the covenant of the wilderness was not; it had remained even during the thirty-eight years of the rejection. Israel in the plains of Moab is a new generation, a renewed Israel, hence the renewing of the covenant; but they are the children and heirs of those at Sinai, and since that covenant was laid upon all the future generations of Israel, so now it has its renewal through the word, but without the covenant-sacrifices and meal."

2. The redemption from Egypt, the leading in the wilderness, and the entrance into the promised land, as it is introduced by the victories, ver. 7 sq., are three stages which have their spiritual reality also in Christ. Upon the one rests the faith, in the other the life, and for the last the hope of the spiritual Israel.

3. Keep therefore. Ver. 9 announces the obligation also of the covenant of God, whose sign and seal is holy baptism (Matt. xxviii. 20), an obligation which has its conscious renewing and acceptance in the confession of faith, in the so-called "confirmation."—[The allusion here is to the rite of confirmation as practised in the continental churches, corresponding very nearly to our term "uniting with the church."—A. G.]

4. In ver. 10 sq. the covenant appears in almost a New Testament form, yet the significant mark of the curse accompanies it, and moreover the expression reminds us of a mediatory sacrifice (Ps. l. 5): thus the fulfilling of that symbolized at Horeb, "the power of an endless life" (Heb. vii. 16) "the blood of Christ who, through the eternal Spirit, offered Himself without spot unto God, to purge our consciences from dead works to serve the living God (Heb. ix. 14) remains in exhortation." Comp. J. H. MICHAELIS upon the passage.

5. The people of God is so connected with the covenant of God, that it must throughout, and over all, appear dependent upon God. Hence apostasy from Jehovah is the sin in Israel. Idolatry appears with it only as the external mould or form at the time; the essential inward reality is the self-hardening consciousness, whose occasional and changing fancies are the abominations of the idol worship. The self-righteousness of man, by nature, and in his whole life unrighteous before God, is not only a great evil, but literally destructive to men.

6. The transition from the individual to the whole, reveals the earnest look of Moses into the corrupt nature of Israel, and what he was solicitous about in the future of his people; at the same time we see therein the general truth that a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump (1 Cor. v.), and that the Christian Church also is under obligation to exlude the unbelieving and godless, through the office of the keys, for its own good. (Heid. Cate.)

7. "It is farther presupposed that in the future, even the heathen should attain to the knowledge of the Lord, and ask the reasons of that which He had done." SCHULTZ. Such a knowledge on the part of the heathen world, indeed, over against the judgment upon Israel, appears as the future of things, hidden in God, as His decree as to the end.

8. "We should be satisfied with what God has revealed to us of His will and nature in the law and gospel." PISCATOR. [The commands, promises, curses, blessings, and our consequent duty with all necessary truth, are perfectly clear. We may well rest with these.—A. G.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Ver. 1. LUTHER: "Moses must live until he has renewed the law with the other generation." STARKS: "Recall here the new covenant, where God has made with man, through the personal union, an indissoluble covenant of grace." Ver.

8. BAUMGARTEN: "As every good gift comes from above, so also the true sense of the Spirit and the flesh. Israel had shown itself through its own guilt, unsusceptible for such gifts, so that he immediately passes to an exhortation with respect to the same in ver. 9. Ver. 4: Give me eyes that I may see Thy rich grace—The wondrous works of God; the most wonderful: a hearing ear, a seeing eye. Prov. xx. 12.—Ver. 9. RANDGLOSSE: Without the Word of God all our doing is folly. Ver. 10 sq. PISCATOR: God's covenant demands obedience in all positions.—What a breadth and length, and depth and height, Eph. iii. 18. BERL. BIB.: "So Christ commands His gospel to be preached to every creature." Ver. 15 sq. Whoever has true knowledge, knows with whom he has to do (the living God) where He is (in the world) and how weak man is in himself. Ver. 19. RANDGLOSSE: "This is the godless word and thought; ay, hell is not so deep it has no want, the devil is not so awful as he is painted; which does boldly and eagerly all hypocritical deeds, and still looks for reward in heaven." STARKS: "It is a certain sign that a man is still under sin if he make light of the threatenings and judgments of God, abandons himself to his desires and lusts, sorrows not, but rejoices in past sins and in godless society, and will not know God, nor has any desire to serve Him, opposes himself to the punishment, and sins against his conscience." (Eph. iv. 19). TRUB. BIB.: "As the dry earth must be watered, so the godless strives, as he would increase the sins for which he thirsts, to satisfy perfectly all his lust. Or as the drunkard seeks for means to quiet the unnatural desires and thirst, to be able above all else to keep himself drunken; so the godless seeks to make himself even worse than he is, as if even thirsting for evil, heaps up sin with sin. (Matt. xii. 43 sq.; Heb. vi. 8; 2 Pet. ii. 20)." "Self-deception and a false conception of the good estate of Christendom leads most men to hell." Vers. 20, 21. STARKE: "Jesus also purges His threshing-floor. Matt. iii. 12." VOLNEY breaks out, "I have wandered through this desolated land. Great God! Whence so deplorable changes? Why has fortune turned this region so entirely into its opposite? Wherefore are so many cities laid waste? Why are these lands robbed of their former blessings?—A mysterious God, exercises His incomprehensible judgment! Beyond question He burdens this land with a secret curse." Ver. 23. Sin has destroyed the people, but it is the sin of apostasy from the way of God.—Ver. 27. RIGHTER: "For eighteen hundred years till this day." Ver. 29. Comp. Rom. xi. 38. [WORDSWORTH: Secret things. "Especially God's counsel concerning Israel, both as to the choice of it by God, and its rejection and restoration, both as to its manner and time. O Altitudo! exclaims St. Paul. Rom. xi. 38."—A. G.]

CHAPTER XXX. 1-20.

- 1 AND it shall come to pass, when all these things are come upon thee, the blessing and the curse, which I have set [given] before thee, and thou shalt call them to mind [thou turnest it back (takest) to thy heart] among all the nations [heathen]
- 2 whither the Lord thy God hath driven thee, And shalt return unto the Lord thy God, and shalt obey his voice according to all that I command thee this day, thou and thy children, with all thine heart [with thine whole heart] and with all thy
- 3 soul: That then [And (So)] the Lord thy God will turn [turns back to] thy captivity, and have compassion upon thee, and will return [so turns he] and gather [gathers] thee from all the nations whither the Lord thy God hath scattered thee.
- 4 If any of thine be driven out unto the outmost [If thy dispersion shall be at the ends] parts of heaven, [even] from thence will the Lord thy God gather thee, and
- 5 from thence will he fetch thee: And the Lord thy God will [cause thee to return] bring thee into the land which thy fathers possessed, and thou shalt possess
- 6 it: and he will do thee good, and multiply thee above thy fathers. And the Lord thy God will circumcise thine heart, and the heart of thy seed, to love the Lord thy God with all thine heart, and with all thy soul, that thou mayest live [because of
- 7 thy life]. And the Lord thy God will put [give] all these curses upon thine enemies, and on them that hate thee, which persecuted thee. And [But] thou shalt return and obey the voice of the Lord, and do all his commandments which I command thee this day. And the Lord thy God will make thee plenteous [cause thee to abound] in every work of thine hand, in the fruit of thy body, and in the fruit of thy cattle, and in the fruit of thy land, for good: for the Lord will again [will
- 10 return to] rejoice over thee for good, as he rejoiced over thy fathers: If [For] thou shalt hearken unto the voice of the Lord thy God, to keep his commandments and his statutes which are written [the written] in this book of the law, and if thou turn [for thou wilt turn] unto the Lord thy God with all thine heart and with all
- 11 thy soul. For this commandment which I command thee this day, it is not hidden
- 12 [too great, hard]<sup>1</sup> from thee, neither is it far off. It is not in heaven [to say] that thou shouldest [needest] say, Who shall go up for us to heaven, and bring it unto
- 13 us, that we may hear it [and cause us to hear it] and [we will] do it? Neither is it beyond the sea, that thou shouldest say, Who shall go over the sea for us, and
- 14 bring it unto us, that we may hear it, and do it? But [For] the word is very nigh
- 15 unto thee, in thy mouth, and in thy heart, that thou mayest do it. See, I have set
- 16 [given] before thee this day life and good, and death and evil; In that [Which] I command thee this day to love the Lord thy God, to walk in his ways, and to keep his commandments, and his statutes, and his judgments, that thou mayest live and multiply: and the Lord thy God shall bless thee in the land whither thou goest to
- 17 possess it. But if thine heart turn away, so that thou wilt not hear [obey], but shalt be drawn away [allowest thyself to be drawn away], and worship other gods, and

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

<sup>1</sup>[Ver. 11. Literally, too wonderful for thee.—A. G.]

- 18 serve them; I denounce unto you [have I you informed] this day, that ye shall surely<sup>2</sup> perish, and that ye shall not prolong your days upon the land, whither thou 19 passest over Jordan to go to possess it. I call [have taken to witness] heaven and earth to record this day against you, that I have set before you life and death, blessing and cursing [the blessing and the curse]: therefore choose life [so hast thou to 20 choose life], that both thou and thy seed may live: That thou mayest [To] love the Lord thy God, and that thou mayest [to] obey his voice, and that thou mayest [to] cleave unto him (for he [that] is thy life, and the length of thy days) that thou mayest dwell in the land [upon the ground] which the Lord swore unto thy fathers, to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob, to give them.

<sup>2</sup> [Ver. 18. The Hebrew idiom expresses both certainty and totality.—A. G.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. Vers. 1-10. The conclusion of the last discourse of Deuteronomy. Hence ver. 1, the allusion to the blessing with the curse; for although the curse remains the last word, still Israel has not barely, in the fathers, commenced under the blessing, can ever exchange the curse for the blessing, but has lastly the conversion of the children in prospect. (Luke i. 16 sq.). Comp. upon iv. 29, 30. (Lev. xxvi. 40 sq.). For the rest comp. xi. 26. This conversion, which alone takes off the curse of the law, we know as that in Christ. Gal. iii. 13, 10.—Thou shalt call to mind. SCHROEDER, turnest it, i. e., all that is said, and all which it had experienced.—

The heart (from לב, that which contracts itself) designates not only the innermost parts, but the chief organ of life, and hence the self-conscious will. (Luke xv. 17), iv. 39, (1 Ki. viii. 46). Comp. xxix. 8, 28, 64. Thus the consideration of its history on the part of Israel goes before the conversion, the return to the Lord, in hearty and perfect obedience. Ver. 2. (iv. 29).

לך, not אל, not barely the direction, but including the goal as one attained. "The return of the Lord to the captivity, while He had hitherto concealed His face from the wretchedness of His people" (HÄGSTRÖM) follows ver. 8 upon the return of Israel. [The Sept. has the singular rendering, the Lord shall heal thy sins.—A. G.] שׁוּב has as in verbs of motion, the goal of the return in the accusative, as in Ex. iv. 19, 20; Num. x. 36. In all the other places in which it occurs, as a proverbial expression, it is derived from this original passage. In any case this view suits the connection, and especially the parallelism with the return to the Lord, better than the other explanation. MEIER, KEIL: To put an end to the captivity, to turn the imprisonment. GRS., HUPF., as already J. H. MICHAELIS, KNOBEL, in a transitive sense likewise, but questionable (since it gives the Kal the force of the Hiphil); to turn back the captivity, or the captives. שׁוּבָת as it is alternately pointed by Masoretic punctuators) from שׁוּבָה to sweep away, to lead captive, is an abstract form designating the condition. It is impossible, in this connection, to take the abstract for the concrete, since the leading back of the captives, the gathering of Israel from the heathen, appears as the consequence of שׁוּבָת—

שׁוּבָה. Comp. Jer. xxix. 14; xxx. 8, 18. As there the consideration of what had been experienced, i. e., the bringing it back to heart, preceded the return of Israel to the Lord, so now, the leading back of Israel, the gathering of His people out from all the nations, follows upon the return of the Lord to His people. The expression, have compassion upon thee, which as is conceded, appears in the earlier prophets, and has no necessary connection therefore with the Babylonian exile, but as there used refers rather to the time of the Messiah, is moreover satisfactorily explained. (JOHNSON: "Or, so will—have compassion again upon thy captivity?") OTHERS: He will return with thy captives and, sq., (?) The repeated שׁוּבָה resumes the thought of the first, and indeed as a return of Jehovah to His people, thus confirming the interpretation given above. The gathering is the resumption of the compassion, but now in its actual experience. KNOBEL (as xxiii. 14) and OTHERS:—And gather thee again. This gathering even from the remotest distance, ver. 4, is their restoration as a people, to which the restoration (ver. 5) to Canaan, the reference to the land of promise must follow; for Moses, from Genesis onwards, regards Israel in these two relations. To this stand-point of Moses, to which that taken by the prophets, and especially the apostles, is related as πνεῦμα to γράμμα—Moses knows only the entire conversion of Israel as a nation—corresponds now the blessing of the here announced enlargement. Its fulfilment through the Israel κατὰ πνεῦμα from all the ends of the world, as was perhaps intimated by the πνεῦμα Χριστοῦ in the prophets, first became clear after the outpouring of the Spirit, and is stated with peculiar clearness by Paul. [See also John xi. 51, 52, which seems to be in part a citation from the Sept. here.—A. G.] But Moses comes also to this work of God upon Israel in ver. 6, comp. x. 16; (xxix. 8; Rom. ii. 29; Col. ii. 11 sq.; Jer. xxxii. 39; xxxi. 33; Esek. xi. 19 sq.; xxxiv. 26), except that it is presented in the form of the Old Testament covenant sign. On the other hand, Acts ii. 38 sq. ! Comp. further Rom. v. 5—That thou mayest live; SCHROEDER: because of thy life; iv. 1. Life in every way, pre-eminently the true life (John x. 10).—[The promises in these verses have received their partial fulfilment again and again in the Jewish history. But whether the general conversion of the Jews is to be accompanied or followed by their return to the earthly Canaan, may be well regarded as uncertain. This passage, with others, seems to point to a national and local return. The objection to this urged by KEIL, WORDSWORTH, that such a local return would be inconsistent with the promise to multiply them above their fathers, since the land could not well sustain a larger number than in the time of Solomon, is of little force. The land might easily be made capable of sustaining larger numbers if the Lord so pleased. But while there is no difficulty in the case if the restoration is promised, there is reason even in this passage for the opinion that these promises—as is certainly true in regard to the original promise made to Abraham, Gen. xvii. 6—are to be fulfilled to Israel, but not to the “Israel according to the flesh,” but to the “Israel according to the Spirit.” It is scarcely possible in any case to limit the promise in ver. 6. It is fulfilled as the Apostle teaches, Heb. viii. 16—quoting the words of Moses as repeated by Jeremiah—in the Gospel of Christ. The presumption is strongly against any such local restoration; but there is room for the diversity of views which prevail here, and for that comparison of the promises and predictions of the word of God, with His providences in relation to this wonderful people, which will ultimately give the clear solution.—A. G.] Ver. 7. The reverse side of these acts of grace, in the manner of Gen. xii. 8. Viewed not merely as rods in the hand of God, but in their persecution of His people, as hating them, and thus haters of God, the judgment which at all times begins at the house of God, passes upon them. Ver. 8. And thou, sq; or: And thou wilt again hear, sq. SCHULTZ: A continuation of ver. 6, the human result of that work of God. But after ver. 7 there is no such continuation, since the thought in the verse is there closed, in the opposition which is stated. It rather resumes again, ver. 2, partly to supplement the hearing by the doing, and partly to illustrate in ver. 9 over against what was said in ver. 7 still to be performed, the good promised in ver. 5. Comp. xviii. 11; iv. 68. SCHROEDER: For return, sq., or as in our version, The Lord will again rejoice, sq. The same parallel as vers. 2, 8. “Y Ver. 10 expresses, in the connection, the condition, which is so much the more emphatic as it is repeated. The condition is, obedience and faithfulness to the law in all cases, and in case of disobedience or apostasy, sincere, hearty conversion. If the condition is not fulfilled on the part of the people (Matt. xxiii. 37; Luke xiii. 34), when the national consciousness of Israel was just precisely the opposite (John xix. 15) the fulfillment of the promise for the people as such fails also. For the people as such, not for the seed in Israel (Isa. vi. 18), which it now was to the world; not for the ἐκλογή.

2. Vers. 11–14. The condition is the more earnestly insisted upon, as Moses (and thus he comes to the close of Deuteronomy) himself can say, that after his preaching of the law, Israel has no true excuse; he himself must condemn it (John v. 45). Ver. 11, (vi. 1; xvii. 8). The law as commanded Israel for the rule of righteousness, cannot be designated as extraordinary, difficult, for Israel, either with respect to its knowledge, or its fulfillment (1 John v. 8). But the main thought, that it is not far removed (neither unattainable generally, nor attainable only with great difficulty), is illustrated more fully in what follows. The heavens are not mentioned, ver. 12, “on account of their inaccessible height,” SCHULTZ, KEIL, which is too external, nor even because the law “was so high, unintelligible, incomprehensible, and demands superhuman powers” (KNOBEL), which regards too much its inward, real nature, and has been said already; but historically, since the law has been announced through the revelation from God out of heaven (chap. iv.), there is nothing more concealed there. Ver. 13. The sea forms first of all the contrast to the heavens, the deepest depths (v. 8) to the highest heights; but here it is not to go down to its depths, but to cross to the further side of the sea. The contrast is between the divine concealment and that which is humanly remote, distant, i. e. belonging to the other side, the other world, as the realm of the dead (Rom. x. 7). The law has both its divine and human side; as to the latter, it was introduced, explained, made so clear to Israel by Moses, that as it does not need now first to be revealed, so neither does it require any further effort on the part of Israel to appropriate it. The law is Israel’s nationality. Through it, it became a nation at Sinai, and it stands in it, and continues its national life through it, as is clearly shown in Deuteronomy. Thus ver. 14: not far, but very high unto thee, since Israel had not only heard it, thus could and should talk of it (vi. 7), but had expressly confessed it with its mouth (chap. xxvii.; Rom. x. 9). Moses indeed could suppose nothing else than that his preaching the deuteronomic discourse had brought the law home to the heart of the people (comp. iv. 9; xi. 18 sq.).—[As to the exposition of these words in Rom. x., comp. DOCT. and ETH. 7.—A. G.]

3. Vers. 15–20. Ver. 15 as xi. 26 sq., comp. iv. 8 sq. Not only that thus setting before them includes all prosperity and salvation with life, and all adversity and ruin and the like with death; but (as expegetical) Israel’s morality is its life, and its immorality its death. This thought distinguishes this verse from ver. 19, and agrees well with ver. 16, where the good was announced which leads to life (comp. vi. 5; viii. 6, 1), as ver. 17 announces the evil (xxix. 17; iv. 19) which, ver. 18, brings death (iv. 26; viii. 19). In ver. 19 now life and death appear as blessing and curse. And finally, ver. 20 (comp. vers. 15, 16), what or who (Jehovah) conditions the life and permanence of the nation. Comp. further iv. 4; x. 20; xi. 22. The conclusion, the head and point of the whole—[“He is thy life, that is Christ, see John xiv. 6; 1 John v. 12, 20; Deut. xxviii. 66; Rom. x. 4–9, which is the best exposition of this text.” WORDSWORTH.—A. G.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. It is thoroughly Messianic that the land of Canaan, and Israel as a nation, are retained in sight in this outlook. But whether the restitutio in integrum of the Jews “is incontestably regarded by Paul, Rom. xi., as national” LANGE. Pos. Dog., p. 1266, appears the more questionable, since in that case there is no μυστήριον referred to in Rom. xi. 25, as this lies clear and on the surface in the passage here.

2. The mystery of the apostle is much more the mystery of Israel, that as Christ is the true Israel, so the true Israel is the humanity in Christ (Gal. iii. 29: 1 Pet. ii. 9, 10).

3. Moses undeniably so announces the dispersion of Israel, that the Roman dispersion may be included, and on the other side it is true that the return from the Babylonian captivity cannot be regarded as the fulfilling of the here foreseen gathering. There remain thus only two views: either we may understand it according to the letter, and then "the conversion of the nation in the totality of its tribes or remnants of tribes" (LANGÉ upon Rom. xi. 25 sq.), must be still future; comp. the express statement by HOFMANN (Schriftbeweis, 2d Ed. II. 2, p. 88 sq.), or we may understand it according to the spirit, and then both the nationality of Israel, is that of the people of God, i. e., of the New Testament Church, composed of Jew and Gentile, and the land of Canaan, the earth under the new covenant. It will not do to understand that literally, and this spiritually, as is done by V. GERLACH upon this passage.

4. The direction to the correct understanding which Lev. xxvi. 42 sq. offers reaches on to the covenant, comp. especially ver. 45 with Jer. xxxi. 32, with which also (more especially Jer. xxxi. 38) vers. 1, 2, 6, in this chapter agree, namely, to the New Testament economy after the Old Testament economy has passed away through its fulfilment in Christ and the Christian Israel. With the ἱσπαλὴ κατὰ σάρκα both as to the nationality and as to Canaan, the εἰς τέλος has come, even to the uttermost, as Paul testifies, 1 Thess. ii. 16, before the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans.

5. So also we must bear in mind for a correct understanding that those among whom Israel was scattered, appear as his enemies, his haters, ver. 7, which, in the sense at first at least conceivable, does not apply to the Christianized nations, while the destructive curse has been actually fulfilled upon the Assyrians, Babylonians and Romans, which permits us to infer a fulfilling (i. e. according to the Spirit), even the conversion of Israel, as it has actually occurred in the manifestation of Christ and through the testimony of the Spirit in His apostles.

6. "A testimony that grace and mercy run side and side with the wrath of God, and overcome the wrath, so far as we return and truly repent." PISCATOR.

7. When Paul, Rom. x., contrasts the righteousness which is by faith with the righteousness which is by the law, that is at the same time a contrast between Moses and Moses, or between the earlier and deuteronomic lawgiving. But he may so much the more regard Moses here, ver. 12, as speaking of the righteousness by faith, since Moses in this whole chapter uses essentially and truly evangelical language. He speaks from faith for faith; the former truly when he generally entertains such a prospect for Israel; the latter especially where he takes into view the return of Israel to itself, its return to Jehovah, its new birth and conversion, as this can come to pass upon no other than the Messianic back-grounds.—[The passage in Rom. x. goes further than this. The apostle not only applies the words of Moses here, but expounds them. He gives their true and full interpretation. However near the law may have been brought to man, the word is very nigh unto thee and in thy heart only, in the preaching of the gospel and the righteousness which is by faith. The heart is so estranged from God, "that the objective nearness and ease of the commandment are never realized by any one until the heart is renewed." It is by the word of faith, the gospel of the grace of God, that they become practicable to us. The question is not, as WORDSWORTH well says, "whether Moses understood all that St. Paul deduces from his words. But it cannot be doubted that the Holy Ghost, who spake through St. Paul, has given a correct view of what was in his own divine mind when he spake through Moses these words." "The word of which Moses speaks as being in the heart is not only the word of faith preached by the apostles of Christ, but the Incarnate Word, the Word who came down from heaven, and has risen like a second Jonah from the depths of the sea, even from the lowest gulf of death. See Rom. x. 6-9, where, adopting the words of Moses here, the apostle says: 'If thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus Christ, and believe in thy heart that God raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved.'—A. G.]

8. Paul the true "Deuteronomiker," i. e. according to his profound and inward understanding of the words of Moses.

9. "The inability for good is not physical, but moral, the inability of the will." V. GERLACH.

10. The spiritual nature of the law as well as its gracious character, appears as we look backwards to the law imprinted in the divine image, or inwards to the law written upon the conscience, and forwards to its full realization in Christ. Coming from God it must lead to God.

11. The demand to choose life, although it turns upon or relates to the possibility of knowledge, is still no mere process of reasoning, still less an empty phrase as to strength and ability; but as through the revelation of God and the preaching of Moses, Israel must necessarily judge that life is the only thing to be chosen, so to the upright the choice must be successful. The demand is at the same time a promise.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Ver. 1 sq. STARKER: "The best method of turning away punishment, or ameliorating it, is the true conversion of heart. A beautiful description of true repentance." The three great steps: experience, consideration, faith—CRAMER: "Saving repentance involves not only a recognition of sin and a hearty sorrow for it, but an apprehension of the mercy of God with true faith, and an earnest effort to reform the life and to obey the voice of God."—Ver. 8. If thou turnest to me, so I will to thee; as thou to me, so I to thee. BERL. BIB.: God is pure love and compassion. Ver. 4 sq. The hand of God's love is stretched out in all places to the returning penitent. Love is in a true sense His omnipresence. CRAMER: "No one has fallen too far, or is too widely removed." — Ver. 6. SCHULTZ: "The first conversion is only the rescuing of one in danger of death. But God gives more." CALVIN: "What God offers in the sacraments depends upon the secret efficacy of His Holy Spirit." Ver. 9. STARK: The repentance of the poor sinner gives true joy in heaven, Luke xv.—Ver. 14. EARL. BIR.: "The essential word of life is the Lord." CRAMER: "When we through faith and conversion have attained the evangelical righteousness in Christ, then the commandments of God are not grievous, then we keep His commandments, and do what is pleasing to Him, 1 John v. 3; iii. 22."—Ver. 20. The question as to our relation to God concerns the very existence of men.

The Surrender of Office and Work as a Pause to the Third Discourse.

CHAPTER XXXI. 1-30.

- 1, 2 AND Moses went and spake these words unto all Israel. And he said unto them, I am an hundred and twenty years old this day; I can no [I will not be able] more go out and come in: also [and] the Lord hath said unto me, Thou shalt not go over this Jordan. The Lord thy God, he will go over before thee, and he will destroy these nations [Gentiles] from before thee, and thou shalt possess them: and Joshua he shall go over before thee, as the Lord hath said. And the Lord shall do unto them as he did to Sihon, and to Og, kings of the Amorites, and unto the land of them, whom he destroyed. And the Lord shall give them up before your face, that ye may do unto them according unto all the commandments which I have commanded you. Be strong and of a good courage [firm], fear not, nor be afraid of [tremble before] them: for the Lord thy God, he it is that doth go with thee, he will not fail thee, nor forsake thee. And Moses called unto Joshua, and said unto him in the sight of all Israel, Be strong and of a good courage [and firm]: for thou must [shalt] go with this people unto the land which the Lord hath sworn unto their fathers to give them; and thou shalt cause them to inherit it. And the Lord, he it is that doth go before thee; he will be with thee, he will not fail thee, neither forsake thee: fear not, neither be dismayed. And Moses wrote this law, and delivered [gave] it unto the priests the sons of Levi, which bare the ark of the covenant of the Lord, and unto all the elders of Israel. And Moses commanded them, saying, At the end of every seven years, in the solemnity of the year of release [year of Jubilee], in the feast of tabernacles, When all Israel is come [In the coming of all Israel] to appear before [by over against the face of] the Lord thy God in the place which he shall choose, thou shalt read [proclaim] this law before all Israel in their hearing. Gather the people together, men, and women, and children, and thy stranger that is within thy gates, that they may hear, and fear the Lord your God, and observe to do all the words of this law: And that their children which have not known [do not yet know] anything, may [shall] hear, and learn to fear the Lord your God, as long as ye live in the land whither ye go over Jordan to possess it. And the Lord said unto Moses, Behold, thy days approach that thou must die [near are thy days to die]: call Joshua, and present yourselves in the tabernacle of the congregation, that I may give him a charge. And Moses and Joshua went and presented themselves in the tabernacle of the congregation. And the Lord appeared in the tabernacle in a pillar of a cloud: and the pillar of the cloud stood over the door of the tabernacle. And the Lord said unto Moses, Behold, thou shalt sleep [margin: liest down] with thy fathers, and this people will rise up, and go a whoring after the gods of the strangers of the land [of the foreign land]<sup>1</sup> whither they go to be among them, and will forsake me, and break my covenant which I have made with them.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

<sup>1</sup> [Ver. 16. SCHROEDER's suggestion here adds nothing to our version, which is literal, and conveys the full sense of the original.—A. G.]

17 Then [And] my anger shall be kindled against them in that day, and I will forsake them, and I will hide my face from them, and they shall be devoured [for a consumption] and many evils and troubles shall befall [margin: find them] them, so that they will say in that day, Are not these evils come upon [have they not found us] us, because our God is not among us? And [But] I will surely [or still] hide my face in that day for all the evils which they shall have wrought, in that [for] they are turned unto other gods. Now therefore [And now] write ye this song for you, and teach it the children of Israel; put it in their mouths, that this song may be a witness for me against the children of Israel. For when I shall have brought [For I will bring]<sup>2</sup> them into the land which I swear unto their fathers, that floweth with milk and honey; and they shall have eaten [they eat] and filled themselves, and waxen fat; then will they [and] turn unto other gods, and serve them, and provoke [reject, despise] me, and break my covenant. And it shall come to pass, when many evils and troubles are befallen [shall find] them, that this song shall testify against them [margin: before them] as a witness: for it shall not be forgotten out of the mouths of their seed: for I know their imagination which they go about [margin: do]<sup>3</sup> even now, before I have brought them into the land which I swear. Moses therefore wrote this song the same day, and taught it the children of Israel. And he gave Joshua the son of Nun a charge, and said, Be strong and of a good courage [firm]: for thou shalt bring the children of Israel into the land which I swear unto them: and I will be with thee. And it came to pass, when Moses had made an end of writing the words of this law in [upon] a book, until they were finished, That [Then] Moses commanded the Levites which bare the ark of the covenant of the Lord, saying, Take this book of the law, and put it in [by] the side of the ark of the covenant of the Lord your God, that it may be there for a witness against thee. For I know thy rebellion [obstinacy], and thy stiff neck: behold, while I am yet alive with you this day, ye have been rebellious against the Lord; and how much more [will ye be] after my death? Gather unto me all the elders of your tribes, and your officers, that I may [and I will] speak these words in their ears, and call heaven and earth to record against them. For I know that after my death ye will utterly [surely] corrupt yourselves, and turn aside from the way which I have commanded you; and evil will befall [meet] you in the latter days; because ye will do evil in the sight of the Lord, to provoke him to anger through the work of your hands. And Moses spake in the ears of all the congregation of Israel the words of the song until they were ended.

<sup>2</sup> [Ver. 20. Hiphil, I will cause them to come. The construction is more direct and simple than in our version.—A. G.]

<sup>3</sup> [Ver. 21. Literally: Is doing, denoting the process already going on, and one which would continue.—A. G.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. It forms as it appears a third last Selah, comprehending the two earlier. In the first Pause we have the designation of the cities of refuge on the east of the Jordan, that the office of Moses as rescuing life might clearly appear; in the second, the setting up of the monumental stones on the west of Jordan, as Moses' work is to place the law in the life of Israel. The office and work, which now in the third pause are surrendered, relate therefore to the whole land of the chosen people.

2. Vers. 1-8. The close. 1) In reference to Moses himself. Vers. 1, 2. And Moses went, ver. 1, is not a continuation of xxix. 1 (HENGST. speaks further, proceeds); the Sept. gives a sense better suited to the connection, completed, closed his discourse. It is literally either went away (BAUMGARTEN: into his tent where he composed his written discourses, brought up to the last point, ver. 9), comp. ver. 14; then we must supply, and after he came again, he spake; or in order to emphasize the personal close, after the actual, the literal discourses were closed with chap. xxx.; i. e., and he came, entered, after his previous retiring from sight. SCHULTZ supplies: anew, "or it is spoken still once more of the discourses generally. (i. 1; iv. 45; v. 1; xxvii. 1)." It is essentially as if it were: he prepared himself and spake. [The BR. COM. regards the word as redundant, but it is better to take it as SCHROEDER and KEL, prepared himself, rose up, or began.—A. G.] Ver. 2. Comp. xxiv. 7 (Ex. vii. 7). The apparent diversity is only that between the personal perception of Moses, the presentiment of his death, and the view of his contemporaries, chap. xxiv. Does he say וְיָמָיו with respect to his birth-day? The announcement of his age stands by itself, and has no necessary influence upon what follows, which rather has its ground in the last clause of the verse. וְיָמָיו also may be regarded as intimating that in the future, with such an age, he would not be able.—Go out and come in does not designate the leadership of Moses, but his personal work (xxviii. 6) and here only that. It is not therefore to draw attention, SCHULTZ, to any falling, declining strength 'JD'. Comp. xviii. 17. The thought is completed first in the last clause of the verse. Comp. besides, upon i. 87; iii. 26. Vers. 8-6: 2) In reference to Israel. It closes his years of wandering under the leading of Jehovah. Comp. ix. 8, 1.—He not directly in opposition to Moses, but emphatically pointing away from Moses to the Lord. Joshua would naturally stand as the one opposed to Moses, but he is rather placed by the Lord as the successor, the continuation to Moses. Hence, as the law-giving is both of Moses and of God, so also the emphatic expression here is equally suited to Joshua and to Jehovah. Comp. iii. 28. Ver. 4. Comp. ii. 8. Ver. 5. Comp. vii. 2. Ver. 6. Comp. xx. 8 and iv. 31. Neither suffer them to sink down, thus to leave them without His guiding hand, nor indeed entirely forsake them (Heb. xiii. 6).—Vers. 7, 8: 3) In reference to Joshua: "the last words from Moses to him." (SCHULTZ). Ver. 7. Solemnly as it is formally in the sight of all. Comp. i. 88; iii. 28. What was formerly said to the people is here addressed to its leader; for what is becoming to them, is not only also becoming to him, but is first truly incumbent upon him. Ver. 8: as ver. 6. Comp. still i. 21.

8. The handing over of the Mosaic work. Vers. 9-18. Comp. Intro., § 2. The writing on the part of Moses, ver. 9, is made prominent indeed because such prominence was generally necessary with respect to the priests, etc., but particularly necessary for the special charge, ver. 10 sq. The significance of the written, fixed form, thus appears already from both classes of officials, the ecclesiastical and the civil, who as permanent, and thus distinguished from the temporary activity of Joshua, come into view with regard to the law. For the priests see Intro., § 4, I. 22. Both the construction with , and the mention of all the elders of Israel, to whom the literal giving would be out of place, as also the whole connection, evidently shows that the giving of the book by Moses is not to be understood of the material book, literally given out of the hand, but as a formal assignment, or an addressing of the law to these persons. Both officers are necessary for the charge, ver. 10; the priests for the law, the elders for the people. Comp. xv. 1.  is a definite time (Ex. ix. 6), SCHULTZ: the time at which the year of release began; KELL: the festival time of the year of release, since he places the tabernacle feast at the expiration of the civil year (Ex. xxiii. 16), КНОБЕЛ: the specified time of the sabbatical year, and indeed at its close. It might designate also the festal gathering (ver. 11). SCHULTZ: "That the people might thereby be incited to spend this year of rest in their employment with the word of God." BAHR: "It was not intended for this purpose, but as a solemn promulgation of the fundamental law of the State, of the embodied covenant with Jehovah, and at the same time for the leading back and restoration, so far as departures had found entrance into the life of the people;" which at all events is better suited to what follows than the view of KELL, that "it was for the purpose of quickening and refreshing the people with the law, etc., in order to make the law beloved by the people as a gracious gift of God," a entirely subjective aim and purpose according to the experience of David, Ps. xix. Moses neither emphasizes the propriety of the sabbatical year, nor signalizes its idea, nor even generally the idea of the feast of tabernacles, but what was opportune for the required reading of the law, i. e., ver. 11: the gathering of the whole people at the place of the sanctuary (chaps. xii., xvi.). Thou, i. e., the priestly and civil magistrate who represents Israel. According to Neh. viii. 1, the priest Ezra. [We learn also from this passage in Neh., not only that Ezra read in the book of the law day by day, but that the book of the law was the Pentateuch, not merely Deuteronomy, since Ezra had actually read from the earlier portions of the Pentateuch. Comp. Neh. viii. 14, 15, with Lev. xxiii. 4, 40. See also HENGSTENBERG, Autken. II., pp. 158-168, and KELL, who well says, "Ezra did not regard the book of Deuteronomy like the critics of our day, as the true national law book, an acquaintance with which was all that the people required."—A. G.]. According to the Talmud: the king. But ver. 12 expressly requires the gathering of all the people in all its parts for this purpose. The object of the ordinance is here clearly and fully declared. Although that object was elsewhere (vi. 6 sq.; xi. 18) sought, yet it is cared for here in the most solemn and public manner. So that every excuse, over against this solemn testimony of the law, even the natural ignorance of the children, ver. 18, may fall away. Comp. further iv. 10.

4. Vers. 14-28. After the Mosaic close, there follows now immediately the divine conclusion, and in the same order or succession of thought, as 1-8: Moses, Israel, Joshua. Ver. 14 is connected with ver. 2, as to Moses, and the actual approach of his death gives the middle term between what is there said and what is here required. Comp. Gen. xlvii. 29. That I may give him, is the new stage, the directly divine appointment, in distinction from ver. 7 sq. and Num. xxvii. 16 sq. Moses goes to the appointed place, Joshua alone with him. We need not suppose that either Israel or its representatives were dismissed (SCHULTZ); it would have been more solemn still if the people in the meantime remained before the tabernacle and awaited the return (Luke i. 10). HEXHEIMER: "Here, for the first time, Joshua stands by the side of Moses before the God who reveals Himself." Ver. 15. Comp. Ex. xxiii. 21; xl. 34; Num. xii. 5; Ex. xxxiii. 9. The pillar of cloud stands high over the entrance. Since in ver. 16 the discourse is still addressed to Moses, it resumes again his death (Gen. xlvii. 80; John xi. 11; 1 Thess. iv. 13), which also serves to introduce what follows, and appears once more in reference to the people of Israel (ver. 8). The people appear as only restrained, kept down. Its nature is to rise up again as soon as possible. —to turn aside, especially from a wife, thus to commit adultery, to run after many paramours, etc. (Ex. xxxiv. 15 sq.; Lev. xvii. 7; xx. 5 sq.; Num.

xiv. 33; xv. 39), Jehovah the husband of Israel, the covenant a marriage covenant. <sup>רַבִּי</sup> of the strange foreign land (Gen. xxv. 2; Josh. xxiv. 23), not as KNOBEL, KIL, foreign gods of the land, since that would have been the same as other gods. It rather calls attention to the fact that Canaan, because of its past idolatrous nature, is a rejected (<sup>רַבִּי</sup>) land (ix. 4 sq.). Upon forsake me comp. vers. 6, 8 (xxxii. 15 sq.); and for the rest, Gen. xvii. 14; Lev. xxvi. 15 (Num. xv. 31). Ver. 17. Comp. xxix. 26 (vii. 16). Others: Many and pressing (oppressive) evils. Israel must pronounce its judgment with its own mouth. SCHULTZ: "They were attributing their necessities and distress to his want of power rather than to his righteousness; the Lord protracts their sorrows to bring them to a better mind" (?) What follows does not necessarily imply this thought, for although there is a confession of guilt, it is only, or very much external and formal. But hence the position of the Lord in ver. 18. <sup>וַיָּבֹא</sup> and <sup>וַיָּבֹא</sup>, as they have turned away from me, so I from them (xxx. 17). Ver. 19. The association of Joshua with Moses in the writing (see Introd. § 2) shows the significance of the written document also for the future consequences; Israel endures upon the progressive revelation of God—for the this here evidently refers to the song which follows in chap. xxxii.—but, at the same time, in the manner there intimated, viz., that the divine revelation must be ever deposited in writing. ("In ver. 16 sq. it was intimated that the song should spring up in the mind of Moses out of the Spirit, which Jehovah, when He announced to him the coming conduct of the people, had breathed upon His servant, and with which he was filled; there is no revealing word of the Lord, which was not accompanied by the efficacy of His Spirit." SACK.) Now therefore—in view of such a future, Joshua also must know from the outset, and indeed from God Himself, with what a people he had to deal, that he might not give himself up to any delusion, but rather in his leading of the people keep their apostasy in mind. Nevertheless, Moses remains the leader of the people while he lives. As xxx. 14, the law generally, so also this song added to it should be sung for a testimony to the Lord against Israel (Luke xix. 22). Comp. ver. 26. Ver. 20 sq. forms the fuller basis and carrying out of the testimony of the song, through what Jehovah had done for Israel, and what Israel had done in return. Comp. vi. 10 sq.; viii. 7 sq.; vi. 8 (xxxii. 15). What grace turned to license! Provoke—despise, reproach, reject me, Num. xiv. 11. Comp. ver. 16. Ver. 21. Comp. ver. 17. Testify. SCHROEDER. Answer, xix. 16. To the law, to Moses himself (John v. 45, 47), there is still now another witness (xvii. 6) [against; literally, before his face]. Israel should hold the court against itself even (Gal. ii. 11; Acts xxv. 16), and indeed down to the very latest Israel (their seed). The power and significance of a sacred song confirmed by God Himself. [Comp. Col. iii. 16.—A. G.] Song against imagination (Gen. vi. 5; viii. 21). Ver. 22. An insertion of the performance of the command immediately (SCHULTZ:) as often occurs, e.g., Ex. xii. 50, not only on account of the great importance of the song, but especially because of the immediate divine conclusion, and hence also barely, Moses wrote, etc.—and then the transition from Moses and Israel to the third stage or person, to Joshua (vers. 7, 8). Ver. 23. And he.—Comp. ver. 14. With this the revelation in the tabernacle closes—and according to HENGSTENBERG, KIL, at the same time, the autographic work of Moses. Comp. on the contrary, SCHULTZ, pp. 88 and 646.

5. Vers. 24-30. The final surrender of the Mosais work for its preservation and introduction to the following song. Upon ver. 24 comp. Num. xvi. 31 and Introd. § 2. Upon ver. 25 comp. x. 8 and Introd. § 4, I. 22. [It is clear that the Levites here are the priests, the sons of Levi, who alone could so freely approach or touch the ark. For although the Kohathites bore the ark through the wilderness, it was still as prepared by the priests; and on all solemn occasions it was the priests who bore the ark. See Josh. iii. 8; iv. 9, 10; viii. 33; 1 Kings viii. 8.—A. G.] Ver. 26. In [at] the side—not in the ark, where were the two tables of stone (Ex. xxv. 16; xl. 20), "but as a commentary upon the decalogue, it was to have its place outwardly as an accompaniment"—KIL, 1 Kings viii. 9; 1 Sam. vi. 8, 11, 15; 2 Kings xxii. (Introd. § 4, II.). Comp. further vers. 19 and 21. Ver. 27. Comp. i. 26, 43; ix. 7, 28 sq. [While Moses appears to have handed over the book with these words, it was simply the words of this law (ver. 24), and it does not therefore in the least conflict with the theory that Moses himself wrote the song, and the blessing which follows. It is only a special part of his work which was then finished and delivered.—A. G.] Thus the song is introduced. The persons addressed ver. 28 are the Levites—those who came together or had remained together for the foregoing purpose (ver. 14). Gather (ver. 12) may be here not any new peculiar calling together, but directed on account of the here added officers (comp. upon i. 15). KIL. "Because the civil authorities must take care that the whole people should learn the song." They are rather regarded as the representatives of the people (iv. 26; xxx. 19). Heaven and earth—verbally according to the beginning of the following song—really because of its whole enunciation. Ver. 29. A communication of that revealed in the tabernacle, but not at all superfluous (KNOBEL). Comp. iv. 16, 25; ix. 12; iv. 30. Evil on account of evil, iv. 28 (xxvii. 15). Ver. 30. It is not said that he read it. (J. H. MICHAELIS: recitavit ex scripto.)

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The parallel to Moses here, in 2 Peter i. 12 sq.

2. "A hundred and twenty years is the limit of life (Gen. vi. 3) for the sinners of the old world. As the mediator and bearer of the law, Moses must experience the whole strength of the divine righteousness." BAUMGARTEN. "This was the noticeable age of Moses, of which forty years were spent in Egypt, forty in Midian, and forty in the wilderness." BERL. BIB.

3. The thorah, from <sup>וַיָּבֹא</sup>, to scatter, spread, e.g., the hand, in order to point to any thing, is instruction, ver. 12. The appointment at the end of the Sabbatical year prefigures the intimation, Heb. iv. 9.

4. The days of birth and death are times fixed by God.

5. The death of believers is even in the Old Testament a falling asleep.

6. The relation of the wife to her husband, that of total dependence, is very instructive as to the correct understanding of the covenant of God.

7. How personally the covenant relation on the part of God declares the symbolism of the divine face, vers. 17, 18.

8. Roos calls the song "a majestic song." because "the only one flowing directly from the mouth of the Lord."

9. "Psalms and spiritual songs serve for the confession of sin, for consolation to the troubled heart, and to remind us how we should order our life, so that we may please God, particularly to call upon Him and praise Him." PISCATOR.

10. It is to be observed that the evil upon Israel, ver. 29, coincides with the salvation of the world.

11. ["The book so received, so secured, so guarded, was not to be kept secret, but to be published by open reading in the ears of all Israel." WORDSWORTH.—A. G.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Ver. 1 sq. The faithfulness of Moses to his office, even to the end. Ver. 2. OSIANDER: "If we should live equally long, still we must die, and often when we least expect to do so." STARKE: "A Christian should put his affairs in order before his end comes." Ver. 3. ZINZENDORF: "The most important condition in all the undertakings under the Old Testament is that the Lord thy God be with thee: unless He goes with us, we may not go. Paul shows that the same desire dwelt with him: the Lord stood by me. But the declaration of the Saviour is most express—I am with you unto the end of the world—whence we are justified in thinking and speaking of Him as present." Ver. 4. CRAMER: "If God promises that He will do any thing, He confirms it by examples from what He has already done." Ver. 7 sq. BERL. BIB.: "It is well when subjects and rulers mutually seek the blessing of God." OSIANDER: "Soldiers should not rely upon their power and strength, but should lay their hopes upon God." Ver. 18. STARKE: "The Scriptures should be taught even to the little children." Ver. 15. STARKE: "Where two or three are gathered in the name of Christ, there He is in the midst of them." ZINZENDORF: "But we have other eyes. Every child of God has spiritual senses, without which he cannot enter the kingdom of God, and with which he knows inwardly and truly the Saviour." Ver. 16. STARKE: "God knows all things and understands the thoughts of men afar off, Ps. cxxxix." Ver. 19. ZINZENDORF: "It is an old and well-known fact that the song is the best method of bringing the truths of God into the heart, and of preserving them there." Ver. 20. STARKE: "We should not be secure in favorable circumstances; Lord, give me only my allotted part, Prov. xxx. 8." Ver. 22. V. GERLACH: "Moses thus has occasion to place his own testimony beneath his work, that he has written down the whole law." Ver. 24. STARKE: "The sacred scripture is not incomplete, 2 Tim. iii. 16." Ver. 26. CRAMER: "God's word is the blessed accompaniment and the true treasure of the Church." Upon ver. 29 comp. Acts xx. 29. Ver. 30. V. GERLACH: "A precedent for many predictions of the prophets."

THE SUPPLEMENTS.

CHAPS. XXXII—XXXIV.

THE DIVINE SONG OF MOSES.

CHAP. XXXII.

- 1 GIVE ear, O ye heavens, and I will speak;
And hear, O earth [hear shall the earth] the words of my mouth.
- 2 My doctrine shall drop [Let my doctrine drop] as the rain,
My speech [words] shall distil [flow] as the dew,
As the small rain [showers] upon the tender herb [grass],
And as the showers [rain-drops] upon the grass [herb];
- 3 Because [For] I will publish the name of the Lord:
Ascribe [give] ye greatness unto our God.
- 4 He is the rock, his work is perfect [The rock, perfect is his work];
For all his ways are judgment [right];
A God of truth [faithfulness] and without iniquity [deceit], Just and right is he.

- 5 They have corrupted themselves<sup>1</sup> [corruptly act against him],
 Their spot is not the spot of his children [sons]:<sup>2</sup>
They are a perverse and crooked generation.
- 6 Do ye thus requite the Lord,
 O foolish people and unwise?
*Is not he thy father [?] that hath bought thee?**
 Hath he not made and established [prepared] thee?
- 7 Remember the days of old,
 Consider the years of many generations [of generation and generation]:
 Ask thy father—and he will show thee;
 Thy elders [thine old men] and they will tell thee.
- 8 When the Most High divided to the nations [Gentiles] their inheritance,
 When he separated the sons of Adam [men],
 He set [firm] the bounds of the people
 According to [with reference to] the number of the children of Israel.
- 9 For the Lord's portion is his people;
 Jacob is the lot [cord] of his inheritance.
- 10 He found him in a [the] desert land [land of the desert],
 And in the waste<sup>4</sup> [waste, the] howling [of the steppe] wilderness;
 He led him about [surrounded him], he instructed him,<sup>5</sup>
 He kept him as the apple of his eye.
- 11 As an [As the] eagle [, he] stirreth up her [his] nest, Fluttereth [settles] over her [his] young,
 Spreadeth abroad her [his] wings,
 Taketh them, beareth them on her [his] wings [pinions]:
- 12 So [om. So] the Lord alone did lead him,
 And there was no strange God with him.
- 13 He made him ride [drive] on [over] the high places of the earth,
 That he might eat [And eat] the increase [fruits] of the fields;
 And he made him to suck honey out of the rock,
 And oil out of the flinty rock;
- 14 Butter [cream] of kine, and milk of sheep [the flock],
 With [the] fat of lambs,
 And rams of the breed [sons] of Bashan, and goats [bucks],
 With the fat of the kidneys of wheat;
 And thou didst drink the pure blood of the grape [blood of the grape, even wine].
- 15 But Jeshurun waxed [was] fat, and kicked.
 Thou art waxen [Thou becamest] fat, thou art grown thick,
 Thou art covered with fatness [art full, gross];
 Then he forsook [And forsookest, rejected] God, which made him,
 And lightly esteemed [despised] the Rock of his salvation.
- 16 They provoked him to jealousy, with [through] strange gods,
 With abominations provoked they him to anger.
- 17 They sacrificed to devils [shedim<sup>6</sup>], not to God [which were not God],
 To gods whom they knew not,
 To new gods that came newly up [from near at hand], Whom your fathers feared not [did not shudder at].

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

<sup>1</sup> [Ver. 5. Margin: He hath corrupted himself.—A. G.]

<sup>2</sup> [Ver. 5. Margin: That they are not his children; that is, their blot. SCHROEDER, more literally: not his children—their spot—taking צִמָּת in the moral sense, as equivalent with stain or blemish.—A. G.]

<sup>3</sup> [Ver. 6. The word used here denotes rather the founding, or perhaps redeeming, and thus acquiring for himself.—A. G.]

<sup>4</sup> [Ver. 10. מִדְּבָר, without form, Gen. i. 2.—A. G.]

<sup>5</sup> [Ver. 10. Literally: took thought for him. SCHROEDER supplies nothing after the לָקַח, and makes פָּ open the sentence, and the apodosis begin at once: as the eagle, He, etc.—A. G.]

<sup>6</sup> [Ver. 17. Shedim. SCHROEDER transfers the Hebrew. The root seems to mean to waste, destroy. GRSN. derives it from the root meaning to rule, and hence renders idols, lords. It is used here most probably with reference to the malignant, destructive character of idol worship.—A. G.]

- 18 Of the Rock that begat thee [The Rock, he bare thee] thou art unmindful [thou forsookest], And hast forgotten God that formed thee [turned thee round].
- 19 And when the Lord saw it, he abhorred them, Because of the provoking of his sons and of his daughters,<sup>7</sup>
- 20 And he said, I will hide my face from them,
I will see what their end [their last] shall be,
For they are a very froward [a generation of perversities] generation, Children [sons] in whom is no [faithfulness] faith.
- 21 They have moved me to jealousy, with that which is not God [through no God];
They have provoked me to anger [angered me] with their vanities;
And I will move them to jealousy, with those which are not<sup>8</sup> a people [a no people].
- 22 For a fire is kindled [burns] in [through] mine anger,
And shall burn<sup>9</sup> [burns] unto the lowest hell [Sheol],
And shall consume<sup>10</sup> [consumes] the earth with [and] its increase,
And sets on fire [devours] the foundations of the mountains.
- 23 I will heap mischiefs [evils] upon them;
I will spend mine arrows upon [against] them.
- 24 They shall be [or are] burnt [wasted, made lean] with [by] hunger,
And devoured with burning heat [fever heat], and with bitter [poisonous sting] destruction:
I will also send the teeth of beasts [wild animals] upon them,
With the poison of serpents [the creeping] of the dust.
- 25 The sword without [From without the sword shall sweep thee away],
And terror within [From within—from the chambers of terror]
Shall destroy both the young man and the virgin,
The suckling also, with the man of gray hairs.
- 26 I said, I would scatter them into corners<sup>11</sup> [will blow them away].
I would make the remembrance of them to cease from among men:
- 27 Were it not that I feared the wrath of [upon] the enemy,
Lest [That] their adversaries should behave themselves strangely,
And lest [that] they should say, Our hand is high,<sup>12</sup>
And the Lord hath not done all this.
- 28 For they are a nation void [ruined as to counsel];
Neither is there any understanding [judgment] in them.<sup>13</sup>
- 29 O that they were wise, that [If they were yet wise, they would] they understood this,
That they [They] would consider their latter end!
- 30 How should one [yet] chase a thousand,
And two put ten thousand to flight,
Except their Rock had sold them,
And the Lord had shut [delivered] them up?
- 31 For their rock is not as our Rock,
Even our enemies themselves being [And our enemies are] judges.
- 32 For their vine is of the vine of Sodom,<sup>14</sup>
And of the fields of Gomorrah:
Their grapes are grapes of gall [poisonous grapes],
Their clusters are bitter [Bitter clusters have they]:

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

<sup>7</sup> [Ver. 19 Our version, while substantially correct, is needlessly verbose, and weakens the force of the original. Better:

And the Lord saw, and rejected,
Out of indignation, his sons and his daughters.—A. G.]

<sup>8</sup> [Ver. 21. The italics are not only needless, but impair the force of the original.—A. G.]

<sup>9</sup> [Ver. 22. Margin: hath burned.—A. G.]

<sup>10</sup> [Ver. 22. Margin: hath consumed.—A. G.]

<sup>11</sup> [Ver. 26. The verb TING occurs only here, and is derived from a root to which GZA. and FURNER assign the meaning—to breathe, blow,—thus utterly to scatter them.—A. G.]

<sup>12</sup> [Ver. 27. Margin: Our high hand, and not the Lord, hath done all this.—A. G.]

<sup>13</sup> [Ver. 28. SCHÜTZER views this as the close of what Jehovah began to say in the twentieth verse, regarding the intervening verses as in a special sense belonging to the Lord.—A. G.]

<sup>14</sup> [Ver. 32. Margin: is worse than the vine of Sodom, taking the וְהָיָה in its local, comparative sense, rather than as a participle.—A. G.]

- 33 Their wine is the poison of dragons,
And the cruel venom [gall] of asps.
- 34 Is not this laid up in store with me,
And sealed up among my treasures [in my treasure-chambers]?
- 35 To me belongeth vengeance and recompense [retribution for the time],
Their foot shall slide [When their foot shall slide] in due time,<sup>15</sup>
For the day of their calamity [destruction] is at hand,
And the things that shall come upon them [prepared for them] make haste.
- 36 For the Lord shall judge his people,
And repent himself for [have compassion upon] his servants,
When [For] he seeth that their power [hand] is gone [vanished],
And there is none shut up, or left [set free].
- 37 And he shall say, Where are their gods, [?]
Their rock [?] in whom they trusted [they trusted on him],
- 38 Which did eat the fat of their sacrifices,
And drank the wine of their drink-offerings?
Let them rise up and help you,
And be your protection [covering upon you].
- 39 See now that I, even I [for I, I] am he,
And there is no God with [besides] me;
I kill, and I make alive, I wound [crush] and I heal;
Neither is there any that can deliver [any deliverer] out of my hand.
- 40 For I lift up my hand to heaven,
And say, I live forever!<sup>16</sup>
- 41 If I whet my glittering sword,
And mine hand take hold on judgment,
I will render vengeance to mine enemies [adversaries],
And will reward [requite] them that hate me.
- 42 I will make mine arrows drunk with blood,
And my sword shall devour [eat] flesh;
And that with [From] the blood of the slain and the captives,
From the beginning [the head] of revenges [of the hairy] upon the enemy.<sup>17</sup>
- 43 Rejoice [Praise], O ye nations, with his people [SCHROEDER: om. with].<sup>18</sup>
For he will avenge the blood of his servants,
And will render [repay] vengeance to his adversaries,
And will be merciful unto his land, and to his people [expiate his land, his people].
- 44 And Moses came and spake all the words of this song in the ears of the people, he 45 and Hosea the son of Nun. And Moses made an end of speaking all these words.
46 to all Israel: And he said unto them, Set [place, direct] your hearts unto all the words which I testify among [against] you this day, which ye shall command your 47 children to observe to do, all the words of this law. For it is not a vain thing [word] for you: because it is your life; and through [in] this thing [word] ye shall 48 prolong your days in the land whither ye go over Jordan to possess it. And the 49 Lord spake unto Moses that self-same day, saying, Get thee up into this mountain Abarim, unto mount Nebo, which is in the land of Moab, that is over against [before the face of] Jericho; and behold the land of Canaan which I give unto the 50 children of Israel for a possession: And die in [upon] the mount whither thou goest up, and be gathered unto thy people; as Aaron thy brother died in mount Hor,

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

<sup>15</sup> [Ver. 35. Literally: To me is vengeance, and retribution for the time their foot shall shake. Vers. 34 and 35 are marked by SCHROEDER as in a peculiar sense the words of Jehovah.—A. G.]

<sup>16</sup> [Ver. 40. Kxi. and Bb. Com. remove the stop at the end of this verse, and make 40-42 one sentence. There is no necessity for this, as the sense is equally clear with the present pointing.—A. G.]

<sup>17</sup> [Ver. 42. Others, following GZENTIUS, take פָּרִיץ here for princes, and render, from the head of the princes of the enemy. But see Ps. lxxviii. 22, which seems to confirm the rendering of SCHROEDER: the hairy head of the enemy.—A. G.]

<sup>18</sup> [Ver. 43. Or, Praise, O ye nations, his people. Kxi.: Rejoice, nations, over his people. The rendering of SCHROEDER is preferable. It preserves the distinction between nations and people which is insisted upon in the song, and supplies nothing to the text. The transitive sense of the verb, if not usual, is permissible.—A. G.]

51 and was gathered unto his people: Because ye trespassed against me among the children of Israel at the waters of Meribah-Kadesh, in the wilderness of Zin; because ye sanctified me not in the midst of the children of Israel. Yet thou shalt see the land before thee, but thou shalt not go thither unto the land which I give the children of Israel.

PRELIMINARY REMARKS.

Literature.—See Introd. pp. 44, 45.

Criticism.—KNOBEL: "The hints as to the religious and political condition of the people leave no doubt that it belongs to the post-Mosaic time. So also VATER, GESSENIUS, DE WETTE, EWALD, BLEEK, and others. Fundamentally out of the assumption that there is no prophecy, and out of dogmatic prejudices (comp. xxxi. 16 sq.; Introd. § 4, I. 18; HENGSTENBERG, Chris., 2d Ed., II., p. 196 sq.). The particulars cited by V. LENCERKE, EWALD, and others, are either to be understood generally, or are directly a misunderstanding. For the rest, the striking remark of LANGE upon the blessings of Jacob (Genesis, p. 650), as to "the reckless disposition of our time," is of force here also. KNOBEL supposes it to be a remodelling by the second Jhivist author, in the Syrian time, of a song found by him, and held to be Mosaic. BUNSEN (Bibelwerk V.): "It is an address at the time of the Mesopotamian captivity (Judg. iii. 7 sq.)." BLEEK: "The Deuteronomist has first given to this song, not originally published as Mosaic, its present relation and position." Comp. further Introd. § 8.

The Mosaic Authorship.—"The most important thing here is that it breathes throughout the spirit of Moses, and in a measure seems to exclude any imitation. The manifold coincidences in the manner of representation, and in style with Deuteronomy are very noticeable—not indeed for those who believe that the authorship of this book by Moses must be rejected on independent grounds, but for those to whom these grounds or reasons are not satisfactory, and who find in the similarity as to style between this book and this song a proof of the Mosaic origin of Deuteronomy, while the Mosaic authorship of the song is not indeed for them conditioned or determined through that of the book, since that speaks indeed for itself." SACK. The ever-recurring figure which rules the whole song is that of the Rock, the firm, the faithful; without a figure, Jehovah (Ex. iii. 18 sq.; vi. 8 sq.). It is thus throughout, as is fitting the Song of God, as it were, a self-revelation of Jehovah. But that which thus corresponds to the divine origin testifies not less to the Mosaic authorship. The unity and simplicity of this fundamental thought, in the first place, guarantees the great antiquity of the song. With the scored "earnestness, to which nothing in the world approaches, save one only," the "fitting yet overwhelming energy," the "profound losing of himself in God and his glory" (SCHULTZ), appear precisely in the second place, as specifically Mosaic. HERDER: "No shepherd people, no mere shepherd ideas of God and the circle of life; a man born and educated in Egypt, to whom Arabia is a second fatherland, the scene of his preparation, deeds, journey, and wonders, stands out clearly before us. The spirit of poetry takes from thence also its form and imagery. No one can mistake the altered style compared with the patriarchal history. The desert of Arabia gives the tone throughout: God is a rock—a burning, consuming fire. He whets the glittering of His sword—He shoots his arrows, which thirst for blood—His angry messengers are serpents, etc. The poetry of Moses is stern, earnest, simple, as were also his life and character. It gleams as his countenance, but a veil hangs before it. The spirit is widely different from that of Job, David and Solomon. Here the rugged, zealous soul of Moses, vexed even unto death, reveals itself in his last flaming song. In this poem appear the flaming mountain, the pillar of fire and cloud which went before Israel, and in it the angel of his face." The "rock" is his dwelling-place (xxxiii. 27), Ps. xc. 1. "The long residence of Moses upon the lofty rocks of Horeb, and the finding of his God upon it, is urged by SCHULTZ in favor of this Mosaic authorship. Comp. also further SCHULTZ, p. 648-650. Lastly, the fact that this song, with its peculiar, fixed, and very perfect method, remains and gives tone to the post-Mosaic poetry, speaks in favor of its Mosaic authorship. "The highest poetic images in the Psalms and the Prophets," says HERDER, "are derived especially from this last song of Moses; for this is, as the primitive prophecy, the type and canon of all the prophets."

[The objections urged against the Mosaic authorship rest either upon the style, or the ideas of the song. The differences in style between this song and the preceding chapters in Deuteronomy are obvious and striking, but they prove nothing as to its authorship. They are just such differences as would be natural in a passage of this kind, and which appear in all languages between the prose and lyrical passages of the same writer. They may fairly be urged in favor of the Mosaic authorship, since they indicate, as the critics themselves concede, a very great antiquity. In many cases, too, these peculiarities point back to similar expressions in other parts of the Pentateuch. Thus, as KEIL says, "The figure of the eagle, ver. 11, refers to Ex. xix. 4; the description of God as a Rock in vers. 4, 15, 18, 80, 81, 87, recalls Gen. xlix. 24; the fire of the wrath of God, ver. 22, points to chap. iv. 24; the expression "move to jealousy" in vers. 16, 21, recalls the jealous God, chap. iv. 24; vi. 15; Ex. xx. 5; xxxiv. 14, etc." The obvious similarity between this song and the 90th Psalm also confirms its Mosaic authorship. The Psalm claims to be the prayer of Moses, and in the judgment of the critics themselves there is no sufficient reason for denying the validity of this claim. KAMPHAUSEN indeed admits "that if it were really certain that Deuteronomy was composed by Moses, the question about the authenticity of the song would be decided in the traditional way."

The objection drawn from the ideas taught in the song rests mainly upon the assumption that any foreknowledge and prediction of the future is impossible, and therefore does not lie against this part of Deuteronomy any more than against those other passages, both of this book and the other books of the Pentateuch, which so distinctly contemplate the apostasy of Israel, its fearful punishments, and its ultimate return and blessedness. These are more vividly set forth in this song, as its poetical character demanded; but they are no less certainly predicted elsewhere. And the question therefore, so far forth, as to the Mosaic authorship of the song, resolves itself into the wider question, whether predictions of the future are possible. The fitness of the song in its style and character, its imagery and ideas to the person, position and life of Moses; its relation to the later poetry of the Bible; its adaptedness to the end sought, i. e. to protest vividly and impressively against apostasy, and to testify to the faithfulness of God; and still more the divine seal set upon this song as the work of Moses, Rom. x. 19, place its Mosaic authorship beyond reasonable question.—A. G.]

The poetical form is in general the symmetry of the so-called parallelism of the clauses. This simple and elevated rhythm of the thought, as it was suited to the Hebrew poetry, was well calculated in the case before us to make a strong impression, to fasten on the memory, and also to aid to a better understanding, and on the other hand also fitted for the enunciation in song and with music. But in particular, three words (פסוק, פסוק) nearly always form a clause, the small words, or those joined by Makkeph, not being reckoned; the two-membered strophes are partly used as grace-notes (vers. 1, 8), and partly (vers. 9, 12) they alternate parenthetically with the doubled four-membered strophes. The whole is arranged as a double song or dialogue between Moses and Jehovah. Comp. vers. 20, 84, 87.

The prophetic character. "The song is poetry in this highest style, only possible in Israel" (שיר), i. e. it has a prophetic character. If Gen. xlix. is "the prophetic life-picture of the future of Israel" (נבואה), so here Israel as a nation; the patriarchal family-prophecy gives place to the legal national prophecy. Israel's position in the world is the prophetic element in this song, i. e. in particular, his being set for the world, his introduction into the world (ver. 6 sq.), his appearance in the world, his position yet to be presented to the world; the future position of the world to Israel in respect to retribution and promise (ver. 26 sq.). As in the succeeding prophets, the final judgment upon all the enemies of God is perfectly clear, so here already the prospect of it dawns upon us (vers. 34, 35, 41 sq.)—personally presented here, because as to form, the fundamental tone of the song is Jehovah, and as to substance the realization of the idea of God through the kingdom of God in Israel was assigned to the following prophecies (at the same time there is a progress here in comparison with chap. xxx.)—and this final judgment concerns every enemy both inward (ver. 35 sq.) and external (ver. 41 sq.), and is partly a retributory sifting, and partly a retributory destruction. The prophetic contents of the song close with this horizon, not avowedly, but essentially Messianic, namely, in the wider sense of that word.

Its character as to its contents. The point of departure, the basis in the present, that which Moses had sufficiently experienced, namely, the apostasy of the people still for the last time proclaimed, more especially the rejection of the first generation, is recalled to mind. Next follows the picture of the future. The approaching already manifoldly described enjoyment of the promised land, with its results in pride and idolatry, also already frequently repeated, is spoken of in the most fearful and monitory method, a real prophecy from Israel's nature and way. The time of the judges gives already a satisfactory commentary upon it. The symbolical significance of this picture of the future for the wider history of salvation. The entire rejection, but also the restoration of an Israel, which shall be the true Israel, and indeed out of the Gentiles. Comp. Doctrinal and Ethical.

Deut. xxxii. and Ex. xv. The distinction: here upon the threshold of Canaan, there upon that of the desert; there at the morning after the night filled with salvation, here with the look at the night, approaching with Canaan, of the corruption of Israel; there pre-eminently the subjection and terror of the heathen, here the judgment upon Israel and its consequences. The unity: as there so here, the rejoicing at the close of the song, because in both Jehovah is the fundamental thought (comp. Deut. xxxii. 8 and Ex. xv. 1 sq.). As "the hallelujah has passed from Ex. xv. over to the Psalms" (הַלְלֵי), so the succeeding prophecy of Israel from Deut. xxxii. If the song of Moses, Rev. xv. 8, has its bud and blossom in Ex. xv., the song of the Lamb finds the same in Deut. xxxii. (We might say with ZIEGLER in reference to Ex. xv. and Deut. xxxii.: "that the latter is to the former as the old wine is better than the new.")

The Division.—Vers. 1-5, the introduction and theme; vers. 6-14, Israel's position through Jehovah; vers. 15-18, Israel's apostasy; vers. 19-25, Jehovah's sentence; vers. 26-48, the execution of the judgment in vengeance and mercy.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. Vers. 1-5. The introduction must indeed reconcile the actual divine address to Moses, with his human historical individuality. Hence, ver. 1, the truly deuteronomic invocation of the heavens and the earth. Comp. upon iv. 26 (82); xxx. 19 (12); xxxi. 28. That they are summoned directly by the law-giver as witnesses is intelligible from his legal character (xvii. 6; xix. 15); and still more historically from iv. 36, since they were participants in the law-giving, in the most solemn natal hour of Israel as a people. They were here invoked only as attentive hearers, as also in Isai. i., which is entirely appropriate, since not merely threatening, but promise also, appears in what follows. וְהָיָה in Hiph. is not used in the sense of to be pointed, to sharpen, prick up the ear, rather in the sense of ready, quick, to fasten, to hold fast (hence the ear as that which receives, catches up); to hearken. Moses here, as Christ, John xv. 22: Had I not spoken unto them? The figure of the rain, dew, sq., is suggested by the mention of the heavens, as also that of the grass and the herb, through the mention of the earth. His song comes from above, whence all good comes which does good, all blessings which produce fruit. The earth should not receive the curse, nor misery, the law is not given for this (Rom. vii. 12), still less should this most peculiar, testamentary work of Moses, and indeed this dying strain of Deuteronomy tend to this end. (לָקַח) to seize, grasp; but the reception is necessary (1 Thess. ii. 18; 1 Tim. i. 15; iv. 9), and hence the term occurs here; and not "merely to make prominent the dignity and worth of his word, as one received, 1 Cor. xi. 23; xv. 3" (SCHULTZ). Power generally, the heavenly (rain), the gentle, secret flow (dew), the mighty, copious (showers, or storm-torrents, heavy rain, thick rain-drops רִבְבִים from the multitude of the drops); are the points of comparison, not the refreshing, fertilizing, enlivening, and the like (KEIL, KNOBEL), which relate rather to the effects of the rain, dew, etc. (עָרַף, only elsewhere, xxxiii. 28; שְׁעָרִים, only here.) Comp. Job xxix. 22, 28; Isa. lv. 10, 11; Ps. lxxii. 6; Hos. xiv. 6; Micah v. 9. Ver. 8 gives the reason for the demand, ver. 1, as also for the fullness of power which he wished, ver. 2, Let my doctrine drop. LUTHER: "It is as if he had said, I will sing a song, which I will begin in so high a strain that no one under the sun can strike a higher strain, or be able to make a nobler song. My best song and best doctrine shall be the first commandment." שֵׁם קְרָא (not שָׁמַע, to invoke as the poets the muses, EWALD, not even to praise), but to proclaim, to make known to all the world, what he had said, the revelation of his being whereof heaven and earth should make confession, in case Israel should neglect it, who therefore is not directly addressed in the following clause: Ascribe, sq. Comp. iii. 24; v. 21; ix. 28; xi. 2. This greatness is not His majesty generally, or as LUTHER: "Ye shall not honor other gods, or ascribe greatness to any creature, all other gods are vain, false and nonentities," but in the transition to what follows, points out already as with all the fingers, His exalted nature, his glory as Jehovah. הָצִי, the Rock, placed first absolutely, and thus given the greater prominence. צָר, the thick, strong, firm. HERDER: "Derived without doubt from Sinai, where the covenant was made which on the side of God as the Rock was everlasting." It reminds us of Gen. xlix. 24. It is the refuge, protection, security, for the forsaken. It presents the name Jehovah by a striking comparison (Isa. xvii. 10; xxvi. 4; Ps. xviii. 2, 81; xix. 15). As alone in His being, so perfect in His work; without defect, without stain, nothing to be supplied, and nothing to be removed, both with respect to creation and providence (HERDER: "Israel often blamed the providence, in its way through the desert"). For his ways are only right, as this is still more personally expressed in the fourth member parallel to the second. מִן־מַלְאָכָא, firmness, the nature of the rock. מַלְאָכָא (xxv. 16) crooked, perverted nature, imperfection, villainess. (The prayer of the Jews in their burial-service begins as ver. 4, which is also found engraved upon their cemeteries and tables.) [How deeply the idea of God as the Rock (Tsur) penetrated the Jewish mind and life, is apparent from its frequent recurrence in names as Pedah-sur, Eli-sur, Zur-iel, Zur-ishaddai, etc.—A. G.]—The theme of the song finds its necessary completion, ver. 5, in the opposite description of Israel. Hence לוֹ שָׁחַת cannot possibly refer to Jehovah; He deals not corruptly with him (SCHULTZ), as already J. H. MICHAELIS: Num deus corrupti sibi (ipsi Israel) sc. vias suas num ille est Israelitis causa exitii? COCCEIUS: Num corruptio ipsi? Nequaquam minime. The subject is clearly the generation, sq. Whether לוֹ refers to Israel (Num. xxxii. 15), or to Jehovah in the Dat. Comm. may be doubtful; the latter appears to suit the connection better. Not Jehovah in His nature, work, ways, attributes (ver. 4), but Israel in its work, ways, nature, attributes, ver. 5, is an antithetic parallel to ver. 4. Comp. ix. 12. We are to recall the apostacy immediately at Sinai, and still further in the wilderness (Num. xiii. sq.). The clause in apposition with generation occurs parenthetically before it. Your ways should have appeared as that of His children (xiv. 1). SACK "they are not His children" is almost too strong. מִלִּפְנֵי before מִלִּפְנֵי, as frequently in this song before the substantive, is an observable idiomatic peculiarity. Their spot (the apposition and the opposition once more), rather: the children of Jehovah, as they should be, and His children as they are actually.—[KEIL: They are not the children of Jehovah, but their stain, i. e. the stain or disgrace of God's children.—A. G.]—(OTHERS: to their own blemish, shame.) SCHULTZ: His children are their own disgrace. [Regarding Jehovah as the subject, has He dealt corruptly with them? No, His children, etc.—A. G.]—The historical explanation of KNOBEL, referring it "to Judah and the faithful in Israel," is needless, since even earlier the children of God (comp. Gen. v. 22), e. g. Noah, the patriarchs, Caleb, Joshua, are thus distinguished, and the idea was always made prominent as simply set over against the actual evil character (Phil. ii. 15; Matt. xvii. 17).

2. Vers. 6-14. Upon the ground of such a theme, of this opposite actual character, there is raised for the future, as the present, the question in ver. 6. מַלְאָכָא, to show, to cause, do, with reference to the recompense, retribution. גָּבַל, as the following context shows (ver. 29), is foolish. GRESNIUS, HUFFELD, of the insipid, stale conduct, wanting the salt of divine wisdom, here used of the forgetfulness of God, godlessness. The derivation from, to swell, distend, and hence to be haughty, arrogant, agrees well also with the context. Comp. i. 18; iv. 6. The fatherhood of Jehovah is set over against the not His children, ver. 5 (comp. ver. 20; xiv. 1; Ex. iv. 22 sq.). The thought that Abraham was only their father in the beneficent strength of the divine promise, seems apparent from the emphasis placed upon הוּא (see Gen. xvii.). קָנָה combines the ideas, to prepare, to form (not precisely, create, Gen. xiv. 19, 22), to acquire, possess. If קָנָה marks the descent from Abraham, then עָשָׂה denotes fully the constituting of the people in Egypt, and וּבְנֵי, the forming or preparation in the wilderness. Comp. upon the verse Isa. lxi. 16; lxiv. 8; i. 2; Mal. ii.

10. In the עוֹלָם, ver. 7 (this form occurs only here as the similar poetical term, שְׁנוֹת, Ps. xc. 15, agreeing with it), the עוֹלָם designates the covered time either before or behind the speaker (iv. 32). From the hoary antiquity the tradition here comes down through generation and generation (the repetition used poetically for the plural), forming the revolution or succession of old men (וְרֵי, the circle or revolving period), Ps. xc. 1. Thus it comes to the fathers and elders (from the bowed, decrepid age, וְרֵי). עַד in ver. 6 is collective, and hence the alternating singular and plural verbs. וַיִּבְרַח (to separate, distinguish and understand)

וַיִּבְרַח, in High.: to bring near, to bring over, to point out, declare. Ver. 8 contains the result of the tradition; a retrospect to Genesis. The separation of the people as described Gen. xi.

עָלִי occurs constantly without the article, and here used instead of Jehovah, and equivalent to the Exalted One, the Highest. When He divided to the nations all their inheritance determined in Gen. x.; when He, the sons of Adam, (comp. Gen. x. 1, 82) dispersed, separated, Gen. xi. (Acts xvii. 26). He did so לְכִסְדּוֹ according to the number, sq., i. e., so that Israel should possess a land corresponding to its population. Comp. also Gen. ix. 25 sq.; Deut. ii. BAUMGARTEN combines the number seventy of the genealogical table, with the seventy ancestors of Israel, (x. 22). [So WORDSWORTH also. —A. G.] Ver. 9 gives the reason for this earliest provision and care. Comp. vii. 6; x. 15;

(Acts xiv. 16). כֹּחַל a cord, measure, then that which is measured by it. Comp. iii. 18. This two-membered strophe forms a beautiful pause or interruption. Thus it is from the beginning placed for the world, Ex. xix. 5 sq. It follows now, ver. 10, how it was introduced into the world, to the ideal follows the real provision on the part of God. The connection is directly with ver. 6. The words form a description of that frequently enforced (i. 27; Num. xiv. 11, 4; Ex. xvi. 2) helpless condition of Israel. Thus even after the redemption from Egypt, thus always indeed with respect to Israel. Instead of Canaan, to which ver. 8 points, the land of the desert was the land where He found Israel. The reference to Egypt, with כִּי, is artificial. As כִּי is clearly defined from the preceding, so it is placed also in reference to what follows, e. g., ver. 18. The prominence given to the leading through the wilderness is genuinely Deuteronomic. Comp. viii. 2 sq., 15 sq.; xi. 5; xxix. 4 sq.; i. 1. As the deliverance from Egypt was evidently presupposed, it is the more readily passed over here in silence because Israel is here spoken of as a nation, and Israel's national existence dates from Sinai, from the wilderness. Found either after he had sought him in Egypt, the one that was lost (Luke xv. 4) without him, or had found out, selected (Ps. lxxxix. 20) since he had closed the covenant with him at Sinai, or simply met with him; thus Israel found itself, began its conscious existence, when Jehovah took it into His school, to train and educate it to a people, (Hos. ix. 10, a description as to the other side). SCHULTZ emphasizes the fact that the Lord first appeared to Israel in the pillar of fire and cloud in the desert, Ex. xiii. 20 sq. The emphasis, he remarks correctly, does not lie upon the finding, but upon the desert land, which is made still more explicit by the (!). The waste (Gen. i. 2), from תֹּהוֹ literally; the dense, close wilderness, where no way is, Ps. cvii. 40. Comp. upon i. 1, 81. Howling: emphasizes the horrible howling of the beasts of the desert, especially in the early part of the night. Led him (compassed him) about—near Him in his love, to care for, (Ps. xxvi. 8) but also to protect as a shield; (the pillar of fire and cloud, Zech. ii. 8). וַיִּשְׁמַר; to keep, watch, preserve. וַיִּשְׁמַר GEN.: the pupil (of the well-known little man, pet, the daughter, for the miniature image of him who looks in the eyes of another), literally the man (וַיִּשְׁמַר) of the eye. Or should one go back to the signification of וַיִּשְׁמַר from which וַיִּשְׁמַר is derived to bend, thus the arched eye-ball. OTHERS: the eye-lid. Generally the comparison intimates that Jehovah had not left Israel out of His sight; the most careful, thoughtful protection, Ps. xvii. 8; Zech. ii. 12. On account of the desert, of the hostile nations, but especially after the rejection of the old, for preservation of the new generation. The first and second, and third and fourth clauses are parallel to each other, as also in ver. 7. ["The whole description of what the Lord did for Israel, vers. 10-14, is figurative." Israel is represented as a man ready to perish in the wilderness, and so found and rescued by God. But there is no design or attempt to bring out in their succession, the events in Israel's history, or what God had done for them. Only those are selected which bear upon the general theme and purpose of the song.—A. G.] Ver. 11 gives the desert figure of the eagle. Israel is the eagle's brood in the nest (וַיִּשְׁמַר a separated mountainous place) in the rocks at Sinai. Jehovah stirs it up, as He came down over it in the giving of the law (her young, from וַיִּשְׁמַר, the stripped, naked, featherless young). Farther: the pillar of fire and cloud was like the outspread wings! Indeed He took it and bare it in His power and love, and with what patience? As the eagle is the subject, the suffixes refer to the nest, or to each individual one of the young. Ver. 12 is a continuous exposition of the figure used. (OTHERS refer alone and with him to Israel). For the rest comp. Ex. xix. 4. (An out of Egypt so in the way to Canaan), Gen. i. 2; Deut. i. 81. It is only a two-membered strophe, as ver. 9. [KEIL: "If no other god stood by the Lord to help Him, He thereby laid Israel under the obligation to serve Him alone as its God."—A. G.] Ver. 18 treats of the partly begun and partly approaching occupation of the mountainous Canaan. With the high places was the "earth," (land) promised to Israel, assured. The occupation of Gilead was the beginning of the victorious dominion (chap. lii.). So the enjoyment of Canaan is described with prophetic foresight, as in viii. 7-10. Comp. upon vi. 8. Palms, date trees growing upon the mountains, as well as bees building their hives in the rocks introduce honey into Palestine; olive trees are found in apparently the most unproductive places. A pleasant, childlike enjoyment, because throughout a blessing. Ver. 14 is a continuation. The specification "testifies to the general faithfulness of the song." (HARDER) the East Jordan land was an earnest of the farther side. חָלָב that which is drawn out through strokes or rubbing, the milk from the milking. חֶלֶב the selected, picked out; hence the fat, generally the best, (Num. xviii. 12) here strengthened still further by the kidneys, the very finest wheat (in reference to the flour) or in the size of the grains. Lastly the bubbling, foaming red wine (Gen. xlix. 11). The last clause here, as in ver. 7, takes the form of an address. The five-membered strophe also shows the poetic fervor. For the rest comp. Numb. xxxii. 1; Ezek. xxxix. 18. (It may be regarded as a four-membered strophe thus: butter of kine and milk of sheep with the fat of lambs, and rams of the breed of Bashan, and goats, with the fat of kidneys of wheat. And thou didst drink the pure blood of the grape). [Fat of kidneys was, as the best fat, specified as a part of the sacrificial animals which were to be presented to the Lord, and hence the figure here—for the finest, most nutritious wheat.—A. G.].

8. Vers. 15-18. The apostasy of Israel comes to pass as was already foreseen, vi. 11; viii. 12 sq.; xxxi. 20. Ver. 15. Jeshurun, found twice elsewhere in Deut. (xxxiii. 5, 26) and in Isa. xlii. 2. Beyond question from שָׂרָא comp. Jesharim, Num. xliii. 10 (Josh. x. 18; 2 Sam. i. 18). It is not a diminutive (GASENIUS: the pious, precise, blameless little people), which is destitute of philological (comp. HENGST.: Balaam, p. 98), proof (the שָׂרָא, ver. 10, referred to, is correctly with (DELITZSCH) rather: the man, if not man-like), and an appellatio blanda et charitativa does not accord well with the serious character of the passage in which "a loving being, but no mere lover speaks," but is perhaps a nomen proprium; the just, honorable man, the just, the righteous; but by no means the happy or the like, not even the justified (CALVIN) although that is nearer the truth. The legal character, the national essence or nature of Israel was expressed in this term. (Comp. ver. 4). Over against the idea of the nation, as it rests in Jehovah, enters so much more offensively the character in which Israel actually appears in the world. A prophetic preterite. JOHNSON sees in Jeshurun a pun, which the figure of the fat and kicking ox (שֹׁר) completes. Comp. Acts ix. 5 (Hos. iv. 16; xlii. 6). The direct address in the second person vividly interrupts, and gives greater energy to the statement begun in the third person. It is not jocosely spoken, as Ew-

ALD, but the keenest sacred irony. [By reminding them of what they were in idea, of what they were called to in character and dignity, he censures more severely their guilt and perfidy.—A. G.].

מָלֵךְ is the pathetic form for מְלִיכָא both in the old and in the later Aramaic Hebrew. Comp. vers. 6, 4. [Lightly esteemed, from נָכַל to treat as a fool.—A. G.]. Ver. 16. The plural form, which gives the poetical coloring, occurs instead of the previously used singular, as in ver. 7. Upon the provocation of the divine zeal (jealousy), comp. iv. 24, 25: v. 9; vi. 15. The covenant is a marriage covenant, (xxi. 16). מְלִיכָא, "those standing beyond marriage, and the relationship effected by it, xxv. 6," SCHULTZ. For the rest comp. vii. 25; xxvii. 15. A two-membered strophe, as vers. 9, 12. Ver. 17. שְׂדֵים. Baalim, lords (1 Cor. viii. 6), Demons? Further comp. xi. 28; xlii. 7; xxix. 25. [WORDSWORTH: "Wasters, destroyers." BIB. COM: "As indicating the malignant character of the deities in heathen worship."—A. G.]. New.—Lately risen in a temporal, as the following clause in a local sense. In both references not God, Jer. xxiii. 28 sq. (SCHULTZ figuratively; not worth much). BAUMGARTEN: Israel had no historical relations with them. To understand the second clause, came newly up, temporally also, is tautological, and is not demanded by the parallelism. The third member is parallel to the first, the fourth to the second. In ver. 18 he renews at the close what was said in ver. 15; there using the masculine, and here the feminine termination. וָרֵךְ, as: to make thick is also to form (רָצָה in the plural: birth-threes) thus in a verbal way reconciling the figure of bearing (רָצָה to break through, of the birth) with the rock; with respect to its source, e. g., the noble metal, may be actually said to be born of the iron stone of the rock. שָׁחַ from שָׁחַ, to forsake, forget, KNOBEL, SCHULTZ, KEIL; from שָׁחַ, to neglect. The direct address appears again as at the close of ver. 14. God as the woman in birth throes (Pa. ii. 7; xo. 2; Isa. xlix. 15; Gal. iv. 19). ["To bring out more prominently the base ingratitude of the people, he represents the creation of Israel by Jehovah, the Rock of its salvation, under the figure of generation and birth, in which the paternal and maternal love of the Lord to His people had manifested itself." KEIL.—A. G.]

4. Vers. 19-25. The judgment of Jehovah upon His apostate people, proceeds upon a personal observation. He needs no testimony, ver. 19. A comprehensive two-membered strophe, as ver. 16, 9, 12. (Comp. i. 34). SCHULTZ: "From indignation at, sq." HERRINGMEER: "On account of the provocation of, sq." [Our version brings out the force of the preposition as well, and is equally as intelligible as those suggested.—A. G.]. Ver. 20. The declaration of the judgment. Comp. xxxi. 17, 18. He speaks after the manner of men (Gen. xxvii. 20). They are no more regarded with favor; He will only see what their end, their last sins and last punishments will be. The reason is their wicked and faithless (ver. 4) way, which with them comes to the uttermost (1 Thess. ii. 16). Ver. 21. The retribution will at last correspond to the offence. NOT GOD, is not a monster (1 Cor. viii. 4 sq.; x. 19 sq.), to which in a corresponding way "not people," would signify "an inhuman people, repulsive and frightful," (Ewald, in order to bring into the text in a historical way the Assyrians), but: as idols to which the heathen correspond. Moreover the no-gods are explained through the term vanities (nothingness); they are as the breath of men, fugitive human forms (Matt. xv. 9); and no-people through לֹא עָמָּה, and the alliteration between לֹא עָמָּה and לֹא אֱלֹהִים. The designation occurs with more express reference to Israel, and is thus, as even KNOBEL concedes, "not to be pressed," not even "to the Syrians under Baasha and Ahab," generally not to any particular nation. No-people in the view of Israel, a foolish nation according to Israel's own conscience, is a godless nation, one which has gone hitherto its own way, etc. (Eph. ii. 12). The Acts of the Apostles is a biblical commentary upon this passage. Comp. also ver. 6; thus it is such a nation or people, who (notwithstanding all the grace they had received) are, as they are by nature (comp. iv. 6 sq.). The emphasizing of the Gentile world for the end of Israel, Rom. x. 19 (1 Thess. ii. 15, 16). The reception of the Gentiles in the place of Israel is certainly and literally contained in this verse. [No-people is not a people which does not deserve to be called a people, because it is behind the Israelites in its outward organization, or in its culture and general civilization, but because it does not rest as to its existence and growth upon the choice of God, because it does not "recognize Him as its Head and King," because it does not submit itself to His statutes and judgments, (Deut. iv. 6) which alone make a wise or understanding people. The designation does not imply any inferiority in worldly or secular respects on the part of those to whom it is applied.

The Apostle Paul, quoting (Rom. x. 19), the precise words of the SEPT. here, gives the true interpretation, and puts their significance, as teaching the adoption of the Gentiles in the place of the Jews beyond question, by any one who accepts the teaching of the Apostle as inspired. His use of this passage, too, ought to settle the question as to the inspiration of this song, and as to its Mosaic authorship.—A. G.]. It is nowhere said in ver. 22 sq., that the Lord would use the Gentiles only as a rod against Israel comp. ver. 81, as KAMPHAUSEN asserts; and what else is "the provoking and angering" (ver. 16) in this connection, than what J. H. MICHAELIS "illustrates metaphorically by the spirit of a loving husband, who sees himself scorned by his wife, and takes some poor maiden in her place, as Ahasuerus Esther in the place of Vashti." The description which underlies and grounds the judicial sentence, ver. 22, corresponds to these awful extremities (iv. 24; vi. 15). Comp. upon xxix. 19. The dimension even to the lowest (sheol) hell (the chasm, abyss; see HUPFELD upon Ps. lxi.) according to which this stands as the underworld in opposition to heaven,—here the lowest depth (xxx. 18) may be intended,—presents the judgment first of all as a destruction reaching beyond the earthly life, and continuing in Sheol, (Num. xvi. 30 sq.) The intensive extent or compass in the next place, when the fire which is kindled (xi. 17) consumes indeed the foundations of the earth, expresses the judgment, as in the analogy of Sodom (xxix. 22 sq.), extending from Palestine, and spreading out to one which concerns the whole world. [The judgment thus described was not to fall upon Israel alone. It was first to suffer. "But the words were not intended to foretell one particular judgment, but refer to judgment in its totality and universality, as realized in the course of centuries in different judgments upon the nations, and only to be completely fulfilled at the end of the world." KELL.—A. G.]. (2 Pet. iii. 7). Thus only does it correspond with the universal idea of Israel. Since the land of promise loses its peculiar significance through the curse of God, the heaven of Israel passed away with the temple, there exists in Christ with the new Israel, which is entirely, completely spiritual, already a new heaven and a new earth, according to the Spirit. Israel is the nearest object of the Divine love-judgment, ver. 23 sq. The transition to another figure, comp. xxxi. 11, 21. In masses one upon another; as a warrior against his enemies, exhausting his arrows to the very last one in his quiver, heaps them together around the enemy. Ver. 24. לִשְׁכַּח, to draw, exhaust, or simply to extend, make thin. לִשְׁכַּח the licking, lapping flame, used of fever, burning pestilence. לִשְׁכַּח, cut, thrust, blow. Comp. Lev. xxvi. 22. [KELL paraphrases "when hunger, pestilence, plague, have brought them to the verge of destruction I will send, sq."—A. G.].

Ver. 25. לִשְׁכַּח in Piel: lonely, bereaved, made childless, (Gen. xliii. 14). לִשְׁכַּח the closed, within the tent, house, where especially are the wives and children. לִשְׁכַּח, the chosen, manly youth, especially soldiers. לִשְׁכַּח to have gray hairs, (Lev. xix. 82).

5. Vers. 26-48. In such a position to the world would God bring them, but they should not disappear entirely from the race. In ver. 26, in which he passes from the sentence to its execution. I said occurs as "he said" (ver. 20) and with a similar purport. לִשְׁכַּח, used only here, may mean: to drive into every corner, or: to cast out from every corner (SCHULTZ); the last signification may agree with the connection, but not the first.—To blow away agrees still better, so that they are dispersed. VULG., LUTHER, according to the Rabbinical solution לִשְׁכַּח מִן הַבַּיִת: where are they? i. e., destroyed beyond any trace, so that one sees after them in vain. OTHERS: to make an end. OTHERS still: they are exposed, abandoned as the corners of the fields to the poor. Or deriving it from לִשְׁכַּח anger, to let this have success or control). לִשְׁכַּח in Hiphil: remove the Sabbath from their memory (Lev. xxvi. 43). Comp. xxv. 19. Once more a two-membered strophe. Ver. 27. What restrains Jehovah from this utter destruction is not anything in Israel, not even anything in Him in reference to Israel,—this is the icy character of the passage,—but Jehovah fears His wrath of (upon) the enemy, i. e., because the oppressors of Israel, if they should ignore (misunderstand) the fact, that Jehovah and not their power (Isa. xxvi. 11) had destroyed Israel, would excite His wrath. Comp. CICERO: pro Flacco, c. 28, cited by BAUMGARTEN. The impeachment of His honor or glory through the enemy is to be explained perhaps as ix. 28. There may, however, be an intimation also of the gracious purpose of God toward the Gentiles. The blessedness of all is indeed the glory of God. The world should not occupy such a position to Israel on its own account; it should execute and recognize the judgment of God upon Israel; therefore it is arrested, however little the nation deserves it. As Israel c. g., ix. 4 sq., could not assert its own goodness as a motive, so with the gentile world its power; there the heart, here the hand. In what follows, the correct reasons are presented against these possible false reasons: not the gentile power, but Israel's corruption, which presents it as ripe for overthrow, is the reason for its destruction by Jehovah. Thus ver. 28 gives the reasons for ver. 26, so that ver. 27 forms the conclusion to ver. 26. We have still the words of God, as also in the reasons given for the declaration of the judgment (ver. 20); KNOBEL: "the author here proceeds with his own words." That the discourse treats of Israel is not doubtful, as SACK thinks, because the וְלֵאמֹר, which is more commonly used for the gentiles, occurs here. It stands for Israel also, c. g., iv. 6 sq., agrees well with the more general style here, and moreover when emphasized could well serve to present the equality of Israel and the Gentiles. Void of counsel, generally; not knowing what to advise, they have lost the power of wise consideration, counsels, or: lost, ruined, truly with respect to that with which they might consult; they do not take advice from the law of God (iv. 6 sq.). וְלֵאמֹר, comp. with וְלֵאמֹר ver. 7. The moral corruption has wrought intellectual. With reference to this sign of deserved destruction, Moses breaks out, ver. 29, in a sad lamentation: לֹא יִהְיֶה כֵּן (it will not be so, surely not in the whole people). [The particle expresses here the simple condition without any wish, implying that the condition does not exist, or is uncertain.—A. G.] Luke xix. 42. Comp. vers. 6, 7, and upon ver. 20. וְלֵאמֹר especially what follows, that Israel could not have the victory, but that its end was near. Ver. 30 is usually understood of the unsuccessful wars of Israel, from which either the Gentiles could perceive (this is expressed ver. 27 sq.), how Jehovah gave over His people, or that Israel should perceive and consider. More correctly: the review of the earlier history, which they were not considering (ver. 29 comp. with ver. 7) would prove to them how mighty Israel could be, (Lev. xxvi. 8; comp. Josh. xxiii. 10). But, since the actual case is altogether the reverse, the self-judgment of their end must follow upon this review. (וְלֵאמֹר, how would it still כֵּן thus be, namely: it would, sq. כֵּן—לֹא יִהְיֶה כֵּן except (according to the usual interpretation), their Rock, sq., or: the actual case was that, sq.). Their Rock, as is clear from the parallel clause, is Jehovah (ver. 4). Ver. 31 gives the proof through a comparison of Jehovah with that which the Gentiles call their rock. Their gods could only be called rock, never be so, (ver. 21). Moses includes himself with his people (according to the idea, [i. e., the true Israel]).

וְלֵאמֹר SCHULTZ: Against the faithless ones who had proved the vanity of idols. MOSE: Since they even had experienced the omnipotence of Jehovah, and the weakness of all gods besides Him, as c. g., of Egypt, Moab, Midian. (Numb. xxiii. 24). Perhaps still more simply:—And our enemies are judges. Israel's judges (Ex. xxi. 22) instead of Jehovah, carry out His judicial sentence, and do nothing more. Thus ver. 31 connects itself with the close of ver. 30: because the rock of the heathen, the gods whom they worship, are not as Jehovah, so the Rock of Israel must have given it into their power. Otherwise Israel would, as of old, have been victorious in the field, instead of as now recognizing its enemies as its judges. Ver. 32 holds a similar relation to ver. 31, and ver. 30, as ver. 28, to vers. 26 and 27. Israel had placed itself on an equality, in pleasure and pride (ver. 15), with the Gentiles, and indeed with those of Canaan, against whom a previous judgment of God had long ago warned, and is soon therefore to be upon an equality with them, in punishment likewise, (xxix. 22). Against SACK and those who with him apply vers. 32, 33 to the Gentiles, KZIL asserts "that throughout the Old Testament the corruption of the Israelites, and never that of the Gentiles, is compared with that of Sodom, sq.; Isa. i. 10; iii. 9; Jer. xxiii. 14; Ezek. xvi. 46 sq." Their vine, so far as it is to be compared with any such, is of the vine of Sodom, is a scion from that, (וְלֵאמֹר as xxix. 17). Ver. 33. "The sweetness of the luxuries in the garden of God," BAUMGARTEN. As ver. 29 Moses, so now ver. 34 Jehovah breaks up the thought into the form of a dramatic dialogue. The position of the world to Israel should thus not be for the glory of its power, but for the glory of the Lord; Israel should be judged through the world, but from the Lord. וְלֵאמֹר refers to the immediately foregoing, only so far as the corruption of Israel involves guilt which demands punishment, for as corruption is it plainly discovered, manifested, ver. 32 sq., thus in any case not "concealed," as SCHULTZ renders וְלֵאמֹר, which is found only here. But the rendering also by "preserved," or: "coiled up," "shrivelled, bound," (Isa. viii. 16) does not accord well with the sins of the people as such; but does agree well with the guilt, the recorded guilt registers which were rolled together, so that nothing might fall out and be lost, Job xiv. 17; Hos. xiii. 12, and Dan. vii. 10; but Ps. cxxxix. 6; Mal. iii. 16, do not belong here. The sense is perfectly clear from the parallel sealed up, i. e., still secret, but to be opened in due time. (Dan. xii. 9). The treasures (treasure chamber) according to xxviii. 12 is heaven. Comp. upon the whole xxix. 28. Ver. 35. What it is which this refers to is designated here more precisely under the known prominence of the literal Supreme Judge, (Gen. xviii. 25). וְלֵאמֹר not: "vengeance, as well as punishment, is prepared with me" (HERXHEIMER), which would be the same as ver. 34; but it belongs to me, is my part. The judge, the avenger am I peculiarly (Rom. xii. 19; Heb. x. 80). בְּקֵץ is destination, judicial sentence, decision, and hence first vengeance. שֶׁלֶם Piel: consummation, restitution, reaches to the end of Israel. When your support gives way, your pride, your secure confidence wavers, then is the time of God; for now, only kept sealed, but then also manifested where it was perhaps little expected, the day of their calamity is at hand. וְאֵל literally: crushing, oppressive burden. The singular includes all that shall come upon them, as that which is prepared (vii. 10). Ver. 86. In which Moses again is the speaker, gives a new reason for the judgment in due time, and introduces also a new element. The mere fact that Jehovah appears as the one judging, allows us to infer a separation (Gen. xviii. 28 sq.), or distinction. The solemn and formal עֲשֵׂה, while hitherto וְלֹא (ver. 28) עַד at most נֶכְלֵי ver. 6 had been used of Israel, renders that inference more probable. The parallel וְעַד strengthens it, since the word refers to the true servants, those who are faithful in Israel. The judgment as a sifting. The people of the Lord indeed in name, but in nature apostate (so also Heb. x. 80) causes and experiences the judgment, which not only procures their right, does not prevent their punishment, but as generally, it procures right to the true Israel, who correspond to its idea, so especially by such a distinction it helps that part of Israel which constitutes this people of the Lord, to its vindication (Rom. xi.). Thus also the name of Israel in the best sense, is not extirpated, comp. ver. 26; as a sign of judgment so also of mercy. וְאֵל. The sorrow of His own gives Him sorrow (Ps. xc. 18; Matt. xxiv. 22). His seeing corresponds with ver. 19: there the apostacy, here the result of the execution of the judgment, which is such that it excites to compassion: power, with national strength, namely, run out, dried up, exhausted. בְּדָם a noun which takes the place of a verb and signifies to cease, i. e., is no more. The fourth-time occurring paranomasia עָצוּר עָצוּר.—There is none shut up or left.

KEIL, KNOBEL: the married and single, i. e., all men. BAUMGARTEN: the captive and freed-man. EWALD: close and liberal, i. e., all, as our thick and thin, is in any case a proverbial designation of persons; but scarcely of boys who were still at home, and those of age; scarcely also of the impure, who must remain at home, and in this reference the free, but either servants and freed-men, (עָצוּר the ruled), or the men of rank (who remain in the house) and the common people. SCHULTZ, MEIER: the vassal and the lord, the borrower and the lender, or one bound to service, and the free. Understanding the expression of things, some render it: the shut up (treasures) and the left free (the herd in the field), the precious and the trifling, and the like. Israel's nationality is at an end. Ver. 87 corresponding to ver. 20. It is naturally not the servants of the Lord, ver. 86, who are addressed, since they have held fast to Him as their Lord, but the question concerns the larger part of Israel. Their gods, and with this the rock used ironically here is not easily misunderstood.

Literally, Jehovah alone could be the Rock (ver. 30), but they have despised Him (ver. 15), and strange gods, ver. 16 sq., have become their rock, even a rock as that of the Gentiles, ver. 81. The theme of the song in all its variations is repeated. Ver. 88. SERT., VULG., LUTH., SCHULTZ, "Whose sacrificial fat they ate, the wine of whose drink-offerings they drank," as if it was said of the Israelites, while yet both the fat is burned for the deity (Lev. iii. 8 sq.) and the libations are poured out before it (Num. xv. 5), and this is certainly to be specially retained here, with respect to the way of the Lord. In order to bring out more prominently the qui [quid] pro quo right. The gods ate and drank in this way (iv. 28); had in Israel so good an entertainment. Upon קִיּוּם comp. Num. x. 85. A covering and defence they could still claim from them, in any case it is the cloud pillar of Jehovah over His people which is referred to.

Ver. 89. The connection through their own sight, especially with respect to that upon which they were visibly trusting, is an altogether fitting connection. Now, after the strange gods have proved their powerlessness. מִיָּה, יָמָא, an emphatic repetition, and at the same time an exposition of the name Jehovah. There is no God besides (with) me (ver. 12; iii. 24), thus מִיָּה is equivalent to יְהוָה; Jehovah alone the true God (John viii. 24). SCHULTZ: "Jehovah could not be the true being, having the cause of His being in Himself, purely dependent upon Himself alone, if He had any one beside Himself, which He Himself could not be." BAUMGARTEN: "Jehovah the absolute subject." What this exclusiveness and unchangeableness of His being says in the sphere of His deity, that, the killing and the making alive (וְחַיָּים) alluding to Jehovah, in any case to the immediately following וְ, ver. 40) the wounding and healing, say in the sphere of the becoming (Werden) and the mutable, the creature. Kill, wound, at first because of the judgment; make alive, heal, in reference to the true people of God, the servants of the Lord, (ver. 86) by which contrast it was intimated that the suffering which they endure here, is salvation through the hand of God. Moreover וְ here and in ver. 40 forms an antithesis to וְ ver. 86. The declared execution of the judgment in vengeance and in mercy is confirmed ver. 40, for men, and hence, in the divine condescending love after the manner of men, by the oath. To heaven—the throne of God, essentially as if it was: by myself, but formally as men are accustomed to swear, who by the lifting up of the hand confess and invoke Him (Gen. xiv. 22). וְ the oath formula: as truly as I live, by my life. What is sworn follows. The oath reaches over the whole world to heaven. Jehovah has to show the judgment, inwardly, with respect to Israel itself, in vengeance and mercy; and in the like manner also outwardly, so far as the future position of the world to Israel should be the right position, perfectly right; and hence it must be a final judgment over the collective enemies of the Lord. Otherwise it might occur, that as with Israel, their intractable pride grew out of their possessions and their apparent goodness, so with the others, the Gentile world, it might arise from their apparent powerful position. Comp. vers. 27, 15). Ver. 41. The warlike figure as in ver. 23 (sword, ver. 25). Entirely personal: my, sq., on account of the fundamental thought (Jehovah) of the prophetic standpoint of the song, and because the enemies of Israel as such could not come into view here, since it also is the very object of the divine judgment. Israel itself even is become an enemy of Jehovah (ver. 15 sq.).—Glittering (the flash) of the piercing (קַר) point of that in the hand of the heavenly hero, as the quivering flash of his sword.—Whet, denoting its preparation with all the earnestness of his zeal or anger. The judicial procedure (שֹׁפֵט) explains the sword which God grasps, and which He (J) holds fast, until the judgment is completed. שֹׁפֵט is explained through שֹׁפֵט (ver. 35), as a retributive destruction. Ver. 42. There is no exemption even of the captives. The divine arrows would become drunk as they drink the blood of the slain, as the divine sword would eat the flesh. שֹׁפֵט, to break forth, to be at the head, or in the front; hence SCHULTZ: of the head, chief of the princes; EWALD: of the supreme ruler (King) of the princes; KAIL, KNOBEL: of the hairy head (because שֹׁפֵט designates the hair of the head); ORTHES: "from the head of the uncovering (Lev. x. 6) of the enemy. i. e. the uncovered enemy;" thus the destruction of the people as of their rulers (comp. Ps. cx. 5, 6), or as a supplementary portraiture of the destroyed power of the enemy; the hair, as already the head, naturally symbolising youth, wanton strength, pride, haughtiness, and the like. Comp. HUFFELD upon Ps. lxviii. 21.—[The rendering in our version has no foundation in the language itself, is not supported by other passages in which the word occurs, and breaks up the parallelism of the verse, the third clause being obviously related to the first, and the fourth in like manner to the second.—A. G.]—Ver. 43 forms the conclusion, but in which also the divine mercy is announced in connection with the divine vengeance in reference to the world, those without or beyond Israel. As at the beginning, as especially at ver. 36, so now also at the close Moses takes up the word. If it was vengeance only which was in view for the Gentiles, the solemn, sacred summons to rejoice, which is directed to the Gentiles (thus at the end, as at the beginning, to heaven and earth with regard to Israel), would be simply fenshish. Comp. Rom. xv. 10 (Rev. xii. 10, 12; xv. 8); Gen. xii. 3. The object of this loud rejoicing is His people, but is immediately set in its true light by His servants, as in ver. 36. (יְיָ in Hiph. with the accus. of the object is unusual, but surely to take יְיָ as in apposition with אֲנִי, "nations which are His people" (s. g. HERDER) is still more unusual, and the way is not sufficiently prepared for it through ver. 21, or other passages. SMR.: μετὰ τοῖς λαοῖς αὐτοῦ.) —[Our version follows the SMR., as does St. Paul in Rom. xv. 10. Nor does this rendering differ essentially from that which makes His people the direct object of the joy. "For the heathen here called upon to laud God's people can only be required to do so when they have themselves received a share in God's mercies to His land and His people, and had cause therefore themselves to rejoice with His people. It is apparent also that since the praise is to be addressed in the first instance to 'His people,' and not directly to God Himself, the mercies must be regarded as overflowing to the rejoicing Gentiles through and from the Jews. Nor can we imagine such praise to be bestowed by the Gentiles upon the Jews for such mercies whilst the Jews were themselves excluded from the same. It seems then that in this profound passage there is shadowed forth the purpose of God to overrule (1) the unbelief of the Jews to the bringing in of the Gentiles, and (2) the mercy shown to the Gentiles to the eventual restoration of the Jews (comp. Rom. xi. 25-36)."]

BIB. COM.—A. G.]—The blood of His servants appears as the blood of martyrs who have sealed their faithfulness to Jehovah with their blood (Matt. xxiii. 31, 34, 35; Luke xviii. 7; Rev. vi. 10; xviii. 20, 24; xix. 2). For the rest comp. ver. 41. Genuinely Mosaic is it to the last: to His land and people, the two fundamental references of the Pentateuch from Genesis onward. To which the remark of J. H. MICHAELIS well agrees, that in this song the enemies of God are peculiarly Israel after the flesh. How else indeed could the song be a testimony against Israel? At all events it relates to the guilt of blood, pressing as a burden upon the land, and at the same time the stain which through it comes upon the people, first of all upon Israel. Comp. xxi. 8; Lev. xvi. 38; Num. xxxv. 38; Zeoh. iii. 9. With this wonderful, mysterious tone the song ceases. (The close of the Old Covenant reflects itself in the way in which this song closes, Ps. xxii. 27 sq." SCHULTZ.)

6. Vers. 44-52. This passage commends itself to us as from a different hand than that of Moses (Introd. § 2). It is not against this view, but rather in its favor, that it is from the same hand which has added also chaps. xxxiii. and xxxiv. הוֹשֵׁעַ, ver. 44, instead of the earlier constantly used יְיָשׁוּעַ, is remarkable. The former, his domestic name, denotes simply help, salvation; the latter, his more public official name, denotes that Jehovah is this or his help. The first natural name of Joshua would be most appropriate if he was the person who has added this section and the following chapters, especially that at the first opportunity at which it could occur, he should thus at the beginning designate the tone corresponding to his modesty. He was Hoshea, as he was the servant of Moses, and so he names himself again when he, in this writing, actually serves him. Comp. further xxxi. 30, 19.—And Hoshea, thus according to the divine direction; Joshua only assisted. Comp. ver. 45. In this way Israel could reach the conviction of the entire accord between the predecessor and his successor. Ver. 45. Comp. xxxi. 24. Ver. 46. Testify, more exactly, which I take to witness, or better still, through which I lay down my testimony; a reference to xxxi. 26, but especially to xxxi. 19, 21. It is the song pre-eminently which is intended, which should help to faithfulness to the law. Comp. vi. 7; xi. 19. Ver. 47. The proof as xxx. 11.

קָרַ, from קָרַן (קָרַן), contracted from קָרַן, to remove, put far away. Hence קָרַן is neither: "so that it had no importance for them" (SCHULTZ), nor as equivalent with "not more vain and empty than you yourselves" (KNOWEL). For the rest comp. xxx. 20. Ver. 48. The day of the song; thus this was his dying (swan) song. Ver. 49. (Num. xxvii. 12 sq.) The particularity in the description of the locality should not escape notice; more appropriate for Joshua than for God. KEIL calls attention also to the imperatives. Comp. upon iii. 27. The plural, הַקְּרָנִים, designates the mountain range on that side, east of the Jordan. The particular (הַהוּא) mountain of this mountainous border of Moab is the הַר-נֹבֵל. HANSTENBERG, Hist. of Balaam. In this region (BUCKINGHAM, Travels) there are outlooks stretching from thirty to sixty miles in breadth, e. g. at Heshbon, from whence one can see Jerusalem directly to the west, and still more clearly Bethlehem. Ver. 50. Comp. Gen. xxv. 8, 17; Num. xx. 26 sq. (Deut. x. 6)—[Unto thy people seems to indicate something more than that the body of Moses was gathered with the buried dust of his fathers, and if not a proof of the immortality and consciousness of the soul after death" (WORDSWORTH), it is one of those passages which imply that truth.—A. G.]—Ver. 51. מַעַל, to separate, to be rebellious, to act faithlessly. Num. xx. 12; xxvii. 14; xx. 18, 24.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. What is said, Num. xii. 8, as to the distinct position of Moses, from the literal prophetic order, receives its full confirmation in this chapter. As God speaks to Moses without any reserve what related to the destiny of Israel and the world, literally "mouth to mouth," it is a conversation or dialogue. The servant faithful "in all the house," introduces the song in inspired faith and with burning zeal, accompanies and closes it with painful lamentation (ver. 29 sq.), yet not without blessed hope (ver. 48).

2. If Moses nevertheless is a prophet in the more general sense of the word, the נְבִיאָה which is denied to him in distinction from the literal prophets, Num. xii. 6, 7, and the נְבִיאָה granted to him, ver. 8 (although the latter is qualified and explained by כְּחִירָת (riddles) and וְלֵאמָר), is intelligible through the figurative and generally poetical style of this chapter. We may say: the figurative term הַצִּיָּר for Jehovah, is perhaps from the חֲכִינָה, which, according to Num. xii. 8, Moses saw.

3. Poetry and prophecy in their relationship and their difference. The relation is not a barely formal one. GOTTEN: "Poetry is inspiration," which he explains more fully by "genius;" with which, for the Christian view of the world and life, there arises at once a distinction—a distinction like that between nature and grace. Comp. the excellent work of SACK (Songs in the Historical Books of the Old Testament, p. 8 sq.). STEINBECK, the Poet a Seer, Leipzig, 1836. Comp. LANGER, Phil. Dogm., p. 367, 374.

4. But it is not poetry alone, music also, which here appears in the service of religion: the song, chap. xxxii., is not only a poem, it is at the same time a song. In the song we have the unity of poetry and music. Comp. the thoughtful treatment of the point in view here, in LANGER as cited above, p. 375 (2 Kings iii. 15).

5. The parallel between the ancient classical poetry and the Old Testament poetry and prophecy. "The form, the beautiful, festive appearance," rules in the former; "the living realities," the vehement, struggling conflict which marks the progress of history (des verdens), for the latter. "There the beautiful is prominent; here the sublime, exalted." LANGER (HERZOG's Realencycl. XI 773).

6. It is as a festive celebration of the beautiful with the good (the kalokagathie), that not only the deuteronomic discourses, but the entire historical activity of Moses closes in poetry and song. In correspondence with this is the look at Canaan from Nebo, closing his life—the most beautiful image.

7. "The contents and connection," SACK correctly calls "so great and comprehensive," that he speaks here of the "prototype of all prophecy in a certain measure of the connection of the Old and New Testaments." That which forms the contents of the word of God, the contents of prophecy in the narrower sense, that also forms the contents of this song: the law and the gospel. The thread of its idea runs from Israel, the people of God in truth (ver. 36), in order to reach the nations generally in the future (ver. 48). THOLCK designates it "as a prophetic theodicee of God in history."

8. Whoever is accustomed to place the divine anger in opposition to the divine love will never win an understanding of the deepest and truest nature of this song. The "perception of the burning zeal of God proceeds from the zeal of His love" (SACK).

9. "The righteousness of God is not especially a judicial, punitive righteousness, but a forth-going in the direct way of that justice, grounded in His eternal holiness and love, according to which His creatures must regulate their lives," etc. (SACK).

10. The fact that the adoption belonged to the Israelites, Rom. ix. 4 puts beyond question. The parallelism there is in any case between εὐδοκία and νομοθεσία, and so much the more truly, as throughout the (morally) filial relation, outward or inward, formal or essential, must be formed according to the conduct in reference to the will of the Father, i. e. the law. If we hold to the objective side, then the law demands love. Thus it includes the gospel, love; and there remains thus between the Old and the New Testaments a difference only of method; there the demand, here the fulfillment, of which the ante-legal time forms the promise. Thus the law is an institution, and the Israelitish adoption is also an institution, not, however, a ceremonial, but political, i. e. Israel as a nation is the adoption of God, placed as His right, His house, His glory among the nations. "Limited to Israel as the chosen people, the idea is therein proclaimed, that God is the creative founder and builder of its theocratic life, cherishing and training Israel as a child. It is (Gal. iv. 1 sq.) the relation of a minor child, when in respect to the father, as is fitting the time of life, he is conscious only of that life-support in the form of care and guardianship, not the free spiritual communion which inwardly develops itself in riper years" (BROCK, Christ. Lehr-wissenschaft. I., p. 344 sq.). It is not barely in a figurative (comparative) method (HENGSTENBERG); neither only typical (LANGM). The typical in the Old Testament idea of adoption refers to the true Israel, and to Israel according to the truth. As to the subjective realization of the adoption of God, it does not require to be spoken to here upon this chapter: but its treatment properly belongs to the Psalms. It is not to be forgotten that the kernel of Israel, which comes into account here as to the adoption, appears rather as the servant of Jehovah (vers. 36, 48). The stage of the Holy Spirit's manifestation alluded to (John vii. 39) is that of consummation (comp. DEL., Bibl. Proph. Theol., p. 283 sq., 243 sq.), or better still, that of the seal, of confirmation, but not first of efficient working.

11. "The existence of Israel as a nation is indeed like that of other nations brought about in a natural way, not through a spiritual new birth, but still Israel has its remotest ground in the supernatural mighty word of promise given to Abraham (Gen. xvii. 15 sq.); and a circle of wonderful, mighty proofs and gracious leadings have brought Israel from this starting point of its existence, to the goal to which it attained with the exodus from Egypt" (DEL. upon Isa. i. 2).

12. It is very strange when SACK in opposition to SCHULTZ, calls "the distinction of a better kernel in Israel, conceded to the later prophets," here "a forced distinction, and one which in this Mosaic work has no place, is not even intimated in the song." So essential a view could not fail entirely in "the very magna charta of prophecy" (HENGSTENBERG); it must at least be intimated, although its actual carrying out may be handed over to that which follows. The distinction between the nation, and the people of God, the separation of the servant of Jehovah is truly Mosaic; not merely according to the narrative of the primitive and preliminary history of Israel (comp. upon ver. 5), which Moses gives, but directly through the events with reference to Caleb, Joshua (i. 36, 38), Phinehas (Num. xxv. 7), the Levites (Deut. x. 8; comp. Ex. xxxii. 23), and indeed through his own existence as the servant of the Lord above others (Num. xii. 7). On the other hand SCHULTZ remarks upon chap. xxx.: "In the most eventful moments of his life he had experienced that the Lord even then, when His anger burned most fiercely, and when He was ready to condemn Israel without any restraint, would spare at least him, the one, etc. He must have had the consoling conviction, without which he would not have had strength, even from the beginning, over against the general obstinacy of the people, that there was a sacred seed still existing, in order to produce from itself a new and better sowing for victory and glory. In the very being of God Himself, it lay concealed," etc., etc. The exposition has pointed out the intimations in the song.

13. SACK, ver. 10 sq., opposes very finely "the view which has never yet entirely vanished, according to which the God of the Old Testament is pre-eminently a frightful and terrible God." "It is the fundamental thought of the divine education of Israel to religious, godly sorrow, or a sorrow which works a change of mind, agreeing on one side with the drawing of the first man to love and obedience through the fullness of the surrounding glorious creation, and on the other side with the evangelical motive: Let us love Him, for He has first loved us."

14. A superficial view only of the history of Israel reveals merely the opposition to Jeshurun; a closer examination will justly bring out the variance between the idea in Jeshurun and the reality in the manifestation of Israel. The history of the people is the history of this variance, reaches its greatest crisis when the Gentile judge repeatedly proclaims Him the Jeshurun, and Israel, on the contrary, cries: Crucify Him! crucify Him! A purpose fixed by God, which He realizes in the fullness of time through the Messiah, must verify itself also by the way, as drawing nearer this goal, however separated into its parts or elements in its realization. This is the truth of the divine word. "A deeper view of the history of Israel," says HENGSTENBERG, "reveals to us, even in the most corrupt times, the existence of an εκλογη, to whom the predicate perfect belongs (?); the best evidence of whose existence is found in the judgment upon the dishonesty and unrighteousness of the people, which at all times comes forth from its own bosom. Where do we find such a morally reacting force among the Gentiles? So also the history shows that the times of corruption, in which honesty and righteousness are confined to the little flock, are ever followed by times of reformation, in which honesty and righteousness more or less penetrate the whole life of the nation. (The period of the judges already.) Israel is, especially in relation to the Gentiles, Jeshurun."

15. The results of the sanctifying ordinances and institutions of Jehovah among His people entitle it to this name "Jeshurun;" of the law as giving the knowledge of His will; of the sacrifice especially as procuring the pardon of sin, of the Spirit working in the people, giving the experience of communion with God, the covenant-communion. It is equally erroneous to ground salvation upon a state or disposition attained subjectively by one's own strength, and to regard this inward state as unnecessary (HENGSTENBERG).

16. The thought, vers. 26, 27, is the more striking, inasmuch as after Israel, as this people, has come to an entire end, it presents its evil condition historically, and legitimates itself as a thought of God through the continuous existence of the Jews. Over against the hatred of the nations, foaming out in persecutions of the Jews (since the time of the Romans, especially in the Christian middle ages), its existence willed by God was strongly assured both through the remarkable outward means of existence (xv. 6; xxviii. 12), and through the peculiar inward and intellectual endowments which characterize it even to this day. (KEITH,

Witnesses, supposes their prosperity, indeed their wealth, to serve as the object of the threatened spoiling (28, 29), and also for the approaching enrichment of the Israel of the future, formed again to a people; accompanied with the very singular remark, that their ill successes were limited to Canaan during the time of the divine judgment upon them, as if under the Turkish power they could not prosecute their pursuits there as they could elsewhere!)

17. Israel's end as to the flesh, ver. 29 (20), must be at the same time Israel's completion as to the Spirit, and this is the Messianic horizon which environs this song.

18. The rejoicing of the nations, with which the song closes, sets in a clear light the conversion of the Gentiles as the consequence of the judicial sifting and destructive mighty deeds of the Lord upon Israel and upon the world at large (e. g. Heathen Rome). The first song of Moses already (Ex. xv. 14 sq.) dwelt upon the issues of the deliverance of Israel from Egypt. The resulting impression upon the contiguous heathen nations at first indeed an impression of alarm. The other side of the results of the falling away of Israel, both for the world and the Gentile, is set forth by St. Paul, Rom. xi. 11 sq. Whether the πλήρωμα, Rom. xi. 12, brings into view another complement of Israel than that through the Gentiles, a rescuing, namely, even of the unbelieving part of Israel, and thus the entire conversion of the people is intended, or whether the gain by means of the whole Israel, which is the new true Israel composed of Jews and Gentiles, for the yet wider world and all the Gentiles, and thus the conquest of the race through the Church of Christ is intended, may be left undecided. Comp. Doct. and Eth. upon chap. xxx.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Ver. 1. LUTHER: "It happens also that when God visits unbelievers, and lays hold upon them, they imagine that all the creatures have become their enemies. The whole creation agrees as a witness of the law with the law. Moses shows in this whole song the method of the law (Rom. iv. 15; vii. 7), and acts as a true preacher of the law. But he summons heaven and earth to witness, because he treats of so great a matter, which does not concern a kingdom, or gold and silver, but that which is of the utmost moment to every one, namely, either to have God, the fountain of all good, and with Him all eternal and temporal salvation, or to be eternally without either." R. BROCHAT: "He begins with the creation of the world, and from thence onwards until he closes his discourse with the days of the Messiah."—Heaven and earth as spectators, hearers and witnesses.—JAHN: "There is nothing elsewhere comparable to these first two verses in the boldness of expression."—Ver. 2. LUTHER: "When God's word is preached purely then it is not as with human statutes, clouds without rain, 2 Pet. ii. 17. But he sets the herb and the grass over against the stony ground and the sand; for it belongs to the word, that the doctrine should be healthful, and the hearers thirsty and docile." V. GERLACH: "The richness and fullness can only be a fullness of blessing. For the severest punitive testimony of the law has a life-giving and invigorating efficacy for the true servant of his covenant God."—Ver. 8. LUTHER: "But the little flock, the believers and saints upon the earth, give the glory to God the Lord alone. But hypocrites and other godless persons, whatever they may confess in words, in heart rely upon their own goodness, wisdom, power, or look to men for help and consolation."—Ver. 4. TILLER (Engl. Bib.): "It declares the eternity of God, the unchangeableness of His purposes, and the insuperable power of His majesty." BAUMGARTEN: "He had proved Himself as the Rock, both in Egypt and the wilderness, as He had manifested Himself as the only support in heaven or upon earth, for Israel."—The Rock of Israel: Jehovah according to His work, ways, nature and attributes.—STARKE: "The name of the Lord is a strong tower, Prov. xviii. 10; Nah. i. 7." ZINZENDORF: "Jesus is the true one, faithful unto death, in respect to His merits for us over death and the grave. A husband, who is perfection in His nature, has such an evil bride." SCHULTZ: "It is a great consolation that God is immutable in His power and will (faithfulness); that His way is right, He Himself without injustice, therefore, it is inculcated, because with this knowledge the punishment would not be received with incredulity."—Ver. 5. RICHTER: "The reformation corresponds with the redemption from Egypt; to the rejection of Jehovah corresponds, alas! the modern unbelief and apostasy."—Ver. 6. HERDER: "God remains the father; but they cease to be His children, first by their wickedness, then in their destiny."—[WORDSWORTH: "This is more fully verified in Christ, who hath purchased His Church with His own blood (Acts xx. 28; 1 Cor. vi. 20). Dost thou, O Christian, who sinnest against Christ, thus requite the Lord who bought thee (Jude 4)?"—A. G.]—Ver. 7. RICHTER: "How many Christian fathers, alas! would now grow dumb at such questions!" CRAMER: "The Church the witness of the truth."—Ver. 8. SCHULTZ: "His own people must at last possess the whole earth, or bear away the spoil thereof; for the meek shall inherit the earth."—God is the Highest; why should men flatter others and call them by this title?—Ver. 10. STARKE: "God finds us; His grace is all, and in all. He here appears as the bridegroom who goes out to seek His bride. Israel unmarried was without law, etc. He named him after His own name," etc. V. GERLACH: "The wilderness is the point of departure, because of the vivid contrasts to the fullness of blessing of the land of promise. He finds Israel as a lost sheep."—Ver. 11. BROCHAT: "In the Old Testament the figure of the eagle; in the new that of the hen."—Here Israel, the eagles brood, over the carcass of Canaan; later the Romish eagle over the carcass of Israel.—Ver. 12. Jehovah alone; thus the song sings, thus the whole history of Israel proclaims, and thus the experience of all the children of God attests.—Ver. 18 sq. When the Lord is the leader then is the victory and the blessing. The lofty flight of His people to victory, to proud security, to a full enjoyment of all.—Ver. 15. CRAMER:

"Good times and plenty often lead to a contempt of the word of God and to many sins."—[The temptations and dangers of prosperity.—A. G.]—Ver. 20. RICHTER: "Hidden as the sun behind the clouds."—Ver. 21. BAUMGARTEN: "In so far as all the Gentile nations rest upon the ground of nature, their national character is transient and no people; thus in the light of the full eternal truth all and every one of the Gentiles are foolish nations, because they are without the source of all wisdom, the knowledge of God, because they do not possess the law of Israel." Ver. 22 sq. HERDER: "With such a prophetic outlook must the law-giver of the people close his wearied life." Ver. 29. CRAMER: "Blindness and security precede the divine punishments." BERL. BIB.: "Who is there who has shown sufficient earnestness, diligence and care in a preparation for his latter end? Where is the dying before one dies, the judging before one is judged?"—Ver. 37 sq. CRAMER:

"There is no protection or help in false doctrine."—Ver. 40. What consolation still is heaven for the earth!—Ver. 43. The penitential Psalm becomes a song of rejoicing, as true repentance ends ever in shouts of triumph. True repentance is true joy. The history of the world is not first a world-judgment, but truly a judgment of Israel. The thoughts of peace of the Eternal One as to the times, in the calling of Israel, in the fullness of the Gentiles.—Ver. 46. BERL. BIB.: "The command is without force if the example is worthless. We understand correctly; for hypocrisy makes hypocrites. The divine life and work conceals and carries with it also a divine authority more than in all blows, cries and words."—Ver. 47. Sin is suicide.—Ver. 48 sq. BERL. BIB.: "Thus the Lord prepared Moses for his death."—Ver. 52. BERL. BIB.: He shall not go in thither; as David also should not build the temple whose model he was permitted to see.

THE BLESSING OF MOSES.

CHAP. XXXIII. 1-29.

- 1 AND this is the blessing wherewith Moses the man of God blessed the children of Israel before his death. And he said,
The Lord came from Sinai,
And rose up [brake forth] from Seir unto them;
He shined forth from Mount Paran,
And he came with [out of] ten thousands of saints [myriads of holiness]:
From his right hand went a fiery law for them [fire, law for them];<sup>1</sup>
- 2 Yea, he loved [is cherishing] the people;
All his saints are in thy hand:
And they sat down [turn] at [after] thy feet:
Every one shall receive of [he rises up at] thy words.
- 3 Moses commanded us a law,
Even the inheritance [possession] of the congregation of Jacob.
- 4 And he was king in Jeshurun,
When [As] the heads of the people
And the tribes of Israel were gathered together.
- 5 Let Reuben live, and not die;
And let not his [That his] men be few [numerable].
- 6 And this is the blessing of [in reference to] Judah: and he said, Hear, Lord, the voice of Judah,
And bring him [again] unto his people:
Let his hands be sufficient for him [With his hands he fights for it];
And be thou an help to him from [before] his enemies.
- 7 And of [in respect to] Levi he said,
Let thy [Jehovah] Thummim and thy Urim be [belong, or be and remain] with thy holy [favored] one,

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

<sup>1</sup> [Ver. 2. The marginal reading is literal: a fire of law. But it is objected, that the text thus assumed cannot be correct here, because it gives no good sense, and because the word אֵשׁ is not a Semitic word, but adopted from the Persian.

KRI. and others therefore read אֵשׁ אֵשׁ, fire of throwing, for the flashes of lightning which accompanied the promulgation of the law. The reading thus adopted is sustained by a considerable number of MSS. and editions.—A. G.]

- Whom thou [Israel] didst prove at Massah,
And with whom thou didst strive at the waters of Meribah [at Me-Meribah].
- 9 Who said [of] unto his father and to his mother, I have not seen him :
 Neither did he [And did not] acknowledge his brethren,
 Nor knew [And did not know] his own children [his sons] ;
 For they have observed [Jehovah !] thy word,
 And kept thy covenant.
- 10 They shall teach<sup>2</sup> Jacob thy judgments [rights],
 And Israel thy law ;
 They shall put incense before thee [at thy nose],
 And whole burnt-sacrifice [whole offering] upon thine altar.
- 11 Bless, Lord, his substance [strength],
 And accept the work [And let the work] of his hands [be well pleasing to thee] ;
 Smite through the loins of them that rise against him,
 And of them that hate him, that they rise not again.<sup>3</sup>
- 12 And of Benjamin he said,
 The beloved of the Lord shall dwell in safety by him ;<sup>4</sup>
And the Lord shall cover him all the day long,<sup>5</sup>
 And he shall dwell between his shoulders.
- 13 And of Joseph he said,
 Blessed of the Lord be his land,
 For [Of] the precious things of heaven, for [of] the dew,
 And for [of] the deep which coucheth beneath,
- 14 And for [of] the precious fruits brought forth by the sun [precious produce of the sun],
 And for [of] the precious things put forth [precious growths of the] by the moon [moons],
- 15 And for [of] the chief things [head] of the ancient mountains,
 And for [of] the precious things of the lasting [everlasting] hills,
- 16 And for [of] the precious things of the earth and fullness thereof,
 And for [And] the good-will of him that dwelt in the bush ;
 Let the blessing [it] come upon the head of Joseph,
 And upon the top of the head [crown] of him that was separated from his brethren.<sup>6</sup>
- 17 His glory is like the firstling of his bullock ;<sup>7</sup>
 And his horns are like [om. like] the horns of unicorns [the buffalo] :
 With them he shall push [thrust] the people
 Together to the ends of the earth ;
 And they are the ten thousands of Ephraim,
 And they are the thousands of Manasseh.
- 19 And of Zebulon he said,
 Rejoice, Zebulon, in [over] thy going out ;
 And, Issachar, in [over] thy tents.
- 19 They shall call the people [nations] unto the mountain ;
 There they shall offer sacrifices of righteousness ;
 For they shall suck of the abundance of the seas,
 And of treasures hid [the hidden, of the hid treasures] in the sand.
- 20 And of Gad he said,
 Blessed [praised] be he that enlargeth Gad ;

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

<sup>2</sup> [Ver. 10. The marginal rendering here is not so close as that in the text. It is not a wish, but a declaration, covering the future of this tribe.—A. G.]

<sup>3</sup> [Ver. 11. SCHROEDER more exactly :

Crush the hips of his adversaries,
 And his haters that they may not rise.—A. G.]

<sup>4</sup> [Ver. 12. The לְיִשְׂרָאֵל is the subject of the verb ; and the last words should be rendered literally upon him.—A. G.]

<sup>5</sup> [Ver. 12. The participle is expressive—his sheltering.—A. G.]

<sup>6</sup> [Ver. 16. SCHROEDER retains the Hebrew נָזַר, the Nazarene.—A. G.]

<sup>7</sup> [Ver. 17. Literally : The first-born of his ox, majesty is to him. Our version brings ambiguity and confusion into the text.—A. G.]

- He dwelleth as a lion,<sup>8</sup>
 And teareth the arm with [yea] the crown of the head.
- 21 And he provided [chose] the first part [first fruits] for himself, Because there, in a portion of the law-giver was he seated,<sup>9</sup>
 And he came with [om. with] the heads of the people,
 He executed [did, performed] the justice of the Lord,
 And his judgments with Israel.
- 22 And of Dan he said,
 Dan is a lion's whelp;
 He shall leap from Bashan.
- 23 And of Naphtali he said,
 O Naphtali, satisfied with favor,
 And full with the blessing of the Lord;
 Possess thou<sup>10</sup> the west [sea] and the south.
- 24 And of Asher he said,
 Let Asher be blessed with children<sup>11</sup> [Blessed before sons is Asher];
 Let him be acceptable to [among, of] his brethren,
 And let him dip his foot in oil.
- 25 Thy shoes shall be iron and brass;<sup>12</sup>
 And as thy days, so shall thy strength [firmness]<sup>13</sup> be.
- 26 There is none like unto the God of Jeshurun [like God, O Jeshurun],
 Who rideth [riding] upon the heaven in [with] thy help,
 And in his excellency on the sky [clouds].
- 27 The eternal God is thy refuge [Dwelling is the God of olden time],
 And underneath are the everlasting arms:
 And he shall thrust [thrusts] out the enemy from before thee;
 And shall say [says], Destroy them.
- 28 [And] Israel then shall dwell [dwells] in safety.
 Alone the fountain of Jacob shall be,
 Upon a land of corn and wine;
 Also his heavens shall drop down dew.<sup>14</sup>
- 29 Happy art thou, O Israel; who is like unto thee,
 O people [a people] saved by [in] the Lord,
 The shield of thy help,
 And who is the sword of thy excellency [eminence]!
 And thine enemies shall be found liars [shall deny themselves] with thee;
 And thou shalt tread upon their high places.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

<sup>8</sup> [Ver. 20. Geseuius, Keil, Knobel, render this word lioness, although it has a masculine termination; comp. Gen. xlix. 9. It is probably the lion, including both the male and female.—A. G.]

<sup>9</sup> [Ver. 21. Schroeder: For there [the same was] the leader's portion, a thing kept. כִּנְיָק, one who ordains, determines, commands, refers not to Moses, but to Gad, who is called the leader here because of his special activity and boldness in the conquest of the land.—A. G.]

<sup>10</sup> [Ver. 23. The verb is future, and expresses a promise rather than a wish or direction: he shall possess.—A. G.]

<sup>11</sup> [Ver. 24. The כִּנְיָק is comparative, away from, above the other sons. Asher, as his name imports, is blessed above—most blessed among the sons.—A. G.]

<sup>12</sup> [Ver. 25. Schroeder renders with Keil and others, כִּנְיָק, bars, castles, from כָּעַל, to bolt.—A. G.]

<sup>13</sup> [Ver. 25. כִּנְיָק Ges. and most recent authorities render rest. Thy rest shall continue as thy days. Our version has the ancient authorities in its favor, and affords so good a sense that we may well adhere to it.—A. G.]

<sup>14</sup> [Ver. 28. The pointing in our version breaks up the parallelism of the original. Schroeder departs from the original also, and renders: the eye of Jacob is directed to a land, etc.—A. G.]

PRELIMINARY REMARKS.

For the Literature see Introd. pp. 44 and 45.

The Criticism.—See Introd. § 3. Geseuius and Maurer refer it to the exile; Graf, V. Len-Geske to the times of the two kingdoms; Knobel: "When David, in flight from Saul, lived in exile;" Bleek, who earlier held this chapter as older even than Gen. xlix., as perhaps genuinely Mosaic, in his Introduction to the Old Testament, concedes to the blessings of Moses only such a reference, by the author of Deuteronomy; that it must have risen in the period between the death of Solomon and the Assyrian exile, about 800 B. C. As to the reasons for these opinions, essentially the same remarks may be made as upon the criticism upon the song. Comp. Schultz, p. 682 sq.

The Mosaic origin is not placed in doubt, because the written publication is not, as with chap. xxxii., attributed to Moses. Not only ver. 4, but the general character and setting permits us to conjecture that another hand than that of Moses has composed this chapter (Introd. § 2). Moses was the speaker only, but we need not appeal to the usually retentive memory, e. g., of the Arabians, for the well-known attachment and faithfulness of Joshua, raises us above any and all anxiety as to the "accuracy of all that is essential." SCHULTZ: "It is here precisely as with all the discourses of our Lord in the New Testament." KEIL emphasizes correctly "the peculiar nature of the blessings of Moses as the strongest proof of their genuineness." [In favor of the Mosaic authorship of this chapter it may be urged, not only that all the reasons which go to establish the Mosaic origin of the Book of Deuteronomy are of force here; but that the character of this song and its fitness to the circumstances in which it is said that Moses spake it, and its inappropriateness to any other circumstances, are independent proofs that it is the work of Moses. If the whole book expresses the tender care and solicitude of the leader for his people, of the father for his children; this blessing is just the final leave-taking of the departing Moses. Its hopefulness, its cheerful tone and aspect, especially in contrast with the song which it thus supplements, even its entire freedom from any caution or warning, are just what we ought to have expected from one who had spoken the song with its solemn warnings, and was now to leave the people for whose welfare he had spent his life. He could not leave them until he had thus blessed them.]

On the other hand, there is not in this chapter one distinct reference to any circumstance in the after history of Israel; neither to the Assyrian period, nor to the time of the disruption of the kingdom, nor even to that of the Judges; and the absence of any such allusion is inconsistent with the supposition of its later origin. The assumed reference in ver. 7 to the desire for reunion, under the sceptre of Judah, of the divided kingdom, is obviously a mistaken and forced interpretation of that passage. And indeed all the objections to the Mosaic origin of this chapter proceed either upon erroneous interpretations of particular passages, or upon the denial of its prophetic character, or upon the assumption that its geographical or local allusions and details could not have been known to Moses. This latter assumption, of course, has no force, if the possibility of prophetic foresight is granted; a possibility which calls for no discussion here. The special interpretation will be considered in the exegetical notes. How unreliable these grounds are appears from the diversity in the views which rest upon them, as seen above.—A. G.]

The form of statement is in a verbal, as in a poetic and rhythmical point of view, peculiar, but with true Mosaic features, as a comparison with the other parts of Deuteronomy will show. We cannot understand how "this song should be viewed in any important sense as inferior in poetical merit to the earlier songs of Moses" (HERXHEIMER). On the contrary, the noticeable doubling—now of the first, now of the second clauses, even of both, with one corresponding clause standing by itself refutes any such supposition. As to the rhetorical form, the discourse alternates between animated address, description, declaration, calls to those addressed, prayer to the Lord for them or still devout wishes for their good. See the exposition. KNOX calls this song "the most difficult section of the whole Pentateuch."

Its relation to the blessings of Jacob. KNOX holds that they "are alike" in their original peculiarities and independence, and that "any imitation cannot be proved." That the blessings of Moses contain references to those of Jacob is peculiarly clear with respect to the blessing upon Joseph, but they are also traceable elsewhere. But that the one is founded upon the other, and a confirmation of it (KEIL), does not seem to be the most appropriate designation. Although Moses here blesses as a father, still "not as father simply, but as a lawgiver." "No sons stand around the bed of the dying father, but Israel, with its hosts, lay before him." The patriarchal, Gen. xlix., appears, Deut. xxxiii., as a blooming, fruit-promising nationality. This natural progress and development gives less scope for "specific predictions" than for "the purely ideally depicted prophetic glances into the future," as KEIL has well remarked. The parallel between Judah and Joseph shapes and rules the blessings of Jacob, and that of Levi and Joseph the blessings of Moses, which is at the same time genuinely Deuteronomic (Introd. § 4. I.). Moses, "the beginning of the new time of the law, and still at the same time the bearer and the end of the time of the wilderness now coming to a close, blesses the people for this new time which he himself began, and for the future of which he gave the form, and which, in relation to the time of the wandering, should be a time of rest, of partial fulfilment, of the peculiar and now first possible political development of the nation" (ZIEGLER). "These circumstances," says HERDER, "give the tone and contents of this second blessing; they render an introduction necessary, which was not needful with Jacob. They give a close which is not found there—and for the most part also other necessities and other wishes, although it cannot be denied that the song of the patriarch floats before the mind of Moses." Comp. LANG, Genesis, p. 649.

The import of the Mosaic blessings. "Moses, in his blessing upon Israel, sets forth 'the fulfilment of its destination as the people of God' (according to SCHULTZ), the only true and highest happiness," to which fulfilment each tribe, according to its nature and peculiarities, already for the most part intimated in the blessings of Jacob, should take part. "Simeon, whose peculiarities did not authorize his distinct mention, and whose independence was therefore already removed, Gen. xlix., forms the one exception. The same is true to some extent also with Reuben." Intimations, "although entirely elementary, still sufficiently definite, reveal both how different are the problems in the kingdom of God on the earth, and how well the Lord knows how to use the different natural peculiarities in their realization." One "problem is inward with respect to the people itself; another outward with respect to the Gentile nations." As there are personal charisms or gifts, so also there are national, indeed tribal and family charisms. Israel, in this regard, is the symbol of the manifold grace of God (ποικίλη χάρις Θεού), as in it the idea of the kingdom of God the one charism completes itself in the world. But work for the kingdom of God is in like manner a different work, and hence the arranging and grouping of the charisms, their alterations likewise, the leadership also of one or another charism whence results the then existing spirit of the time in its divine definiteness in the kingdom of God. We observe, in connection with this, that the order of tribes in the blessings of Moses departs, not only from the natural order, but from that observed in the blessings of Jacob. Neither the geography (Κνωβελ), nor any thing else external, gives a sufficient explanation for this departure. As this freedom, corresponding essentially to grace, has its position and value for the work, the work-day of the kingdom of God, so finally the issue of the Mosaic blessing (ver. 26 sq.) is significant in reference to the rest, which from eternity lies at the foundation of this labor, in reference to the Sabbath, in which this labor must issue as its termination. That is, in the beautiful words of LANGHE: "The kingdom of heaven is both the deepest foundation and the highest revelation of the kingdom of God."

The relation to Deut. xxii. The unity. The glory and the praise of Jehovah is here as there the beginning, the end, and the fundamental thought. The difference. HERDER, too sharply: "as that between the curse and the blessing." Better, with SCHULTZ: "the song and the blessing supplement each other as negation and affirmation." In that the reality in Israel, what it actually is, is prominent, in this its ideality, what it ought to be.

Division.—Title, ver. 1. Introduction, vers. 2-5. The blessings upon the tribes, vers. 6-25. The close, vers. 26-29.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. The title, ver. 1, brings out prominently the character, contents, and significance of that which follows. If the law, because of sin, suspends over Israel the curse, Moses personally takes his departure from his people, blessing them. The designation אִשִּׁי הָאֱלֹהִים; which is not found elsewhere in the Pentateuch, comp. Josh. xiv. 6; Ps. xc. in the title, points with the finger of an intimate cotemporary to the import of the person, and thus makes apparent the significance of his blessing. The expression denotes a personally near position to God, intercourse with Him, and hence is used to describe the official, prophetic qualification (1 Sam ix. 6; 1 Tim. vi. 11; 2 Pet. i. 21). Before his death (Gen. xxvii. 4) presents the situation in its solemn earnestness. The repeated and still at last announced imminent death-penalty (xxii. 48 sq.) illuminates the weight and value of the words which follow, the impression which they must make, as coming from one just about to die, and is also a time announcement, showing that Moses immediately after the song, and upon the same day, completed these blessings.

2. Vers. 2-5. The introduction takes us up to the only true fountain of all blessing, to Jehovah revealed to Israel. Thus at the very beginning of ver. 2. The description of the law-giving through which Israel was and should be this nation, is geographically poetical, brought out through the figure of the sunlight in its glory streaming from every side, corresponding to the all-embracing majesty and greatness of the Lord, because its glory reveals itself from the most remote points at the same time, and consequently fills a wide horizon with the light and splendor of its manifestation. In order to state at once that of which he treats, and to which all further details are subservient—for it is scarcely possible that other manifestations of Jehovah can here be referred to (Κνωβ).—and as to those coming from Egypt, Sinai was the nearest eminence, so Sinai in the South is first named (comp. i. 2). At midday here the eternal sun, as God, sets up his throne, and there his full light appears. The Edomite mountain region, רָעַשׁ, as it forms the eastward limits of the wilderness in which Jehovah found Israel (xxii. 10) connect with this position in the figure here used, the breaking forth (וַיֵּצֵא) of the light (Titus ii. 11). רָעַשׁ (i. 1) the mountain of Arasimeh, located in the North, and for the most part chalk-masses, and hence in their reflection of the blinding sunlight agreeing well with the shining forth here connected with them. Kadesh is located there, and thus—to remove any misunderstanding, since it might have been thought that the mountains of Et-Tih, lying not far above Sinai, were referred to by the term, the mountains of Paran—רָעַשׁ might be rendered with HERDER, Κνωβελ and OTHERS, "from the heights of Kadesh," but then we should have to read רָעַשׁ, רָעַשׁ does not require the rendering ten thousands (as רָעַשׁ: xxii. 80), since רָעַשׁ signifies to heap up, to extend. But the ordinary explanation also meets the parallelism. While the "heights of Kadesh" indeed would only supplement what was already expressed by the Mount Paran, the holy myriads, i. e., the angel hosts, well agrees with the geographical details, the earth localities, completing them by the reference to heaven, (Acts vii. 53; Heb. ii. 2; Gal. iii. 19), which is neither "a mere idle fancy," nor "an idea elsewhere foreign to the Old Testament, nor even a thought too lately introduced here" (Κνωβελ). In this latter view, indeed, the explanation alluded to gives the best transition to the last clause of the verse, (comp. Judg. v. 4, 5; Hab. iii. 8; Ps. lxxviii. 17; Gen. xxviii. 12; xxxii. 2; 1 Kings xxii. 19; Isa. vi., etc. Matt. xxvi. 53; Heb. xii. 22; Rev. v. 11; Jude ver. 14). Since לִמֹּנִים refers to the Israelites, they are clearly not the myriads. The לִמֹּנִים is not to be taken as synonymous with עָמָּה, in which case we should have to read instead of וַיֵּצֵא poet: to come forth, וַיֵּצֵא with him out of holy myriads, namely those who came with him, in order to express the thought of such a following or attendance. ["The verse thus forms a poetical description of the vast arena upon which this glorious manifestation of the Lord in the giving of the covenant took place." BIB. COM. And KEIL well adds "this manifestation of God formed the basis for all subsequent manifestations of the omnipotence and grace of the Lord for the salvation of His people, Judg. v. 4; Heb. iii. 8."—A. G.]. The last and fifth clause completes those two doubled clauses, as answering the question why this manifestation? The thought is thus suggested that it is the giving of the law to Israel which was the object in view. But the expression from his right hand (thus going out from it) justifies the expectation of a gift, and scarcely any other than symbolically, the fire, really the law (Hab. iii. 4 does not give a proper and full explanation). Comp. iv. 11, 86. But לֹא אֵשׁ cannot be rendered ungrammatically fiery law. It is either fire of law, [so the margin in the A. V.,—A. G.], or fire, as in apposition with the law, in connection with which the law was given. Dr WETTE, and OTHERS, refer it to the pillar of fire, for direction, i. e., through which their way was pointed out. But the assertion of Dr WETTE, KNOBEL, that לֹא is only a recent Hebrew word, adopted from the Persian, has been too readily accepted as true by SCHULTZ, KEIL, and OTHERS. Comp. on the contrary HAVERNICK's Intro. I. 1, who argues in favor of a Hebrew derivation from לֹא. It must be a primitive term as a comparison of languages shows, i. e., Sanscrit dā, Greek θε (τίθημι) German Thun. "Aramaisms or Chaldaisms testify, as well, in favor of a very early as of a late composition." (L. KENIG, Alttest. Studien II.) The very early form לֹא would correspond well with the poetic אֵשׁ. KNOBEL reads אֵשׁ and explains: out of his hand shoot forth lightning flashes (outpourings, iii. 17; Num. xxi. 15). KEIL reads with great confidence (after the conjecture of BÖTTCHER), אֵשׁ in the sense of "fire of throwing," fire darting (Ex. xix. 16). SCHULTZ: fire missile. [The reference to the fire and lightnings which attended the giving of the law is clear. The supposition of the pillar of fire is entirely out of place, and must be rejected. But whether the words לֹא אֵשׁ are to be read as one word, and if so how that word is to be pointed, is an open question. The reading proposed by KEIL has in its favor some MSS. authority, and meets the necessities of the case so well that it seems now to be generally accepted.—A. G.].

Ver. 8. אֵשׁ. Confirming that which precedes. חֶסֶד, found only here, and signifies in general to love—according to the meaning in kindred dialects. It is not however as KNOBEL holds, the conceiving of an affection once, but rather an enduring love. חֶסֶד is the lap or bosom, and thus it expresses the cherishing love (Others: the concealing, protecting) affection. עַמִּים. The thought of other nations than Israel is here out of place; it appears in xxxii. 8 from the contrast of Israel to the nations. Although it should not be translated "the tribes of Israel," KNOBEL, yet still they are specially to be thought of; but generally the word is to be taken in the sense of the promises to the patriarchs (Gen. xvii. 4; particularly xxviii. 8, (xxxv. 11; xlviii. 4, 19). According to the promise Jehovah cherishes in reference to Israel, nations in His bosom, i. e., in the purpose of His love. The subject clause is placed first, to which the three following members correspond. Since it is Jehovah who is spoken of, his saints can only be those of Jehovah, and as the holy myriads, ver. 2, so the all justifies the conjecture that the Angels of God are referred to; who are sent forth as the ministers of those who are the heirs of salvation, Heb. i. 14. But as the discourse is of Jehovah, so in this blessing it is directed to Israel, and in thy hand, therefore leaving out of view the harshness sought to be justified from Ps. xlix. 19, can only refer to Israel. That the heavenly hosts are in Israel's power, i. e., are devoted to his service, after Gen. xxviii. 12; xxxii. 2, after the allusion to them shortly before, for the law-giving at Sinai, after Deut. iv. 7, etc., cannot be regarded as too boldly spoken. תָּכֵן is to bend, turn, whither; and so explains the כִּיךָ of a service which the angels rendered. That the Israelites in the power of God followed at the foot of the ark of the covenant, (KNOBEL), and the like, is saying far too little, in itself, and for this passage; and the words can scarcely be understood of being thrust down, prostrated, of being banded together, encamped, either as disciples (HEERER) or as those swearing allegiance (HERXHEIMER). לִרְגֶלְךָ, after thy footstep. Whither thou movest, the hosts of God from heaven move after His hosts upon the earth. KNOBEL in his perplexity assigns the last member to the following verse. Understanding it of Jehovah, which is the most obvious view, it strengthens the preceding thought in the highest measure. KEIL takes אֵשׁ as distributive, i. e., each one of them rises up to receive thy utterances. But how can Israel be suddenly taken as the subject, as receiving from the words of God with Moses (the law), or even Moses (KNOBEL) since he received out of these revelations (the statutes of God)? מִדְּבַרְתֶּךָ on account of thy (Israel) discourses, utterances with God, i. e. prayers. Chap. iv. 7 gives an excellent explanation. Comp. Num. x. 84 sq.; Ex. xiv. 19. Jehovah Himself rises up when Israel speaks to Him. [This ingenious exposition of SCHROEDER avoids the necessity for supposing any change of person, accounts for the singular אֵשׁ, and agrees well with the context. It is suggestive, and well worthy of consideration. KEIL paraphrases the verse: "He embraces all nations in His love, has all His holy angels in His hand, so that they lie at His feet, and rise up at His word." On the whole SCHROEDER's view is the better.—A. G.]. After ver. 8 has in this way connected the glory of Israel with the glory of Jehovah (ver. 2), the communion of the two in the law follows now most appropriately in ver. 4. The Jews regard this verse as a citation, taken from the lips of Israel. HENGSTENBERG: "Moses forgets himself, as it were, places himself upon the standpoint of the people, who in thankful love should rejoice in the favor of God shown to him. Thus Habakkuk in the last verse of his prophecy. Ps. xx. and xxi. In the New Testament John xxi. 24. And we are familiar with similar examples in the Christian lyrics." Comp. also xxxii. 81.

The supposition, however, of a redaction, easily understood by a reference to the filial piety of Joshua, is natural, who instead of "He commanded Moses a law," places "Moses commanded us a law." [Moses however has so completely and uniformly identified himself with the people, that the supposition that he does so here, and actually spake the words as they are recorded, though he did not write them, is much more natural. The piety of Joshua would lead him to record the words, as they were uttered, not to give them any new form.—A. G.] The repetition of the ל is not necessary in the second clause. Comp. iv. 6 sq. (Rom. iii. 2); John i. 17; vii. 19. Upon קהל comp. v. 19; ix. 10; x. 4; iv. 10; xviii. 18. Ver. 6. Jehovah is the subject, as this shows that ver. 4 was originally uttered as suggested above אֱלֹהֵינוּ יְהוָה בְּרַחֵם. After the expression of the communion in the law, he closes now with that through the theocracy (Jeshurun, comp. upon xxxii. 15). The law Israel's, the kingdom Jehovah's (Ex. xv. 18). KNOBEL, when he gathered the heads of the people, sq., comp. iv. 10, etc., (Ex. xix. 24).

3. Vers. 6-25. The easy natural connection of the blessings upon the individual tribes, with what precedes, arises out of the common relations to Jehovah, and the rich promises to Israel. Thus the Mediator of the law is the speaker of the blessings. And first—Ver. 6. REUBEN: A moderated wish and blessing for the first-born, but one who was already displaced, Gen. xlix. 8 sq. כִּסּוֹר is something easily counted (iv. 27; Gen. xxiv. 30), and can scarcely therefore be taken to designate that which is innumerable. (HERDER: His men should be numerous again). The negation appears clearly as an explanation of 'ו', since a co-reference to 'ו' in the following clause, cannot well be regarded as allowable. [See the rule, EWALD, § 351, as referred to by KEIL, p. 500, who however disregards it here and carries the negation to the second clause.—A. G.] The view of KNOBEL and others is perhaps the best, because he had sunk down to a small number; still there remains a blessing therewith, and the natural claim of Reuben, according to the judgment of Jacob, as also the low note which Moses here struck, was not altered, (comp. Num. xvi. 1 sq.; 1 Chron. v. 8 sq.). He should not entirely disappear as a tribe, (Gen. xlii. 2; xliii. 8) should much more remain while Simeon is passed over in silence as dead. Some MSS. of the Sept. interpolate the name of Simeon in the second clause, and connect it with: ἔστω πολλὸν ἐν ἀριθμῷ. HERXHEIMER speaks of a "happy life;" KNOBEL of a "prosperous condition." Both remind us of Reuben's local distant position, exposed to Moabitish and Arabian incursions.—[The Moabitish stone so lately discovered shows that the cities of the Reubenites assigned to them by Joshua, were for the most part taken by the Moabites. They seem also to have wrested in part some of the cities assigned to the more warlike and energetic tribe of Gad. SCHLOTTMANN, Die Siegesaule Mesa. The Moabite Stone by CHRISTIAN DE GINSBURG, LL. D., London, 1870.—A. G.]—According to

Num. xxvi. 7 this tribe, and still more that of Simeon, had suffered considerable losses. Num. xxv. 14 should be considered in connection with the latter tribe; but it still had a continued existence (1 Chron. iv.), so that the circumstances of a later time give no occasion for the omission of this tribe in the blessings of Moses. But it is in accordance with the Messianic and redeeming character of Judah that it receives into itself, as it were the tribe of Simeon, Judg. i. 8; as indeed this tribe had its location within the bounds of Judah, Josh. xix. 2 sq.—[Simeon shared in the general blessings; but as dispersed in Israel, he had no individual blessing. This tribe had not, like that of Levi, made any efforts to retrieve its position, or to remove the stain which rested upon it, but had added new sins to that which brought upon it the curse of Jacob. Although they did not perish utterly (1 Chron. iv. 24 and 89-48), they were still regarded as included with the other tribes, especially with Judah, with whose "fate and objects," as SCHULTZ remarks, "they shared as far as possible."—A. G.]—Ver. 7. Judah. After the omission of Simeon, Judah as the head-tribe follows upon the nominally first-born (Reuben). This blessing is the first introduced through the peculiar formula (אמן); it is distinguished also by the method of prayer used (Gen. ix. 26). The striking brevity points to the rich details in the blessing of Jacob. The voice of Judah is not merely his prayer for a prosperous return after he had gone out into the earlier contests (HENGSTENBERG, KEIL), but according to LANGE's finer feeling, something mysterious, i. e. the utterance of a desire after a return generally out of all, even the last struggle, into the glory of a peaceful dominion.—Unto his people embraces as Gen. xlix. 10, more certainly, than the Israelitish tribes. (HERDER perhaps too strongly: "a tribe which thirsts for the end of the pilgrimage"). Upon the pre-eminence of Judah comp. Num. ii. 7; x. 14; xliii. 24. HENGSTENBERG's Christologie, 2 Edition I. a. 88. For the criticism upon the historical explanation see KNOBEL, p. 344. But his own view of this passage, as referring to the flight of David from before Saul is too personal entirely for a tribal blessing. Comp. ver. 12.—[KNOBEL, after an allusion to the explanation given above, which he rejects, discusses and lays aside one by one, the views that it refers to the days of Jehoiachin, to the disruption under Rehoboam, to the period of David's residence as king at Hebron, and fixes as the only possible sense the time of David's flight from Saul. The reasoning he adopts, viz. that the circumstances of the history at each of these periods cannot well be made to agree with the words in question, bears against his own assumption. "For" (BR. Com.) "it is impossible, on his own principles, to explain how the disasters, apostacies and confusion of Saul's reign and of the times of the Judges could have happened at a date not long preceding that in which the song was penned—a song which everywhere speaks of peace and plenty."—A. G.]—SCHULTZ strangely calls in question the idea of a return in מלך. As the preposition ב belonging peculiarly to this root denotes entrance (בָּרַךְ, בָּרַח), so the verb signiflies to enter. The Hiph. can only be either: to effect an entrance into his allotted inheritance in Canaan (J. H. MICHAELIS, HERDER), with which the exalted character of the blessing upon Judah does not accord, because that was not less to be desired for all Israel, or: to make an entrance again to his home, and with this to his people with whom he dwells. That the separation from his people supposed, can be no other than that occasioned by his warlike expedition, is clear from what follows. There is here a similar mingling of war and victory (peace) as in Gen. xlix. 8 sq. (The explanation of SCHULTZ: "give to him the people," is very nearly the opposite of the text, which says: "bring him to his people," and the  $\text{לֵךְ}$  is not so much: bring him to the king of his people, as: king over his people.)  $\text{לֵךְ}$ , scarcely (iii. 26) be sufficient for him, for if Judah's own hand is sufficient for him, what need is there of the Lord's help as immediately follows! OTHERS: He has hands sufficient (!). Far-fetched: He stretches out widely ( $\text{רַחֵם}$ ), or: upon his side, fights ( $\text{לִי}$ ) for him. A participle from  $\text{לָחַם}$  to thrust, press, strive:  $\text{לֵךְ}$ : "for his people;" for himself, would not suit the connection. We might also refer  $\text{לֵךְ}$  from the end of the clause to  $\text{לֵךְ}$ . His hands, fighting for him, help, sq., be thou: Because contending for Israel, Judah is thought of as in straits, hence the prayer for help from his adversaries, and assistance against them. Vers. 8-11. Levi: As Judah had the pre-eminence in external things, so the blessing of the tribe of Levi is clearly connected with it, on account of its pre-eminence internally, but it can only come after Judah, partly because, Gen. xlix. 7, Levi is scattered as a tribe, and partly for a criticism upon those who know so much of the hierarchy in the Old Testament. What Judah was for Israel, Levi was in Israel. The prevalent tone of this blessing in its reference to Jehovah points also to the connection of the two. For the Thummim and Urim comp. upon Ex. xxvii. 30. (HENGSTENBERG, Egypt., p. 164), a pluralis majestatis, the "medium through which Israel might have the advantage of light and infallible truth, as it designates the assemblage of all lights, and of all perfection and infallibility." [The article in SMITH'S Bib. Dict., by Prof. E. H. PLUMMER, gives, perhaps, as clear and satisfactory a theory of the Urim and Thummim as we can now attain. It includes however conjectures and suppositions, which a fuller knowledge will probably show to be unfounded. The general end and purpose is clear, but how the divine will was manifested, is involved in uncertainty.—A. G.] Thummim here, before Urim, as it does not occur elsewhere, bring into prominence (according to HUPFELD, viewed as having a positive import), "the sincerity of mind, the right position of the heart towards God and man," because such perfection could be asserted of Levi. The divine illumination, for his judicial decisions (xvii. 9) which belongs to him, is based upon this. OTHERS regard it as a wish; let both be and remain with him. Of this tribe as an ideal person (vers. 9, 11, plural) or of the idealized tribe-father (!) it is then said that he is  $\text{לֵךְ}$ , i. e., that Levi in all this, comes into view only as the bearer of the divine  $\text{לֵךְ}$ , viz., as participating in the grace of God, standing in the covenant of grace with Jehovah, as His chosen one. [ $\text{לֵךְ}$  designates Levi as the object of the divine choice and favor, and not his moral character. But still there has obviously, from the whole blessing here, when compared with that in Gen. xlix. 5-7, been a great change in the moral and religious character of this tribe. A change which the events in the intervening history illustrates; especially those recorded in Ex. xxxii. 28 sq., and Num. xxv. 11 sq.—A. G.] After such an emphatic allusion to the distinguished honor of the tribe (comp. Intro., § 4, I.) with reference to the high-priesthood in Levi there follows an historical reference, for Levi must have changed the curse of Jacob first into a blessing through his standing (Ex. xvii.) as through his falling (Num. xx.) if indeed this latter reference is in place here. V. GERLACH cites Ex. xvii. 7 only, which is sometimes called both Massah and Meribah. [Both passages are referred to. The two provings by means of water are chosen, "because in their correlation there they were best adapted to represent the beginning and the end, and therefore the whole of the temptation." SCHULTZ.—A. G.]  $\text{לֵךְ}$  KNOBEL renders arbitrarily: "thou blamedst." But if not on that account, still on account of the  $\text{לֵךְ}$  there may be a reference also to Num. xx. 18, a slight intimation of the sin of the two chief personalities of the tribe, i. e., of Moses as well as Aaron. If we hold that the probable address of Jehovah, in thy Thummim, sq., in connection with the seventh verse continues even in the second clause, then we must interpret the provings and strifes as introduced indeed by the people, but as fundamentally proceeding from Jehovah, according to viii. 2 sq. But in this latter passage it is the whole people who are spoken of, and indeed their humiliation and trial by the Lord; while here it avails peculiarly of Levi, and indeed his trial and strifes. This latter term sounds somewhat strange when used of God to Levi, while it is on the contrary classic with respect to the conduct of the people towards Moses and Aaron (Ex. xvii. 2; Num. xx. 8, 2), and toward Jehovah (Ex. xvii. 7; Num. xx. 18). Comp. further vi. 16; ix. 22. But why this difference? The reference to the Lord may very well, in the second clause, pass over into the address of Israel in order to return again at the close of ver. 9 sq. to Jehovah! With this most natural interpretation we gain perhaps a reference of the provings on the side of the people to the Thummim, and of their strifes to the Urim; and moreover a reason why the former precedes the latter here. Israel had proved or tested before all the faithfulness of Levi, of God, then truly also striven against the light of Levi and of God. The prominent reference in ver. 8 to Ex. xviii. agrees well with ver. 9 also, as in any case the following references are on this supposition more appropriately added than if Num. xx. still came between. He denies the strongest natural ties when the interest of Jehovah are concerned, xiii. 7 sq. (Matt. x. 37; xix.

29; Luke xiv. 26). The cases referred to: Ex. xxxii. 26 sq. (Num. xxv. 7 sq.). KNOBEL applies it only to the entire concession to his divine calling. OTHERS refer to Lev. xxi. 11, or understand it of his not accepting persons, of the impartiality of the Levitical criminal judge (i. 17). ׀ gives a proof of the described disposition through his observing and guarding (xxxii. 10); because they held fast what God had spoken from Sinai, and had shown themselves to be the guardians of the covenant proclaimed there, even with the sword. Upon these historical events rests finally, as upon its basis, the description of Levi's calling. Ver. 10 relates chiefly to his duties as ver. 11 is full of promise. Comp. xvii. 9 sq.; xxiv. 8. The incense service is in the holy place, the sacrificial service in the court.—(At thy nose) the nose as the prominent member for the face, thus the same as before thee; perhaps also with reference to his anger. ׀, not his substance, revenues, but the strength, which needs the divine blessing for resisting, as well as for working, e. g. in his judicial activity and office (SCHULTZ). The work must on account of the ׀ refer here to the sacrifices. The loins (dual) of the lower part of the back come so far into view as with their crushing (xxxii. 89), whoever has risen up against him must become powerless and fall away; parallel to the first clause. ׀ (Ex. xv. 7) especially those rising against his priesthood (Num. xvi.) as against his judicial office (xvii. 12).—The haters (xxxii. 47) should not indeed proceed to an actual revolt or outbreak. ׀ and ׀, a play upon words. Their hatred is parallel to the favor, acceptance, of the Lord, in the second clause. ׀ occurs only here in this position [it usually stands before the infinitive.—A. G.]. As it is with Judah's enemies, so with those who rise up and hate Levi; and thus the two blessings run parallel even to the end.—Ver. 12. Benjamin.—As the blessing of the later born, Judah, precedes that of his brother Levi, so also of the sons of Rachel the younger comes before the elder, Joseph. This blessing lies directly in the face of the hypothesis of KNOBEL as to the origin of chap. xxxiii. at the time of David's flight, making ver. 7 relate to the desire for David, and ver. 11 an expression of the sharp, stern wish against Saul, etc. Saul might indeed be for Benjamin what David should be for Judah. The beloved of Jacob (Gen. xlv. 20) here appears as the beloved of the Lord, and thus first truly as the son of prosperity (Gen. xxxv. 18). This distinguishing relation to the Lord becomes to Benjamin a dwelling, and thus describes how he dwells and lives rather than where. For ׀, which KNOBEL designates as "very difficult," cannot refer to a settlement by the temple, but if not, according to the fundamental view of chap. xxxii., to one grounded upon the Rock Jehovah, still in accordance with i. 81 or xxxii. 11 to one whose existence is supported by Jehovah. ׀ usually refers to the presence of the Lord (xii. 5, 11, etc.) and hence this thought floats before the mind of expositors; but it occurs here, as in ver. 20, of the sleeping lion! It is scarcely possible that the participation of Benjamin in the place chosen for the sanctuary (Josh. xviii. 28) should be referred to here, nor even the mountain-district which fell to this tribe, and might symbolize its rest upon the eternal Rock. The founding [dwelling] upon Jehovah is not therefore anything local, but a property in which Benjamin stands as the representative of all Israel (comp. ver. 28), as the designation at the very beginning of the blessing also may apply to all the people (Pa.

lx. 5; Jer. xi. 15). The SEPT. reads ׀ as if it were ׀, and connects it with the following clause. The security [safety] which grows out of the dwelling founded upon the Lord is also not merely for Benjamin, but equally for the other tribes (ver. 28); and with this the reference of ׀ is put beyond question. The peculiar word is without doubt connected with ׀ (ver. 8); ׀ is the edge, border; thus truly: surrounding, protecting.

The ׀ is repeated with marked emphasis: upon such a rock. Benjamin is a protecting tower for others. The connection with the blessing of Jacob (Gen. xlix. 27) is effected through ׀, which is equivalent to the "morning and evening" there. The warlike character ascribed to him there, appears now in the service of others, so that only the fruits of it, the enjoyment, come into view here. The third clause is parallel to the first, and confirms the security of Benjamin and of that which he protects, as it illustrates more fully the repeated

׀. The shoulders obviously come into view with reference to the bearing; the dwelling is of Benjamin, who is the subject here, so that His is equivalent to Jehovah's. Comp. i. 81; xxxii. 11. As Jehovah appears as the Rock, so also as the eagle. The representative character of the last of the twelve sons of Israel with respect to the whole people gives rise to this feature in the blessing, which is also ascribed to Israel generally. (KNOBEL makes Jehovah the subject, and explains the dwelling as referring to the position of the tabernacle at Gibeon between the mountain-ridges of Benjamin.)—[KNOBEL's view which he rests mainly upon the geographical position of Gibeon is certainly far less tenable, than that which explains the dwelling of the residence of Jehovah in the temple afterwards built in the land of this tribe. But the subject is clearly Benjamin, as SCHROEDER holds, although the comparison is rather with the father who carries his sons while tender and young, than with the eagle.—A. G.]—Vers. 13–17. Joseph. We have here a fullness of details and of words as with Levi, which surely has its origin here, as also in Gen. xlix., in the fact that it is a double blessing both of Ephraim and Manasseh. The elaborated and figurative language corresponds well with the fact that Joseph is Israel's ornament and glory as over against the Egyptians (HERDER: "The kindness of Joseph is still ever before the eyes of him who utters the blessing, and his sons are clothed in the rich beauty of their father"). As in all cases, especially in the dwelling of Benjamin, the reference to Canaan is predominant, so the progress from the blessing, Gen. xlix., to that spoken here, is marked by the prominence given to his inheritance. The author of such blessings upon his land is Jehovah; the second causes (יְד is equivalent to through or with) are given in the accumulated expressions which follow. The waters from beneath (richness in springs, viii. 7), as from above, according to Gen. xlix. 25, whence some have altered the explicative מַל into מַעַל (Gen. xxvii. 28). It is a question whether in ver. 18 the words treat of productions matured by the influence of the sun, and also by that of the moon in its different phases (KEIL), or of the fruits which ripen only once in a year, and those which grow in each month, fruits of all seasons of the year (KNOBEL). וְכִרְאֵשׁ, ver. 15, as וְכִרְאֵשׁ (ver. 13), unless מִנְּךָ is to be supplied. Whether olive-groves, or vineyards, or merely the rich and beautiful wild forests, are referred to, is uncertain. The reference to Gen. xlix. 26 and the parallelism exclude the explanation of קֶרֶן (literally: what is before, used both in a local and temporal sense) as the east, although this in itself is allowable, and JOHNSON retains it here with reference to the easterly mountains of Gilead, assigned to Manasseh. The poetical expression celebrates the strength and sublimity of the mountain-region. Ver. 18. Moses here first sums up still all that relates to the land, but makes prominent immediately after the earth: and all its fullness, significantly for the transition to the person of Joseph, the affection, grace and good-will of the Lord in a setting both genuinely Mosaic (Ex. iii. 2), and at the same time, as Gen. xlix. 24 shows, in full harmony with that of Jacob. It is not, however, so much "an addition of the spiritual blessings of the covenant of grace to those merely natural," as rather an addition to the needy (as Joseph himself had been in Egypt, as Israel always is) of divine mercy permanently shadowed forth, which, as is evident, forms the basis of all that is said, and is itself the very kernel of the whole remarkable utterance. Hence we have not now as before אֵל, but neither an accusative of the instrument, nor of a more precise definition (SCHULTZ: "and indeed through the good-will," etc.); but רַחֲמָיו is abstract, on which account, and because at the same time all is included, it is connected with the feminine form (רַחֲמָיו), as in a neuter sense. For the rest comp. Gen. xlix. 26. יְדִי retains the reflexive signification: who has separated himself through the plan or disposition of his life upon which he devoutly entered, but is not to be taken in the moral sense Gen. xxxix. 8, much less in the sense of a ritual abstinence, but rather in the sense of one who has consecrated himself to the Lord, as an instrument of His holy purposes with Israel, as he himself interprets or explains it to his brethren, Gen. i. 20. The expression has nothing to do with יְדִי, "diadem" (JOHNSON: "the crowned"). But even the signification, "prince" (DELITZSCH), is not established at least by the reference to Lam. iv. 7. SCHULTZ refers it "to the esteem in which he was held by the tribe-father, Jacob."—The head and the top of the head (crown) point to the long hair of the Nazarite; but whether the divine good-will and all blessings are to be viewed as a garland upon the head is questionable. It is simply said to come upon him, that it may be his lot and portion. Ver. 17. The description introduces here a figure corresponding to the fruitfulness of the land with reference to the firstling of Joseph, i. e. according to Gen. xlviii. 14 sq., Ephraim; although the closing member shows that Manasseh, the first-born in the order of nature, is included, but in less power and potency. To refer it to Joshua (V. GEBLADE, SCHULTZ) is too personal; even in Levi Aaron is not individualized. The glory (majesty) which is attributed to Ephraim, or which is desired for him, should manifest itself, make itself felt through peculiar remarkable strength, hence the horns, as the pride and strength of the bullock, give the tone and coloring to the statement, especially the horns of the אֵילָן, the wild bullock, either from אֵל, to be high, or אֵלָן, the outbreathing, raging (comp. Num. xxiii. 22; xxiv. 8; Ps. xxii. 21). After the results of such power have been extended even to the remotest nations, the ends of the earth (in apposition), unless together [even to] is to be supplied ("which easily appears as the most fearful power." SCHULTZ); the horns of the first born are explained at the same time as the thousands of Manasseh; an explanation which has a "joyful ring and tone." SCHULTZ (Josh. xvii. 14 sq.).—Vers. 18, 19. Zebulon and Issachar. After the two sons of Rachel, we have now the sixth and fifth sons of Leah. As Benjamin closing the births of Rachel comes before Joseph, so Zebulon closing those of Leah stands before Issachar; or it is as with Ephraim and Manasseh, even as Judah before Levi. Its purport is very similar to Gen. xlix. 18 sq.; but the address here is to Zebulon alone. So certain is the blessing, that each tribe is directly called upon to rejoice. Ver. 18. Still the occasion, nature and object of this rejoicing is the peculiarity of each tribe, fixed already at the blessing of Jacob (Gen. xlix. 18 sq.), but almost directly the opposite the one to the other; in the one, the wide-world enterprise and efforts; in the other the comfortable enjoyment of home life (Gen. xxv. 27). This contrast serves to complete both. GRAF KEIL, miss the characteristic feature of the picture when they explain the going out and tents as equivalent to labor and rest, and apply both, to both tribes. The parallelism of the clauses is the parallelism of the brothers. The outgoing is that of the shipping and commercial life of Zebulon; in the tents applies to the grazing and agricultural pursuits of Issachar. SCHULTZ: in thy tents, i. e. "in order to furnish animals for the caravan-merchants, or to become the bearers of their goods." (HERDER: "The outgoing, as the contrast with Issachar shows, is the departure from the tents; Zebulon will use its vicinity to Sidon and the coast for the purposes of trade through a variety of industries abroad," etc.). The peoples, ver. 19, without any precise definition, must refer to the other nations of the world, who in distinction from the aggressive method (as in ver. 17), are here in an attractive, but still undefined way, called to the mountain. This calling is attributed to both tribes dwelling together: to Zebulon, because of his wide world commerce and intercourse; to Issachar, because from its easterly and southerly mountain-district, through which it is the beloved Land, and as it appears with its mountain-heights from the sea (iii. 25), it represents and symbolizes the mountain (chap. xii.) in prospect as the dwelling-place of Jehovah (Ex. xv. 17), and thus awakens a surem corda in the seamen. (KEIL: Moriah, Gen. xxii. 14 — [But KEIL holds that while Moriah has thus been designated and sanctified by the sacrifice of Isaac required of Abraham, there is no distinct or direct allusion to this mountain in the words of Moses here. — A. G.] — HEADER: Tabor; KNOBEL: Carmel.) The sacrifices [sain-offerings] offered there, not burnt-offerings, as is clear from the sacrificial meals connected with them, to which the nations are invited as guests, are זֶבֶחַ i. e. such as bring out clearly the moral quality of Israel as the people of the law (vi. 25; xxv. 15), include praise and thank-offering of every kind; and thus serve to introduce what follows. Zebulon and Issachar have, namely, such an occasion for praise and thankfulness, and must give them a sacrificial expression, since they call masses, troops, to such communion with the God of Israel, — for, sq. זֶבֶחַ used of the bringing together, gain, wealth; "both by commerce and the catch of fish, purple snails, bathing-sponges," (KNOBEL), "the abundance which the nations bring over the sea, Isa. lx. 5, 16." SCHULTZ: "the riches and treasures of both sea and land, Isa. lxvi. 11, 12." KEIL. סֵדֶה is then equivalent to strand, and the אֲרָזִים (a play upon words) is to be taken as: the treasures, jewels, or: the most hidden treasures. According to KNOBEL the author refers to the glass so highly prized by the ancients, which was found in the sand of the Belus southerly from Akko. פֶּן to apply closely to anything, here for the drawing in of the sea, as the mother's milk. Comp. for the whole Ps. xxii. 27 sq., and for the distinction between the idea and the reality, which forms an insoluble difficulty here for the historical exegete, since Zebulon and Issachar afterwards never in reality reached to the Mediterranean Sea; see SCHULTZ, p. 705. [The distinction involves no difficulty if we keep in mind the Messianic thought which is contained in the passage, and which receives its explanation and illustration in the Psalm above referred to. Comp. also Isa. lx. 1-22, and lxvi. 11, 12. — A. G.] Vers. 20, 21. Gad. The sons of the handmaidens follow, and first the first-born of Zilpah, Leah's handmaid. The praise of the Lord (Gen. ix. 26) implies the existence already of that which was about to be said. Jehovah gave the tribe a wide inheritance in the region of Sihon, and unlimited space, (Gen. xxvi. 22), also for further conquests. (xii. 20; xix. 8). For Gad appears already, Gen. xlix. 19, as a victorious warrior; here as a LION (KNOBEL, lioness) "who destroys even the last remnants of the Amorites" (SCHULTZ), or as KNOBEL, "plun-ders and consumes those encamped in quiet security. — Arm is equivalent to strength, and the crown of the head to the command, leadership. יָמָא, ver. 21, as the following דָּב shows, refers to the first portion of the land, which Gad held on the farther side of Jordan, (Num. xxxii.), which was conceded to him, and which he had to determine and organize as a leader and ruler; which was reserved to him as such; or according to KNOBEL: "Since the portion conceded to Gad for his bravery was especially only something preserved or kept, because the condition of Moses (Num. xxxii. 19) must first be fulfilled before the regular legal occupation could take place." (ONKELOS, RASCHI: For there the grace of the law-giver (Moses) is concealed, and similar numerous explanations)! If it refers to Moses, it must be, that there the portion defined by the law-giver is preserved. (JOHNSON: "For there the portion of the leader is preserved"). [קָחָה might refer either to Moses or to Gad; but as Gad is said to have chosen the first portion for Himself, it can only refer here to Gad, who is called the leader, ruler, because of his activity and bravery in the conquest of the land. See Num. xxxii. 2, 6; xxv. 84, and also KEIL, p. 509. — A. G.] The heads of the people is equivalent to the leader of the people, at its head, thus descriptively of the whole tribe; or Gad at the head of Israel, as the head of the nation, and thus before all (iii. 18; Josh. iv. 12). SCHULTZ, KEIL: "to the heads of the people," i. e., with them, joined himself to them. — The justice of the Lord is either: the Divine penal justice, and the judgments (his judgments) which he with the rest of Israel executed upon Canaan; or: because he performed before God and Israel, his duty, according to this command, he should not permit Israel to pass over alone. — Ver. 22. Dan — the first-born of Rachel's handmaid Bilhah. The serpent-like. Gen. xlix. 17, is now the lion-like, but still with the characteristic trait of unexpected cunning. פָּנָה literally, to draw the feet together for a spring. KNOBEL, renders פָּנָה from the plain: the lion usually has his lair upon the mountains, in the forests and thickets, but here in the treeless plains, and for that reason the more dangerous. SCHULTZ explains the allusion to Bashan from the fact that lions, leopards, abound in the northern mountain caves more than elsewhere. KEIL: "in the easterly Bashan these enemies were very dangerous to the herds." (Song. iv. 8). — Ver. 23. Naphtali. — The second son of Bilhah is still ever the graceful (Gen. xlix. 21) but with a more decided and fuller expression. נָרְכָה יָה confirms the explanation of רָצוֹן given in verse 16. Favours — not as SCHULTZ, which he causes, makes, but the good-will which Jehovah has to him, as He gives him the blessing for his portion. — The West (Sea) and the South gives one an idea of the favours of Jehovah to Naphtali, and the Divine blessing; although his land lay in the North, far from the sea, it should still enjoy the healthful freshness of the sea, as well as the genial warmth of the South. He dwells upon the beautiful sea of Genuesaret, where tropical fruits are produced. Should this be D'? The address imperative. [The דָּרָךְ does not necessarily refer to the South, but rather to the natural characteristics of the climate of a part of his inheritance, which bordered upon the Sea of Galilee, and which was a warm, sunny region. ROBINSON, PORTER, and other travellers, call attention to the beauty and fertility of this region. And here, too, there is the same distinction as before between the idea and the reality, showing how impossible it is to interpret these blessings merely historically.—A. G.] Vers. 24, 25. Asher.—The second son of Zilpah closes the blessings, a position for which his name was significant. (Blessedness). Ver. 24. With children, rather before or above the sons, (Judges v. 24),—i. e., above the sons who are blessed; standing at the close of the blessings of Moses, and parallel with יְהוּדָה in the second clause, it is naturally the sons of Jacob, above whom he is blessed. יְהוָה the favor of God (xxiii. 16). The rich picture of his oil possessions, or generally of his fat and fertile land, completes that given, Gen. xlix. 20. Ver. 25. The promise of lasting security is added to all the rest and completes it. Iron and brass.—KNOBEL: "Thy castles and strongholds shall have their doors and bars of these materials." OTHERS: "Thy iron and brass containing mountains (viii. 9) are thy strongholds." KEIL: "As strong and impregnable are thy dwellings, as if they were built of iron and brass." [Nearly all the recent expositors adopt the rendering of בְּמַעֲלָי, by bars or bolts. But that chosen in our version is consistent with the Hebrew, has in its favor the old-r versions, and presents in an expressive figure the strength and firmness of Asher.—A. G.] But what if the fastnesses were such, and no strength behind or within them? Hence it follows, and as thy days, or as long as he lives; so long shall he himself remain firm and strong. (בְּיָמָי, KNOBEL: "Thy security." KEIL: "Rest." HERXHEIMER and OTHERS: As thy days, so let thy prosperity increase).

4. Vers 28-29. At the close of the blessings we have a return (ver. 26) to their beginning, and thus the whole is beautifully finished.—There is none like unto the God, there is not as God—namely, a God beside (xxxii. 12; iv. 7). Jeshurun (comp. upon xxxii. 15)—the one addressed. [The punctuation scarcely admits of the rendering in our version, and the parallelism is against it.—A. G.] The following parallel clauses delineate the almighty power and exaltation of God as availing for Israel's help and redemption. — Who rideth upon (in) the heavens. שָׁחַ, as "the grinding," or "ground to pieces," extended, designating the clouds harboring the thunder, and also the ether. עָוָר, as in ver. 7, with וְ equivalent to; engaged in thy help, for the purpose of helping, as thy helper. The parallelism of וְנִלְמַתּוֹ with בְּעֶזְרִי, reveals the majesty of God as having risen up for Israel's help. Hence in ver. 27, even God Himself is the (dwelling) refuge (Ps. xc. 1), i. e., the permanent lodging (KNOBEL: Shelter, refuge, protection) because a God of the olden time, [the eternal God, A. V.], who has manifested Himself as God long before this time, (xxxii. 17) thus according to His eternity. HERX-

HEIMER, with an allusion to xvi. 15, explains the heavens, the clouds, as the dwelling of the God of old against the parallelism, which as it introduces the heaven with אֵין כָּאֵל, ver.

26, so now the earth with מִעֲנֵה אֱלֹהִי—וּמִתַּחַת must therefore state the contrast underneath, upon the earth; but also from this side—not so much: holds out, extends or offers, as: underneath is he, and from thence the everlasting arm, thus a permanent support and preservation. It is not necessary to say for whom, as this is evident from the address to the people, and also from the following, which represents the activity of the hands for the poor or needy (Gen. xlix. 24). Almighty exaltation above, eternal love underneath. As קִדְּשׁ points to the past, so עֹלָם to the future, the nearest as the most remote. With His hands, Israel's hands prevail, xx. 18, 17; xxxi. 4. (KNOBEL supposes a derivation from כִּתְּשׁ, and renders, "and the outstretching of the eternal arms." MENDELSSOHN: "the dwelling of the primeval God, and the everlasting arms of the lower world." OTHERS: A refuge hast thou in the God of old, and under the arms of the eternal God). In connection with the dwelling which God is to His people, and as a result of the expulsion and destruction of His enemies (especially the Canaanites) Israel should dwell, ver. 28. בְּמִטָּה, because בְּבֵרַךְ, i. e., not because separated from all nations through His law, but because through the protection of God, through victory in the strength of God, saved, secured, from his enemies, whom God has removed from him, he dwells safely (xii. 10). Thus we have here something more than HENGSTENBERG upon Num. xxiii. 9, "a quiet and guarded seclusion." Comp. HUFFELD, Ps. I, p. 64. The connection of בְּבֵרַךְ with the foregoing, recommends itself, even without the accent, against HENGSTENBERG, SCHULTZ, KEIL, KNOBEL. Just as little is יְהוָה, "the fountain of Jacob." Without insisting upon the unfitness of the expression with reference to dwelling, is it not over bold here (but comp. Isa. xlviii. 1; Ps. lxxviii. 26) thus to represent Israel "as sprung from Jacob, in whom it has its source" (KEIL) or, "in so far as it is one with Jacob, ever pouring forth from itself an increasing stream." SCHULTZ. Certainly Israel is no fountain in relation to Jacob, nor in connection with him, but Jacob must be the fountain of Israel. Generally, moreover, it is not so much here a parallel expression to Israel which is in view, as rather a parallel thought, to his secure, separate dwelling, and for this there is nothing more fitting (at the same time perhaps with a glance at מִעֲנֵה, ver. 27) than the eye of Jacob rejoicing in his secure dwelling, and one freed from enemies. The tribe-father directs, as it were, his eye satisfied to Israel, now come to its portion, to him in the promised land, striving after a look therein. (Even מִיְּמֵי a fountain stands for: a corner of the eye). There is no perceptible destruction of the symmetry of the clauses of the verse upon this explanation. Comp. besides viii. 7 sq. [SCHROEDER's view is ingenious, but he lays undue stress upon the phrase, "fountain of Jacob," since that may obviously imply only that Israel is the fountain issuing from Jacob, and not necessarily the fountain from which Jacob flows. KEIL meets the apparent impropriety in the construction of כֶּשֶׁל with לָמָּה, "dwell into," with the remark "that the dwelling involves the idea of spreading out over the land." As this construction seems to preserve the parallelism, it is better to render, Israel shall dwell in safety. Alone the fountain of Jacob. To a land, etc.—A. G.]. לָמָּה the progressive relative clause, the heaven of this land or of Israel (Lev. xxvi. 19). Comp. ver. 18; xi. 14, (Gen. xxvii. 28), xxxii. 2. Ver. 29 closes the whole blessing with which the last, best, happy condition of Israel, resting upon such divine (vers. 26, 27) and truly human and earthly foundations, should not lie buried in silence. (HERDER: "What a law-giver who thus closes! What a people who have such a God, such help, such a law, and such promises"). Literally: Thy blessedness, O Israel. בְּרָכָה plural, as many abstract nouns. The involved idea of grades, adjustments, must be understood morally. No happiness for Israel except upon a basis of right: its physical prosperity rests upon its moral. HUPFELD rightly regards the interpretation as a salutation, ("Blessings to thee, Hail to thee"), as without good ground, it is "a simple utterance." The blessedness with reference to Israel, the last words of Moses, offer the significant point of union for Matt. v. Who is like unto thee—parallel to that, there is none like unto God, O Jeshurun (ver. 26). The people, "singular" (SCHULTZ), as its God, (xxviii. 10); iv. 7. כִּי יְיָ in the Lord, embraces the salvation through him, and victory in him; (KEIL: "saved in the Lord"), Isa. xlv. 17. This is now explained upon the two sides: the defensive shield (Gen. xv. 1), the offensive sword, (Rev. xix. 15, 21). Comp. vers. 7, 26. The parallel to ver. 26 is unmistakable here, and so also in יְיָ: Israel's excellency, Jehovah's excellency! In consequence of which (Niphal) the dissembling flattery of the enemies; the feigned, affected subjection, as the fear of the mighty instils itself into them, (הִתְחַשְׁמִימָה) "as the Gibeonites, Josh. ix."): יְיָ denotes a victorious, ruling tread and step of the foot. Comp. xxxii. 18. OTHERS: Of the placing of the foot upon the necks of the conquered (Josh. x. 24). MICHAELIS: Of the idolatrous high places.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. Moses the man of God, and Christ also the Son of God, leave the earth uttering blessings, (Luke xxiv. 50 sq.).

2. It is characteristic for the law generally, but especially for the Deuteronomic law-giving, that Moses begins from Sinai, even when he will bless.

3. The Sinaitic law-giving was a sunrise upon humanity. What the world's history relates besides of the law, is to this as the star-light to the sunshine. There the night lasts, while here there is the clear light of day.

4. What the light signifies figuratively, that the "saints" present without a figure, for the nature of Jehovah, setting forth His holiness not only in the contrast between heaven and earth, but also in both its searching and illuminating, its requiring and blessing majesty.

5. The law—Israel's possession and wealth.

6. With Reuben it is a matter of life, and barely not death: such characters are usual in the kingdom of God.

7. As Simeon, so now one may live and still be dead as to the kingdom of God; truly also without winning any direct importance for it, and still as to his own person be blessed.

8. As Judah for Israel, so also among the tribes of those in the van. Germany may claim the warlike leadership. [How far? in what respects?—A. G.].

9. Upon the relation of Levi to Judah, in the blessing of Moses. W. NEUMANN, History of the Messianic Prophecies, 1865, p. 78 sq., says: "First the outward power of the ruler, then the inward, glorifying consecration of the priesthood. Until at Sinai all salvation is in the gold-glittering of the kingly diadem. The princely sceptre of Judah must, in the strength of his God, overcome all dangers which may prevent the people from rest. When the land is reached, has passed now into the actual possession of the people, then the silver splendor of the priestly diadem, consecrating the blessing of the promise, pours itself over the whole existence, glorifying it. The name Levi meets us upon the high-priestly official ornament, upon the ground of the flashing green emerald, whose doubled rays are such that according to the Arabian tradition the viper cannot look upon it without destroying its sight, discloses to the inquiring mind a significant element in the relation in which this green ground of the glittering light stands to the nature of that calling in which Levi serves. The hopeful green deepens there into such an overwhelming clearness, that it becomes a flashing light which destroys all the darkness of death. The resemblance to the calling of Abraham lies near at hand, when Levi appears freed from family ties and bands."

10. There is indeed a foolish and very harsh (pietistic), but surely also a sacred regardlessness of ordinary ties, as Levi proves.

11. Benjamin individualizes the fundamental characteristics of Israel, resting upon Jehovah.

12. Prayer and work present themselves in Judah; blessing and victory in Joseph; there we have more prominently the subjective side of Israel—here the objective. In regard to blessing, Jacob has already determined the formula or measure for Israel, Gen. xlviii. 20,—“as Ephraim and Manasseh.”

13. As Zebulun, in connection with Issachar, so the more varied temperaments, and the most diverse methods of life, unite in the service and honoring of God upon the earth (union—missions).

14. The significance of commerce for the kingdom of God (missionary aspect of commerce).

15. Not the service of Mammon, but of God.

16. "It is remarkable how the Israelitish consciousness, notwithstanding the realization of this side of its charge remains uncompleted, is still able to project itself so completely into the sea-life, as, e.g., Ps. cvii. 23 sq." BAUMGARTEN.

17. It claims our notice not barely for the approaching conquest of Canaan, but for the ecclesia

milites, which Israel symbolizes, that throughout in the blessings of Moses, especially in that upon Gad and Dan, the military art and time, is so prominent.

18. As the warlike element runs through the blessings, so at the conclusion particularly the Sabbath feature of favor, and blessing, and security, and enjoyment (in Naphtali and Asher), is not wanting.

19. If the Almighty power of God may be recognized in heaven, or from thence, so His love upon earth, where He is the dwelling, and the everlasting arms for His own (especially in Christ, John i. 14).

20. In the world, but not with the world,—far from the world and so to dwell alone,—still securely, is found only in God, when He is our dwelling. As soon as we inwardly consent to the inclination for the world, it externally possesses and exercises power over us.

21. The blessing of the land has its spiritual import, although truly corn and wine are external bodily things, not barely in the sense of mens sana in corpore sano, but much more because the vivid living consciousness of God can scarcely be preserved in any other way.

22. The blessedness of Israel is peculiar and alone among the nations, ancient or modern. It is, however, not one belonging to a nation, but concerns the humanity which is in Christ, the Israel after the spirit. It is rather a blessedness which relates to humanity.

23. [The general Messianic character of this chapter is clear. The distinction between the ideal of Israel as here presented, and the actual condition of the literal Israel at any time in its history, is so broad that we are compelled to look for a spiritual Israel, in which the ideal shall be realized. But there is no spiritual Israel out of Christ. While it may not be true that "all these benedictions find their spiritual fulfilment in Christ or His Church, and must be so explained," it is true that the interpreter who overlooks or ignores this relation will fail truly to understand them. The purely historical interpretation breaks down at every point. It fails to account for the omission of Simeon. It puts the narrowest and most forced explanation upon the blessing of Judah. It has no satisfactory solution for the utterances in regard to Zebulon, or Issachar, or Dan, or Naphtali, or Asher, while it is utterly impossible to assign any period of Israel's history which corresponds with the general prediction in the 29th verse. The Messianic Psalms which give the exposition of this prophecy, e. g., Psa. xviii. and lxxvi., confirm the Messianic import, not only of this particular verse, but of the whole chapter of which it forms a part.—A. G.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Ver. 1. BERL. BIB.: "The blessings of Moses have this distinction from those of Jacob that they are more purely blessings: Moses passes over the evil." Ver. 2 sq. SCHULTZ: "He will also call attention to this, that God will fill, even the unfruitful, the wretched, that even which is fallen into the power of death, with His light of life; Ps. lxxviii. 5 sq., the widows, orphans, and needy, correspond to the wilderness. But He cannot, because true servants and worshippers were wanting to Him. His coming was rather a condescension, a self humiliation corresponding to the after coming of Him who, Heb. xii. 2."

BAUMGARTEN: "RASCHI well says, it is the coming forth of the bridegroom to bring home His bride. He comes forth from the land where the fathers once had known Him, etc., where Jehovah's altars and the fathers rest in their graves, and stepping in his own way (Amos iv. 13; Mich. i. 8 sq.), over the high places of the earth, meets His redeemed people. The loud blast of the war-trumpets of the heavenly hosts which was heard, Ex. xix. 19, was a sign that Jehovah of hosts was descending with His hosts."

BERL. BIB.: "It proclaims the glory of God who never enters the soul alone, but always with numerous gifts and graces." ZINZENDORF: "The regular ordinary beginning which brings us to the grace of God is a much greater, sharper, more solemn law than that which was given upon Sinai. We have a fiery law, with glowing pinchers, written in the heart. Our conversion is no play-work and pretence." Vers. 4-5. SCHULTZ:

"They received not merely a specific law and king, but law and king generally,—at the basis of which lies the truth that there is no law, and no king besides." "The law-giving on Sinai a sun-rise, a coronation." Ver. 8 sq. SCHULTZ:

"If the Lord takes one into a rigid school, He is wont to assign him to a peculiar office; those whom He humbles deeply, He is accustomed to exalt." But Simeon not as Levi—there is always a distinction. WURTB. BIB.: "Although the servants of God have many and powerful enemies, still God stands with them, so that they can in their sacred office do greater and greater service."

[Levi not only an example of repentance and recovery, but also shows us how, by the grace of God, even a calamity and judgment may be turned into a blessing. Ver. 9. See Luke ii. 49; xiv. 26—A. G.] Ver. 16. SCHULTZ: "Poor and still rich in Himself, without form but for His own raying out the greatest blessings, thus is He the one dwelling in the bush. Fundamentally He appears poor only, because His own, whom He selects for His dwelling, are so. They are the thorn-bush. And that He does not consume them, that He only shines through them, glorifies them,—this is not His weakness, but His grace. His great glory." KRUMMACHER: "The wish for blessings at the new year: 1) the source, 2) the good itself, 3) the wish in its purpose." "He dwells in the bush—a neglected manifestation of God, but its occasion the wretchedness, its purpose is the redemption of the people of God. It was—since God chose a thorn-bush for His dwelling, a still imperfect revelation of love, wherefore Moses must stand afar off, and fear; with which the Old Testament began. Still it was a figure of the manifestation of God in the flesh.

The thorn-bush is the human nature, Christ crowned with thorns. And will He dwell in our hearts—what else is it than in a thorn-bush?" WURTB. BIB.: "God richly rewards the good that was shewn to parents." Ver. 17. SCHULTZ: "Present work is only the beginning of that which will continue to the end of time." Ver. 18. SCHULTZ: "Israel should not be limited to the good things of Canaan; as the people of God, the earth belongs to Him." [Ver. 25. WORDSWORTH: "All the blessings of Israel are summed up in Christ. His feet are compared to fine brass, Rev. i. 15. He is the true Asher or Blessed One. See Matt. xxi. 9; xxiii. 39; Rom. ix. 5."—A. G.] Ver. 27. OSIANDER: "God's words are deeds." Ver. 29. CRAMER: "If we will be blessed, God must make us blessed." SCHULTZ: "For the soldiers of the Lord there is no more needful, but also no more glorious motive, than the certainty that they shall tread upon the flesh, the world, and the devil; that all shall become the kingdom of God and His Christ." [See also HENRY, whose notes are felicitous and instructive.—A. G.]

DEATH AND BURIAL OF MOSES.

CHAPTER XXXIV. 1-12.

- 1 AND Moses went up from the plains [steppes] of Moab, unto the mountain of
- 2 Nebo, to the top of Pisgah, that is over against Jericho: and the Lord shewed him
- 3 all the land of Gilead, unto Dan, And all Naphtali, and the land of Ephraim, and
- 4 Manasseh, and all the land of Judah, unto the utmost [hindermost] sea, And the
- 5 south [south land, Negeb], and the plain [circuit] of the valley of Jericho, the city
- 6 of palm-trees, unto Zoar. And the Lord said unto him, This is the land which I
- 7 sware unto Abraham, unto Isaac, and unto Jacob, saying, I will give it unto thy
- 8 seed: I have caused thee to see it with thine eyes, but thou shalt not go over this
- 9 ther. So Moses the servant of the Lord died there in the land of Moab, according
- 10 to the word [mouth, command] of the Lord. And he [they, one] buried him in a
- 11 valley in the land of Moab, over against Bethpeor: but no man knoweth of his se-
- 12 pulchre<sup>1</sup> [burial, interment] unto this day. And Moses was an hundred and
- twenty years old when he died: his eye was not dim [extinguished, weak-sighted],
- nor his natural force [freshness] abated. And the children of Israel wept for Moses
- in the plains of Moab thirty days: so the days of weeping and mourning for Moses
- were ended. And Joshua the son of Nun was full of [filled with] the spirit of wis-
- dom; for Moses had laid his hands upon him: and the children of Israel hearkened
- unto him, and did as the Lord commanded Moses. And there arose not a prophet
- since in Israel like unto Moses, whom the Lord knew face to face, In all the signs
- and the wonders which the Lord sent him to do in the land of Egypt, to Pharaoh,
- and to all his servants, and to all his land; And in all that mighty hand, and in
- all the great terror which Moses shewed in the sight of all Israel.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

<sup>1</sup> [Ver. 6. The A. V. is preferable to that suggested by SCHROEDER. It is the place of burial, not the fact, which is unknown.—A. G.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. Vers. 1-4. The plains of Moab.—Ver. 1—as throughout in the book of Numbers is the locality in which the Israelites encamped after the victory over the Amorites. The transaction with Balaam occurred there, and this is the plain referred to in Deut. i. 1 sq. That part of the Arabah lying contiguous to the northern side and end of the Dead Sea, and eastwards, is the Arboth Moab. Through the reception of this formula, usual in the book of Numbers, Deuteronomy is finally organically connected with it. Comp. besides upon xxxii. 49; iii. 27, 17. ("The remarkable and strong desire of the dwellers in the desert for burial upon mountain heights is certainly primitive," says Consul Dr. WERTSTEIN in his Travels in Hauran and Trachonitis, Berlin, 1860, p. 26, in reference to the mountain sepulchres. An Arabic poem introduces the dying Sheikh as saying, "Bury me not under the vine which would overshadow me, but upon a mountain, so that my eye can see you. Then pass by my grave and call your names, and my bones shall be quickened when they hear you call.") The emphatic details in the following description of the view, rest upon the knowledge of the writer of the wide prospect which presents itself there. All the land is, because especially grateful to Moses, at first Gilead (the East-Jordan land) unto Dan—not Dan-Laish or Leschem, but as Gen. xiv. 14, the neighboring Dan Jaan (2 Sam. xxiv. 6). Comp. HENOSTENBERG, Beitrage III. p. 194. Looking around from the north to the south, the West-Jordan land is described ver. 2 in a way similar to the later Galilee, Samaria, and Judea. Comp. xi. 24. The naming of the districts, as they afterwards were assigned the different tribes, points to Joshua as the writer. Lastly, in ver. 8, the eye rests upon the warmer South, with which comp. i. 7. יְרִיחוֹ is the circuit more closely defined through the following clause, the low plain of Jericho, thus the Jordan valley. How well the eye could repose here! A feeling of the same kind lies at the basis of the proverb: "See Naples and die." The description of Jericho as the city of palm trees (the high, erect) brings this out more fully still. SEPP: "At the time of the crusades the oasis of Jericho rose again into a garden of Palestine; now a wretched sight, where balsam-trees once waved, and stately palms swayed their crowns. Of the renowned palm-groves, whence the name palm city is derived, only one stunted tree remains to-day." JOSEPHUS asserts that the district is correctly called an earthly paradise. RITTER, XV. p. 600. עָרֵץ, Gen. xix. 22; xiii. 10; xiv. 2, at the southern extremity of the Dead Sea. The description which the writer could thus give from his knowledge of the outlook from Nebo, he completes by an application in ver. 4 of the passage Num. xxvii. 12 sq.: "And see the land which I gave to the children of Israel" (comp. Deut. xxxii. 49) for the present case. Comp. further Gen. xii. 7; Deut. i. 37. With thine eyes excludes as the testimony ver. 7, also every ecstatic vision, still more any magical influence (Matt. iv. 8; Luke iv. 5), but also, it seems clear, any miraculously elevated power of bodily vision for the purpose (BAUMGARTEN, KEIL). It was even a proof of his generally unimpaired strength of vision, which the soaring flight of winged faith rendered more penetrating.

2. Vers. 5-8. After this introduction there follows now the death and burial of Moses, and the mourning for him. His death occurs upon Nebo, after this survey of the land granted to him in the room of an actual passage into it.

Ver. 5. עָרֵץ-יְרִיחוֹ here, in xxxiii. 1, אֶש-הַמֹּרְיָהוּ. Essentially of the same import, although here the contrast to what is human could not be emphasized, since Moses dies even as all men must die. On the contrary, the emphasis rests upon יְרִיחוֹ, who sanctifies himself in his servant, when his servant failed to sanctify him at the proper place. If xxxiii. 1 brings out more fully the official prophetic activity of Moses, so his official regal or theocratic activity is prominent here. In the land of Moab—i. e., not in the promised land. עַל פִּי יְרִיחוֹ (xvii. 11; i. 26) does not mean that Moses died at the mouth, kiss of the Lord. [It means unquestionably that the death of Moses took place, not as a result of exhausted vital powers, but at the command of God—a command which came as a fruit of his sin, and as a punishment for it.—A. G.] Ver. 6. וַיִּקְבֹּר may be generally they, one, buried him; thus the SEPT., DE WETTE, EWALD, KNOBEL, and others. The connection here does not require "an altogether peculiar kind of burial" (KURTZ), in the sense that Jehovah Himself must have buried him; the necessities of the case are met, if the burial was so secretly cared for by trusted, appointed ones, that the place where Moses was buried should be concealed from every one. But in the New Testament (Jude, ver. 9) we have an intimation of mysterious and super-earthly forces or agencies in reference to the "body of Moses" (comp. further Matt. xvii. 8; Mark ix. 4; Luke ix. 80). This may be only a fitting regard for the Jewish tradition, which Jude assumes in those whom he addressed, in the interest of the controversy he was then carrying on with his opponents. But the Jewish tradition does not conform itself precisely to the letter of the Apostle (comp. upon that passage), and the connection here appears on the whole, from the foregoing ver. 4, to be in favor of regarding Jehovah as the subject. ZIEGLER: "Jude, ver. 9, intimates that God was not directly Himself, but indirectly, namely, through the Archangel Michael, who represents the Jewish people, the one who buried the body of Moses." We may comp. upon this Dan. x. 18; xii. 1 (Rev. xii. 7). קָבַר may signify primarily to bring together, collect, in agreement with xxxii. 60; but this supposition is not of such force that we should render: and Jehovah gathered him with his associates there in the valley; for although קָבַר may signify "burial" (Jer. xxii. 19), thus here; and no one knows how it occurred with his burial—whether he was really altogether buried; still the reference to the grave (Gen. xxxv. 20) is more obvious. There—not merely with גִּ' (גִּלְיָה), to compress; thus, valley, literally ravine, defile, גִּלְיָה, is equivalent to, in some certain depression, hollow place,—so that it is not necessary to refer to iii. 29; iv. 46, but rather to Num. xxi. 20, a high valley near the summit of Nebo (HANSTENBERG, Hist. of Balaam), as KEIL holds, but still so that the locality should be made prominent,—he was buried. Moses did not return from his so frequently repeated, and by Joshua declared, solitary death-journey to Nebo. They are no mere empty repetitions but designed and preparatory. His grave was not to be disclosed, so that there remains for the pious consciousness no other supposition than that of a peculiar divine arrangement in regard to the body of Moses (comp. DOCT. and ETH. remarks), which a divine illumination raised to certain knowledge and conviction in the writer. We may observe that the case of Enoch, in his indeed peculiar manner of departure, was still ever received by Israel from Gen. v. 24. (ABEN EZRA explains לָקַח according to Ex. v. 19: he buried himself, i. e. went into a cave and died there).—In the land of Moab, as in ver. 5. וְעַל as in iii. 14. Since Moses, according to ver. 7, upon which vers. 1-4 rest, could have lived longer, so his death appears as a punishment, and the view of his grave and burial given above is confirmed. This view is to be maintained, as his grave and burial testify that he is truly dead. According to Jewish computation in the year of the world 2533, and B. C. 1458. Comp. further xxxi. 2. Aaron died somewhat older, Num. xxxiii. 39. Moses did not die as Isaac, Gen. xxvii. 1.—Natural force; margin: moisture (freshness), mental and bodily soundness, full, vital energy. As the honoring of Moses, on the part of God, as to his death, so also the mourning, ver. 8, on the part of the people, corresponds to this divine preservation and blessing.—Thirty days, as with Aaron (Num. xx. 29), as with Jacob (after the forty days for the embalming were closed), Gen. l. 8. In other cases seven days merely, Gen. l. 10 sq.; 1 Sam. xxxi. 18. The distinguishing feature here is the full celebration of this mourning ('כָּבֵד and לָכֵן, the two together for the sake of strength and emphasis), as this same people, Ex. xxxii. 1, had, instead of mourning for the absence of Moses, danced around the calf. Deuteronomy with the close of the time of mourning embraces a period of two months. Comp. Introd., p. 11.

8. Vers 9-12 Form the close of the supplement of Deuteronomy by Joshua, and give the point of union for the subsequent development of Israel and its characteristics, with the peculiar personality and official character of Moses (Introd., p. 4). Ver. 9. Joshua personally, the Spirit of wisdom in its fullness really (חֵכְמָה, "the power to perceive the nature in and through the appearances, σοφία, DELITZSCH," Isa. xi. 2); the latter bestowed upon the former officially "by the laying on of the hands, still customary in the New Testament" (SCHULTZ). Comp. Acts vi. 6; viii. 17; 2 Tim. i. 6, and thus the next subsequent time of Israel, comp. Num. xxvii. 18 sq., is introduced.—[חֵכְמָה] is used in varied applications in the Scriptures, from the lowest exercises of wisdom to its highest, when it becomes equivalent to piety. Here perhaps it is the practical wisdom, that which was necessary to his office as the leader of the people—A. G.]—The obedience of Israel legitimates the succession of Joshua as a matter of fact; but Moses ever remains the first. The wisdom of Joshua reveals itself still further, and therefore the wisdom of the author and writer of these supplements of Deuteronomy, in ver. 10, when the peculiar, fundamental character of the appearance of Moses for all subsequent time is at the very first distinctly recognized and stated. ("That Joshua should already make this remark is explained upon the ground that he had from his stand-point an insight into the course of the history of Israel." BAUMGARTEN.) Comp. xviii. 15 sq.; Ex. xxxiii. 11; Num. xii. 8.—[The words do not necessarily imply that a long series of prophets had risen up since Moses. They are plainly prophetic, grounded upon special insight into the future, upon the passages referred to, and upon the known position of Moses as the founder of the Old Covenant.—A. G.]—It is especially the personal nearness and the confidential, conversational manner of Jehovah with Moses which are alluded to (BAUMGARTEN: "who knew him, Jehovah" (?)), while Joshua, e.g. is dependent upon the high-priestly office (Num. xxvii. 21). Upon this rests the "clear and all comprehensive revelation" (V. GEBLACH), which fell to the lot of Moses. Comp. Doct. and Eth. upon chap. xxxii.; from this arises also, vers. 11, 12, the wonderful and mighty agency of Moses, of which all Israel is the witness. לָכֵן, etc., must be taken in connection with דָּבָר וְלֹא. Ver. 12. Mighty hand is equivalent to power shown and experienced, iv. 84; vi. 22; vii. 19; xi. 8; xxvi. 8; xxix. 1, 2.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The look of Moses over Canaan reminds us of Gen. xiii. 14, 15. Still, how different the end of Moses, and that of Abraham! Abraham died in a good old age, old and full of years; Moses dies under a divine judicial sentence, and it is remarkable, says AUBERLEN (Contributions to Christian Knowledge, p. 74), "that while the word faith never occurs expressly in the Pentateuch in reference to Moses, his unbelief as such is charged upon him, Num. xx. 12. There was nothing ever expressly blamed in Abraham; in the time of the law, God reproves and punishes sins more sharply. Thus the law-giver must experience the killing strength of the strict divine law. The man of promise and of faith receives a pleasant, peaceful departure out of this life; but there lies upon the death of the man of the law, somewhat of the curse of the law, something unatoned which calls so much the louder for the reconciliation in the New Covenant, for redemption from sin and death, Rom. iv. 15; iii. 20; 2 Cor. iii. 6.

2. "As Christ, the Mediator of the New Covenant, leaves His disciples before they were made partakers of the promise of the Holy Spirit, and were endowed with strength from on high for the new life, so Moses, the Mediator of the Old Covenant, must take his departure before the people in possession of the promised land saw the word of God fulfilled, and even were filled with it." V. GEBLACH.

3. "Moses saw the Holy Land from afar, as the saints of the Old Testament all the promises, Heb. xi. 13; he saw it as the shadow and outline of the true Canaan (Heb. xi. 16), into which he should immediately pass without having seen it beforehand." RICHTER.

4. The vision of the promised land is on one side indeed a favor; but then it was likewise added: and thither thou shalt not come, and thus there is contained in it on the other side also the full severity of the sentence against Moses. So also the preservation of the vital strength of Moses is, on one hand, a proof of special grace, and on the other presents this Moses as a transgressor likewise, who has cast away his life, and was led to death in the midst of his days. That Moses, the servant of Jehovah, must suffer this sore death, is a fearful triumph of the power of death, at which all human nature must grow faint and despair. But Israel could not endure this victory of death over its head and its leader, and would fall into doubt past recovery, whether his redemption and his law could work, secure, even the least enduring salvation, if no ray of light should fall upon this power of death over Moses, and this consoling ray streams forth from the burial of Moses. Because some have failed to look into the whole depth of the death of Moses, they have failed also rightly to understand his burial." BAUMGARTEN.

5. "Wonderful in his childhood and in his whole life, so also now in his death. The man whom the Lord had so known heretofore that no prophet should arise henceforth like him in Israel, was after his whole manifestation so hidden in God that even his body was not buried by any human hand. His appearance is like the lightning-flash, which breaks forth suddenly from the darkness, shows a shining path before the people for a moment, and then immediately vanishes, even as to its material substance, to a place which no one can find." ZISLER. JOSEPHUS relates that Moses, after he had embraced Joshua and Eleazar for the last time, while he was still speaking to them, was suddenly borne away by a cloud into a valley, and so vanished from their sight. It is interesting also in reference to his character as a legislator, in which he stands related to Moses, that even Calvin's grave cannot be found.

6. The reason usually given since the time of Augustine why the burial of Moses was held and kept so secret is not as ZISLER formulates it: "probably for this reason, that thereby his body and grave should be kept from being regarded as relics of the dead, thus for the sake of the distant future, and before that future, to debar any possible superstition or idolatrous reverence for his grave." SCHULTZ says correctly: "The Israelites were never inclined to human idolatry. But if he actually stood in so clear a relation to God as the history in the Pentateuch represents, he could not so fall under the power of death and corruption that nothing of that earlier distinction should remain. It was not necessary for the sake of Israel that they should look upon that face laid in death which had once so shone from communion with God, that he had to put a veil upon it, as JEROME has already remarked." Comp. KURTZ, Geshich. II., pp 526 sq., who urges against the reason above mentioned the fact that every one knew where the grave of Abraham was, and then asserts that the burial of Moses was intended "to place him in the same category with Enoch and Elijah, not indeed as to an exemption from death, but most probably from corruption; the form of existence in the life beyond was similar to theirs; the way to it for him was different from that for them; but still not in a condition of absolute perfection and glorification of which Christ must be the first-fruits (1 Cor. xv. 20, 23), although not either in the condition of the dark Sheol-life," etc.

7. The wonderful burial of Moses has also its decided prophetic element with reference to the burial of Christ; the discourse, however, cannot relate to the resurrection, as to this a veil lies upon the Old Covenant generally. "The fact that Jehovah notwithstanding Satan's protest" (remarks KURTZ, Geshich. II., p. 529 sq.), "exempts the body of Moses from the general doom of the sinful human race, becomes a type and example of future endlessly greater and more glorious things. That the founder of the Old Covenant must die on account of sin is a testimony to the truth, that he is not the true mediator, and that the covenant introduced by him is not complete; that it, although לדרת עולם founded, needs still a completion through a second Mediator, who lives forevermore. The death of Moses was not like the death of the first Adam which issued in corruption; but neither was it like the death of the second Adam which issues in the resurrection; it was rather a middle form of death between the two, as Moses himself and his office occupied a middle position between the first and the second Adam, between the head of the sinful, dying humanity and the head of the humanity redeemed from sin and death. Since the death of Moses was indeed a real death, but still as to its natural progress restrained, and his condition therefore an imperfect one, still in suspense, which demands and awaits a completion, it becomes itself a prophecy of this completion. And if Moses who was entrusted with the whole house of God could not still bring the organization of the house of God to its absolute perfection, and therefore received the promise of a second prophet and mediator, so we are justified also in regarding his peculiar, unique death and burial as a memorable type of the death and burial of this future prophet like unto Moses."

8. "Compare the seventh chapter of the Epistle to the Romans. In this at the same time personal and universal historical Pauline deduction, we have stated the ground of that strife between Satan and Michael about the body of Moses. The fact that the law through the sin already existing before it, "becomes an incitement, a cause and temptation to wider sin; that through it sin is first truly set in its full light, first becomes strong, living, even more and more powerful and exceedingly sinful; this is the ground for the apparent claim of right on the part of Satan to the body of Moses, which claim was so apparent and plausible, that Michael did not bring against him a railing accusation, etc. But the fact that the law, notwithstanding its working evil, through the corrupted state of the human conscience, through which it could even become an instrument in the hands of Satan, is holy, just, and good, and as it was given by God originally, tended only to life,—this was the ground of the real and legal claim on the part of Michael to the body of Moses." ["When the Israel of God goes into the spiritual Canaan, under the command and leading of Jesus, the divine Joshua, then the law which is as it were the body of Moses, is buried; for we are become dead to the law, by the body of Christ, that we should be joined to another, Jesus,—even to Him who is raised from the dead, (Rom. vii. 1-4), and it is God only who can bury the body of Moses, because it is only God in Christ who could abolish its ordinances, and reclaim it from its curse (Rom. viii. 8; Gal. iii. 18; Col. ii. 14, 17; Heb. ix. 9-11; x. 1-9); and now that it is buried, let no one seek to revive it as the Judaizers did, (Gal. iv. 9-11; v. 4)."] WORDSWORTH.—A. G.]

9. "The peculiar preservation" (SCHULTZ upon ver. 7) of those who live more than others in the Lord, appears in another form; the outward eye is closed in order that the inward may see the more clearly; then arises a new world, and an inward life-energy unfolds itself, which is not less wonderful than the outward. But still for those whose mission concerns pre-eminent external things, Moses remains their permanent type." Homer, on the other hand, is always represented as blind.

10. The personality of Moses at its beginning and close appears to be typical for the later prophetic order; at least in the first relation the calling of Jeremiah (i. 6, comp. Ex. iii. 11), appears to be connected with that of Moses, and in the last we are reminded of the wonderful end of Elijah. Elisha as Joshua.

11. ["There is but One who is worthy of greater honor than Moses, namely, the Apostle and High Priest of our profession, who is placed as a Son over all the house of God, in which Moses was found faithful as a servant (comp. Heb. iii. 2-6 with Num. xii. 7), Jesus Christ, the founder and Mediator of the New and Everlasting Covenant." KEIL. Whom God not only knew face to face as He knew Moses, but who is in the bosom of the Father, (John i. 18), and in whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom (Col. ii. 8), and all the fulness of the Godhead (Col. ii. 9), WORDSWORTH.—A. G.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Ver. 1 sq. STARKER: "Pious Christians do not fear death, but look forward to it; and go to meet it with peace, Luke ii. 29; Phil. i. 23; Gen. xlix. 88." CRAMER: "Whoever will die blessed should refresh his faith in the ascension of Christ, and his hope that believers leaving the world follow him." The God of peace has brought again from the dead, the great Shepherd of the sheep, etc., Heb. xiii. 20.—STARKER: "Faithful servants of God, who have borne great labor and care in their office, must often leave the world before they enjoy the fruits of their toil. —God does not permit His children to leave the world without consolation, but gives them a foretaste of future glory, Luke ii. 29, 30; Acts vii. 55, 56." BERL. BIB.: "God leads men inwardly also to a mountain, and shows them the throne of eternity, and as then the sweet drops of the heavenly Jerusalem fall upon their hearts, so they look into the promised land."—But Satan also imitates God, and stands upon the heights, Matt. iv.—Ver. 4. STARKER: "With God there is no respect of person, He punishes whoever sins, the high as well as the low."—Ver. 5. Be faithful unto death, Rev. ii. 10.—If the faithfulness of the Lord to us is our beginning and progress, our goal is our faithfulness to the Lord.—STARKER: "The truest glory, and the most honorable title in death: a faithful servant of the Lord."—Whether any one is faithful can first be said at the end.—Consider their conversation, end, Heb. xiii. 7.—A good end places the crown upon a good life.—The last journey of Moses: may our end be that of this righteous one.—FLOREY: "The death of Moses a testimony, how the divine grace reveals itself to the faithful servants of God, even in their departure: 1) because the faithful servants of God have their departure in serene strength; 2) because they enjoy communion with God until their very end; 3) because they may in this life already have a view of the land of promise; 4) because they are blessed of the Lord with believing successors." BERL. BIB.: "In the opinion of the Jews he died at the end of our February.—But the glory of the first covenant must cease, and it cannot bring us to blessedness."—Ver. 6. We should not confound, as it concerns the guarding against possible idolatry, Moses with Mohammed.—RICH-TER: "In the Ante-type, Christ, the angels also were active." LANGE: "At death the soul journeys upwards, but the body must come to the earth, the deep valley of its true humiliation." CRAMER: "Christ has buried Moses and silenced the curse of the law, (1 Tim. i. 16; Rom. vi. 14; viii. 1), therefore we do not fear in death."—STARKER: "The care of God for His own does not cease, neither in death nor after it." Ver. 7.—ZINZENDORF: "In the world it occurs truly, that one grows so old that he is unable to do anything, and if he has been a great man some seventy years, still in his last days passes into oblivion. On the other hand, our verse is a testimony which is in part unique, that we do not come into rest, and obtain permission in weariness to lay aside our work before all His counsel has come to pass." LANGE: "The strength of Moses, even until his death, represents that his economy should remain in its full strength until the death of Christ. Until that occurred the disciples of Christ were bound by it," Luke xvii. 14. Ver. 8. BERL. BIB.: "it is sad to separate from godly persons and guidance, especially if we through their service have seen and known much of the glory and power of God." Ver. 9. WURTH. BIB.: "Upon whom God imposes an office, him He qualifies with the necessary gifts for its duties." RICHTER: "The cheerful obedience of Israel is confirmed through the book of Joshua. Moses brought the people to this, that it was obedient to Joshua; thus the law brings us to Christ, and remains our rule, if we will follow the true Joshua." Ver. 10 sq. STARKER: "Pious, excellent people, may be held in honorable remembrance in funeral discourses, monumental inscriptions, and the like, Ps. cxii. 6." AUBERLEN: "The relation of the promise to the law, impresses itself even upon their representatives. But with this is connected the fact that the work of Moses is altogether different from that of Abraham. The one receives, the other gives. Naturally Moses gave only to the people what he had received from God; but his essential work is to introduce what he had received to the people; he is the mediator between God and the people (Gal. iii. 20). Abraham, on the other hand, has only to receive in faith what God offered him, and to preserve it; he had to mediate for no one besides his family, and especially the children of the promise (Gen. xviii. 19), but this even in no essential respect different from that in which every father of a family, and even Moses himself must care for the religious instruction of his own. Thus Abraham's calling in relation to God is entirely closed in faith; here also lie the difficulties, temptations, and thorns of his path; he is exclusively the religious hero. In Moses on the contrary, his relation to the people grows out of, and rests upon his relation to God; faith in him is, so to speak, a presupposition, under which he has a great work to do, love to exercise, since the liberation and leading of the people was given into his hands. From religious roots there grew up for him mighty moral labors. The difficulties in his pathway lay therefore in relation to the people, in this, that he had ever anew to bear and overcome the murmuring and obstinacy of the children of Israel. God made faith much easier to him than to Abraham. While God appears to Abraham only now and then, and after long intervals, Moses has constantly the divine presence a presence which is a revelation, in the pillar of cloud and fire, and was honored also with much oftener repeated, more lengthy, and more condescending, special revelations, etc. While still further Abraham in the revelations of God, was accustomed only to receive words from him, words of promise, which offer to him no present good, but point him to a most indefinite future, Moses saw in Egypt and the desert, the great deeds of God, his faith was strengthened by these mighty wonders, which have somewhat not only directly convincing, but overpowering in themselves. Moreover Moses himself is endowed with miraculous strength, and could thus feel the Divine strength present in his own person, (Ex. iv. 1 sq.), which was not the case with Abraham, since he did not have to deal with an unbelieving people. Lastly, Moses was prepared for his task with all the means of human science and culture (Acts vii. 22) while Abraham was a simple shepherd, and his wisdom doubtless purely the divine. Thus Moses has fulfilled his calling entirely, with the same faithfulness that Abraham manifested in his, although he has not attained the same measure with him in the life of faith. He is so good a shepherd (comp. John x. 11), that he not only, when Jehovah offered him, to make him as it were a new Abraham, declined the offer (Ex. xxxii. 11) but will suffer himself to be blotted out from the book of life, for an atonement for the sins of his people, (ver. 32). While he thus in self-denying love mediates for the people with God, he does not on the other hand grow weary in bearing their obstinacy and complaints. As therefore Abraham was renowned for the special charism of faith, so Moses was for that of patience (Num. xii. 8). Compare the connection of faith and patience, Rev. xiii. 10. As therefore Abraham as the father of believers surpassed all his successors, in faith, so Moses is glorified, in the fact, that henceforth no prophet should arise in Israel like unto him, i. e., among all those who might have the same task with him, namely, to bring the word of God to the people, and to be through that word a leader and shepherd for it. Moses was, as in respect to time, so also in fact, as in the commencement of his calling, so in his faithfulness to it afterwards, the first and most prominent. Thus we recognize with a holy admiration how God adjusts so fitly their callings to His chosen, and measures to them with the same fitness the burdens and duties, the helps and alleviations. He is truly a God to whom one may safely entrust himself. But He will never permit heavy labors, temptations, and crushing sorrows, to fall any one of His servants; they all bear the cross, and must through much tribulation enter into the kingdom of God."

APPENDIX.

A VINDICATION OF THE MOSAIC AUTHORSHIP OF DEUTERONOMY

WITH REFERENCE TO THE LATEST CRITICAL DISCUSSIONS.

---

BY THE AMERICAN EDITOR.

---

RECENT LITERATURE.

The Religion of Israel. By Dr. A. KUENEN. Translated from the Dutch by Alfred Heath May. Williams & Norgate. London, 1874. Comp. also his Prophets, translated by A. Milroy, London, 1877, and his Introduction to the Old Testament, in 3 vols., 1865 (not yet translated).

KATHE: Das vorzählische Buch der Urgeschichte Israels und seine Erweiterungen. Straassburg, 1874.

GRAF: Die geschichtlichen Bücher des A. T. Leipzig, 1866

COLENO: The Pentateuch and the Book of Joshua Critically Examined. Seven Parts, including Joshua. 1863, 1879. W. WELLHAUSEN: Geschichte Israels, in 2 Bänden. Erster Band, Berlin, 1878. Comp. his essays on Composition des Hexateuchs in the Jahrbücher für Deutsche Theologie, 1878 and 1877. WELLHAUSEN builds on the views of VATKE and GRAF, maintains the priority of Deuteronomy over the middle books of the Pentateuch, and puts its composition at the end of the Assyrian period.

W. ROBERTSON SMITH (Professor in the Free Church College, Aberdeen): Art. Bible, in the Encyclopædia Britannica, ninth ed., vol. III. (1875), p. 637 sq. Also a number of pamphlets of his which have grown out of his trial for heresy before the Free Church Presbytery of Aberdeen and the General Assembly (1878 and 1879). It is but justice to Professor SMITH to say that while he denies the Mosaic authorship of Deuteronomy in its present shape, he differs from the dogmatic position of the German Rationalists, and affirms his full belief in the doctrinal system of the Westminster Confession of Faith. In his last defence before the Aberdeen Presbytery, July 1, 1879, he says: "In dealing with this accusation, I ask it to be observed at the outset that I uphold the canonicity and inspiration of the Book of Deuteronomy as strenuously as my most determined opponent can do. Those who press the Libel against me have never attempted to prove that I disbelieve in the inspiration of Deuteronomy, or of any part of that book. What they attempt to show is that in consistency with my opinions as to the origin of the book, I ought to reject its inspiration. . . . . I am willing to have my views of Deuteronomy tested even by the strictest doctrine of plenary inspiration, and I am confident that they are able to stand the test."

Dr. SCHROEDER's Introduction is full and clear and satisfactory—but as the criticism which assails the genuineness of Deuteronomy is ever shifting its grounds, and the Dutch critics of the school of KUENEN have forced into great prominence points which were then of comparatively little moment, the American editor has deemed it no disparagement to the learned author of this commentary to add a special discussion of these points for the English reader. This may be done without any needless repetition. It is proposed therefore to consider:—

I. The state of the question, with some preliminary points upon which the parties at issue are agreed.

II. The special objections urged against the Mosaic authorship of Deuteronomy.

III. The difficulties involved in the critical or evolutionary theory.

IV. The positive proof of its Mosaic origin.

I. THE PRESENT STATE OF THE QUESTION.

It is now generally admitted by those who reject, as by those who receive, the Mosaic authorship of Deuteronomy, that it is substantially the work of one person. Leaving out of view the last chapter, and a few brief passages in the first discourse, containing historical and geographical allusions, the most advanced negative criticism, and the strictest defenders of its genuineness are agreed upon this point. Its unity of design, of structure, of style—the song and the blessing of Moses, differ in style from the other portions mainly as poetry differs from prose—is so obvious and impressive that there seems little room for any other hypothesis. The Fragmentary, Documentary, or Supplementary theories are virtually abandoned. Its unity at least may be assumed. There is, it is true, more question as to those parts of the book after chap. xxxi. 9, but the weight of opinion seems to gravitate to the view that even as to these latter chapters—the last, which contains the record of the death of Moses, excepted—there is clear and satisfactory proof, lying partly in their structure and allusions, and partly in their organic relations to the other parts of the book, that they were written by the same person who wrote the earlier portion, or if not by the same person, still by some one under his direction and control. They may have been recorded by Joshua, as spoken by Moses, just as Mark probably wrote his gospel under the direction and control of Peter. It is a simple question now as to who this author is. For its age is involved in its authorship, and so also its canonical position. It is a simple question, and yet one complicated in its proofs, and far-reaching in its results. The evidence upon which it is to be settled is varied, the lines of proof running into widely different fields, historical, critical, and archaeological. Its result is important not only as to the authority of the book itself, but also in its bearing upon many of the points raised by the negative critics. "The solution of the problem" involved here "has issues," as Prof. SMITH says, "of the greatest importance for the theology, as well as for the literary history of the Old Testament."

It has become, therefore, for the time being, a sort of crucial question; the point around which more than any other the struggle between the destructive and conservative criticism goes forward. If it can be settled with any reasonable certainty, if all the lines of proof converge to this point, that Deuteronomy is, what it purports to be, the genuine work of Moses, it will be an important point gained for the discussion of other Old Testament debatable questions, e. g., the genuineness of the Books of Chronicles, which are so confidently assailed on the same general theory of criticism, which gives all its force to the attack upon Deuteronomy.

The question is viewed, of course, by the opposing parties in a very different light. KUNEN defines his position very frankly and clearly,—and he may be taken as the fair representative of what is called the advanced or the scientific criticism—as this: "For us the Israelitish religion is one of the principal religions, nothing less, but also nothing more" (Religion of Israel, p. 5). He admits indeed that one of these religions may be of much greater value than another, and may thus have stronger claims upon our regard, but they are all alike as to their origin, and indeed as to the general principles which have shaped their progress in history. There is no specific difference, such as is implied in the theory that one is derived from special divine revelation, and unfolds itself under the special influence of divine providence, while the others are the products of human invention, or rather the growths of man's religious nature working under the varied conditions in which he is placed in the world. We must approach them, therefore, and the records which they bring, in the same state of mind. They are alike the subject of critical examination; and our estimate of them must be determined purely and solely by the results of our criticism. Scientific criticism requires this. The records of the Israelitish and Christian religion are before us "just as the Vedas, the laws of Manou," etc. They are like "manifestations of the religious spirit of mankind." This is held very confidently as essential to what is, in their view, scientific criticism.

But this seems to be a sophistical use of the word scientific. Every one admits that the criticism should be thorough, impartial and comprehensive, and in that sense scientific; i. e., our theory must be the result of patient study, and rest upon all the facts as its only sufficient basis. It must be scientific in the sense that it comprehends all the facts and explains them. If it fails to do this, it has no right to that term in the broad and proper sense of the word. If we are studying simply the geological character of the rocks and soil of Palestine, it is a matter of little moment to us, because it has no possible connection with the results of our inquiry, who may have lived upon it, whether its soil has been made sacred by the footsteps of Jesus or not. If our theory includes all the facts, and accounts for them all, puts them in their true relation and explains them, it is scientific. It is properly so designated only so far as it does this. This is largely true also if we are studying merely its natural history. But if we are attempting to explain the religious life of the people, and the records out of which that life issues, and by which it is shaped and perpetuated, then any theory which ignores great facts which are every where apparent in this religious life, which every where present themselves for explanation; any theory which assumes as its starting-point that impartial investigation requires that we should divest ourselves of any knowledge, or from any influence of these facts, cannot be scientific. The fact that these records contain the clearest revelation of spiritual truths, in relation to both God and man, which no where appear in connection with other religions or their sacred books, or appear only in the most vague and doubtful form; the fact that they meet the deepest wants of the human heart, both in their revelation of law and grace, and the wants of all men; the fact that their whole tendency, when they have been received, has been to soften, refine, and elevate the condition of men in all respects, that the sphere of their influence has been commensurate with the sphere of the purest morals and highest civilization; the fact that Jesus Christ lived, that His life has no parallel in the annals of the race, that He left His repeated testimony in the clearest form to the divine origin and the Mosaic origin, of this part of these records; and it is impossible to believe that He would testify to that which He did not know, or which He knew to be only a tradition; these facts, and others like them, must be accounted for on any theory which claims to be scientific. They demand explanation. They create a presumption in favor of the records as Mosaic. But whether they do or not, and to what extent this presumption reaches, or what influence it should have upon our minds as we approach the question at issue, may be left undetermined here; but so much is clear, that any theory which fails to explain them cannot be scientific, or indeed impartial.

It may be said that these facts are not decisive, and indeed are of little moment, if the records themselves are self-contradictory. This is freely granted. They are not alluded to here as decisive, or to bias our minds so that we are unfitted for a thorough and impartial criticism of the documents themselves, but as real facts which must be accounted for; as showing how unscientific it is to separate the question as to the authorship of Deuteronomy from the question as to its contents, as the critics attempt to do, and as justifying a claim on the part of what KUENEN calls the "ecclesiastical" theory to a presumption in its favor, so far as this, that the solution it offers of the difficulties it involves should be fairly weighed, and that with respect to others which may now seem insoluble,—unless the criticism can show that the records are so inconsistent as to be unworthy of credit,—the true position is that of waiting for the solution which a fuller knowledge of Jewish institutions, laws and customs will surely bring. Progress in geographical and archæological studies is constantly shedding light upon these very points. We must wait not only until we have reached the summit, but until we have explored the vast mountain depths and spaces which lie within our broad horizon. The summit gives us the wide view—enables us to judge better of the "comparative size and mutual relation of the objects which surround us;" but while we may "smile," as KUENEN suggests (p. 7), "at the conception we just now entertained," when we were lower down, we may also find it needful to connect these mountain peaks by the broad valley regions which lie hidden from our view. They may be as essential to any full conception of the mutual relation of the parts, of the way in which they are fitted to each other, as the broad and general view from the summit.

While, therefore, we are not to come with any undue bias to the study of these records which claim to be sacred, while we are to insist that they shall be subjected to the closest scrutiny, to the most patient and exhaustive criticism, and be judged accordingly, we are still justified, by the character of the traditional testimony in its favor, culminating in the testimony of Christ Himself, and more especially by the character of the contents of the book, in starting in the investigation from the stand-point that the records are what they claim to be; and further in holding that the criticism which separates so widely between the question of the authorship and the contents of Deuteronomy, and ignores almost entirely the latter, must necessarily fall into error. KUENEN himself, while expressly claiming to regard these records precisely as if they came utterly unaccredited, and actually doing so, still admits virtually that this position is the fair one. "If there exist," he says (p. 14), "a tradition with regard to the author of the books and the times at which they lived—in the titles with which the books are provided, for example—he (i. e., the critic) of course, takes notice of it, but does not rely upon it." In specifying the titles of the books, as an example, it is fair to suppose that he would include all the forms in which the tradition delivers its testimony. No one demands that tradition should be relied upon. Taking the word in the only sense proper here as not only expressed in the title of the book, but in the unvarying belief of the Jewish people and the testimony of Christ Himself, this seems to be a fair starting point in the argument. Such traditions must be tested "by the contents and form of the books." We take up the book bearing this stamp upon it with this presumption in favor of its Mosaic origin—accredited in part at least by its obvious and general character, and by the most impressive tradition. Any other position would not be scientific.

As we open this book, the first and most obvious impression is that it claims to be from Moses. It makes this claim at the outset. "These be the words which Moses spake." It implies this claim in varied form in its progress. It closes with a repetition of the same claim—"And Moses wrote this law" (xxi. 9), "And it came to pass when Moses had made an end of writing the words of the law in a book" (xxi. 24). Whatever this written book included, it is admitted that it must have included Deuteronomy. It purports therefore not only to spring from Moses as its author—that the thoughts and discourses were uttered by him—but that he is the penman. There is no necessity for the supposition that the priests wrote down his words as they fell from his lips. In the strictest and fullest sense it claims to be from Moses. On any supposition as to its author this claim must be admitted. The theory of the critics makes it, if possible, more forcible. Their present hypothesis, like those which have preceded it, involves this claim. It is necessary to its very existence. Whoever wrote the book, and at whatever age it was written—if we can reconcile at all the theory of its being "a legislative programme" with its whole moral and spiritual tone—it must be put by its author in the mouth of Moses. It comes under the color of his name and authority. Thus only can its author hope to win any general acceptance for his work. With the utmost care, in the style and matter of the discourse, in the historical and local allusions, in the construction of the memorable scene—the vast host just emerged from the wilderness, flushed with recent victories, standing on the verge of the land of their inheritance, eager for the conquest and yet restrained and hushed, to listen to the parting words of their leader and sage—he strives to win a way for his literary venture, to secure for it a ready hearing, and to clothe it with authority. He has no hope for success for himself or his work, except as he may make it probable, that it was really from Moses. It makes no difference as to the point in view, whether we regard it as "prophetic teaching presented in a dramatic form in the mouth of Moses," or as a pious fraud, a conscious forgery, justified by the end sought. Upon any assumption of the critics, as upon the theory that Moses actually wrote the book, it claims, and must claim, a Mosaic origin. It shows the skill, the genius, the ceaseless watch and care, the high literary culture, the vast resources of the author, if later than Moses, that he has so constructed his work, breathed into it so largely the Mosaic spirit, that there should be so little to awaken suspicion; that he should have imposed upon his contemporaries, and upon all the succeeding ages, until the sharp eyes of the modern critics detected the imposture. It is an instance which has no parallel in the literary annals of the world.

Another thing which is equally apparent, and is generally agreed upon by both parties in the controversy, is the obvious nature and design of the book. It either is, or assumes to be, the parting discourses of Moses to his people, in which there are so many tender allusions to the past, and at the same time a prophetic outlook into the future, and a careful provision to meet their wants, in their new situation and home. It is the father taking leave of his children, for whose instruction and welfare he had cared with so much wisdom and love; the leader of the people, about to part from them without sharing the full fruition of their hopes; the prophet, who, as he forecasts the future, and sees what perils surround those, who have proved so slow to learn and so quick to forget, and then by wise counsels, by laws and institutions, adapted to the state upon which they were now to enter, by warnings, promises, reproofs, seeks to guard them against their danger. This general design is apparent upon either hypothesis, whether it is the genuine work of Moses, or has its origin in some unknown source, and is attributed to him. But it is worthy of notice here in passing, that in admitting this design of the book, the critics concede a strong point in favor of the Mosaic origin of Deuteronomy. We feel at once that the book is in its proper place. It falls fitly into the frame and setting in which we find it. It supplements the books which precede, and prepares the way for those which follow. It corresponds exactly to the course of events which even KUNEN admits must have marked the history of Israel. For while he fixes with that positive certainty, which is characteristic of this advanced criticism, the year 800 B. C. as the point beyond which we have no certain knowledge of Israelitish history, yet in the vague and misty past, he sees the strong probability of a series of events like these; that there was an enslaved race in Egypt; that they were rescued from bondage; that some such person as Moses was probably connected with their Exodus; that they journeyed through the wilderness, and ultimately settled in Canaan. Now the whole design and structure of Deuteronomy fits precisely to that point in this series, at which the people were about to leave the wilderness and enter Canaan, and it fits nowhere else in the history. It either originated then, or assumes to have done so. And the hypothesis of the critics, that it originated later, and is assigned to this place, requires not only that the book should have been written by a man of great genius, learning and skill, but that the collector of the records, aware of its real origin, as he must have been, has yet placed it where it is in the canon, and associated it so closely, so inseparably indeed, with all the circumstances of the history in which it claims to take its origin, that it is impossible to rend it away without the greatest violence. Applying KUNEN's first rule (p. 19), its acknowledgment as Mosaic would seem to be necessary, since it is one "of the facts which fits into its place in the historical connection." We are not discussing the question here, but simply stating what is involved in the conceded design and structure of Deuteronomy—conceded by the critics as well as by those who claim its Mosaic origin.

II. THE SPECIAL OBJECTIONS AGAINST THE MOSAIC AUTHORSHIP OF DEUTERONOMY.

But it is said, this "ecclesiastical supposition" is no longer tenable. The progress of modern investigation has shown it to be impossible. We have gone far enough up the mountain to see that the earlier view must be abandoned. We have outgrown the belief of our ancestors. The critical difficulties involved in that supposition are overwhelming. We turn therefore to these difficulties.

It is essential, however, to any fair view of the case to say, that it is not the hypothesis of the Mosaic origin alone, which is encumbered with difficulties. It undoubtedly involves questions difficult of solution. It could scarcely be otherwise. Such questions must necessarily arise in any attempt to explain customs, usages, institutions, like those with which this book is full, and yet which are often merely alluded to as familiar to those whom the speaker addressed, and required therefore no detailed statement. There would be apparent ground for suspicion of artifice and plan, if we found everything clear and easy of explanation. But the critical hypothesis finds no free and easy sailing. It meets on every hand difficulties which have proved fatal to kindred theories of the sacred records, which have preceded it, and which are felt to embarrass its progress. It is obvious that when he stands upon the mountain-top, as he supposes, the critic has not yet gone above the cloud-region. It is not clear sun-light which rests upon the scene. The parts do not fall into easy and harmonious relationship. To bring them into such relationship, he must leave out of view large fields which lie within his horizon, and bring fields into existence which are merely the cloud-structures of his own fancy. He assumes as known, and beyond all reasonable doubt, points which are still in dispute, and on these assumptions proceeds to construct his theory, and indeed the history, of the Israelitish religion. For KUNEN avowedly (p. 16) refuses entirely "the guidance of the historical books, and strikes out a path for himself;" does not write the history, but what on certain assumptions he thinks must have been the history of the people and its religion. It is not an easy path to tread, and every step increases the difficulty.

The difficulties which are thought to weigh so heavily against the Mosaic authorship of Deuteronomy are all included in the general position, that there are serious discrepancies between the statements here made, and those in other parts of the sacred records. In particular it is urged that the obvious difference in style between the book of Deuteronomy and the earlier books claiming to come from Moses, indicates some other authorship than Moses; that certain chronological, geographical or historical allusions are either inconsistent with the earlier books or pre-suppose a later date than that of Moses; that the clause relating to the king is irreconcilable with the whole tone and spirit of the Mosaic legislation, and with the narrative in 1 Sam. viii.; that the strict regulation in regard to the central altar and the one place is opposed to the earlier institution and the later history, especially during the times of Samuel and Elijah; that there is a wide discrepancy between the law as to the tithes here, and that given in Leviticus and Numbers; and that the teaching in Deuteronomy justifies the assertion that every Levite might be a priest, and thus destroys the sharp distinction between Levites and priests, which is elsewhere insisted upon. As to this latter point, the critics are divided, some holding that Deuteronomy is the older work, the germ out of which the more strict priestly legislation has been developed, by which the priestly privileges of the Levites were limited to the sons of Aaron, others regarding it as the later in time, and more liberal in spirit, and thus throwing open the priestly privileges and honors to the whole tribe of Levi. "The latest phase of criticism maintains the former view." (See CURRISS, The Levitical Priests. Preface by Prof. F. DELITZSCH, who holds that this is for the present the turning point in the controversy).

As to the style of Deuteronomy. The difference between it, and that of the central books of the Pentateuch, is obvious and striking. It is not only conceded by those who defend the Mosaic authorship, but is insisted upon as one of the many incidental proofs that he is its author. It does not enter largely into the discussion now, partly because the difference admits of an easy and natural explanation, and partly because the most recent criticism rejects the Mosaic authorship of the earlier books. If Moses is not the author of either, the difference of style is no longer a question of any interest. But the very style of Deuteronomy, as flowing and rhetorical, so different from the earlier books, and in such opposition to the character of Moses as a man slow of speech, who was accustomed to avail himself of others as his mouth-piece, is an argument in favor of the Mosaic origin of Deuteronomy, which ought not to be overlooked. The style in which it is written is one of those things which constitute its fitness to the place it holds. A cold, formal, unemotional address; a precise repetition of previously given instructions would have appeared, and would have been utterly unsuited to the circumstances of the author or his audience. Moses stands in a position in which all the warmth of his nature must find utterance. Feelings which may have been easily restrained, under other conditions, here pour themselves out in all their wealth and fulness. The fire which burns within touches his lips, melts away all restraints, turns the slow of speech into a glowing and eloquent speaker. It is the natural result of strong feeling to unloose the tongue. It is a result which is witnessed every day. The very purpose of the book, aiming at popular impression (see Deuteronomy the People's Book, p. 288-289), designed to arouse the people and fire their hearts with loyalty and devotion to Jehovah and His service, requires just such a discourse, free, tender, forcible, full of allusions to their past experience, full of vivid pictures of their future perils, presenting the law and its institutions in their application to their new condition, and appealing to them by every motive, drawn from their past experience of the divine goodness, the responsibilities which rested upon them, the peculiar privileges they enjoyed, and their hopes for the future, to be true and faithful. This, which is all natural, we might well say unavoidable, on the supposition that it is Moses who speaks, becomes in the highest degree improbable on any other supposition. We can scarcely conceive that any intelligent Israelite of a later day, a man of genius enough to write these discourses, knowing well the character which Moses had, would have put them in a style so entirely unlike that of Moses, and then presented them as his. What a historian of an actual occurrence would have related without any thought of incongruity, a forger would have avoided with the utmost care. He would have guarded sedulously against anything which would have been certain to call attention to his forgery, and thus have prevented the very end he sought to gain.

We omit here any discussion of alleged anachronisms or discrepancies, supposed to exist in the accounts of the selection and sending of the spies (Deut. i. 22, 23; Num. xiii. 12), the direction not to distress the Moabites (chap. ii. 9-18) and the children of Ammon (chap. ii. 19-28), the statement in regard to the iron bedstead of Og, King of Bashan (chap. iii. 11), and the description of Jair's possession as lasting "until this day" (chap. iii. 14), partly because they are briefly considered in the notes on these passages, but mainly because, if they have any real existence at all, they have no weight as between the Mosaic authorship and any other supposition, or rather if they involve the Mosaic authorship in doubt, they are fatal to the theory of a later origin. For no forger, with the records of the earlier books before him, would have suffered any such statements to appear in his work here. Nor is the case materially different if Deuteronomy is held to be the earlier record. For then we must believe that the author of the central books has deliberately inserted into his work statements at variance—according to the critics—with the earlier book of Deuteronomy before him when he wrote.

KUHNEN, who admits that Moses was an actual historical personage, and probably spoke the "ten words," though in a crude form, adds at once: "The 'words' themselves are given twice in Exodus and Deuteronomy; the comparison of the two texts brings to light deviations which are not unimportant; among other things the ground assigned to the commandment regarding the Sabbath in Deuteronomy is different from that alleged in Exodus. If this liberty was assumed in one case, what guarantee have we that the text has not been expanded in other places as well? Nay, that entirely new commandments have not been admitted, and have not superseded more ancient precepts" (Rel. of Israel, Vol. I., p. 282, 283). "We will abandon at once and altogether the idea of literal authenticity." On KUEHN's view, however, that neither form of the command has any claim to literal precision, the difference is of little moment. It is only a Mosaic kernel which is found here, which it is the object of criticism to separate from the later additions. But less destructive criticism, and less consistent with its own principles, still urges this diversity as a serious objection. "Each writer," it is said, i. e. of Exodus and Deuteronomy, "professes to give the identical words which were spoken by Jehovah Himself at the very same point of time. This excludes the notion that one passage gives a mere reminiscence of the other, which might be vague and defective on some points without affecting the general credibility of the whole. Hence the two statements involve an absolute contradiction. The narration is so remarkable that it cannot be supposed that Moses wrote the passage of Deuteronomy, either forgetting or designedly modifying the words of the original commandment. It is therefore enough of itself to prove that the book of Deuteronomy at all events could not have been written by Moses."

To us, on the contrary it seems a clear proof that it was written by Moses. There is no evidence that Deuteronomy claims to give "the identical words" spoken by Jehovah, or an exact repetition of the "ten words" graven on the tables of stone. It is obvious that this was not the purpose of the speaker. The clause which he throws into this fourth "word," "as the Lord thy God hath commanded thee," shows that he has no such purpose. He guards against the supposition thrust upon him by the critics. We have here an intimation, as it were, of what occurs constantly in the Scriptures, a later writer using the words of an earlier, for his own purpose, and yet with the truest sense that the word he uses is the word of God. Thus Christ and His apostles use the Old Testament Scriptures, bringing out often new and unexpected meanings, throwing back upon the very passage quoted broad rays of light, in which we first see its true force and import. It is needless to refer to instances. Moses uses the law as the foundation of his discourse. It is the law which he explains, expounds and applies. He quotes it literally in part, and then brings it, in its true and widest import, to bear upon the new relations in which the people stood. The people were now fully redeemed from the bondage of Egypt. The servitude from which they had been redeemed, and which was fresh and vivid in the minds of those who stood at the foot of Horeb, the very generation from whom the shackles had been broken, might easily pass from the recollection of the new generation who now stood at the door of their inheritance and were about to take possession as the Lord's redeemed. Appropriately therefore, and in the full spirit of the command, he adds: "and remember that thou wast a servant," etc. For the command, truly, has its ground in the rest of God after the creation, and without weakening the force of that ground or reason, it has also further grounds in every great work of God in bringing His people into rest. The author of the Epistle to the Hebrews sets this in the clearest light, and illustrates it in the fourth chapter of that Epistle. And as the redemption of Israel from Egypt was typical of the redemption of God's people from sin, so we have here an intimation, a prefiguration, of that great reason for the observance of the Christian Sabbath, the resurrection of Christ from the dead—the closing act of the mighty hand and outstretched arm of God for human redemption. Now as of old God says: "Remember, etc., therefore the Lord thy God commands thee to keep the Sabbath day." Nor should it be left out of view that this very freedom in the treatment of the sacred "ten words" indicates that it is Moses who speaks in Deuteronomy. It was in no spirit of presumption, but in the liberty of one with whom God spake face to face, in the deepest reverence for the sacred words, in the full consciousness of his relation to God that he thus uses the law. No later author who hoped to gain access for his work on the assumption that it was an exposition of the law in its true spiritual import, would have ventured upon such a course. He would have adhered rigidly to the letter. His whole mental attitude, and the purpose he had in view would have constrained him to do so. What is entirely natural, and in full accordance with Scripture usage, on the supposition that it was spoken by Moses, is well nigh incredible on the supposition that it was written in the seventh century B. C.

In regard to the tithes, little need be said in addition to what SCHROEDER has said (Intro.

§ iv. 19). The law in the earlier books is clear, explicit, simple, and needed no repetition. Deuteronomy neither repeats nor modifies it. It treats mainly of the sacrificial feasts, and these, according to its general nature, in their popular aspects. It gives them a legal basis, and prescribes regulations as to the sources from which these feasts were to be supplied, the spirit in which they should be observed, and in part who were to be the guests; the Levites, and probably also the strangers, fatherless, and widows were never to be omitted. The regulation implies a past, like that which the sacred history gives us, is in full accordance with the present position of the people, and with the whole spirit of Moses and the law. Solicitous that the whole people should remain loyal to Jehovah, he guards against any mere human usage in connection with the divine service, and provides that they should be one, not only politically, but by the sacred bands growing out of these religious services, and associated with them.

SCHROEDER has ably vindicated the passage in regard to the king (Deut. xvii. 14-17) from the objections then urged against it. He has shown (§ iv. 16) that the passage lies imbedded in the context, so that it cannot be torn away without the greatest violence; that the deuteronomic law grows necessarily out of the special position and character of Moses; that it has its foundation in the Abrahamic promise; was anticipated in the prophecy of Jacob; was evident to Balaam, and is not only alluded to verbally in the transaction recorded 1st Samuel, chaps. viii. and x., but essentially underlies that whole history, justifying the request of the elders for a king, but not the manner and spirit in which it was preferred. But it is now claimed that the deuteronomic law has its origin in the excesses of Solomon and his successors among the earlier kings. It is the expression of the author's "aversion from Solomon." "The warnings against trade with Egypt, polygamy, and great riches are borrowed from the tradition concerning the wise king, and are directed against the errors into which he fell." (KUNEN, Religion of Israel, Vol. II., pp. 83, 84.) The claim rests upon the similarity between the record 1 Kings x. 26-29, xi. 1-8 and the deuteronomic law. But on the theory that Deuteronomy was written in the latter half of the eighth or seventh centuries B. C., and that the narrative in Kings has a still later origin, the critic is involved in inextricable difficulties. For in that case the author of Deuteronomy could not have copied from the book of Kings. The earlier could not have copied from the later. Hence the critics assume a reliable oral tradition, coming down through the three or four centuries which have elapsed between the errors of Solomon and the time at which Deuteronomy is assumed to have been written, from which both this author and the writer in the book of Kings have drawn. But there is no evidence of such a tradition. It is well-nigh certain that it could not have existed in any such shape as to furnish a basis for the law in Deuteronomy. In any case the critics are excluded by their own principle from such a resort. They cannot escape from their own dilemma through such a door. For assuming that the records we have of the events of the Israelitish history were narrated only long after their occurrence, KUNEN says: "This fact itself gives a severe shock to our faith in Israel's own records. It is inconceivable that a narrative which was not written down until after so long an interval, should yet accord entirely with the reality. It would have involved a perpetual miracle to have kept it free from many strange elements." (Vol. i. pp. 16, 18). But if the stupendous events of the Exodus and the wilderness—events so inwoven with the very life of the people, failed utterly to perpetuate their own memory, were soon lost out of the popular recollection, so that no reliable tradition of their occurrence remained—how is it possible that such an every-day event, so comparatively trivial, as that Solomon carried on a lucrative commerce with Egypt in horses and chariots should have so impressed the popular mind, that the tradition remained clear, vivid, unadulterated and truthful for three or four centuries? Surely, their own principles being judges, the critics must abandon the tradition which they assume. If there is any copying it remains that the author of Kings must have copied from the deuteronomic law. And this accords entirely with his avowed design. He does not attach any blame to Solomon for his mercantile relation with Egypt, and the increase of his wealth, but intends to show how his wealth and luxury had corrupted the simplicity and godliness of his earlier life, had influenced him to disregard the law, with respect to which he had received so solemn a charge from his dying father (1 Kings ii. 1-4)—in which there is an obvious reference, both verbal and real, to the deuteronomic law—had led him to form illicit intercourse with other nations, and so exposed him to those divine judgments which were gathering around the later years of his reign, as a muttering storm at the close of a brilliant summer day. He has brought his description of the splendor and successes of Solomon's reign to a close, and then introduces the sad contrast, "but, King Solomon," referring partly to the law of the king (Deut. xvii. 14) and partly to the prohibition as to mixed marriages in Deut. vii. 4. How could he place the errors of Solomon in their true light, without setting them in contrast with the law? The similarity between his narrative and the law, therefore, grows necessarily out of his purpose, and may be fairly urged as a testimony by the author of Kings—and this author and his work are held as reliable by the critics—to the earlier existence of Deuteronomy.

A full examination of the passage brings out important differences as well as similarities, and differences which cannot possibly be accounted for on the theory that Deuteronomy is here a copy from the passage in Kings, or from any full and minute tradition which is supposed to underlie that passage. Why does the copyist insert the direction that the king should be chosen—"one from among thy brethren?" There was no reason in the long-established dynasty, running now down to Josiah—according to the critics—for such a caution. There is no intimation of it in the narrative from which he is supposed to have framed the law. There was no prospect that the dynasty would fail, or the blood-royal be exhausted. No one would have thought at that day that there was any danger of selecting an alien as king. Why should he betray such a dread of returning to Egypt? The exodus was long since past; the people were contented in their land; splendid triumphs had attended their arms; any longing after Egypt had been quenched for ages. Such a desire or purpose would have been repulsive to them. Then further, if the deuteronomic law is a reflection from the faults and excesses of Solomon, how does it occur that it contains no allusion to the other nations with whom Solomon's excesses were associated, as much as with Egypt, and who stand out conspicuous in the history in Kings? This is all natural the moment we suppose Moses to be the author of Deuteronomy. The allusions and restrictions are just such as would suggest themselves to one standing in his position, scarcely away from Egypt, recalling how quickly and easily the people thought of returning thither, and yet without any chosen family in which the kingship should vest. The whole force of the passage in Kings is lost unless we suppose a law referred to as existing and well known, which could be only the deuteronomic law, and it is inconceivable that this law in its requisitions could have arisen at the time of Josiah.

"The law in Exodus xx. 24," (says Prof. SMITH, Art. Bib. Ency. Brit.) "contemplates the worship on other altars than that of the central sanctuary (comp. Deut. xxxiii. 19). This practice accordingly was followed by Samuel, and fully approved by Elijah (1 Kings xix. 14). But the worship of Jehovah on the high-places or local sanctuaries was constantly exposed to superstition, corruption, and heathen admixture, and so is frequently attacked by the prophets of the eighth century B. C. It was undoubtedly under their influence that Hezekiah abolished the high-places. This abolition was not permanent; but in the reign of Josiah, the next reforming king, we find that the principle of a single sanctuary can claim the support, not only of prophetic teaching, but of a written law-book, found in the temple and acknowledged by the high-priest (2 Kings xxii. 28). The legislation of this book corresponds, not with the old law in Exodus, but with the book of Deuteronomy." The deuteronomic legislation is therefore not earlier than the prophetic period of the eighth and seventh centuries B. C.

The objection here rests upon a forced construction of Ex. xx. 24, severing it from its historical surroundings, and upon a failure to recognize the peculiar position of Samuel and Elijah as inspired prophets, and the peculiar circumstances of the people of God during their official life.

It is claimed that the law in Ex. xx. 24 "contemplates the worship on other altars, than that of the central sanctuary;" but in any construction of this passage it is beyond question that "the places" are those only which Jehovah hath chosen and in which He records His name. It is not a loose regulation, leaving the people to offer worship and sacrifices in any and every place. It is the place or places chosen of God. This may obviously refer to the places occupied by the one central altar, during the wanderings, when it was movable, according to the movements of the pillar of cloud and fire, expressing the divine choice; or to the places designated in the after-history by the providence of God at which the ark should rest, as Shiloh, Mount Moriah. There were different places but the one central altar and place of worship. The limitation to one place at a time is clear and definite. This is not only a possible construction. It is the natural and fair construction. It is the only one consistent with the period at which the law was promulgated, in connection with the history of the people of Israel. It is the one suggested by the closest rendering of the original, which is rather "in every place" than "in all places." There is no evidence, therefore, that the law in Exodus contemplates any worship of Jehovah inconsistent with that prescribed in Deuteronomy xii. 2-14, and indeed in Leviticus xvii. 1 sq. If Samuel and Elijah—not to speak of Moses himself, who commanded an altar to be erected on Mount Ebal and sacrifices to be offered upon it—violated the deuteronomic law, they could not plead the law in Exodus as justifying their course. The law indeed is one, but uttered more fully, carried out into detail, and clothed with heavier sanctions, as the people were about to enter the land of Canaan and encounter the temptation to idolatrous worship with which that land was full. The law became more explicit as the danger was more pressing and real.

As to the practice of Samuel and Elijah which it is said is utterly inconsistent with the existence of the deuteronomic law as to the central altar, it has been well and forcibly urged (Deut. the People's Book, pp. 101-125) that the times at which these prophets lived were times of prevalent apostasy and calamity. In the days of Samuel the ark and the tabernacle were separated, and a literal compliance with the law was impossible. The alternative which presented itself to the prophet was simply whether there should be other places of worship than at Shiloh, or no worship at all. No man of piety and good sense could have hesitated as to what was right under the circumstances. Samuel judged, and judged rightly, that God would be met with again, at the places at which the great founders of the Hebrew race prayed and worshipped. The same condition of things substantially existed at the time of Elijah, whose ministry was largely bounded by the kingdom of Israel, from which there was no ready and safe access to the central altar at Jerusalem. There is unquestionably great force in these considerations. They cannot be ignored or underrated in any solution of this difficulty.

But we prefer to rest the defence here upon another ground. All laws regulative of the times, places and modes of worship admit of exceptions which, although in form violations of the law, are still in full and entire accordance with it. The cases of Gideon and Manoah, e. g., can never rationally be urged as violations of the law, because their sacrifices were by special divine command, and God thus recorded His name at the places at which they sacrificed. They saw clearly enough, as we now see, that this worship was no violation of the law, which treats of the general orderly worship, and not of special occasions such as they were meeting. Nor is the case with Samuel widely different. He was placed in peculiar circumstances. Special exigencies had arisen, and as a prophet clothed with divine authority he meets the occasion. He was not hampered by the letter of the law. And the few instances in which he deviated from it (four only) were clearly sanctioned by the approval of God. It was really the place at which God recorded His name. The same thing was true with Elijah at Carmel. No one questions the propriety of this sacrifice. The fire from heaven is the full justification, and brings it at once into full consistency with the deuteronomic law. But it is said that Elijah approved of the worship on other altars, and those not sanctioned by any such manifestation from God. In his answer to the question "What dost thou here, Elijah?" he says (1 Kings xix. 14) "I have been very jealous for the Lord God of hosts, because the children of Israel have broken thy covenant, thrown down thine altars, and slain thy prophets with the sword." But these words are explicitly used by the prophet as descriptive of the actual state of things in Israel. There is no approval or disapproval. It is simply a recognition of the facts as they were. The children of Israel had, in their separation from the kingdom of Judah, used other altars than the central one at Jerusalem. They were unable in many cases to reach that altar. Political considerations and hostile armies stood in their way. But now even this worship of Jehovah, formally wrong but comparatively and substantially right, had been abandoned. The people as such had bowed the knee to Baal, and over this defection, this utter forsaking of Jehovah and His covenant the prophet mourns. Against this he had bravely struggled. Hence his flight to Horeb. There is no express approval of the other altars, and even if the words can be construed into an approval, a tacit recognition at least of that worship as valid, it is clearly only as that worship stands opposed to the idolatrous worship and altar of Baal. Neither the practice of Samuel nor the utterance of Elijah is inconsistent with the deuteronomic law, nor does either justify any inference that the law was then unknown to the people.

That it was known, even in the times of Joshua, is clear from the words of the two and a half tribes, when they had reared their altar as a witness that they were entitled to a full share in the worship and privileges of the tribes in Canaan proper,—“God forbid that we should rebel against the Lord, to build an altar for burnt-offerings, for meat-offerings, or for sacrifices, besides the altar of the Lord our God that is before His tabernacle.” The whole transaction recorded in Josh. xiii. (unless we are prepared to say with KUNEN that this chapter also has its origin at the time of Josiah) loses its significance unless the people knew the deuteronomic law. The two and a half tribes expressed their sense of the sacredness of that law in rearing the altar, and Phinehas with the nine and a half tribes assent at once to the propriety of the act, when they understood the purpose with which it was done.

On the whole, we must not attribute to these “wise and good men” the narrow and slavish views of the later Jews. They were not bound to the letter in every case. The deuteronomic law did not so bind them. There was a flexibility and susceptibility of adaptation in all these regulations to the special exigencies in which they lived. They acted only in the liberty which ever belongs to the servants of God. They understood, as Samuel expressly teaches, that obedience is better than sacrifice. He knew well that for these particular purposes the places in which he worshipped, and the people with him, were as truly chosen of God to record His name there, as Shiloh was chosen for the regular and ordinary worship. He had no more doubt that he was acting in accordance with the law in Deuteronomy than Moses had when he directed that an altar should be reared on Ebal. His practice no more implies that the law of the central altar was unknown to him than the precept of Moses to Joshua and the elders, proves that it was unknown to him.

“The Levitical laws give a graduated hierarchy of priests and Levites; Deuteronomy regards all Levites as at least possible priests. Round this difference and points allied to it the whole discussion turns.” (Prof. SMITH, Art. Bib. Ency. Brit.). “The deuteronomic law makes no distinction between those who belong to this tribe, i. e., Levi; they are not all priests, but they can all become priests. Not so the laws recorded in Exodus (ch. xxv.) and in the following books. They confine the priesthood to Aaron and his descendants, and make all the rest of the Levites subordinate to them. The line of demarcation between priests (sons of Aaron) and Levites is even drawn so sharply here, that the Levite who dared to sacrifice is threatened with death.” KUNEN, (Rel. of Israel, Vol. i. p. 387). KUNEN, and Prof. SMITH also, although he does not distinctly avow his position, favors the view that Deuteronomy is the earlier book, and that in the interval between it and the central books of the Pentateuch, the family of Aaron has succeeded in excluding the other Levites from the priestly offices and honors. They are only degraded priests, holding a subordinate position, and officiating as servants or assistants of the Aaronic priesthood. “The Levites had an equal claim to the priesthood but did not avail themselves of it, and gained their living by other means; the higher and lower services and offices in the temple at Jerusalem, although accessible to all Levites, remained as might have been expected, hereditary in the families which had once discharged them, and thus in the natural course of things arose the distinction between higher and lower priests, which contained the germ of the subsequent contrast between priests and Levites, but did not call it into being prior to the Exile.” Religion of Israel, Vol. i. p. 388.

KUNEN's criticism rests upon a philosophic theory. He is writing a series of monographs upon the religions of the world, the Israelitish religion among others. It must be explained upon the same grounds and by the same methods. It is unscientific to recognize any factor here which is not found in the history of other religions. It must fall in with the general theory of development. Its ideas and ordinances are the unfolding of the germ,—and as there is a gradual, constant growth in the one from the crude and grosser form, to the more mature and spiritual, upon which our Saviour grafted the teachings and truths of the gospel, so there has been a corresponding growth in the ordinances and regulations from the germs laid in man's religious nature, and the hierarchy with its institutions as it is set forth in the central books of the Pentateuch, and described in the books of Chronicles and Ezra, is the final flower and fruit of the process. Until this is reached all is confusion and growth. “There was no doctrine of finality with regard to the ritual law, any more than with regard to the religious ideas and doctrines.” Prof. SMITH, Art. Bib. Encyclop. Britannica. It is said that these assumptions are justified by the critical process. We can trace such a growth from the germ, and perhaps not fully, but to a satisfactory extent, can describe the process, see the ritual, its institutions, officers, expanding from the germ until it blooms and fruits in the graduated hierarchy of the Levitical law. The process is traced by the critics very much as the history is written, i. e., it is not the process as it appears in the history, but as they think it must have been. The whole process, linked with certain phrases and sentences in the historical and prophetic books which are thought to give it pretext and color, is imaginary. The vast structure which they have reared, so far as this point is concerned, and Prof. SMITH says "this is the turning point in the whole discussion," rests upon the distinction between the phrases "priests and Levites," and "the priests the Levites," and upon the passage in Ezekiel xliv. 10-17, in which it is said we have the record of the introduction of the sharp distinction between the priests and the Levites, from which time the Levites are regarded as "degraded priests," and occupy the secondary position assigned them in Exodus—Numbers. Of course these books date subsequent to Ezekiel and the exile.

But this basis, narrow as it is, becomes still narrower the moment we look at the usage and find that it is not uniform. For while as to Deuteronomy, it may be conceded that there is no well-authenticated instance in which the phrase "priests and Levites" occurs, yet as to the books of Chronicles and Kings—books which the critics assign to the same general period and authorship respectively, as the central books of the Pentateuch and Deuteronomy—the usage is not uniform. The Chronicles use the phrase "priests the Levites" (2 Chron. v. 5) and in 1 Kings viii. 4 we find the distinction "priests and Levites." Indeed the critics themselves appeal with all confidence to the "Chronicles," when it suits their purpose, to correct the clerical error they find in Kings. There is, moreover, a reason in the history of the people, and in the nature of Deuteronomy, for the distinction in the usage. The priestly privileges and honors of Aaron and his sons, had been signally vindicated in the punishment inflicted upon Korah and his associates in his rebellion. The event proves that while the Levites were "separated by God from the congregation to bring them near to Himself, to do the service of the tabernacle of the Lord," they had no claim to the special prerogatives of the priesthood. That point was settled—and settled finally. The distinction was recognized and acquiesced in. There was no longer any necessity to dwell upon it. It was too deeply fixed in the minds of all the people to call for any precise formula of words; while at the same time the tribe of Levi was recognized as a sacred and holy tribe. The usage in Deuteronomy is not only thus in accordance with the facts of the history, but finds a partial solution at least in the very design of its author. It is admitted by all that it consists of popular addresses, expository and hortatory. It would have defeated his aim and purpose to have insisted upon all the details and regulations of the central books, with which the speaker implies that the people were familiar. The character of his addresses forbids that he should dwell upon minute distinctions. He views the people in their broader relations to the law. And as the Levites were the priestly tribe—in contrast to the other tribes,—using the word priest in its broad sense as including all those who mediate between God and the people, in such rapid addresses he naturally disregards distinctions in order. The idea in his mind is the relation of the tribe to the other tribes, its popular relations, and not the grades or distinctions in the tribe itself. The distinction between Deuteronomy and the other books, therefore, so far as it exists, is merely superficial, and grew out of the circumstances in which Deuteronomy took its origin, and the very design with which the discourses were spoken. Any other usage would have been unnatural. It in no way justifies the inference drawn from it that every Levite might be a priest, or that the distinction which meets us in the earlier books has been lost in the lapse of years, or perhaps with the most recent criticism, has not yet come into existence.

The author of Deuteronomy the People's Book, pp. 155-157, holds that by the priests the Levites, Moses intended the Levitical priests in distinction from other priests among the Hebrews. The family priests were slow to yield their birthright. The struggle continued all through the wilderness. Moses speaks of the disorder and irregularity which had prevailed in the public worship (Deut. xii. 8, 9), and the prophet Amos testifies to the same thing (chap. v. 25, 26). In reference to this condition of things, Moses speaks of priests who were Levites, and those who were not. But this fails to meet the issue as between the usage in Chronicles and Kings, where the Levitical priesthood was fully recognized, and there were no rival claimants as in the wilderness.

This narrow basis on which the critics rest disappears altogether when the passages are subjected to close examination. The formal distinction between "priests and Levites," and "the priests the Levites," does not appear in the usage of the earlier books in contrast with Deuteronomy, but it is conceded that those books recognize and insist upon the distinction in grade and office. The Levites there fill a subordinate place. They serve the priests in the sanctuary worship. Is such a distinction denied in Deuteronomy? or is it there said or implied that it does not exist? There are three arguments relied upon by the critics. 1. The use of the phrase, the priests the Levites, which necessarily implies, it is said, that any Levite might be a priest. 2. That official acts are assigned to the Levites which are strictly and exclusively priestly acts and functions. 3. That the inheritance of the priests is here given to the Levites also, and thus they are recognized as actual or possible priests.*

The phrase "the priests the Levites" occurs in Deuteronomy, chap. xvii. 9, 18; xviii. 1; xxiv. 8; xxvii. 9-14. The passage chap. xxi. 5, "the priests the sons of Levi," cannot be included here, since it is obvious that "the sons of Levi" here, merely defines the tribe to which the priests belong in the same way as the phrase "the priests the sons of Aaron" is used in the earlier books to describe the family from which they sprang; or as in Ezek. xlv. 15, "the priests—the Levites, the sons of Zadok." In chap. xvii. 9 direction is given that a case too complicated for the local courts should be taken up to the central court for decision, a court composed of "the priest, the Levite, and the judge which shall be in those days." Under the theocracy there were ecclesiastical and civil judges, as the rights in question involved ecclesiastical and civil relations. The Levites were expounders of the law, as well as the priests, and were associated with them on the bench. We find them called to this work in the later history. The question of fact was apparently (chap. xix. 18) to be ascertained by the civil judge, the interpretation of the law by the priests and Levites. There is nothing here touching priestly functions or offices. On any construction of the passage, no inference can be justly drawn from it, that any Levite might be a priest. The utmost that can be said even on the construction of the critics, is that the two classes were associated in their judicial functions. But this construction is not necessary nor even probable. The most natural interpretation here, as in other passages, is that the priests were Levites, not that the Levites might be priests. It was a common phrase to designate who the priests were—a usage which perhaps had its origin in that great rebellion against the Aaronic priesthood in the wilderness, and which left its impress on the language as well as on the institutions. This interpretation is sustained by the twelfth verse, in which the priest alone is referred to. The case is brought before "the priests, the Levites and the judge;" if the decision of the priest and judge is disregarded, the presumptuous sinner is to die. "The priest," ver. 12, stands for "the priests the Levites," ver. 9, i. e. it is the Levitical priest or priests.

In the law of the king, chap. xvii. 18, the king is required to "write him a copy of the law in a book, out of that which is before the priests the Levites." The book referred to is doubtless that which was committed to "the priests the sons of Levi" (xxxi. 9), or "the Levites" (xxxi. 25), and was laid up in the side of the ark. The "priests the Levites," the "priests the sons of Levi," and "the Levites," are different phrases designating, in the connection in which they stand, the same class. The priests were Levites. It does not follow that every son of Levi was a priest. The after-history sets this in a clear light. Jehoiada the priest (2 Kings xi. 12)—long years before Deuteronomy was written, according to the critics, in obedience to the very law of the king found only in Deuteronomy—gave the testimony with the crown to the young king Joash, whom he had just anointed. There is no reasonable ground for doubting that the testimony given was the copy of the law. This brief historical notice, occurring incidentally in a book which the critics extol as reliable, not only casts light upon the authorship and date of Deuteronomy, but goes far to settle the usage of the phrase "the priests the Levites." It is the high priest there, who has the book of the law in his custody, as he alone had mainly to do with the ark, and the place in which it rested. The non-priestly Levites could not so much as touch the ark. It is the Levitical high-priest, representing his order, who here gives the law to the newly-crowned king from the book before "the priests the Levites." We know therefore who are designated by that phrase. It is the priestly Levites, or the Levitical priests.

"The priests the Levites" and all the tribe of Levi, we are told (chap. xviii. 1), shall have no part or inheritance with Israel. They shall eat the offerings of the Lord made by fire and his inheritance. There is a natural progress in the thought in the context, from the intricate cases to the general court and its decisions, from the court to the king who is at the same time judge, whose judgments must be according to the law; from the king to the priest, the associated judge and authoritative expounder of the law. The speaker, upon the border of the promised land, and looking forward to the future condition of the people there, has given the law for the king, and now proceeds to define the condition and immunities of the priests. It was impossible, therefore, while speaking of the priests, to omit the Levites, who were associated with the priests in their service, and would rightly share in their privileges. It is obvious, therefore, that it is the priests and Levites who are in the mind of the speaker. The connective particle and found here in our version is not necessary. It is not found in the best MSS. It is not required by the idiom of the language, nor by the connection. The sentence is climatic. The priests the Levites, the whole tribe of Levi. It is the tribe which comes into view, as called to sacred service, separated from the purely secular pursuits of life, and for which therefore provision must be made. The whole tribe has the Lord for its inheritance. Other passages, Esra x. 5; Neh. x. 28, 35; x. 20 (Curtiss, The Levitical Priests, p. 24 et seq.), show the same usage, from which it is clear that the classes are distinct, although no connective particle is used. The speaker says "the priests the Levites, all the tribe of Levi," and then proceeds to assign the peculiar provision for each class in the tribe, the Levitical priests, and the Levites who were not priests. This shall be the priests' due, vers. 3-5. The word "him" (ver. 5), as the object of the divine choice, refers to the priest, ver. 3, and the original calling and appointment of Aaron and his sons to that office. The phrase "out of all thy tribes" does not necessarily imply a comparison with the other tribes, but is used as equivalent to all Israel. Thus xxix. 18-21 it is the secret and presumptuous sinner who flatters himself that he will escape and prosper in his iniquity, whom the Lord decides that he will separate out of all the tribes of Israel. He may dwell among his people shielded by human authority; but God will separate him out of all the tribes of Israel according to the curses of the covenant. So it is the priest who was chosen "out of all thy tribes" or people.

* The writer here wishes to acknowledge his indebtedness to The Levitical Priests, a very able work by Prof. CURRIE. While going over the same ground in his own way, he has availed himself of the suggestions and results of that treatise, and possibly in cases in which there is no special acknowledgment of the obligation.

Having thus made provision for the priests, he gives, vers. 6-8, the regulations for the Levite who is not a priest. In both cases, however, the regulations are supplemental. They imply the fuller and more specific directions of the central books. Only a part of the Levites could reside near the sanctuary when they had entered the land of promise. The larger portion of the tribe in the very nature of their calling, as teachers, judges, must find their homes in the Levitical cities. But even such were not to lose their share in the duties and immunities at the sanctuary, if moved by a strong desire to take part in the service there. Their right was secured. They should in such cases have the same privileges with their brethren, the Levites, who dwell near the sanctuary. That the Levite so coming is said to minister in the name of the Lord his God does not imply (see further below) that he officiated as a priest or could do so. This is clear from the passages in Num., chap. iii. 6, 7; xviii. 2-7, in which the service of the Levites is defined, and in which the very term here used to express the ministration of the Levites, is there used to define the subordinate, but not priestly service, to which they were called. For there the distinction is sharply drawn. From the usage of the language, from the train of thought in the speaker's mind, as that thought is unfolded in the connection, and from the comparison with the book, which draws the distinction so sharply between priests and Levites, we are justified in holding as clear, that the phrase "the priests the Levites," is equivalent to priests who are Levites or Levitical priests.

In Deut. xxiv. 8, the people are cautioned to "take heed in the plague of leprosy, that thou observe diligently, and do according to all that the priests the Levites shall teach you, as I commanded them." In the passage in Leviticus (chap. xiv.) referred to here, it is the priest to whom the leper is to go, and by whom his case is to be decided. They were the repositories and teachers of the law. It is as such, and not in their priestly functions that they appear here. With the construction which the critics put upon the phrase, it could only imply that every Levite might be associated with the priests in this teaching and application of the law. It is probable that they came to be so associated. The necessities of the people scattered widely from the sanctuary, at which the priests mostly resided, would seem to have required some such arrangement. This is all that can be drawn from the passage even upon the principle of interpretation adopted by the critics. We have shown already that while in itself this construction is possible, it is neither necessary nor probable. The passage sustains no relation to priestly functions; and, even if it stood by itself, could never fairly be used as defining who were priests. Taken in connection with the other passages in which the same phrase occurs, it can only mean priests who were Levites, or the priests and Levites.

In the renewal of the covenant (Deut. xxvii. 9-14), the tribes were placed upon the sides of the opposite mountains, Ebal and Gerizim, while the Levites (ver. 14), "the priests the Levites," (Josh. viii. 33) stood in the valley between. "The priests the Levites" are carefully distinguished from the tribe of Levi, or the Levites generally, who were not priests, and had their place with the other tribes and joined in the response. "The priests the Levites" uttered the blessings and the curses, the Levites responded with the Amen. It is clear, therefore, that every Levite was not a priest, and that the phrase in question does not imply that they might be. The distinction between priest and Levite is fully recognized. Every priest was a Levite, but every Levite was not a priest. The author of Deuteronomy recognizes the distinction. It is so familiar to him that he does not carefully insist upon it. It underlies his whole usage with respect to these offices. He takes it for granted that those to whom he spoke were familiar with it, and hence it occurs that in nearly all the cases other than those already alluded to, the Levites or Levite is spoken of as separate from the priestly members of the tribe. "It is the Levite dwelling within thy gates," the scattered Levites having their homes in the towns and cities of the other tribes, who are to share in their festivities and joys. He is to share in their good, because he has no inheritance like the other tribes. That was a part of his inheritance, which was guarded by these injunctions. The priests were not scattered, shared largely in the immunities of the altar, and needed no such provision. There is therefore so far no proof that Deuteronomy teaches that every Levite could be a priest.

2. It is said, however, that Deuteronomy assigns to the Levites acts, which are strictly and exclusively priestly acts, and that therefore, according to its teaching, every Levite may be a priest. They are said "to bear the ark, to stand before the Lord to minister unto Him, and to bless in His name" (chap. x. 8). "Then he shall minister in the name of the Lord his God, as all his brethren the Levites do, who stand there before the Lord" (chap. xviii. 7). "The priests the sons of Levi shall come near, for them the Lord thy God hath chosen to minister unto him, and to bless in the name of the Lord" (chap. xxi. 5). There are obviously two questions involved here. First, are these passages applicable to the Levites as distinguished from the priests, or to the priests who are Levites? Second, is that which is here ascribed to the Levites exclusively a priestly function or act, so strictly priestly offices, that it may be fairly inferred that every one to whom they are ascribed either is or may be a priest? Unless it can be shown that the persons spoken of are Levites as distinct from the priests, or that, what is ascribed to them belongs exclusively to the priests, they have no force as proofs that every Levite might be a priest.

In Deut. x. 8 it is the tribe which is spoken of, and not the Levites as distinguished from the priests; it is the whole tribe, and not any classes which may compose it, and the tribe considered mainly with respect to its inheritance. Separated as a tribe to the service of Jehovah, He is its inheritance. There is nothing here in the service to which it is called to preclude the interpretation that some parts of the service may belong only to some members of the tribe, while other parts are proper to all the members of the tribe indiscriminately. "To bear the ark" is not regarded in Deuteronomy as distinctly a priestly office. Here it is assigned to the tribe, while in chap. xxxi. 9 it is attributed to the priests the sons of Levi, and in xxxi. 25 to the Levites. According to Num. iii. 31; iv. 15; vii. 9, in the ordinary life and movements of the people, the family of Kohath were to bear the ark. They were Levites but not priests. The priests were to cover the ark, and the Kohathites to bear it. It is not said that the priests might not bear it; it is rather implied that they might: but in the long and wearisome marches of the Desert it was assigned to the Kohathites. The ark was entrusted to the priests. They alone could cover it; but they were not the exclusive bearers. This is just the state of things which is recognised and assumed in Deuteronomy and the later books. The language in Deuteronomy corresponds precisely with this usage. "The Lord separated the tribe of Levi to bear the ark." Moses wrote the law and delivered it unto "the priests the sons of Levi who bare the ark." "Moses commanded the Levites which bare the ark." The author speaks as one perfectly familiar with the appointed order, sometimes apparently referring the office to the wider circle, and then confining it to the narrower. It is now the tribe of Levi, since the Kohathites were of that tribe; now "the priests the sons of Levi;" and now "the Levites," i. e., either the priestly members of the tribe or the larger family. This same usage meets us in the after-history, in which the priests, as on the more solemn occasions, appear as bearers of the ark, and then again the Levites. Comp. Josh. iii. 8, 6-18; vi. 6; vii. 88; 2 Chron. v. 4, 5-7; 1 Chron. xv. 2. "The chronicler," who, according to the critics, wrote after the distinction between priests and Levites, unknown at the time of Deuteronomy, was sharply drawn, speaks in precisely the same way. There is nothing therefore here which justifies the assertion that only priests could bear the ark, or the inference that every one who bare the ark might be a priest.

The case is not widely different with the phrase "to stand before the Lord and minister in His name." To stand before the Lord denotes any special service, or any peculiar readiness and consecration to that service—the service rendered varying widely in different cases. The priests stood before the Lord to offer, the Levites stood before the Lord, as they are the associates and assistants of the priests, to minister or serve; the angels stand before the Lord as His messengers. The words therefore are applicable to the Levites as well as the priests. To minister before the Lord, or to minister unto the Lord, may include a merely Levitical service, as well as the priestly. The term appears in Numbers in the very definition of the Levitical service as distinct from the priestly. KEIL, Arch., Vol. I., p. 154, holds that the phrase "ministering to the Lord," denotes the specific priestly office, while "ministering before the Lord" "is used in a wider sense not only of the priestly service, but also of that rendered by the prophets. 1 Kings xvii. 1; xviii. 15, and often." But without insisting upon this, it is certain that the Levitical service was a service unto the Lord. They were separated from the other tribes for that express purpose. They shared in the Lord's inheritance as thus serving Him. The Lord provided for His servants. It was therefore entirely proper to describe them as standing before the Lord to minister unto Him. It is clear, moreover (CURTISS, The Levitical Priests, pp. 16, 17) that the terms used here are applicable to others than priests. Samuel stood and ministered unto the Lord, i. e. he did so in the service rendered to Eli the priest. The Levites are said to have been chosen to stand before the Lord, 2 Chron. xxix. 4-11, and yet the distinction in the services rendered by them, and the priests, was clear in their minds. On the supposition therefore that Deut. x. 8 refers to the whole tribe, in the sense that every one who so served must be of that tribe, it can in no way be made to bear the inference drawn from it that every Levite might be a priest.

To bless in the name of the Lord refers most probably to the solemn official blessing of the people by the priests in the name of Jehovah. Apart from any exegetical reasons in favor of this construction, as against that of those who hold that it is equivalent to "invoke his name," or "praise his name," it seems evident that the whole verse refers to official acts. All the people might bless the Lord, the house of Israel, as well as the house of Aaron and Levi—all those who fear the Lord (Ps. cxxxv. 19-21). That was no peculiar Levitical function. The Levites were indeed to praise the Lord; but it was as the leaders in the common worship. David (1 Chron. xvi. 2) is said to have blessed the people in the name of the Lord. And David was no priest, nor did he claim or exercise priestly functions. His whole life testifies to his care in this respect. But granting now, as that is the view most favorable to the critics, that the blessing is specifically a priestly act, is it attributed to every Levite. It is conceded by all, that the specific duties assigned to the tribe of Levi in Deut. x. 8 were not discharged by every member of the tribe, nor could they be without a violation of the divine arrangement. All the Levites did not bear the ark, it was the family of the Kohathites; every Levite did not stand before the Lord to minister in the same sense. The whole history both before and after the Israelites stood in the plains of Moab is full with this distribution in the services. It is not true that every Levite was to bless in the name of the Lord. The whole tribe was set apart to special services, was thus the object of the divine care, shared in his inheritance; but different duties were assigned to different classes or members of the tribe, some to the priests and Levites in common, some to the priests alone, and some to special families among the non-priestly Levites. Then in the rapid speech of the deuteronomic orator, they are alluded to without careful, pains-taking, minutely-drawn distinctions, which would have been inconsistent with the whole character and object of his addresses. This view of the passage, as it is obvious and consistent with the usage of the language, as it is in accordance with the history, as it grows out of the circumstances in which the discourses were spoken, is confirmed by any fair interpretation of chap. xxi. 5, the only other passage in which the phrase occurs. It is there said that "the priests the sons of Levi" were chosen to bless in the name of the Lord. The priests are described by their tribal relation, just as they are described in the central books by their family order, the priests the sons of Aaron, and just as later in the history, when the other members of the family had forfeited their peculiar privileges, as the priests the sons of Zadok. We are at no loss as to what members of the tribe of Levi it belonged "to bless in the name of the Lord." This is one of those passages in which we see gleaming through the rapid and compact utterances of the speaker, the distinction between priests and Levites. What in one case is assigned to the tribe, though properly belonging only to some members of the tribe, is here assigned specifically to those members. The separation of the tribe to minister to the Lord, or before Him, and the special functions attaching to each class in the tribe were well known to speaker and hearer, so well known that it does not occur to him to more than allude to them. He assigns no priestly functions to other members of the tribe, while he recognizes the whole tribe as called and set apart to the service of the Lord.

8. It is urged again that the special inheritance of the priests is given indiscriminately to the Levites, and hence, that to the speaker in Deuteronomy every Levite is either actually a priest, or might become one. The passage upon which the critics rest this claim is found in Deut. xviii. 1-8. We have already seen that while it is possible grammatically to regard the words, "the priests the Levites all the tribe of Levi," as in apposition, it is not necessary, and is inconsistent with the connection and with the clear discrimination in other deuteronomic passages between the priests and Levites. It is clear, that by "his inheritance" the Lord's inheritance is meant. The Levites were to share in that inheritance whatever it may be. (Comp. Deut. x. 9 and Josh. xii. 83). We are not told what that inheritance is, but are referred to some earlier regulation familiar to all, in the added words, "as he hath said." This was all-sufficient to those who heard the speaker. They were at no loss for a moment as to what was meant. The passage is unintelligible, even on the theory of the critics as to its authorship, unless some earlier law is referred to, and by which it must be explained. The reference is beyond question to the 18th chapter of Numbers. The tithe which was prescribed in Lev. xxvii. 81-88 is there appropriated to the Levites, and the Levites were to set apart a tithe of their tenth for the priests. This provision is made clearly, out of the Lord's portion or inheritance. What the people gave to Him, He gives as His own, to them as their portion. They shall have no inheritance with the children of Israel, because the Lord had given them this possession. He was as truly their inheritance, as He was the part or portion of the priests. The priests (Num. xviii. 8 et seq.) are assigned the offerings, or portions of them. This shall be thine of the most holy things (reserved) from the fire. It is not necessary to enter into any detail as to the particular offerings, or rather part of the offerings which they were to share.* It is the clear teaching of the central books, first, that the priests only could have the offerings made by fire, and second, that the Levites were to share in the Lord's inheritance. This is the law to which the deuteronomist refers. Does he teach anything inconsistent with it? Making the reference, it is not to be presumed that he would contradict it. The speaker glances at a regulation with which all were familiar. That he has in mind the distinction between the priests and Levites, is implied in the very terms he uses, "the priests the Levites the whole tribe of

* The tithe referred to in Deut. xii. 17; xiv. 22, or the second tithe, is so obviously different from that spoken of in Numb. xviii.—different in the things tithed, and in the uses to which it was devoted, that it scarcely requires a separate consideration here. The assumed contradiction between Numb. xviii. 15-18 and Deut. xii. 17 is well met and refuted by the mere consideration that "it is not said in Numbers that all the flesh of the firstlings belongs to the priests, nor in Deuteronomy that the people are to eat all of it." The priests received their portion, enriched by the right shoulder presented by the owner, while the rest remained as his own, and was enjoyed by him in the feast.—CURRIE, The Levitical Priests, pp. 30-41. A careful observation of the distinctions which the author of Deuteronomy makes (xviii. 1-5), even in his brief and rapid survey, would have saved the critics from supposing that there was any design here to substitute a new and more restricted portion for the priests than was assigned them in Numbers. They are to have (ver. 1) the offerings of the Lord made by fire and His inheritance. This portion came from the Lord. Then there is added (ver. 3) their due from the people. These latter parts of the victims slain were given from the people, out of that which was their own. It was not of the Lord's inheritance. It enlarges the provision, perhaps because after the settlement in Canaan the people were permitted to kill and eat flesh in all their gates, and the priests would thereby

Levi," and is clearly drawn in ver. 8, "This shall be the priest's due from the people;" and ver. 6, "And if a Levite come from any of thy gates," etc., he shall have like portions to eat with all his brethren the Levites. It is a pure assumption to say, as COLenso does, that the word portion must be qualified by sacrifices. It is not said in Deuteronomy. It is specially guarded against in Numbers to which Deuteronomy refers. It is said "the priests the Levites, all the tribe of Levi shall eat the offerings of the Lord made by fire, and his inheritance, as he hath said." He does not stop to say what portion belongs to the priests and what to the Levites. That is all well known. That there is a peculiar due to the priests in distinction from the Levites he does say. But as to the details, as to what each should have, he refers to the earlier law. In this eating they must be governed by its provisions. They must not overstep the distinction thus drawn. To say therefore that Deuteronomy teaches that every Levite might eat of the fringes of the Lord, the portion exclusively appropriated to the priests, is not only to overlook entirely the distinction which the author makes impliedly and explicitly between the priests and Levites; in the face of the obvious insufficiency in these offerings to meet the most simple necessities of the tribe, but charges the deuteronomist with the folly—equally flagrant and unaccountable on the theory of the critics as on our own—of referring to a law as the authority for his own regulation, while he was aiming to subvert the law, and that law too formulated as a final settlement of a struggle between the Levites and priests. But, place the statement in Deuteronomy beside the law in Numbers, and everything is clear and consistent. The teachings in both cases are one. The priests the Levites, all the tribe of Levi, are to eat the offerings of the Lord made by fire and His inheritance, but each one his own portion of that inheritance, the priest his part, with the dues from the people, and the Levite his portion; and that alike, whether having his dwelling at the sanctuary, or coming there from a distance, to minister or serve in the name of the Lord his God.*

Little need be said here in regard to the blessing pronounced or implored upon Levi, Deut. xxxiii. 8-11, in which it is claimed that exclusively priestly functions are attributed to every member of the tribe, and therefore every Levite either is or may be a priest. There is a distinction between the tribe and the individual members of it. What is true for one is not necessarily true for the other. Because the tribe is a priestly tribe, it does not follow that every individual in it, either in fact or right, is a priest in the strict sense, and competent to priestly functions. It is the tribe which is here regarded in the person of its representative, not Levi, as KEIL holds, although he is the ancestral head of the tribe, nor Moses, who, though a Levite, is no longer of one tribe, but of all—the great representative and leader of the people; but Aaron, who as the high-priest in his person and office, represents his tribe. KUENEN (Rel. of Israel, p. 99) indeed holds that because "it is the tribe in its entirety which is referred to, therefore it is not to Aaron and his race," but whoever utters the blessing—"a poet presumably a contemporary of the second Jeroboam," as KUENEN thinks, or Moses, the true poet—he must have had some reason for saying the man thy holy one who was proved at Massah and Meribah. Some one was tested. It was not the tribe. It was not Levi. There was no distinction between the Levites and the other tribes at either place. But as the places are real, we are not at liberty to think of an ideal person. Aaron was tried at Massah—the murmurings and strivings of the people were a test to the faith of their leaders. By a natural association—natural at least to Moses, who uttered these blessings, which binds the conduct of Aaron (Lev. x. 6) with that of the tribe (Ex. xxxii. 27)—he passes from Aaron to the tribe. The whole tribe has vindicated its be deprived of certain perquisites which were theirs, when the animal was slain at the door of the tabernacle. That the earlier prescribed portions are not mentioned here, is no evidence at all that the law did not exist, since, as CURTIS well observes, "the custom of arguing that a thing does not exist because at the time of a certain writer it is not referred to by him, is a curse to all true criticism, and cannot be too severely condemned." We refer for fuller details on the portions assigned to the priests and the law with respect to tithes to SCHMIDT, Intro. § iv. 19 and 20, and to CURTIS, The Levitical Priests, pp. 24-54. They are not essential to the specific point before us.

* "It is a curious coincidence (noticed by CURTIS, p. 31), that while the phrase 'offerings made by fire' occurs only once each in Deuteronomy, Joshua, and Samuel, it is found four times in Exodus, forty-three times in Leviticus, and sixteen times in Numbers, and yet is not once mentioned by the priestly author of Chronicles, who according to the critics was saturated with the contents of Exodus—Numbers." The critics will have to devise some new programme—surely. This "Chronicler" is a troublesome person after all.

sacred character, cleared itself by its conduct at the time of the idolatrous worship of the golden calf, from the curse of the dying patriarch (Gen. xlix. 5-7), and changed that curse into a blessing for itself and for all Israel. Hence he uses the plural form in the ninth and tenth verses. It was there that the tribe won its priestly designation and honor. Then specifying the priestly functions—which as the Levites assisted in the service are attributed to the tribe, and every priest must be of that tribe—he closes his blessing with a return to the singular form, and with a probable allusion to the rebellion of Korah, Dathan and Abiram, in which the enemies and haters of Levi and of Aaron met a fate which was typical of all opposers. KUNEN argues, in the face of the facts of the history, for there is no particle of evidence that the Levites were proved at Massah or Meribah, against the associations which give shape and form to the blessing, against the progress of thought in the blessing, against the use of the singular form at its beginning and close, that the use of the plurals in vers. 9 and 10 “prove convincingly” that every Levite might bear the Thummim and Urim. Any thing is convincing to those who start with a foregone conclusion. It is certain that “to put incense before the Lord, and offer whole offerings upon His altar,” are exclusively priestly functions; but to claim that these are attributed to the Levites in general, and to every Levite as a right, is to ignore the facts of the history with which the blessing is full—and equally full upon any theory as to its authorship—historical facts which involve the distinction in the tribe between the priestly and non-priestly Levites, and ignores that constant usage of language by which we attribute to a whole mass or body what is true in a general sense of all, but in a special sense only of its representative class or individuals.

It only remains to notice the passage in Ezek. xlv. 10-16, which is relied upon by the critics as showing the very process by which the distinction between priests and Levites, unknown in Deuteronomy, but sharply drawn in the central books of the Pentateuch, was introduced into the history. “We know” (Prof. SMITH, Art. Bib. Encl. Brit.) “mainly from Ezek. xlv. that before the exile the strict hierarchical law was not in force, apparently never had been in force.” We have here the origin of the Levites, or “degraded priests” of whom KUNEN speaks (Rel. of Israel, Vol. II., p. 203). We may pass here with a mere allusion, the similarity between Ezekiel and certain chapters in Leviticus (xvii.-xxvi.), since that is sufficiently explained by the fact that Ezekiel was a priest, and that expressions from the portions of the law which concern the priests would naturally weave themselves into his discourse, and the resemblances, frequent as they are, scarcely modify the broad differences in language and style between the two books. The one using only the purest Hebrew, and the most concise and simple style, the other abounding in Chaldaic forms and expressions, and often diffuse and obscure. The common reader feels at no loss as to what is meant in Leviticus, while there is perhaps no Old Testament book in regard to which he feels so much the need of help. (See CURRISS, The Levitical Priests, p. 74 and note.) That the Levites spoken of in Ezek. xlv. 10 are priests, is clear from the connection. “They shall not come near unto me to do the office of a priest unto me, but shall bear their shame.” They are excluded from the priesthood in which they once shared. Ezekiel does not think of them, nor speak of them as non-priestly Levites. They had forfeited their priesthood by their unfaithfulness. “We know that the house of Aaron was divided into two branches, Eleazar and Ithamar (Num. iii. 4). According to the Chronicler (1 Chron. xxiv. 1-5) all the priests came from these two tribes. The line of Ithamar was cursed in the person of Eli (1 Sam. ii. 86; xiv. 3; xxii. 9, 20; 1 Kings ii. 26, 27; 1 Chron. xxiv. 8, 6). In the second book of Samuel, Zadok and Abiathar appear side by side in the priesthood (2 Sam. xxiv. 35; xix. 11), from which Abiathar, a descendant of Ithamar, is excluded by Solomon (1 Kings ii. 27), thus leaving the position of high-priest to Zadok alone. Henceforth the posterity of Ithamar occupy an inferior position. Now when we read the account of Josiah’s reformation of the idolatrous priests (2 Kings xxiii. 8, 9), who are called brethren of the other priests, and then turn to Ezek. xlv. 10, the whole matter becomes clear. In ver. 15 of the same chapter the priests the Levites, the sons of Zadok, are mentioned as those who went not astray. Who then are the Levites spoken of ver. 10-14, but descendants of Ithamar, who might also be termed Levitical priests, who were degraded from their priestly office on account of their apostasy” (CURRISS, The Levitical Priests, pp. 75, 76). There is no allusion here, therefore, to the Levites as a class, much less any record of the process by which they came into existence.

There is besides the clearest evidence that the distinction between priests and Levites was already well known at Ezekiel’s time, and long before. Ezra himself, whose testimony even the critics will not impugn (iii. 12), recognizes this distinction as existing—and implies its long previous existence.

The theory, moreover, of its later origin is incredible, since it requires us to believe that this fundamental change, affecting so large a class of the tribe, was accomplished in the space of a few years, when the nation was agitated by internal strifes, and overrun by foreign enemies, and that it was completed so noiselessly, that all traces of it disappear, even in the memories of men who witnessed it going on under their eyes (see Deut. the People's Book, pp. 160, 161).

But the passage referred to—lies embedded in the grand apocalyptic vision of the prophet, ch. xl.—xlviii. It cannot be wrested out of its connection, and made to serve as a record of historical events, or as a basis of a history to unfold itself in the immediate future of God's people. The whole passage is symbolical and typical, and finds its full realization in the Messianic times. It purports to be a vision. Indeed this is a characteristic feature of his whole prophecy. The representation was not intended to find a literal and exact realization. Such a view of it would imply a restoration of the whole "Jewish ceremonial and place the prophet in plain contradiction to the teachings of the New Testament." In this chapter, xlv., he passes from the Prince, in whom is represented "the true and complete harmony of civil and ecclesiastical order in the days of Messiah," to the priests, and in the most vivid way presents, not any class-distinction between priests and Levites, but the distinction between the priests, the false and the true, the profane and the holy. In that day when the vision in its true sense shall be realized (it is not important here to say when, or precisely in what sense), the sanctuary in which God shall dwell, and from which issue the life-giving streams of water, shall no more be polluted by the presence of the unfaithful and unclean. But the sons of Zadok—Zadok the typical high-priest of the Messianic time of David and Solomon, who kept the charge when Abiathar proved unfaithful—"Zadok and his sons who kept the charge of my sanctuary when the children of Israel went astray from me"—referring not to a particular instance, but to their general course in the history—stand as the typical representatives of the true, holy, faithful priests, who shall minister in His sanctuary. "His very name (righteous), and what is historically known of him, symbolized him as the type of the true priestly character. (See SCHROEDER, on Ezek. in this Commentary. Also FAIRBAIRN and HAVERNICK on Ezekiel.) The facts of the history, the testimony of Ezra to the previous existence of the distinction between priests and Levites, the character of the times in which it is claimed the distinction was introduced, the connection of the passage with the apocalyptic vision of the prophet and its typical character, and the obvious import of the context fairly interpreted, all show that the view of the critics is untenable. The bridge upon which they claim to pass from Deuteronomy to the hierarchical law in Exodus—Numbers will not bear the strain upon it. It breaks down under the burden, and the critics fall into the stream, already bearing away in its current the fragmentists and the documentarians.

III. THE DIFFICULTIES INVOLVED IN THE THEORY OF THE CRITICS.

It may be confidently said that the passages in Deuteronomy relied upon by the critics, when submitted to a fair examination in their connection, and in the light of the admitted design of the author, not only fail to sustain their theory, but may be urged in favor of the Mosaic authorship. The difference in language and style between it and the central books of the Pentateuch, in its references to the customs of the people, the regulations and institutions of the law; in its allusions to the officers, civil and ecclesiastical, are both reconcilable with the position that Moses wrote these discourses, and are precisely such differences as would naturally arise in the circumstances in which he was placed, but would be most unnatural to any one writing in his name, and at a later date. The absence of these diversities would justify a strong presumption, that it was a mere frigid and lifeless copy of the earlier law—a second law, and yet not a second—a mere useless repetition, serving no good end in the life of the people, and without any necessity for its position in the canon.

It is a serious objection to their theory that it rests upon a pure assumption. It is avowedly based upon a philosophic view as to man's religious nature. The Israelitish religion is one of the different religions which have risen out of the germs of that nature, and then flourished and decayed. It is nothing less and nothing more. Its records are to be examined and explained upon this basis. The theory is not the growth of a careful study of the facts presented —a frame in which they may be set and explained; but the facts are explained according to the demands of the theory, and any fact, however well attested, which refuses to bend to its demands, which will not take its place at their bidding, is thrown aside at once as impossible. A supernatural factor in the history is out of the question. A miracle is impossible. The echoes of them in the records are mere childish superstitions, the traditions from a credulous age, and, of course, present no serious claim for examination. It is not worth while to canvass the evidence for that which is impossible. It would not be uncharitable perhaps to say, in reply to all this, that we have here the real animus in the whole effort. It is the supernatural contents of the records which are troublesome; and any theory which dispenses with these is welcome. But whether this is so or not, it is certain that the whole theory is assumed at the outset. The earlier pages of KUNEN's book are full and explicit. He not only admits it, but claims this as his position.

We must content ourselves with a mere reference for the most part to the difficulties involved in this theory.

1. The phraseology of the book, its archaic forms, its freedom from Aramaisms, which would naturally and almost unavoidably have found their way into its language had it been written by Hilkiab or any other person of Josiah's time, lies directly in the face of their view. The indisposition to change in the Semitic races, either in language or customs, will scarcely meet the demands which this theory makes. For the lapse of centuries, eventful in great changes in the internal affairs of the people, and in their relation to other nations, in the progress of which the people have been drawn more and more into connection with great nations, using to some extent dialects kindred with their own, could not have failed to make an impression upon their tongue, which would have revealed itself in a work designed for popular effect, and wearing therefore a popular dress.

2. It may fairly be objected to this view that the critics are so far apart in their conclusions. They are agreed only upon this, that Moses is not its author; and that certain parts of the records are distinguishable from each other, by the terms which are used for the name of God. Beyond this they are all at sea. It is not only that there is a wide diversity in the various schools, each of which claims with equal confidence that it has the truth, but that within the same school there are all shades of opinion. Prof. SMITH denies the Mosaic authorship, substantially and to an extent verbally, upon KUNEN's grounds, while still claiming that it is a part of the inspired word. KUNEN rejects altogether the idea of inspiration, though recognizing a substratum of facts underlying the recorded history, while the Christian Bishop of Natal, admitting in the earlier stages of his inquiries, that possibly Moses may have been an historical character, is now disposed to question his existence, and thinks the less said about him the better. There is as little agreement of course as to the time of its origin, as with respect to its character and authorship. It is fair to say that there must be some grave error in the premises they assume, or in the process of their investigations, which leaves them in such uncertainty in their conclusions. KUNEN admits that "some of the results of critical research lack that certainty and precision which is desirable; but this does not detract from the certainty of the main point." But this main point is either assumed—and it is easy to agree in a pure assumption—or it rests upon these minor details and results "which lack certainty," and about which therefore there is such diversity among the critics. The conclusions cannot be more certain or credible than the grounds on which they rest.

3. The critics have great difficulty in finding any period in the history when a book like Deuteronomy could have secured an entrance into the religious life of the people. That it could have arisen at the time of Moses, as it claims to have done, is not only possible and probable, but leaving out of view the few brief passages upon which they rest their proof of its later date, it is admitted by the critics themselves. For on their theory it assumes to have its origin then and there. All the requisites for its appearance were at hand. The people were familiar with the art of writing; the stage in the history which they had reached demanded just such a book; the relation of Moses to the people in the past, and his natural solicitude for their future, gave the impulse to its composition, and Moses stands confessed by all the one person in the history most richly endowed with all the qualifications for the work. There is no such combination of favoring circumstances at any subsequent period in the history. The discovery of the book of the law in the temple (2 Kings xxii. 8) in the days of Josiah is eagerly seized upon as affording a door of escape from the difficulty. But aside from this record, it is well nigh certain that no one would have fixed upon this period. There is nothing in its characteristic features favoring such a supposition. There is no evidence of any special literary activity, such as the critics claim. The whole period—Josiah reigned only twenty-one years after the discovery of the book of the law—was a reformatory, but not a creative period. The ruling feature was that of comparison with some previous age, not of origination. It was a time of temporary prosperity, but not of quiet or of high expectations. There was no opening future like that which gleams upon us in Deuteronomy. The people were disturbed by fears and jealousies, and agitated by the conflicts of the great world powers in which they shared, and in which Josiah himself fell. There is no person who figures in the history to whom such a work could be attributed. He is pre-eminently the "great unknown." Even on the supposition that it could have originated at that time, how is its introduction to be explained? How did it secure universal and unquestioned acceptance among the people—among the opposing literary and religious parties of whom the critics speak—and some of whom at least must have been violently hostile to its whole tendency and result; how came it to have such acceptance when, according to the critics, its whole object was to effect such changes in the religious life and institutions, to restrict the people in the mode of worship, to lay upon them heavy burdens, to deprive the Levites of their birthright and heritage, or if not to do all this, yet to furnish a ground and justification for such changes? how could it thus win its way against necessarily opposing tendencies, and yet leave no sign or trace of any struggle in the history, and no allusion to it even, unless it is found in the apocalyptic and symbolic language of Ezekiel; by wresting a passage which manifestly portrays ideally the glorious Messianic future and turning it into a mere reference to a supposed or real past. It is at least a difficult problem to solve.

4. The literary problem involved in their supposition is still more difficult. It is not merely that some author of Josiah's time, or a century earlier or later, assumed the position of Moses, spake in his name, translated himself into a remote past, and gives his work the color and stamp it would have borne had it been written then; and this so successfully—that even if his learned contemporaries regarded it as a clever fiction, the great body of the people were imposed upon, received it as a genuine Mosaic production, and as of inspired authority—and with such admirable skill that it has escaped detection until recent criticism has brought it to light. Even this would place Deuteronomy without a literary parallel. There have been numerous works of this class, but none constructed with such skill and genius as this theory implies. But this is the easiest part of the problem. The plan of the book, simple and natural, if it sprang from Moses, and on the borders of the promised land, reveals the very highest art if it was written centuries later and under entirely different conditions; the frequent and almost countless allusions, minute, unexpected and yet natural, coming out, as it were, uncalled-for, from a personal experience and share in the history, from a memory full with the events as of yesterday, references which bear the most unquestionable proof that they were unstudied; the impressive tone and spirit which breathes through all its utterances, the glowing fervor and love, the tender and yet faithful reproof and warning, the yearning solicitude for the welfare of the people, and their loyalty to Jehovah; to suppose all this accomplished by a fictitious author, and through these long discourses without once seriously tripping, or in any way betraying himself, is well nigh incredible. This would be true in any age, and with the most abundant materials on which to work. But it is simply amazing on the theory of the critics. For the periods prior to that at which they suppose this great work was written were destitute of any literary activity. The prophets even, as KUENEN holds, had just begun to commit their works to writing. Dim and floating traditions—a discordant, unreliable and crude mass of memories, through which the critic, with all his acumen, and with the light of their later works, threads his way with the utmost difficulty, fill up the past. It is upon these materials only that the author must have wrought. Around here and there a shadowy fact, as e. g. that there was probably an enslaved people in Egypt, such a person as Moses, a journey across the desert, and Canaan in prospect, the author has framed these marvellous discourses. He has not only created his diction, but created his facts, created his institutions—facts and institutions which are vital to the history, and has done it in such a way that his own people and succeeding ages have lived in the faith that Moses spake and commanded what the author has here attributed to him.

5. But the great difficulty which this theory must meet and explain is the moral difficulty. The author personates the great Lawgiver in order to gain acceptance for his venture, and then impart to it greater authority and force. It is a "legislative programme," in the terms of the critics, in which the author puts his words into the mouth of Moses, or, in plainer words, a pious fraud, resorted to in order to bring the people to a higher and more spiritual view of the law. If he did not act upon the maxim that the end justifies the means, he was conscious of a purpose to deceive. His whole success depended upon the skill with which the deception was practiced. It is difficult and indeed impossible to justify the deception. The moral judgment of men is everywhere prompt and clear in its condemnation. Even the critics accept this judgment in their very statements, by which they apologize for the forgery. "The people had not yet learned to lay weight on questions of authorship." "As ancient writers are not accustomed to distinguish historical data from historical deductions, he naturally presents his views in dramatic form in the mouth of Moses" (Prof. SMITH, Art. Bib. Ency. Brit.). "At a time when notions about literary property were yet in their infancy, an action of this kind was not regarded as unlawful. Men used to perpetrate such fictions as these without any qualms of conscience" (KUENEN, Rel. of Israel, Vol. II., pp. 18, 19). The Dutch professor at least cannot describe the fiction without showing clearly his own moral estimate of it. But there is no sufficient evidence "that forgery was ever regarded in any other light than we regard it now." The moral sense of men is the same at all times, and although it may be greatly perverted in any given case, it has never hesitated to say, that it was both mean and wicked for an author to plume himself in another's colors. The analogy sought in the Book of Ecclesiastes, which is attributed to Solomon, affords no relief. For the Preacher only claims to give that view of life which results from large experience, and great practical wisdom, of which Solomon was the most perfect representative. Solomon is alluded to, not personally, but in his representative character. It is personified wisdom who speaks. Those to whom the book came would understand this at once; and no deception, therefore, even on the supposition that Solomon did not write it was practiced. But Deuteronomy claims to be the work of Moses. In every form it is attributed to him personally. It is no dramatic programme, but an authoritative law, an absolute rule of life. The author, whoever he was, speaks as if deeply conscious of his divine commission. He claims the most implicit obedience on that ground. "Ye shall not add unto the word which I command you, neither shall ye diminish aught from it." See also xii. 32; xxxi. 1, and other similar passages. There is nothing wanting which can aggravate the offence. He speaks in the name of God, as one who stands face to face with God, with the very highest authority; treating with the greatest reverence and freedom the laws and institutions of which he speaks; claiming to shape and direct all that is vital in the spiritual interests of the people; pronouncing the heaviest censures and penalties upon those who spake in the name of God, and were not commanded to do so, and yet consciously, deliberately and designedly palms off his own work for that which it is not—sets his hand to a false claim, and calls down upon himself his own condemnation. The offence is not individual. The theory assumes necessarily a conspiracy of all the best men of the age in abetting and promoting the fraud. Whatever we may assume as to the intelligence and culture of the people with respect to their law, the prophets, the priests, the Levites, were familiar with its provisions. The King could not have been entirely ignorant. The history shows that he was not. The work of reformation began before the book of the law was discovered in the temple. That gave new impetus and completeness to it. If therefore this book was not really discovered, but newly written, by Hilkiah, or by some one with his cognizance and authority, the king, and priests, and prophets, all the better-informed among the people, combined to lend their influence to the imposture. No such work could have secured acceptance with the people, without their aid, much less against their opposition. The astonishment and sorrow which the king expresses, his own humiliation, his earnest call upon the people to repentance, were, in large measure, assumed. It was a part of the concerted arrangement, by which this book, so skillfully prepared, was to introduce these great changes into the life of the people, as the critics claim, or at least stamp them, so far as they had grown into use, with a pretended divine authority. The moral judgment of men, the Christian conscience, revolts from such a supposition. It is difficult to conceive of a good man, and the author of Deuteronomy was indisputably a good man, seeking the good of his people, stooping to such a fraud; it is absolutely incredible that the great body of good men should have united in it. It is not only incredible; it is absurd. For goodness and fraud—fraud deliberate and persisted in, and on such themes and interests as this book discusses are irreconcilable. They are mutually destructive of each other.

IV. THE POSITIVE ARGUMENTS FOR THE MOSAIC AUTHORSHIP.

Fairly weighing the difficulties which each theory involves, the scales preponderate on the side of the Mosaic authorship. But it is not a balance of difficulties and probabilities upon which the decision is to rest. There is strong positive evidence that Deuteronomy is what it claims to be, the work of Moses.

1. Its own express and repeated testimony is confirmed by the whole internal character of the book. Its contents, its tone and spirit, the tenderness and urgency of its entreaties, the full consciousness it everywhere breathes that the author speaks with divine authority, particularly the manner in which the inward experiences of Moses are referred to—his whole heart laid open to us—his sacred communings with God (chaps. iii. 23-25; ix. 25-29), coming out as freely as his words to men, and without once betraying the hand of a mere pretender, all this goes to show that it is really Moses who speaks. Still further, the warnings not only against the forms of idolatry prevalent in Canaan, but against worldliness and pride, against a spurious liberality towards the Canaanites, against self-righteousness on the ground of their peculiar calling and privileges, are all natural at the time of Moses, but are without any force at the time of Manasseh or Josiah. It has been well said: "If Deuteronomy be only the production of some timorous reformer, who conscious of his own weakness, tried to borrow dignity and weight from the name of Moses, then assuredly all arguments drawn from internal evidence for the composition of any work are utterly useless."

2. The historical argument in favor of this view which belongs here, cannot be over-stated. It is difficult even to outline it in any brief space. The book purports to have been spoken by Moses in the plains of Moab, after the Exodus from Egypt and the dreary march through the wilderness and before the entrance into Canaan. The historical allusions all harmonize with this. It refers to Canaan as just before the people. "When the Lord thy God shall bring thee into the land whither thou goest to possess it;" or "the land which he swore unto thy fathers to give thee." "For the Lord thy God bringeth thee into a good land." "Thou art to pass over Jordan this day, to go in to possess nations greater and mightier than thyself." "Understand therefore that the Lord thy God giveth thee not this good land to possess it for thy righteousness." This is the mode of reference, in constantly recurring passages all through the book. The goodly land is not theirs in possession; it is soon to be theirs; they are about to enter it; it is just before them. The references are precisely what they should be, if the people actually stood as it represents them as standing, upon the borders of their inheritance, and longing for its possession.*

The historical references to other nations are equally fitting and striking. The tribes of Canaan, the Amalekites, etc., are the foes of Israel, whom they are commanded to destroy. Such a command would plainly have been out of place at a later date, when these nations had either ceased to exist, or were so enfeebled that they no longer endangered the welfare of Israel; and when the people were struggling for their existence between the great world-powers, whose vast armies swept across their borders. On the other hand, we search in vain through all these discourses for a clear reference to those mighty nations, which could not well have been wanting had the book been written at a later date. There are indeed prophetic hints of their existence and power in the pictures of Israel's sad future which it presents; but they lie only in the most distant horizon. All the nations alluded to, friendly or hostile, are those, and those only, who stood around the chosen people of God, at the time at which these discourses claim to have been spoken.

The book is remarkable for its allusions to the desert, which according to its own statement Israel had just left behind it. The shadow of that great and terrible wilderness still rested upon the mind of speaker and his hearers. Its air seems to surround them. The acacia groves in which they are resting remind them, by contrast, of the dreary road along which they have marched. The memories of the desert are fresh and vivid, and give coloring to the exhortations and warnings of the speaker. If the people are to be roused to greater courage it is by the remembrance that "the Lord bare thee, as a man beareth his son, in the wilderness and all the way that ye went." They are called to trust in the Lord, for "He knoweth thy walking through this great wilderness, these forty years the Lord thy God hath been with thee, thou hast lacked nothing." To impress them with reverence and awe, they are taken back to the scene at Horeb (chap. iv. 10); to guard them against pride and self-righteousness, they are reminded of their conduct in the wilderness (viii. 1-6 and 15-17; ix. 22, 23; xi. 6-7); the freshness and verdure of Canaan, with its abundance of water, is set over against the drought and sterility of the desert; the orderly worship in the land of promise, stands in contrast with the usages in the wilderness (xii. 8); the curses denounced upon the unfaithful are colored by their experiences there (xxviii. 22-24); and the song and blessing are full of its imagery. No one can read the book without feeling that it was written by one who was not only familiar with the desert, but whose life was full of its experiences, whose thoughts and language breathe its very air.

---

* And the reference is uniform. It never implies that they were already in Canaan. For the passages which seem to imply this, are either spoken of the East Jordan possessions, or are such that in their connection they will not bear the construction the critics put upon them. Such an apparent later reference is said, e. g., to be found in chap. xix. 14, and yet the speaker guards against this inference when he says, following the phrase, "which they of old time have set in thine inheritance," by the words which thou shalt inherit, in the land that the Lord thy God giveth thee.

It is still more remarkable for its references to Egypt. The impression that these references make is so strong, that EWALD holds that the supposed author of Deuteronomy was some learned Jew, at the time of Manasseh, who lived in Egypt, and thus became familiar with the Egyptian usages. It is not so much the frequent allusions to Israel's residence and condition in Egypt, but to the Egyptian usages in mining, agriculture, modes of warfare, ritual of worship, etc. It underlies the law of kindness towards servants and strangers, it constitutes a striking feature in the promises and curses of the covenant, and comes out even in the law of the king. (For the references, see SCHROEDER, Intro. § vi. pp. 37, 33). The book, therefore, is so far just what it purports to be. It is entirely natural in all its historical references if it was written by Moses, and most unnatural on the supposition of another author and a later date.

3. Its relation to the earlier and later books shows that it stands in its true position in the canon, and is therefore the work of Moses. It implies everywhere the knowledge of the historical contents and legislation of the preceding books. How untenable the position of the critics, that Deuteronomy is earlier than the books of Exodus—Numbers, is, appears from the mode in which these historical events are alluded to. They are not recorded, but simply referred to as fully recorded in the earlier writings. They are presupposed as well known. Thus he alludes to the bondage in Egypt (chap. iv. 20; v. 6, 15; vi. 12, etc.); to the passover (xvi. 1-8); to the pillar of cloud and fire (xxi. 15); to the manna (viii. 3); to the war with Amalek (xxv. 17-19); to the law-giving at Sinai (iv. 11-15); to the residence of Moses in the Mount, and the double tables of the law (ix. 6; x. 5); to the law of leprosy (xxiv. 8); to the sin of Miriam (xxiv. 9), a passage which is utterly without meaning unless we go back to the earlier history in Numbers. It is needless to multiply instances of this kind. They are so numerous, and the references are so natural and unstudied, that the great body even of the critics, until the present day, have held that the other books of the Pentateuch must have been known to the author of Deuteronomy. The same thing is true with regard to the whole Sinaitic legislation. Deuteronomy refers to these laws, e. g., the laws about food (comp. chap. xiv. with Lev. xi.) the law with respect to servants (Deut. xv. 12-15 Exod. xxi. 1-4); the law with respect to murder (Deut. xix. 11-13; Exod. xxi. 12-15); the law for the annual feasts (Deut. xvi.; Exod. xii. 1 seq.; Lev. xxiii. seq.); and so more or less fully through the whole code, always implying that the fuller and detailed legislation was well known both to speaker and hearers.

If it is full of references to the other books of the Pentateuch, the whole after-history, poetry, and prophecy presuppose its existence. The line of proof which runs through the history is many-stranded. It is only when the different threads are followed up, and united into one that we fully appreciate its strength. It seems clear, e. g., from the passage in Ezra which speaks of the weeping of the ancient men, who had seen the glory of the first temple, with the shouts of the younger generation at its restoration, that the first temple had been an object dear to the hearts of the people. It was connected with their most precious interests as a nation. Their whole life, popular, civil and religious, centered in it. If it stood in its glory, and had this place in the affections of the people, as we know it did about 600 B. C., it must have been built long before. It could not have won this place, and drawn into connection with itself all that concerned the nation's welfare in any brief period. The restoration of the temple points beyond any reasonable question to the temple of Solomon. But the existence of the temple, with its altar, carries with it, more or less fully, the feasts and sacrifices, the whole ceremonial law, and this implies the moral law, since the sacrifices and altar have no significance except as instituted to atone for the breaches of the moral law. At the time of Solomon, therefore, the whole law, with its institutions and officers, was in full operation. But without insisting upon this, or upon kindred statements in the history which are inexplicable, except upon the supposition of the earlier existence of the law (see 1 Kings xii. 32, and comp. 1 Kings xviii. 40 with Deut. xiii. 5 and xviii. 20), it is certain that Deuteronomy existed at the time of Solomon. The prayer of Solomon (1 Kings viii.), at the dedication of the temple, is full of real and verbal allusions to the earlier book. Its tone and language are deuteronomic. We cannot suppose that the author of Deuteronomy or the "programme" copied from Solomon, for in that case we shall have to explain how Solomon came by that knowledge of Moses and his work, with which the prayer is full; we should have to feign a tradition from which he has drawn so largely, and of which there is no evidence. But if Solomon had the copy of this law, which as king he was required to have, and with respect to which, as we have seen already, he had received the solemn charge from David his father, then all is natural. The tone and coloring of his prayer is just what we should have expected. It could not well have been otherwise. He would naturally clothe his petitions in the terms of the book most intimately connected with his religious life. He was here, too, leading the devotions of the people, and uses terms and phrases with which they were familiar. His prayer, therefore, is a testimony that Deuteronomy was known to him and known to the people. But this implies its long previous existence. Since no book could thus have entered into the religious life of the people, and have formed the vehicle of its thoughts and feelings in its communion with God, unless they had long been familiar with it. A moulding and shaping power like this is only the growth of time. We meet with allusions to Deuteronomy in the books of Samuel; and allusions of a kind which show that the people were familiar with it, that it had left its impress upon their views and language. Joab (2 Sam. xxiv. 3) speaks to the king, remonstrating against his course, in words borrowed from Deuteronomy (i. 11). Tamar (2 Sam. xiii. 12) reproves her seducer by a reference to the deuteronomic law (xxii. 21).* It is not only the king, prophets, priests, but the common people who thus advert to the law, as found in Deuteronomy, and thus show that this law was read to the people, as Moses commanded. It is incredible that these incidents—and they are inwoven in the history, as having far-reaching results—should have been inserted in the narrative in order to give a basis for the law, which was not written, according to the critics, until centuries after their occurrence.

The whole plan and significance of the book of Ruth turns upon the Levirate law in Deuteronomy, xxv. 5-10. The custom is unquestionably of earlier date, but the law which regulates it, which prescribes its limitation and the manner of enforcing it, is found only here. It is important to observe, as showing that the law was not of recent origin when the book of Ruth was written, that the usage as to the loosing of the shoe prescribed in the law, is referred to as comparatively out of date (Ruth iv. 7). No reasonable person can well doubt that the law in Deuteronomy was older than the narrative in Ruth which refers to it, and older by generations, for it is referred to as fixing the usage in a former time, which was then passing out of vogue. We have already shown how fully Joshua implies the deuteronomic law. It could not have been written indeed had not Deuteronomy preceded it. The history, therefore, from the time of Ezra back to Joshua presupposes Deuteronomy.

What is true of the history is true also of the poetry. Apart from the ninetyeth Psalm, which claims to be Mosaic, and carries in its whole tone and structure the evidence that the claim is true, and which is full of striking resemblances to Deuteronomy, we have the grand eulogies upon the law in the nineteenth and one hundred and nineteenth Psalms. Whatever may be said as to the date of the latter of these Psalms, there is no reason to doubt that the former was the work of David, and there is every reason to believe that it was. It bears his name in its title, and its internal character reveals his hand. But this Psalm is not only a eulogy upon the law, showing how it was regarded at that time, but is full of deuteronomic terms in its description of the law, and has express reference to it (comp. v. 13; Deut. xvii. 12, 13; v. 17; Deut. xxxii. 4, 31). The thirty-second and fifty-first Psalms reveal to us the experience of David, which implies a knowledge of the law—and the law substantially as we have it in the books of the Pentateuch—as a revelation both of the holiness and grace of God. The eighteenth Psalm (comp. 2 Sam. xxii.) abounds in terms and figures which constantly remind us of Deuteronomy. The triumphant and exultant songs of Deborah (Judg. v. 3-5), and Hannah (1 Sam. ii. 2), different in many respects, are alike in this, and bear their decided testimony to the same book. We have therefore running through the whole body of Lyric poetry a uniform and consistent testimony to the pre-existence of Deuteronomy as the work of Moses. See further SCHROEDER's Intro, § vii. p. 41, and also HAVERNICK, Intro. i., ii. 557-8, and iii. p. 304-5.

* See Deuteronomy the People's Book, pp. 209-211, and in this connection STANLEY LEATHERS, The Structure of the Old Testament.

The prophetic utterances are, if possible, more clear and decisive. (See SCHROEDER, Intro. § vii. p. 40; SMITH, Bib. Dic. art. Pentateuch, and HENGSTENBERG, Beitrage, Vol. ii., 48, 21 seq.).

But besides these clear references to Deuteronomy as an earlier book, direct and indirect, there is an impressive argument in favor of the Mosaic origin of the law, drawn from the general spirit and character of the later books; and what is here said of the law applies with special emphasis to Deuteronomy, which gives us the law in its popular aspect, and enters therefore more directly and fully into the religious life of the people. If the people as individuals, and as a body, recognize in their recorded experiences, and in every stage of the history, a law to which they were amenable, by the knowledge of which their sense of sin, and at the same time their hope for forgiveness was awakened, then it is safe to say that such a law must have existed. The sense of sin, it is true, must be such in its reality and expression, that it cannot be ascribed to the mere working of natural conscience, or be measured and explained by the law written upon the heart; and the hope of pardon must not be the blind, instinctive feeling that in some way God will be merciful, but rest upon, or involve a knowledge of some specific way in which He will show mercy to the guilty. The prophet Daniel clothes his confession in terms of the law, "we have sinned, and have committed iniquity by departing from thy precepts and from thy judgments," and yet clings to the hope of mercy in connection with the covenant, and the sacrifices or oblations. Nehemiah presents the Levites as confessing the guilt of the people—the generation then before them and their fathers—as saying: "They were disobedient and rebelled against thee, and cast thy law behind their backs; they sinned against thy judgments;" and then as leading the people back to God and His mercy through a restored ritual and service. Jeremiah opens to us the secrets of his own heart and the experience of the people in the Lamentations. He mourns over the deserted ways of Zion; her neglected feasts; her despised sabbaths; her sanctuary desecrated by the presence of those who were excluded from its precincts by the law; her pleasant (desirable) things of old now passed away: he traces this desolation, as to her religious feasts and institutions, to the transgressions of the people, their rebellion against his commandment, and then closes with the deuteronomic prayer: "Turn thou us unto thee O Lord, and we shall be turned; renew our days as of old." If it is said, that there is no dispute as to the existence of the law at the time of Jeremiah, this does not meet the case. For the prophet deplors the loss of the pleasant things of old, and prays that the people may be restored to the former things. It is no law of recent date from which the nation has departed. He connects the sins of the people and the sufferings for them with the law of old, its precepts and institutions and penalties. He looks for salvation only by a return in obedience and privilege to the condition of the people in its earlier history.

Isaiah not only begins his prophecy by quoting the words of Deuteronomy, but paints the picture of the moral condition of his people in the colors of the law: "They have forsaken the Lord, they have provoked the Holy One of Israel unto anger." They observe its external rites and ceremonies, its feasts and sacrifices, but violate its spirit. They make their punctilious outward obedience, an excuse and cover for their inward corruption. It is this which makes the prophet shudder and mourn, which leads him to cry out in astonishment and regret, "Ah, sinful nation, seed of evil doers." He sees their real character in the glass of the law. He recognizes the righteous hand of God upon them; but yet does not leave them without hope. The atoning and cleansing rites of the law are before him: "Wash you; make you clean: though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool."

Hosea, writing about 800 B. C., and long prior to the days of Josiah or even of Hezekiah, recognizes in every way the law as the measure of Israel's sins. They are charged with transgressing the covenant of the Lord, and trespassing against His law; with treachery and falsehood in their relations to Him; iniquities which receive their very form, as they do their turpitude, from the law. Their torn, smitten, wounded condition is the fruit of their sin. But they are not left without hope. He who has torn will heal; He who has smitten will bind up, if they will return unto the Lord their God, as He has appointed them.

The very mission of the prophets, in part at least; in the judgment of the critics, their whole mission, was to bring back the people to the true observance of the law, and the law in its more spiritual, popular, and deuteronomic aspect. Their mission is inconceivable, and their work and writings are without any intelligible cause or explanation unless we assume the existence of the law. If they are sent to awaken the people to a sense of their apostacy and sin, it is by a reference to the law and an exposition of it in its real import; if they call them to repentance, it is in view of the sacredness and holiness of the law; if they hold out to them hope, it is through institutions and ordinances of the law. Their mission and work are based upon the law; presuppose it, and are unaccountable without it; and the law, not as revealed to them peculiarly, but as known to the people. It is not necessary to carry this examination further. The prayer of Solomon, the Psalms of David, the history of the people under Samuel and the Judges are full of the same experiences of sin and grace; experiences which are simply impossible or insupposable without the law in its precepts and ritual. For these references are without a parallel in the history of any people. The sense of sin is indeed co-extensive with the race, the dim shadowy hope of some mercy has never been utterly lost; but this sense of sin found here, so characteristic in its form and depth, is by the knowledge of the law; and the hope of redemption from it is everywhere grounded in the popular knowledge of the law, in its broadest sense—i. e., including ceremonial as well as moral precepts—as a revelation of grace.

This knowledge of the law cannot be explained as merely traditional. For in the first place there is no sufficient evidence of such tradition as is implied in this supposition; in the second place the allusions to the law substantially as we now have it are very clear; and in the third place, it is inconceivable that a law of this nature, running counter to the whole tendencies of the human heart, and therefore likely to be buried out of view or perish, should have been left in an unwritten form, and to the safeguards of mere tradition. Nor is it supposable that a people, whose predominant characteristic is its legality, whose whole life, as it had its origin in the Sinaitic legislation, is also permeated and shaped by it, should have suffered such a change, as is involved in a later writing formed out of floating traditions, from an unwritten to a written form, from mere scattered germs, to a complete and rounded system, without any discoverable allusion to it, either in its history or experiences, save that which is supposed to exist in the finding of the book of the law by Hilkiah.*

4. The external evidence in favor of the Mosaic origin of Deuteronomy is very strong. "It was the undisputed testimony of the Jewish nation at and before the time of Christ, that Moses wrote the Pentateuch. Such is the testimony of PHILO from Alexandria and JOSEPHUS from Jerusalem (PHILO, Mangoy II., 141, 149; JOSEPHUS, Bekker, III., ii. 5, xii., etc.). So also the Talmud from Babylon in a passage apparently of great antiquity."† The New Testament recognizes the arrangement of the Old Testament Scriptures under the "law of Moses, the prophets and the Psalms," and thus sanctions the Synagogue view which held that Moses was the author of the law. It may be urged that this is only a recognition of the Mosaic system, a system of laws which went under his name, although it was actually the slow growth of centuries, and as a written code of much later date than Moses. But the usage, if it is a mere usage only, shows clearly that the Jews, at the time of our Lord, regarded the law as the divinely inspired writing of Moses. The manner in which our Lord uses the classification seemed to imply that it was correct. He was under no necessity to use it. He gives no hint or intimation that it was not true. And when He adopted it, therefore, He gives it the sanction of His name and authority.

That Moses is a real historical personage in the New Testament, a personal lawgiver, is beyond any reasonable question. It is "Moses who lifted up the serpent in the wilderness;" Moses "gave you not that bread from heaven;" "For the hardness of your heart he" (Moses) "wrote you this precept;" "Did not Moses give you the law, and yet none of you keepeth the law?" Stephen, addressing the Jewish Sanhedrim (Acts vii. 37) says: "This is that Moses which said unto the children of Israel, A prophet shall the Lord your God raise up unto you, of your brethren like unto me; him shall ye hear." It is the personal lawgiver who speaks, and the words spoken are quoted from Deuteronomy, and from one of the passages which are supposed to militate against the Mosaic authorship of this book. "A prophet like unto me." The "me" is the person who wrote the book. To whom is the predicted prophet, who can only be Christ-like? To Moses, who spake with God face to face, or to the Egyptian exile, or the "presumable poet" of the second Jeroboam, or the "great unknown?" The Apostle Peter (Acts iii. 22) speaks to the people at Jerusalem. "Moses truly said unto the fathers, A prophet," etc. It is the personal lawgiver who speaks, as the fathers who were spoken to were persons. The Apostle Paul (Rom. x. 5-8, 19) says: "Moses describeth the righteousness which is of the law," etc.; it is not the righteousness of Moses or which Moses taught, but the righteousness of the law; it is not Moses and faith, but the law and faith. Moses describes the one—Paul the other. And then, speaking of the mode in which the gospel is propagated and received, he adds: "first Moses saith," and then: "But Esaias is very bold and saith." Moses is the personal lawgiver as Esaias is the personal prophet. Throughout the New Testament therefore Moses appears as the personal lawgiver. It is not the Mosaic system—which may have been originated by other persons, and went under his name—but Moses himself, who spoke to the Hebrews, who gave the law. Bearing this in mind as what is intended in all the citations from Moses or references to him, the testimony of the New Testament to the Mosaic authorship of Deuteronomy and the Pentateuch is overwhelming. There are not only numerous direct formal citations (see the partial list in SCHROEDER'S Introduction, pp. 41, 42), but there are allusions, indirect, hidden, and yet impressive, depending partly however for their force upon the use of the Septuagint. The author of the Epistle to the Hebrews quotes directly from Deuteronomy as the work of Moses, "He that despised Moses' law died without mercy under two or three witnesses" (chap. x. 28; also x. 30; xii. 19, 29); but what is of greater moment here, the whole central part of his Epistle, the contrast between the Aaronic priesthood and the priesthood of Christ, is based upon the genuineness of what "Moses spake concerning the priesthood." The history and the institutions are inwoven in his Epistle, so that we cannot separate them. His argument not only implies the Levitical priesthood, but the priesthood and institution as connected with the history and introduced through the mediation of Moses.

* STANLEY LEATHER, Structure of the Old Testament, pp. 176-187.

† Prof. S. C. BARTLETT: SMITH'S Bib. Dict. Art. Pentateuch.

The Apostle John tells us that "the law was given by Moses, but grace and truth came by Jesus Christ." Christ and Moses are set in personal contrast. He not only declares that the Law was by Moses, but asserts it as something which was well known to the people, and therefore true pre-eminently of Deuteronomy. "Did not Moses give you the law?"

It is difficult to believe that inspired apostles fell into a common delusion, or accommodated themselves to it, were either deceived or deceivers; but if we could so believe, what shall be done with the testimony of Christ Himself, the truth and the Teacher of truth? His testimony to Deuteronomy is very remarkable. It is a striking fact that in His conflict with the adversary, in the hours of his temptation, He draws His weapons of defence only from this book. He uses the sword of the Spirit, the word, but the word as found here. He overcomes the tempter by this word. Did He triumph by a fraud? There were other divine words, other sentences which were written—why did He use this? If it was not what it claimed to be, and what it was understood to be, why does He, in this singular and most emphatic way, coming back to it time after time with this significant phrase: "It is written," set His stamp upon it? It is a most unaccountable fact if Moses is not the author of Deuteronomy.*

Turning from the temptation to the ordinary teaching of our Lord, we have the same testimony. The Sadducees came, hoping to entrap Him with their question: "Master, Moses wrote unto us, If a man's brother die," etc., referring to the Levirate law in Deuteronomy; and He answers, not questioning the validity of their references, but correcting their error of interpretation by a quotation from another book in the Pentateuch. To the lawyer, who asked: "Master, which is the great commandment in the law?" He replies, quoting Deuteronomy: "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God," etc. Is it possible to believe that when thus summing up the whole law—for the second command obviously flows from the first—He would base His teaching upon a book which, if it was not from Moses, He must have known to be a fraud?

If we pass from His ordinary teaching to His controversies with the Jews, He still appeals to Moses in that most significant passage: "Do not think that I will accuse you to the Father: there is one that accuseth you, even Moses, in whom ye trust. For had ye believed Moses, ye would have believed me; for he wrote of me. But if ye believe not his writings, how shall ye believe my words?"—a passage which includes a testimony from Christ as to every point in question. For it is a testimony to Moses as a personal law-giver. He accuses: I do not; but Moses does. It is a testimony that he left the law in its written form, in "writings," which were still extant as his among the Jews, which they might have consulted, and out of which they might have learned of Him. The allusion to the prediction of the prophet in Deuteronomy is too clear to admit of question. It is further a testimony peculiarly to the deuteronomic law, since it is the law which comes into the closest relation to the people, by which they were accused, and must be condemned or acquitted before the Father, to which Christ here sets His seal.

* "Hæret lateri lethalis arunde." "It would seem," says Wordsworth, "as if the evil spirit were still smarting from the weapon by which he received the wound from the Son of God at the temptation; and as if he were straining every nerve, in these latter days, to prove the spuriousness of Deuteronomy by means of the self-idolizing arrogance of this so-called 'scientific biblical criticism.'"

He had scarcely risen from the dead and met with His disciples, than "beginning at Moses and all the prophets, He expounded unto them in all the Scriptures the things concerning Himself." But if Moses spoke directly of Christ, it can only be in that great prophetic utterance in Deuteronomy: "The Lord thy God will raise up unto thee a prophet," etc. And what He thus did on the road to Emmaus, He repeats to the gathered disciples as He sat and talked with them, and recalled, as it were, all the past: "These are the words which I spake unto you while I was yet with you, that all things must be fulfilled which were written in the law of Moses, and in the prophets and in the Psalms concerning me."

From the scene of His temptation and conflict, in His ordinary teaching, when surrounded and pressed by the cavilling Jews, from the risen Lord, and just as the opening heavens were to receive Him from our sight, we have one, repeated, unvarying, consistent testimony of Christ that Moses was the author of the law.

It does not meet the case at all to say, that Christ accommodated Himself to the prevalent view of His day, that He was only using popular language, adapting Himself to the prejudices of His hearers, etc. For that involves one of two things, which lie in the face of the whole gospel or involves both. Either that Christ was a mere man, and shared in the prejudices and ignorance of His age; used the language He did because He knew no better; scientific criticism had not yet shed its rays of light, and the darkness lay dense and unbroken—or Christ lent His great name and authority to sanction and perpetuate common errors, and errors which touched the spiritual interests and life of the people. And then what kind of a Redeemer have we left? But there are few who will willingly and consciously go down into these depths, who will either shut their eyes to the clear proofs of Christ's exalted character and intelligence, or to the unquestionable and almost unquestioned fact of His moral honesty and integrity. Those who agree fully with KUNEN and COLENZO may say that Christ was ignorant as those around Him, or at least shared in that ignorance; and it must be confessed that this is a less abysmal depth than the supposition of moral obliquity. In either case, however, the Christ of the gospels has disappeared.

We are shut up to this alternative. Either we must abide by the testimony of Christ, and regard Moses as the author of Deuteronomy, or we may accept the premises and conclusions of these negative critics, and thus part with our Bibles and Christ.

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

Library of Princeton University.

Presented by

ARTHUR WELLMAN BUTLER
CLASS OF 1892

A
COMMENTARY ON THE
HOLY SCRIPTURES:

CRITICAL, DOCTRINAL, AND HOMILETICAL, WITH SPECIAL REFERENCE TO MINISTERS AND STUDENTS.

BY
JOHN PETER LANGE, D. D.
IN CONNECTION WITH A NUMBER OF EMINENT EUROPEAN DIVINES.

TRANSLATED, ENLARGED, AND EDITED

BY PHILIP SCHAFF, D. D.
IN CONNECTION WITH AMERICAN SCHOLARS OF VARIOUS EVANGELICAL DENOMINATIONS.

VOLUME IV. OF THE OLD TESTAMENT: CONTAINING JOSHUA, JUDGES.
AND RUTH.

NEW YORK:
CHARLES SCRIBNER & CO., 654 BROADWAY.
1872.

THE BOOK OF JOSHUA.

BY F. R. FAY,
PASTOR IN CREVELD, PRUSSIA.

TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN, WITH ADDITIONS,

BY
GEORGE R. BLISS, D. D.,
PROFESSOR IN THE UNIVERSITY OF LEWISBURG, LEWISBURG, PENN.

NEW YORK:
CHARLES SCRIBNER & CO., 654 BROADWAY.
1872.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1871, by CHARLES SCRIBNER AND COMPANY,
in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

RIVERSIDE, CAMBRIDGE:
STEREOTYPED AND PRINTED BY
H. O. HOUGHTON AND COMPANY.

PREFACE BY THE GENERAL EDITOR.

---

THE BOOK OF JOSHUA relates the history of the conquest of Canaan under the lead of Joshua, the successor of Moses, the division of the conquered land among the tribes of Israel, and the provision for the settlement of the theocracy in that country. The Book of JUDGES continues the history of the theocracy from the death of Joshua to the time of Eli, under the administration of thirteen Judges, whom God raised up in special emergencies for the restoration of social order and deliverance from foreign oppression. It covers the transition period of about three hundred years from the theocratic republic to the theocratic monarchy. The Book of RUTH is a charming episode of domestic virtue and happiness, in striking contrast with the prevailing character of this period, when might was right, and "every one did that which was right in his own eyes." It teaches the sure reward of filial devotion and trust in God, the proper use of the calamities of life, the overruling providence of God in the private affairs of an humble family as well as in the palaces of princes and the public events of nations. It also shows how God had children outside of Canaan and the Jewish theocracy. The incorporation of Ruth, the Moabitess, into the Church of the Old Testament, may be regarded as an intimation of the future call of the Gentiles to the gospel salvation. The story of Ruth is told with touching simplicity. Göthe (Westöstlicher Dicotan, p. 8) says: "It is the loveliest thing, in the shape of an epic or idyl, which has come to us." Humboldt (Kosmos, ii. 46, Germ. ed.) calls it "a most artless and inexpressibly charming picture of nature."

These three books are here brought together in one volume.

The Commentary on JOSHUA was prepared in German, 1870, by the Rev. F. R. FAY (Dr. Lange's son-in-law), Pastor in Crefeld, Prussia, and in English by the Rev. GEORGE R. BLISS, D. D., Professor in Lewisburg University, Pennsylvania. Dr. Bliss writes: "My own impression concerning the author (Mr. Fay), derived from a close and protracted familiarity with his book, is highly favorable to his learning, his piety, his Christian catholicity and amiableness of spirit." He has made a careful use of the most recent helps even in the English language touching the questions of geography and topography of the holy land, which occupy a very prominent position in a Commentary on Joshua. The Textual and Grammatical Notes are added by the American translator, who has also materially enriched the other departments, in accordance with the general plan of the American edition.

The Commentary on JUDGES and RUTH is by Professor PAULUS CASSEL, of Berlin, and appeared several years earlier (1865). The English edition was prepared by the Rev. P. H. STEENSTRA, Professor in the Protestant Episcopal Divinity School at Cambridge, Mass.

Professor Cassel is a converted Rabbi, one of the best Talmudic scholars of Germany, a man of genius and ardent Christian spirit. His commentary is very original, fresh, suggestive, abounding in historical examples and parallels, but sometimes very fanciful, especially in his philological efforts. Here the translator has very properly expressed his dissent from many of his views. Professor Steenstra has paid special attention to the textual department, and supplemented his author where he takes too much for granted. The grammatical notes on the Book of Ruth are quite full, because it is often read by students of Hebrew in Seminaries, owing to its simplicity and literary merit.

I conclude these introductory remarks with the closing sentences of Professor Cassel's Preface:—

"It will not be considered my greatest fault that, as far as possible, I have avoided polemics, and have contented myself with positive exposition of the meaning as I understood it. I cannot help feeling that in many expositions there is less eagerness to explain the sacred text than to give battle to the views of other writers. The same principle has guided me in the Introduction, which on that account I could confine to brief outlines. A departure from this principle was deemed necessary in only a few passages.

"What shall I say more! Scripture says everywhere Tolle, lege! and such especially is the language of the Book of Judges and of Judgment now before us.

"Verily, the sacred canon here presents us with a book of history and historical art, such as our generation, prolific in writings on history, but nevertheless poor in historical feeling and perception, stands in pressing need of. Sic inveniatur, sic aperietur!"

PHILIP SCHAFF.

BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK, October, 1871.

THE BOOK OF JOSHUA.

INTRODUCTION.

§ 1. Name of the Book. Place in the Canon. Contents and Character in general.

NAMED not from its author but from the distinguished hero whose history it relates, the Book of Joshua stands first in the canonical list of נביאים ראשונים, the prophets priores, of the Old Testament. To these belong also the Book of Judges (שופטים), the two Books of Samuel (שמואל), and the two Books of Kings (מלכים). These writings are collectively so designated, primarily because, according to old Jewish tradition, they were composed by prophets, and in the second place, also, doubtless because they dwell largely, the Books of Samuel and of the Kings in particular, on the deeds of certain prophets. Still, both these reasons together do not of themselves explain the name. The Masoretes, rather, from whom all these designations and titles are derived, certainly had a feeling that the same spirit which swept through the prophets, strictly such, the נביאים אחרונים, and their writings, was traceable in these historical books also; that, accordingly, the history of the people of God had been written in this spirit, not as a profane but a sacred history. The guidance of that people by Jehovah, the God of Israel, as he is called in this book (xxiv. 2, 23), their relation and that of their leaders to their God, their fidelity or unfaithfulness, their conformity to his commandments or transgression of them, their worship of Jehovah or apostasy to idol-worship, are the proper themes of this holy historiography. These books of the first or prior prophets are not merely historical books, but, as De Wette in his Introduction to the O. T. has aptly styled them, theocratico-historical books, pervaded and filled with the same spirit of profound piety, noble moral courage, and holy reverence for the commands of Jehovah, which breathes through the "theocratically-inspired books" of the prophets properly so-called.<sup>1</sup>

This character shows also in the Book of Joshua, which, as on the one hand it introduces the נביאים ראשונים, follows on the other the תורה, the Pentateuch. While in former times, under the supposition that "the law" constituted an absolute literary whole, scarcely any attention was given to the all-pervading relationship between the Book of Joshua and the Pentateuch, modern criticism has the unquestionable merit, both of recognizing this position of our book in the O. T. Canon, and of instituting profound and highly instructive investigations concerning it. These Knobel, in particular, has in part thoroughly explained, and in part independently carried still further, in his Criticism of the Pentateuch and Joshua (Kurzgefasstes exeget. Handbuch zum Alten Testament, xiii. pp. 489-606). The results of the investigations concerning the Pentateuch and the Book of Joshua may be found in shorter compass in Bleek's Introduction to the O. T. [translated into English by Venables, Lond. 1869], §§ 137, 138, where they are summed up as the issue of minute and conscientious researches in §§ 59-136. Indeed, so many and so various are the points of mutual approach between Joshua and the Pentateuch, in respect both to language and to facts, as obviously to raise the suspicion that the two together originally formed one great work, from which our book was, only at a later period, perhaps in the time of Ezra (Bleek, § 140), separated. To set one's self against this discovery because the "neological" or "modern" criticism has first brought it to light, is unworthy of believing Scriptural research.

<sup>1</sup> [We append to this the following interesting remarks of Kell, on the prophetic character of the historical books. "These books thus present no general history of the nation of Israel in its merely political and civil development, but the history of the people of God, that is of Israel, in its theocratic development as the covenant people and bearer of the salvation which from the seed of Abraham was to be revealed, in the fullness of time, to all peoples. Their authors have accordingly selected and delivered through prophetic illumination, out of the rich and various multiplicity of family, tribe and national history furnished by written and oral tradition, only those facts and occurrences, which were of moment toward the history of the kingdom of God. These were, besides the revelations of God in word and deed, and besides his wonderful works and the prophetic attestations of the divine counsel and will, above all, the moments in the life, the action or inaction of the people which had operated to further or obstruct the progress of the divine commonwealth. Whatever did not stand in intimate connection with this higher aim and peculiar calling of Israel is, generally speaking, entirely omitted, or at most only so far touched upon as it served to make clear the position of the entire people or of its leaders and governors toward the Lord and his Kingdom. Hence we readily understand the apparent inequality in the treatment of the history, that here and there long periods are characterised only by some general remarks, while the fortunes and acts of certain persons are portrayed with almost biographical completeness; that the natural causes of the events and the subjective motives which determined the conduct of the historical personages, remain for the most part unnamed, or are only incidentally and briefly intimated. The divine agency and influence therein are meanwhile constantly made prominent and, so far as they were manifested in extraordinary ways, carefully and circumstantially related. . . . The prophetic character, however, by which these historical works are distinguished from the other sacred historical writings of the Israelites, consists in this: that they describe the theocratic history not from the point of view of the individual author, but in its actual course answering to the progressive unfolding of the divine plan, as could be done only by prophets to whom the spirit of the Lord had disclosed the vision of God's economy of salvation." — Bib. Commentar über d. A. T. II. Thell., 1 Bd. p. x. f. — Tr.]

In the closest connection with the last verse of Deuteronomy (xxxiv. 5-12), our book relates first, how Jehovah commanded Joshua to arise and cross over the Jordan to take possession of the land which He had given to the children of Israel; and then declares further how Joshua communicated this order to the leaders of the people, and at the same time required of the two and a half tribes of the Reubenites, Gadites, and half of Manasseh, who had already received of Moses (Deut. xxxii.; Josh. xiii.) their possession on the east side of the Jordan, that they should, according to the conditions fixed by Moses (Deut. xxxii. 20), take part in the coming conquest of the land (ch. i.). Next follows the account of the mission of the spies to Jericho, their reception by Rahab, their danger, deliverance, and flight (ch. ii.). After the return of the messengers the people pass over the Jordan, not without experiencing a proof of the divine assistance in that the passage of the river was accomplished dryshod, although the stream at that season, in the days of harvest, was unusually swollen with the water (chaps. iii., iv.). In the fifth chapter we are informed of the circumcision at Gilgal and of the first passover-festival on the soil of Canaan, with which closes the First Section of the First Part of the book. The preparation for the holy war, of which the author furnishes us a report in that Part, is now finished. And Joshua himself, the leader of the people, has been strengthened and encouraged by a special manifestation from above (ch. v.).

Now begins the narrative of the struggles between Israel and the Canaanites (vi. 1-xi. 23). In a flowing and vivid relation the author depicts, successively, the capture of Jericho, whose walls fall at the sound of the trumpets, the destruction of the city, the rescue of Rahab, the imprecation on the foundation and site (ch. vi.); then Achan's crime, the unfortunate expedition to Ai, Joshua's humble supplication before Jehovah, the discovery and punishment of the criminal (ch. vii.). Upon this follows the truly brilliant description, characterized by the greatest vividness of representation, of the conquest and destruction of Ai (ch. viii. 1-29). After this, however, the course of the hitherto well-ordered narrative of martial exploits, is interrupted by an account (ch. viii. 30-35) of the altar of blessing and curse on Mount Ebal, which appears, as we will show hereafter, to belong properly not to this place but rather after ch. xi. 23. For the conquest of the land is not yet finished; we hear, on the contrary (ch. ix. 1, 2), that five Canaanitish kings unite themselves in a formal league against the triumphantly invading Israelites. The burghers of Gibeon, having heard what Joshua has done to Jericho and Ai, take another course, that of cunning and stratagem, and completely attain their end. Supposing from their old garments, their ruptured wineskins, their tattered shoes, and their musty bread, that they had come from a distant land, Joshua, without inquiring of Jehovah (ch. ix. 14), concludes a treaty with them by which their preservation is assured. The deception is afterwards discovered, but the promise nevertheless maintained, because it had been confirmed (ch. ix. 15) by a solemn oath which the princes of Israel felt themselves bound in conscience to keep. The Gibeonites are not destroyed, but as a punishment for their falsehood they are made wood-choppers and drawers of water for the congregation, and for the altar of Jehovah (ch. ix. 3-27).

But now the wrath of Adoni-zedek and his allies turns against the inhabitants of Gibeon, as apostates from the common cause who must be punished for their treachery (ch. x. 1-5). In this strait the latter appeal to Joshua for help, which is promptly and heartily afforded. Specially cheered by Jehovah he advances, smites the five kings in the great battle of Gibeon, poetically celebrated (ch. x. 12, 13) by an after-age, pursues them with their hosts over the pass of Beth-horon, down to Azekah and Makkedah, hangs them, when the pursuit is over, on five trees, but at sundown causes their corpses to be taken down and cast into the cave at Makkedah, where they had been found concealed. This victory over the five kings was followed by the conquest of the whole southern portion of the land, west of the Jordan, and Joshua now returns to the camp at Gilgal on the Jordan. This seems to have remained the head-quarters of all these operations (ch. x.). Thus the south of the country west of the Jordan — of Canaan proper (see on this designation § 6) — was subjugated. To the same fate must the north also submit. In vain, as before Adoni-zedek gathered the kings of the south, does Jabin king of Hazor now collect about him those of the north in a second compact against Joshua, for continuing the war of defense. Like sand by the sea for multitude, is the host which they bring into the field (ch. xi. 4); but with surprising rapidity they are reached by the able leader of Israel, at the water of Merom, where they are encamped, — reached, surprised, smitten, annihilated. For after this defeat also, Joshua fails not to pursue and to so strike the enemy, that he “left them not one remaining” (ch. xi. 8). Their horses were hamstringed, their chariots burnt with fire.* The history of these events is more meagrely given than that of the capture of Jericho and Ai, and of the slaughter at Gibeon, but not less plainly and vividly (ch. xi. 1–9). After now reporting further (ch. xi. 10–15) how Joshua took the cities of the north, except those which stood upon hills, and slew their kings and people, while he gave their spoil as booty to his army, which had not been allowed at the taking of Jericho (ch. vi. 17; vii. 1 ff), the author closes the chapter with a general review of the conquest of the whole land west of the Jordan. Here he recalls particularly the destruction of the Anakim in the mountain of Judah, as accomplished by Joshua (ch. xi. 16–23). With this closes the Second Section of the First Part, since ch. xii. is to be regarded as a special section. It contains a complete list of the kings subdued under the leadership of Moses and Joshua, on both sides of the Jordan, thirty-one in number. Here the First Part of the book (chaps. i.–xii.) is brought to a conclusion.

The Second Part (chaps. xiii.–xxiv.) describes the division of the conquered territory among the Israelites.

A considerable time, as would appear, has passed since the conquest of the land (xiii. 1). Joshua has become old; there remains also, very much to be occupied, partly in the southwest “where the territory of the Philistine kingdoms was,” and partly in the north, “the country on Lebanon;” yet must Joshua now undertake the distribution of the land (ch. xiii. 1–7) among the nine and a half tribes. The mention made of the one half of the tribe of Manasseh leads the author to look back over the district already allotted to the two and a half tribes east of the Jordan (ch. xiii. 8–33), where the remark is repeatedly brought in that Joshua gave no possession to the tribe of Levi, because the sacrifices of Jehovah, nay, Jehovah himself was their possession (ch. xiii. 14, 33). In the following chapter (ch. xiv.) the writer begins his account of the division of the land (ch. xiv. 1–5). This is not resumed until ch. xv. 1 ff., so that the narrative concerning Caleb’s demand for a possession, which is repeated in another form ch. xv. 13–19 (comp. Judg. i. 12–15), shows itself plainly an intrusive fragment. For clearness of arrangement, we may, with Bunsen, conveniently make these two chapters the First Section of the Second Part, and then group ch. xv.–xxi. as the second.

These seven chapters contain — with the exception of ch. xv. 13–19, xvii. 13–18, xviii. 1–20, xx. 1–6 — very dry, but, for the knowledge of the holy land, extremely valuable, notices, which are often surprisingly accurate. In a few places only, particularly xvi. 5 ff. and xix. 34, is the sense obscure and hard to determine, as will appear in the discussion of those passages. A degree of difficulty characterizes ch. xvi. 1, also, as has been noticed particularly by Hauff (Offenbarungsglaube und Kritik, p. 139 ff.), and especially ch. xvii. 1, where “a mass of explanatory phrases” is found, while the intervening narratives (ch. xv. 13–19, xvii. 14–18) are distinguished by the same beauty of delineation which we have already often met in the first part of the book. How vividly is the transaction between Caleb and his daughter given, how freshly and succinctly that between Joshua and the exacting sons of Joseph, his fellow tribesmen!

The third and last section comprises chaps. xxii.–xxiv. Here the release of the two and a half tribes from beyond the Jordan, who could now be sent home, after the conquest and allotment of the country, is announced, and then reported in detail; and how they raised an altar on the west bank of the Jordan, the building of which excited the ill-humor of the other Israelites. This was allayed, however, when the commission sent out under Phinehas brought back a satisfactory explanation (ch. xxii.). Next follow the farewell discourses of Joshua, the first delivered probably at Shiloh, the second at Shechem (ch. xxiv. 1). Old and full of days (ch. xxiii. 1), feeling that he too must go the way of all the earth, the brave, disinterested, pious follower of Moses, takes leave of his people, admonishes them to fidelity towards Jehovah, warns them against apostasy and idolatry, and finally lays them under the obligation of a solemn renewal of the covenant (ch. xxiv. 25). To commemorate this a monument of stones is erected (ch. xxiv. 26, 27). One hundred and ten years old, the precise age of his ancestor Joseph (Gen. i. 22), Joshua dies and is buried at Timnath-serah, in his own city (ch. xxiv. 29, 30). While he and the elders live, Israel serves Jehovah (ch. xxiv. 31). But Eleazar, also the faithful helper of Joshua, the son of Aaron, the high-priest of Israel, dies and is buried at Gibeah-phinehas, in the city of his son, who as being distinguished by a holy zeal for the true worship of God, was exceptionally provided with a possession of his own (ch. xxiv. 33). A notice concerning the bones of Joseph is inserted between these reports of the decease of Joshua and Eleazar.

If now we look back and bring up to ourselves once more the total impression which the Book of Joshua makes, it may be said with reason that the account of the historical events is given on the whole, in a well-ordered succession, and the connection but seldom broken; and further, that the notices concerning the division of the land are characterized in general by remarkable clearness and accuracy. This is especially evident when one compares the corresponding section of Josephus (Ant. v. 1, 22). At the same time it need not be overlooked that, as manifest interpolations attest (ch. viii. 30-35, x. 12-15, xiv. 6-15, xv. 13-19, xvii. 13-18), we have before us here, as little as in the Pentateuch, an original work emanating from one author; but rather a literary product, which, although finally revised with a view to unity of representation, bears plainly on its face the marks of its origin. The book itself cites (ch. x. 18) one of its documentary sources; and if one why may not a number of them have existed, although they are not directly quoted?

OBSERVATION. The Samaritan Book of Joshua, called also, Chronicon Samaritanum, of which an Arabic translation in Samaritan characters exists in the Leyden Library (printed under the title: Chronicon Samaritanum, Ed. Joh. Juynboll, Lugd. Bat. 1848), is pronounced by De Wette, Hengstenberg, and Ewald, all agreeing on this point, a revision of our Book of Joshua, with an addition of Samaritan fables, and dating from late in the Middle Ages. See De Wette, Introd. to the O. T. § 171. Hengstenberg, Authenticity of the Pentateuch, i. 5. Ewald, Geschichte d. Volks Israel, ii. p. 349, 350; iv. p. 247, 249. ["A splendid legend" from this work is communicated by Stanley, Hist. of Jew. Ch. i. p. 245. f. — Tr.].

§ 2. Origin.

I. Memorandum of Views held by leading Authorities.

According to the Talmud (Tr. Baba bathra, fol. 14, 2, "Joshua scripsit librum suum et octo versus in lege"), Joshua was the author of the book which bears his name, Eleazar, the son of Aaron, the high-priest, then added the conclusion (ch. xxiv. 29-32), but the last verse of all (ch. xxiv. 33) was appended by Phinehas (Baba bathra, 15 a, 15 b; in Fürst, Kanon des Alten Testaments nach den Uebersetzungen in Talmud und Midrasch, Leipzig, 1868, p. 10). Various older theologians, among them Starke, appealing to ch. xxiv. 26, shared this view. "If," says Starke, "he himself wrote the covenant made with the people, why not also the preliminary, and in part very important and necessary, records?" The same argument is employed also by L. König (Alltest. Studien, i. Heft: Authentic des Buches Josua, 1836, p. 127), as well as Baumgarten (Herzog's Real-Encyclop. vii. 40, 42), to sustain Joshua's authorship; against which Kell (Commentary on the Book of Joshua, p. xl. [Martin's Transl. p. 39]), remarks how precisely the fact that the writing in the law-book is limited to the renewal of the covenant at Shechem proves that the remaining contents of the Book of Joshua were not recorded there. Hävernick (Einleitung in d. A. T. ii. 1, pp. 26, 62), resting on the Kethib in ch. v. 1, 6 (עֲבָרְתָּ), combined with the notice in ch. xxiv. 26, ascribes the entire first part and the two last chapters to Joshua, while he refers chs. xiii.-xxii., after the example of Bertholdt (p. 857), to the chorographical descriptions spoken of in ch. xviii. 1-10. Gerlach (Bibelwerk, ii. p. vi.) supposes it probable that, after the example of Moses, Joshua himself or one of his immediate attendants, under his direction, wrote down the history of the conquest, and thereupon of the division of the land, so important in its future bearings, and exhibiting traces of very high antiquity. These he thinks were composed in separate sections which then some editor finished out with the account of the renewed covenant. Keil (ut sup. p. xli. [Eng. Transl. p. 46]; Biblisches Com. über d. A. T., ii. 1, pp. 5, 6) denies the authorship of Joshua altogether, not so much on account of the oft-recurring phrase (previously urged by Spinoza and others), וַיְהִי כִּי (chaps. iv. 9; v. 9; vi. 25; vii. 26 (bis); viii. 28, 29; ix. 27; xiii. 13; xiv. 14; xv. 63; xvi. 10), as because the book gives account of occurrences belonging to the period after Joshua's death. That phrase he thinks by no means supposes the lapse of centuries, but is employed rather, according to its quite relative signification, of things only a few years past, although he fails to furnish any proof of this.<sup>1</sup> Of the class of later occurrences he reckons, above all, the narrative of the capture of Hebron by Caleb, of Debir by Othniel (ch. xv. 13-19), and of Leshem by the Danites (ch. xix. 47), as well as the statement in ch. xv. 63 resting on Judges i. 8. But since these wars and conquests might have occurred not long after Joshua's death; since moreover the book contains definite proofs that it was composed not after but probably before the establishment of monarchy in Israel (ch. xvi. 10: the Canaanites in Gezer, comp. 1 K. ix. 16; the Jebusites yet in Jerusalem, ch. xv. 63, comp. 2 Sam. v. 3, 6-9; a place for the temple not yet determined, ix. 27, comp. 2 Sam. xxiv. 18 ff.; 1 Chron. xxi. 26 ff.; the Gibeonites still wood-choppers and water-carriers, ix. 27, comp. 2 Sam. xxi. 1 ff.); since, finally, the book nowhere shows traces either in its style or contents, of later times and relations, but in language as well as in views of things connects itself closely with the Pentateuch (of which ch. xiii. 4-6; xi. 8; xix. 28, are cited as examples<sup>2</sup>), it becomes highly probable that it was composed not more than twenty-five or thirty years after the death of Joshua, perhaps by one of the elders who had crossed the Jordan with Joshua, taken part in the conquest of Canaan (ch. v. 1, 6), and lived some time after Joshua (ch. xxiv. 31; Judg. ii. 7). Com. on Joshua, p. xlvii., [47]; Bib. Com. ii. 1, p. 7.

So Keil, who, as is obvious, has given up the old, traditional view of the authorship of Joshua, while yet he maintains the unity of the book and its high antiquity. This latter point was disputed already by Andreas Masius, by Spinoza and Clericus, who placed the composition of the book in the time after the exile, in which they have been followed by Hasse, Maurer, and De Wette. And in proportion as the Pentateuch, since the middle of the preceding century, has been subjected to sharper scrutiny touching its unity, our book has shared the same treatment. The different hypotheses of modern criticism enumerated by Lange (Com. on Holy Script. Introd. to Genesis, §§ 3, 7), the Documentary as well as the Fragmentary, the Supplementary, as well as the peculiar theory of Ewald, called by Delitzsch the Crystallization hypothesis, to which quite recently Fürst inclines (Gesch. d. Bib. Lit., u. des Jüdisch-hellenist. Schriftthum, i. pp. 362, 404 ff., 442 ff.; to be compared with Diestel's Review, in the Jahrbüchern für Deutschen Theologie, xiv. 2, pp. 338-342), have all been attempted with reference to the book of Joshua as well as to the Pentateuch. Not unsuccessfully the Supplementary hypothesis, in reference to Joshua in particular, has found defenders in Bleek, Knobel, and very recently in Nöldeke.

According to Bleek (Introd. to the O. T. § 137) there were for a considerable time writings extant concerning the events of the period between the death of Moses and that of Joshua, as in particular concerning the division of the land among the several tribes; precisely as in the time of Moses himself, and in part from his own hand, there were written laws, songs, census-rolls, and the catalogue of the nations. But a connected history of the fortunes of the people, either in the Mosaic period or in that of Joshua, had not then been composed. Both were produced simultaneously at a later time, and in all probability, in the age of Saul, at which time the work of the so-called Elohist arose. This work treated only of the main epochs in the history, those of special importance to a knowledge of the relation between God and man, and of God's providences. Such were the creation, the deluge, the choice of Abraham and God's covenant with him, the history of Jacob and Joseph, then that of Moses and Joshua, while the intervening periods were only summarily touched upon, in short genealogical lists which served to join together two Epochs and the representative personages belonging to them.

<sup>1</sup> [Keil does adduce (Bib. Com. p. 5), as an instance of this, the statement (ch. vi. 25) that Rahab is living in Israel "unto this day." — Tr.]

<sup>2</sup> [In these passages respectively, "the Sidonians alone are called Phœnicians, and these are reckoned among the Canaanites to be extirpated by Israel (ch. xiii. 4-6), altogether differently from the view of David's time (2 Sam. v. 11; 1 K. ch. v. 1 Chr. xiv. 1); moreover, Sidon by the epithet "the great" is designated as the capital of Phœnicia (xi. 8, xix. 28); while as early as David's day Tyre had taken the lead of Sidon." — Keil, Bib. Com., p. 7. — Tr.]

The greater part of our Book of Joshua was contained in this oldest history. Probably in the age of David, and not in the very last part of his reign, this work was enlarged and rewrought by a later hand. The older writing remains the foundation; but it was in part increased by many new additions, which the writer either found already extant like the former, or himself first wrote down from previous oral traditions; and in part the earlier written relations were modified by additions and changes, by abbreviations also and omissions where this Jehovist availed himself of a different source of information concerning the same circumstances and events. It differed from the previous work conspicuously in this, that the author names God Jehovah, from the very beginning, whereas the Elohists had refrained from that designation before the time of Moses. By this revision the earlier work gained some not unessential additions, but lost not a little in literary unity. It embraced (a) the first four books of the Pentateuch, essentially of the entire compass in which we have them, but with trifling exceptions, particularly Lev. xxvi. 3-45; (b) the report of the death of Moses (Deut. xxxiv. 1-8), taken from the Elohistic writing; (c) our Book of Joshua in the form in which the author of Deuteronomy found it. For the last revision of the work was effected by the author of Deuteronomy, at whose hand the whole received the form and compass in which it lies before us in our Pentateuch and Book of Joshua. The author of this revision probably took the above work (that of the Jehovist) entire, as he found it, allowing himself only here and there particular changes and additions, especially in the history of the time of Joshua. The principal alteration however, consisted in the expansion of the writing by the reception of Deuteronomy itself (chaps. i.-xxxiii. It is possible that he had other written authorities besides the Book of the Jehovist, but nothing definite can be made out on this point. As the date of the composition of Deuteronomy and the last revision of the whole work, the reign of Manasseh, King of Judah, in the first half of the seventh century before Christ, may most probably be assumed, and at all events a time not later than the eighteenth year of Josiah (624 B. C.). Comp. 2 K. xxiii. 21, w. Deut. xvi.

According to Knobel (Kritik des Pentateuch und Josua, p. 496 ff.), there lies at the bottom of the Pentateuch and Joshua, an old work (Elohim document, Elohist, Ground-text), which relates the history from the creation to the division of the land of Canaan, which is distinguished by definiteness of plan and by consecutiveness, and may be easily followed from Gen. i. to Joshua xxii. The composition of this work falls in the time of Saul (p. 523). The author was beyond question an Aaronide or priest. This we learn from the deep interest which he takes in sacred persons and usages, and his accurate acquaintance with those matters, the tabernacle, for instance, and its furniture, which a layman would not have known so well about. He lived therefore in the southern part of the country, where the Aaronides had their residence (p. 523). From this ground-text (as Knobel almost everywhere calls it) the other parts of the Pentateuch deviate widely in matter and style, the proof of which is given with great care and to the minutest detail (pp. 524-532), but they altogether lack unity. There are indeed non-Elohistic sections, as in our book chaps. ii-iv. which, overlooking minor points, have been plainly made up of two different elements. The same two elements may then each for itself be further clearly recognized in particular sections, the one e. g. in Josh. ch. xxiv., the other in chaps. vi.-xii. They appear again blended with Elohistic sections, either one or the other or both together, as in Josh. xv., xvii., xviii. The old ground-text has therefore received additions from two other documents. These two documents are mentioned by name Num. xxi. 14; Josh. x. 13. The one is the Law-book, the other the War-book. According to its name סֵפֶר הַיְשָׁר, book of the right, i. e. right-book, law-book, to be interpreted after יהוה עֹשֶׂה הַיְשָׁר כְּעֵינֵי, "to do what is right in Jehovah's eyes," i. e. to follow the divine law, — a phrase common in the historical books to designate conformity with the law, 1 K. xi. 33, 38; xiv. 8; xv. 5, 11, etc. (?), the former contained laws, according to Josh. x. historical reports also, and according to 2 Sam. i. 18, poems, which all suits with the first document of the Jehovist.

In this book, however, which originated in the Northern kingdom (p. 544), in the Assyrian period (p. 546), there was an older סֵפֶר הַיְשָׁר inwrought which is designated, Joshua xxiv. 26, סֵפֶר הַזִּכְרוֹן אֱלֹהִים. This older Sepher Jaschar contained already most of the laws of the law-book employed by the Jehovist, especially the Mosaic Decalogue (Ex. xx.), probably also the blessing of Moses (Deut. xxxiii.), of the time of Saul, David's lament over Saul (2 Sam. i.) and the hymn of triumph (Ex. xv.), which dates only from the time of Solomon. Lower than Solomon we need not bring it. In Jeroboam's time it seems to have been already known (p. 547). Where this older law-book was composed Knobel does not say: probably also in the northern kingdom.

The second document of the Jehovist, the War-book (ס' מלחמות יי, Num. xxi. 14, "book of the wars of Jehovah," i. e. the wars of Israel with the heathen, p. 559), contained a great number of warlike narratives, more in fact than all the others together (p. 559), and appears to have originated in the southern country (p. 560), as it agrees very nearly in matter and style with the ground-text, and in the time of Jehoshaphat († 889). The author, from his interest in religious legislation, was probably a Levite (p. 560).

The Jehovist's course of procedure now was the following. He laid his foundation in the Elohim-text, which is, accordingly, preserved tolerably complete; then took his supplementary matter chiefly from his two documents, more out of the law-book, less out of the war-book, since the former offered more that was peculiar, the latter only that, in many places, which lay already in the ground text. To all the three documents he adheres, as far as possible, word for word, whether he extracts from them great or small. The texts have for him a certain inviolability, and he is guided in this by the consciousness that he has before him and is editing venerable works of Mosaic authority. He is concerned to harmonize the various reports, and effects this often in a truly ingenious manner; witness Gen. xxi. 25 ff., xxvi. 19 ff. comp. w. xxvi. 15, 18; Gen. xxxv. 3, 7, xxxv. 4 ff., 14 ff.; xxxiii. 1-8 comp. w. xxxii. 21; xxxiii. 13, etc. In many cases, however, he saw the irreconcilableness of his authorities and proceeded mechanically to combine the different and contradictory materials, leaving it for the reader himself to bring them into connection and harmony. His primary endeavor was to preserve the contents of the older writer, when they appeared to him important, and, as far as possible, just as he found them. Hence even what was divergent also might, as being something independent, seem to him worthy of preservation; in proof of which Knobel adduces Josh. viii. 12, 13. The mechanical nature of his process appears from the retention of remarks which in the originals stood quite correctly, but in the combination of sources should have been omitted, as in Josh. x. 15. Frequently, however, in his supplementary additions, he allowed himself considerable freedom, transposing particulars, retrenching incompatible designations of time, but especially interweaving little additions into the reports of his predecessors, where they appeared to him appropriate, and especially where necessary to harmonize differences. The introduction of a historical sentence into the discourse of God, Josh. xiii. 1, likewise exhibits this freedom. On the whole, the author shows great tact, since he often applies with real aptness his additions to the statements of his predecessors (e. g. Gen. xii., xiii., xvi., xxxii., xxxix.). On the other hand, the signs of the compulsory process are indeed plain and numerous enough (pp. 573-578). He cannot have lived before the Assyrian period, because he has the law-book and war-book before him (p. 570). Since, moreover, the law-book, especially, comes down (p. 546) to Hezekiah, the last years of this king are about the earliest date to which the Jehovist can be assigned. He probably sprang from the kingdom of Israel. For he has a fondness for the law-book, and cleaves very closely to that in the contents and mode of expression; is not offended by the plurality of sacred places; gives the account (Gen. xxxii. 24 ff.) of God's wrestling with Jacob, which no one else but Hosea (xii. 4 f.) mentions; and finally he uses many expressions which occur elsewhere only in writings of the northern kingdom, and separately in those of later date, e. g. the שׁפּרַף Gen. vi. 3<sup>1</sup>; מִלְחָמָה, "to wrestle," Gen. xxxii. 29 [Eng. 28] as also in Hosea xii. 4; בְּרִירָה, "thistle," Gen. iii. 18, as also in Hos. x. 8; הֵרָוֶן "pregnancy," as also Hos. ix. 11, etc. (p. 579). As modified now by this Jehovist the Elohistico-Jehovistic Work is preserved from Gen. i. to Num. xxxvi. (p. 497).

Into that work still another writer (pp. 589, 590), the Deuteronist, has at a later period inserted his discourses, repetitions, and laws, and among them wrought in a number of explanations, also several accounts of events which the Jehovist had taken from the law-book and appended to Num. xxxvi. He did not meddle with the first four books, but rewrought that merely which followed Num. xxxvi. by giving to it its present great expansion, and furnishing it besides with special additions. He is the last elaborator of the law. His statement Deut. xxxi. 9, belongs to the imprudent expressions which we often meet with in him [!]

His hand, however, is to be traced after Deut. xxxiv. also, in places, as far as to Josh. xxiv., but not at all, on the contrary, in the later books of Judges, Ruth, and Samuel (pp. 487, 579). His language affords the chief proof of the age to which he belonged (p. 591). It is closely related to that of Jeremiah, and other late writers; for which evidence is adduced (p. 591). But we have no sufficient reasons for bringing the author down into the age following the exile. At that time certainly they no longer allowed themselves to deal so freely with the law-book, and increase it with new laws, as this author does. He must have lived in the last days of the kingdom of Judah, perhaps under Josiah, and appears to have been a man of importance, or he would not have made so bold as to take considerable liberties with the book of the law (p. 591).

1 [But comp. Lange, Gen. in loc. (cont. Taylor Lewis); Conant, Heb. Christ. p. 43. — Ta.]

At the close of Knobel's critique upon the Pentateuch and Joshua he has given in tabular form a synopsis, in accordance with the foregoing view, of the several ingredients of the Pentateuch and Joshua (pp. 600-606), which we here append, for the better comprehension of his theory:—

Ground-text.	Law-book.	War-book.	Jehovist.	Deuteronomist.
iv. 15-17, 19. v. 10-12.	ii. 1, 7-17. iv. 1a, 4-7, 14, 18, 20-24. v. 1-9, 13-15.	i. 1, 2, 10-16. iii. 2-8. iv. 1 b-8, 8-18. vi. 1-17 a, 18-21, 24, 26, 27. vii. except ver. 26 in pt. viii. 1-11, 14-29. ix. exc. ver. 27 in pt. x. 1-11, 16-43.	vi. 17 b, 22, 28, 26.	i. 8-9, 17, 18.
xiii. 15-33. xiv. 1-5. xv. 1-13, 20-44, 48-63. xvi. 1-9. xvii. 1-10. xviii. 1, 2, 11-28. xix. exc. ver. 47. xx. 1, 2, 8 in part, 4, 5a, 6 in part 7-9. xxi. 1-40. xxii. 9-11, 13-15, 21, 30-33 a.	viii. 12, 13, 30, 31 in pt. 33 in pt., 34 in pt., 35. x. 12-15, exc. ver. 13 in part. xiv. 6-15. xv. 14-19. xvii. 14-18. xxii. 7, 8. xxiv. exc. ver. 1, in part.	xi. xii. xiii. 2-5, 6 in pt. 9-14. xv. 45-47, 63. xvi. 10. xvii. 11-13. xviii. 9-10. xix. 47. xxi. 41-43. xxii. 1-4, 6, 12, 16-20, 22-23, 33 b, 34. xxiii. 1 a, 2 in pt. 3, 9, 10, 12-15.	x. 13 in part. xii. 1, 7, 8. xxiii. 1 b. 2 b.	vii. 25 in part. viii. 31 in pt., 32, 33 34 in part. ix. 27 in part. xiii. 6 in part. xx. 8 in pt., 5 b, 6 in part. xxii. 5. xxiii. 2 in pt. 4-8 11, xxiv. 1 in part. [16.]

Nöldeke (Alttest. Literatur, p. 25 ff.) pronounces the separation of two chief sources in Genesis and the following books, among which he also includes the Book of Joshua, as the first result of critical investigation. One of these sources is a single and homogeneous writing (p. 26), showing throughout the same systematic proportion, and regularity (!) as the first chapter of Genesis. It gives for the most part only short, outline statements, with little of pictorial filling up, but shows a certain heaviness and verbosity of style, and a special fondness for reciting names and for numbers. Very recently, in his Researches toward the Criticism of the O. T. (Untersuchungen zur Kritik d. A. T., Kiel, 1869), Nöldeke has still more closely examined this ground-text and, like Knobel, traced it also in the Book of Joshua. The other source is not so homogeneous. In it again two main writings are distinguishable (O. T. Lit. p. 26), one of which is the work of the second Elohist, first clearly brought to view, throughout Genesis at least, by Hupfeld, while the other has the Jehovist for its author (O. T. Lit. p. 26, Researches, p. 3). This Jehovist, the most talented of all the writers of the Pentateuch (Res. p. 3), has used the work of the second Elohist as a main authority, and taken from it large portions in so independent a way that what is due to the Jehovist himself is not always clearly to be separated (as Hupfeld and also Knobel assume) from what he has borrowed of the Elohist (Res. p. 3). A redactor, different in Nöldeke's view from the Jehovist (Res. p. 3), combined now this work of the Jehovist with the ground-text. But the Deuteronomist, who is to be distinguished again from the Jehovist, thrust into the work of the redactor almost the whole of the present book of Deuteronomy, and completely reworked the portions relating to Joshua (Res. p. 5, O. T. Lit., 27, 30). The time of writing, Nöldeke defines in the works quoted (O. T. Lit. p. 31 ff., Researches p. 138 ff.), so as to place Deuteronomy in the reign of Josiah, the redactor about the year 800 or soon after, the ground-text, — whose author was a priest at Jerusalem, — in the 10th or rather the 9th century before Christ. About this last period also originated, he thinks, the older materials of the Pentateuch generally (O. T. Lit. p. 32, Res. p. 140). Among these older materials Nöldeke counts the two ground-texts which were combined in the work of the Jehovist. But there are besides in the Pentateuch still older sources, which also must be borne in mind, because all these writings refer to them and occasionally make use of their words (O. T. Lit. p. 32). Thus we have some fragments of ancient songs, for one of which "the book of the wars of Jehovah" is cited as a source (Num. xxi. 14). In Josh. x. 13 likewise "the book of the upright" is quoted, in which, according to 2 Sam. i. 18, stood a song of David, which<sup>1</sup> therefore could not have been written, at the earliest, before the time of this monarch.

The traces of the ground-text have been followed by Nöldeke, in his investigations, both in the Pentateuch and in the Book of Joshua, with much acuteness. In our book their discovery is, in his view, rendered specially difficult by the subsequent modifications effected by the Deuteronomist (Researches, pp. 94, 95). He finds that text in the following passages: ch. iii. 1, iv. 19, v. 10-12, vi. 20, 24 (?), ix. 15 b, 17-22, 27, x. 28-43 essentially; ch. 11 (only accordances with the ground-text); ch. xii. originally belonging to it but interpolated; xiii. 15-xxi. 40, substantially throughout; ch. xxii. (has a report from the ground-text for its basis); xxiv. 33. (Researches, pp. 94-106, where the details which we cannot here repeat may be found.)

II. Estimate of these Views.

Our former assertion that the supplement-hypothesis had not unsuccessfully tested itself on the Pentateuch and Book of Joshua, is sufficiently sustained by this representation of the researches of the critics we have named. For they agree among themselves and with still others, as e. g. Hupfeld, (1) in the assumption of a common ground writing (Elohim-text) for the Pentateuch and Joshua, whose date is fixed in the earliest period of the Hebrew monarchy, the author of which is designated as a priest, dwelling in the southern part of Palestine; (2) in the further assumption that the last redaction of the Pentateuch and Joshua took place in the time of Josiah, or, at the earliest, under Manasseh (Bleek), by the hand of the Deuteronomist, who at the same time incorporated into it his own work (Deut. i.-xxxiii.), itself also resting in part on old reports, and that he worked over the Book of Joshua more than either of the others, which he left comparatively untouched; (3) in the assumption in general of a great Jehovistic element, on the composition of which, however, in particulars, their opinions differ. Bleek is the most cautious, avoiding definite discriminations and rejections. Knobel and Nöldeke, after the example of Hupfeld, and in part that of Ewald, are bolder, and suppose they recognize within this Jehovistic composition the two main writings, which Knobel (very unfortunately imitating Ewald's passion for giving names to the particular documents) designates as Law-book and War-book. We may freely allow that, as the first part of Joshua at once shows, such different portions of the great Jehovistic element may be pointed out; but that the סֵפֶר הַיְשׁוּעַ cited Josh. x. 13, 1 Sam. i. 18, was one of the authorities of the Jehovist, and the "סֵפֶר מִלְחָמֹתָיו", Num. xxi. 14, was the other, is certainly a mistake. The two books are to be regarded rather, with De Wette, Bleek, Fürst, Nöldeke, Hitzig (Geschichte des Volkes Israel, p. 102), [Keil,] and many others, as lyrical books, and יְשׁוּעַ like the plural form יְשׁוּעִים (Num. xxiii. 10, Ps. cxi. 1), as a poetical designation of Israel, properly "the pious congregation," and so precisely like the poetical יִשְׂרָאֵל which comes from a ground-form יִשְׂרָאֵל = יִשְׂרָאֵל: comp. הָטָן and הָטָן. (See Fürst, Geschichte der Bibl. Literat. p. 457, Anmerk. 3.) They were ancient sources to which Nöldeke, among many others, quite distinctly points, poetical sources, and neither law nor war books. Although Knobel, therefore, may be perhaps essentially right in distinguishing two chief writings or documents of the Jehovist, the designation which he gives them, and the resulting identification of them with the poetical productions mentioned, we must oppose. And so far as we know, he has in this found no followers hitherto. How these two chief writings were related to each other, whether each existed independently by the side of the other (Hupfeld, Knobel), or whether the Jehovist, as Nöldeke supposes, directly compounded his work and that of the second Elohist (the law-book of Knobel); whether this Jehovist was the same as the redactor (Bleek, Knobel), or the redactor was different from the Jehovist (Nöldeke), those are mere questions which yet await a conclusive answer, and will perhaps never find one completely satisfactory.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> [I. e. the song could not; of the book it would only be true that it could not have been finished earlier. — Tr.]

<sup>2</sup> [To most English-speaking Christians the freedom with which these critics, especially Knobel, discuss the sacred books will give pain as being irreverent and apparently incompatible with sincere Christianity. Such Christians generally hold that the Church of Christ does rest "on the authenticity of the New Testament Books," and they on the O. T. theocracy, and that on the Books of the Old Testament (see Lange's Commentary on Genesis in this Bible-work, p. 99, Oba.). And there is evidently danger that the too extensive analysis, composition, and recomposition of these books should impair confidence in their divine authority. Yet Knobel's labors on the Pentateuch and Joshua have been not only of prodigious toil, but in various respects of great value. The same is true in their several proportions

As for our own view, we cannot, especially after the example of Bleek, avoid giving in our adherence to the supplement-hypothesis. Yet it seems to us too rash, to undertake as Knobel does, to point out even to minutiae, now this and now that author's hand. Noldeke's procedure is already much more cautious, most moderate that of Bleek, who contents himself with intimations. Neither do we venture more, when we express the opinion that in the first part of the Book of Joshua, as also again in the last three chapters, the Jehovistic character prevails; that within this Jehovistic portion different elements may be distinguished, as was already indicated in § 1, and as the exegesis will show in the particular cases; that in the second part, on the contrary, as specially in the description of the division of the land, the ground-text prevails, itself resting again on other records, perhaps even of Joshua's time; that finally, and particularly in ch. i. and xxiii., perhaps also elsewhere (ch. vii. 25, viii. 31, etc.), the hand of the Deuteronomist is plainly to be recognized. That this Deuteronomist was author of Deut. i.—xxxiii., appears to us to be a fact which cannot longer be successfully denied. It may doubtless be questioned, however, whether admonitions, warnings, and particularly also prophecies of Moses did not survive in oral traditions, or in separate records, which in the time of Manasseh and Josiah, were revised and edited, as we might say, in a free, very beautiful, and edifying manner, and that too without any, the slightest pious fraud, but in good faith, and the fullest persuasion of the perfect justifiableness of such a literary attempt. In reference to Moses himself, we hold firmly with Bleek against Knobel (Kritik, p. 592), that written records from his hand are very probably to be recognized. We maintain the same in regard to Joshua, and cannot therefore allow that ch. xxiv. 26 is a fiction.<sup>1</sup>

§ 3. Credibility.

The history of the conquest of the land of Canaan, as related in our book, has given great offense to the heathen opponents of Judaism and Christianity, at first, to the Manichæans, afterwards, and, in more recent times, to the English deists, and the rationalists of Germany; see the proofs in Lillienthal: Die gute Sache der göttlichen Offenbarung, Th. iv. p. 891 ff. Eichhorn, among many others, in his Introduction, p. 403 (in Keil's Commentary on Joshua, p. liii. [Eng. Trans. p. 52]) speaks very strongly, exclaiming with high moral indignation: "How impious is the narrative of the Book of Joshua! It makes God not only give away to the Israelites, against all right, the land of Canaan, which the Canaanites as the first occupants most justly held, but also sketch out a horrid plan for its conquest, and directly order the most dreadful bloodshed and the total extinction of the Canaanites. Who can reconcile this with even a partially correct view of the Godhead?" Eichhorn objected not only to this procedure against the Canaanites, as recorded in our book, but particularly also to the of the other men to whom we refer; and in estimating their religious character we are doubtless bound to consider carefully what Lange, in the passage just referred to, has intimated concerning the distinction between Revelation and the written record of it as the ground of the Kingdom of God. Charity will often be constrained to hope that the distinction is soundly drawn.

But apart from this, and conceding that scientific research is equally allowable touching the Word and the works of God, the fancifulness and "subjectivity" of such elaborate and minute specifications as some of those above summarized, and the tenacity of many of the reasons assigned, provoke laughter rather than argumentative confutation. That one should gravely split a verse in numerous passages so as to refer the various fragments to their respective authors, and should be obliged to do it to save his theory, is, to most minds, slaughtering the theory at its birth. Our curiosity is naturally raised by such attempts to imagine what the next speculator in Biblical criticism will propose for our wonderment; nay, we inquire what even the same mind, after having dropped for a time and forgotten the particulars of his previous fabrication, would invent, if he were to take up the whole subject anew. We believe Knobel has never been outdone in ingenuity of fiction in this province of literature, except by Ewald, whose theory (briefly outlined in Smith's Dictionary of the Bible, vol. iii. p. 2411, Am. ed.) must probably yet bear the palm. It would seem that the climax is admitted to have been reached, and subsequent writers, of whatever theological school, — even Noldeke, — while maintaining generally the composite character of these books, are much more modest in attempting to partition the authorship. — [Ta.]

1 [The reader interested in the question concerning the origin of our book (connecting itself so closely with that of the Pentateuch) will do well to consult again the 'General Introduction to the O. T.' by Lange in vol. i. of his Commentary on the O. T. and Prof. Lewis' 'Special Introduction to the Book of Genesis' there. Add Dr. Conant's brief but comprehensive Introduction to the Book of Genesis in his revised version, the articles on Genesis, Pentateuch, Joshua, in Smith's Dictionary of the Bible, with particular reference to the additions of the American edition. The translator would only say further that in his judgment there seems to be no good ground for the reluctance with which many of even the most reverent of recent German scholars admit the possibility that Moses and Joshua should have written considerable parts of the works that bear their names. In the darkness which covers the details of the subject it is a priori probable that those leaders should have written, or caused to be written, very much of such history and such statutes as their reputed books contain. And certainly no other names present themselves, during the period within which all agree that the main body of this literature must have been composed, as nearly so likely to have effected the authorship. If this be conceded the modifications and additions of subsequent redactions need have been much less thorough and transforming than is generally supposed. See Milman's interesting Note, Hist. of Jews, I. 160. — [Ta.]

miracles, whose reality he, like Paulus, disputed, and which he then attempted to explain in the well-known ways. The substance of the book, it is true, he thought could not have been fabricated; the events were stamped with the unmistakable seal of antiquity (iii. 399 ff. in Hävernick, Eindl. in d. A. T. ii. 1, p. 3), but we must carefully distinguish between the view of the author which is conceived as narrowly as possible, and the history contained in the book. De Wette went still further when he declared that, "as in the Pentateuch, the narrative is, in its prevailing character, mythical" (Introd. to O. T. § 166). Afterward he added, following Maurer, "but there are also individual instances of real history, as ch. i. 11, comp. v. 12; iii. 4, comp. v. 15 ff." (Introd. to O. T. p. 214, 4 [Germ.] ed.).

Applying a sharper criticism, yet from a position of belief in revelation, G. A. Hauff has discussed the question of credibility, or historical truth, in the Treatise: "Offenbarungsglaube und Kritik der biblischen Geschichtsbücher am Beispiele des Buches Josua in ihrer nothwendigen Einheit dargethan (Belief in Revelation and Criticism of the Historical Books of the Bible exhibited in their necessary Unity, in the Case of the Book of Joshua), Stuttgart, 1843." Having in the first part of his work sharply defined the process of Biblical criticism, as such that the style and mode of representation, the person of the writer, the use of authorities, the time of the composition, plan, and design, and especially also the credibility of the historian must lie open to free investigation, in which however the religious element of this history is to be constantly kept in mind (p. 65 ff.), he proceeds to apply these principles to the Book of Joshua, and finds memorable contradictions in its statements: (a) to the statements of other books; (b) among themselves. The former class relate to the unity of the people, the conquest and division of the land, the religious institutions, the religious character of the people, the mode of divine worship; the latter principally to the conquest of the land, the conquering personages, the division of the land, the genius and character of Joshua and of the people, the divine worship. While, for instance, as Hauff proceeds, p. 70 ff., the Book of Joshua reports to us that the whole people, without exception, stood under the command of Joshua (ch. i. 2; iii. 1), that the whole land, excepting the coast-strip and Geshur on Hermon (xiii. 1-3), was captured by Joshua, and distributed, this account of the leadership of Joshua over the whole people cannot easily be reconciled with the question raised in the very first verse of the Book of Judges (p. 76). The situation in which they there stand indicates that the whole land has by no means yet been taken; and, in reference to the division of the whole land, the notice in Judg. xviii. 1 squarely contradicts the data of our book. Now as regards this notice compared with Josh. xix. 40-46, the explanation will be found in the commentary on that passage; but in reference to the other two supposed contradictions between Judges and Joshua, we think that question, who should lead the war against the Canaanites, after the death of an all-controlling personage, like Joshua, is easily explainable, the more so, as he had died without designating a successor in the office, as Moses had once done. It not only proves nothing against his single leadership, but shows on the contrary, how greatly they needed such a "duke" as Joshua had been.

No more can we allow any formal contradiction between Joshua and Judges in respect to their views of the conquest of the land. According to Hauff (and in this others, e. g. Nöldeke, have followed him), this discrepancy exists also within the Book of Joshua itself (p. 111 ff.), if the accounts of the first part are compared with those of the second. Here, however, Ewald appears to us to have hit the truth (Hist. of the People of Israel, ii. p. 342, 2d ed.) when he assumes that Joshua incontestably, in the first years of his invasion of Canaan, subjugated the land on all sides and received the submission of the entire body of the Canaanites, as many as were spared: when he declares further that on closer consideration no doubt is left that even then, after the first victory over Canaan, much of really permanent importance had been accomplished (of which character he reckons the division of the land, the establishment of the tabernacle in Shiloh, the institution of different religious usages and ordinances pertaining to the cultus, particularly the appointment of the Levitical cities, pp. 337, 341); when he shows finally — and this is of principal moment here, — how, out of this new condition of things itself, there must directly arise new dangers (p. 342). For, although the conquest had been effected with great rapidity (p. 336), the first expeditions of the Hebrews could be little more than what the Arabs in all the three quarters of the globe called Alghären, or rather (since the Hebrews had no cavalry,) razzias, swift forays, that is, for momentary conquest rather than for the permanent subjugation of the land; and when the camp, whether of many united or of single tribes, was at a distance, then certainly after the raids had passed by, the dense columns of the inhabitants would soon gather again, having promised submission, indeed, but for the most part without any thought of rendering it (p. 342). With great propriety Ewald then reminds us further how long it was before the Saxons in England, the Mohammedan Arabs in Egypt, were entirely established. In this view of the case we cannot, although fully recognizing the different documents which lie at the bottom of our book, in this respect either, affirm any proper contradiction between it and the Book of Judges, or, within the Book of Joshua, between its first and second parts.

In regard to the religious institutions, Hauff considers the difficulties to be still more important (p. 84). Shechem, made a free and Levitical city (Josh. xx. 7; xxxi. 21), appears in Judges ch. ix. as a common city provided with idolatrous worship (ver. 4, 46), in which, therefore, a Levite in the sense of the Mosaic law cannot possibly be imagined. But could not idolatry, in an age of disorder like that of the Judges, when idolatry broke in everywhere, invade Shechem also? Again, is it anything contrary to the historical accuracy of the account given in Josh. xxi. of the assignment of the Levitical cities, and to the high legal respect which, as we learn from Josh. viii. and xxii. priests and Levites enjoyed, that at the same period, according to Judg. xvii. 7, xix. 1, "a Levite from Bethlehem-Judah wanders about homeless?" We need only consider that the excellent system established must be gradually carried into effect, and that for this the time following Joshua was not especially suited.

When in regard to the religious condition of the people in general, we are told that it was excellent under Joshua, but afterwards (Judg. iii. 7) was such that idolatry had universally crowded out the worship of Jehovah, we may certainly concede that Joshua xxiv. 31 (comp. also Judg. ii. 7) favors this view; but the word of Phinehas to the Gileadites (xxii. 17) as well as the whole transaction of Joshua with the people at Shechem (xxiv. 1 ff.), and in particular his demand that they should put away their false gods (xxiv. 23), proves how untrustworthy the religious disposition of Israel was, how strongly the people inclined to idolatry, how easily they might fall back into it.

Of the contradiction between statements made in different parts of the book itself (of which Hauff treats, p. 102 ff.) one, and perhaps the most notable, we have already explained. For the most part the matters enumerated are properly the same as in comparing this book with the Book of Judges. We select one more point only, which Hauff himself brings up, when he writes, p. 128: "In general it is statements in relation to worship — the place where it should be offered, as well as the persons on whom its duties devolved — in which we find discrepancies hard to be reconciled. At first the main camp is at Gilgal (v. 9 ff.), even after the altar was built (viii. 30–33, xiv. 6) on the mountains Ebal and Gerizim (?); finally, the tabernacle is reared in Shiloh (xvii. 1), and there is also the abode of the heads of the people (xxi. 1 ff.); there the people come together to consult about the attempt of the two and a half tribes to build an altar beyond the Jordan; there, also, perhaps the heads of the people (xxiii. 2) were collected with Joshua. But how comes it that in ch. xxiv. 1, Shechem is the place of meeting, since here, a solemn covenant is adopted and a written document concerning it deposited with the law-book (ver. 26)? Still further; the holy ark is in many places the symbol of the presence of Jehovah; in ch. iii. it is borne in front in the passage of the Jordan; so ch. vi. at the destruction of Jericho; in neither of these chapters is a word said of the tabernacle, not even in connection with the residence in Gilgal; ch. xviii. first tells of its erection in Shiloh, ch. xxii. 19 names a מִשְׁכָּן there; while ch. xxiv. 1, on the contrary, speaks of an assembly of the people לִפְנֵי יְהוָה in Shechem; and ver. 26 of a מִקְדָּשׁ there, beside a great terebinth-tree. Those are certainly not harmonious intimations, but they involve no essential contradiction. For if the tabernacle is not mentioned in the account of the capture of Jericho (ch. vi.), but its erection is first reported after the entire land was conquered (ch. xviii. 1), we find the one fact as natural and appropriate to circumstances as the other. What could the tabernacle have to do with the storming of a town? Quite otherwise was it with the chief possession of the tabernacle, its most remarkable piece of furniture symbolizing the presence of Jehovah — the ark of the covenant, — which could be, as it was, carried before the people. And in reference to Shiloh and Shechem, to the מִשְׁכָּן in Shiloh and the מִקְדָּשׁ in Shechem, we easily understand them both side by side. There are already nascent, self-developing relations in which Shiloh represents the unity of the cultus at which Moses aimed, which Joshua also, and Eleazar and Phinehas strove after, while the מִקְדָּשׁ at Shechem looks back yet to the patriarchal time as well as to the transaction recorded in ch. viii. 30 ff.

So much in reference to some of the principal objections of Hauff. These, even if we add what the author says, p. 191 ff., concerning the scope and date of the book of Joshua, are not strong enough, in our judgment, to bring down the historical value of the book, as Hauff, evidently influenced very strongly by De Wette (p. 204), would do. He comes to the result, in regard to chaps. i.-xi. at least, that the author "aimed not to give any history of Joshua, in our sense of the word 'history,' but a history of the taking of the land of Canaan by the Israelites under the mighty power of God; that the person Joshua is indeed gathered out of the history, and the events as such for the most part belong to the real history, but that the plan and arrangement serve a higher end." This higher end indeed he understands to be essentially of a religious and moral kind, — to enliven zeal for Jehovah and his service by a representation of God's dealings with his people, only, according to Hauff's conception, the end so influences the narrative that the facts are shaped to correspond to it (p. 237). The consequence of this theory is the mythical conception of the Biblical history. This meets us in Nöldeke quite unqualifiedly, while Ewald favors it, but only in part. Now we will grant that the Book of Joshua "aims to give no history of Joshua in our sense of the word," for that would have required our time with its rich scientific helps, and its advanced scientific culture. But that the book would give the facts, as they survived partly in written records, partly in oral tradition, without enslaving them to any higher aim, even though that were the highest of which a Hebrew writer could conceive — the interest of Jehovah's worship, — that we cannot give up. "A higher aim," in itself we would not deny, as may be seen from § 1, only we would and must dispute that this affected the writing of the history in such a way that out of the history there comes at last a fiction, and that one proceeding on these principles feels obliged to concede, in regard to Moses, e. g., that "on the whole it results from the criticism of the Pentateuch, alas! that the noble, living image of Moses, as we find it, especially in Exodus and Numbers, wears no historical features, but is mainly a grand creation of later hands. Of the historical Moses there remain to us only a very few certain traces; at the bottom we know surely concerning him only that he was Israel's leader out of Egypt, and gave a mighty impulse to the religious development of his people" (Nöldeke, O. T. Lit. p. 26). That truly would be little enough, and strongly reminds us of similar assertions of Strauss, according to which Christ is likewise a grand creation of a later hand, an imagination of the apostolic congregation.

The primary stumbling-block for most of the critics is, when we reach the bottom, miracles, which are assumed beforehand to be something impossible, and incongruous with rational conceptions, whether we find them on Old or New Testament ground. Hauff does not deny this; he explains rather: "the interpreter of the Bible must not bring to his work the assumption beforehand that miracles are impossible. With all his effort, and all his force, it cannot be got rid of sometimes that the Biblical historians intended to relate miracles" (p. 211). On these principles he proceeds, although disavowing the purpose of Rationalism, to fish up in the accounts of miracles some expressions out of which the original, natural occurrence might possibly be discovered (p. 211). On the other hand, however, Hauff objects to our author that he is accustomed, in order to suit his design, to treat of miracles with intentional exaggeration of the supernatural (p. 215); and, with reference to this his design, in a given case would attempt an enhancement of the miracle (p. 223); in view of which the miraculous narratives in him "must be apprehended quite otherwise than elsewhere." How far this assertion is correct or otherwise, will be shown by the particular examination of the five miraculous accounts, in ch. iii. and iv.; v. 13-15; vi.; vii.; x. 12-15. On our own general position as to this matter, we may be permitted here to remark merely, that we most certainly hold to the possibility of miracles, because God is a living God (iii. 10), and can find, therefore, in miraculous narratives no objection to the credibility of a Biblical Book, while yet we would not, on this account, avoid a careful scrutiny of the reports existing in regard to them.

§ 4. Chronology.

The chronological data afforded by our book are very few, but enough at least to guarantee some standards for fixing the reckoning of time. Chap. iv. 19 we are told that on the tenth day of the first month (Abib) the people "came up out of the Jordan," but, unfortunately, not as in 1 Kings vi. 1 is the year after the Exodus given. We learn nothing further than that the passage of the river took place in the spring of the year. If now we place the Exodus, according to the common view, about 1500 B. C. (1495 B. C., Fürst, Gesch.

d. Bibl. Lit. p. 351), we reach the time about 1460 as the date of the passage of the Jordan. But here arises the second question, How many years were required for the conquest of Canaan? upon which follows the third, How long Joshua held the government altogether, or, What space of time does our book embrace? For answer, we have the passages ch. xi. 18; xiv. 7, 10, 11; xxiii. 1; xxiv. 29. In ch. xi. 18 it is only reported in general that Joshua waged war a long time יָמִים רַבִּים with the Canaanite kings. Ch. xiv. 7, 10, 11, leads to a more accurate determination of this period, since Caleb says he was forty years old when Moses sent him out to explore the land of Canaan (ver. 7), and Moses swore to him that he would give him as an inheritance the land to be conquered by him (ver. 9), that now forty-five years have past since Jehovah spoke this word to Moses, which (= during which) Israel wandered in the wilderness. Here evidently "the years of the conquest of Canaan during which Israel had not yet come into the peaceful possession of the land, are in a loose expression added to those of the wandering in the wilderness," as all interpreters without difference admit; because, when Caleb offered this petition, the conquest of the land, as ch. xiv. 5, agreeing with ch. xi. 23, declares, was already completed. How long then did the conquest require? Since the mission of the spies under Moses, with which coincides in time the promise of God to Caleb which the latter here recalls (see the Comm.), took place in the second year of the Exodus (Num. xiii. 14; Deut. ii. 14), and the wandering in the wilderness lasted from that time exactly thirty-eight years, as Deut. ii. 14 states, Jewish tradition had already quite accurately determined the time required for the conquest to be  $45-38 = 7$  years (Joses Seder Olam, ch. xi. in Fürst, ubi sup. p. 408). This was adopted by Theodoret, whom Keil, Gerlach, Bunsen, of modern commentators, and Fürst (but with peculiarities and various emendations of the text) have followed. Josephus on the contrary (Anl. v. 1, 19) gives the duration of the conquest as only five years. He says, l. c. Ἔτος δὲ πέμπτου ἤδη παρεληλύθει καὶ Χαναανίων οὐκέτ' οὐδὲς ὑπολείπειτο, πλην εἰ μὴ τινες εἰς ὀχυρότατον τείχος διέφυγον. Ewald supposes the author of ch. xiv. 10 also thought only of five years, which certainly seems very probable when we consider the fondness of the Hebrews for reckoning in round numbers. Knobel is of the same opinion, remarking on ch. xiv. 15, "the wars of Joshua therefore had, according to our author, lasted about five years." To pronounce a definite judgment is difficult, and is quite unnecessary, as the difference between five and seven years is of no consequence. But when Fürst (ubi sup.) assumes that the conquest occupied seven years in all, five of which were spent in the south and two in northern Palestine, the text gives no clear and definite support for his opinion.

There still remains the third chronological question, How long in all did Joshua hold the government? which is the same as, What space is covered by our book? Chap. xxiii. 1 speaks just as vaguely as xi. 18 of יָמִים רַבִּים, after which Joshua, who was already old and advanced in years, יָקֵן בְּנֵי יִשְׂרָאֵל, held the national assembly. In ch. xxiv. 29 it is said that he was one hundred and ten years old when he died. These are all the notices which the Book of Joshua, and even the whole Bible gives. We find more in Josephus, who reports, Anl. v. 1, 29: Καὶ ὁ μὲν (sc. Ἰησοῦς) τοσαῦτα πρὸς τοὺς παρόντας διαλεχθεὶς τελευτᾷ, βιοὺς ἑκατὸν ἔτη καὶ δέκα, ὧν Μουσεῖ μὲν, ἐπὶ διδασκαλίᾳ τῶν χρησίμων, συνδιέτριψε τεσσαράκοντα, στρατηγὸς δὲ μετὰ τὴν ἐκείνου τελευτὴν γίνεταί πέντε καὶ ἑκοσι. Here the life of Joshua is defined, in agreement with ch. xxiv. 29, as having covered one hundred and ten years, of which forty belonged to the period in which Joshua was yet with Moses, and twenty-five to that of his sole leadership. There are then forty-five years left for the time before the Exodus. Ewald (ubi sup. pp. 330, 331) and Fürst (p. 351) maintain that Josephus took this, in their opinion trustworthy, notice out of "an old document which did not show the gaps of the 'book of Origins,' as Ewald calls the ground-text" (p. 330). At the same time Ewald (l. c. Rem. 3) and Fürst (p. 351, Rem. 4) call to mind that other writers of these later centuries give always twenty-seven (Theoph. Ad Autol. 3, 24; Clem. Alex. Strom. i. 21; Euseb. Chron. I. p. 160, 170 of the Armen. translation, and G. Syncellus, Chronogr. p. 284, ed. Bonn), and Eupolemos (ap. Euseb. Præp. Evang. 9, 30; 10, 14) names even thirty years. Nay, the Chron. Sam. Arab. ch. 39, gives him forty-five years dominion, but in other places (ch. xxi., xxv.) only twenty-one. Of these higher figures the number twenty-seven is explained by supposing that the conquest was reckoned as occupying seven years; the others appear to be taken quite arbitrarily. Starke also speaks of twenty-seven years, referring to this reckoning among the Christian Fathers, as follows (Pref. to Joshua, § 10, p. 5): "The chronology of this book is variously given; some assume twenty-seven years"; but he then immediately adds: "others, however, with more probability, only seventeen, from the beginning of Joshua's rule to his death. The latter rest on 1 Kings vi. 1, since from the Exodus to the temple of Solomon there are reckoned four hundred and eighty years. For the government of Joshua there are actually left seventeen years, if we reckon before and after that government as follows:—

"(a.) From the Exodus to the government of Joshua are . . . . .	40 years.
"(b.) From the beginning of the government of Joshua to the division of the land . . . . .	7 "
"(c.) From the beginning of the division to the death of Joshua . . . . .	10 "
"(d.) From Joshua to Eli . . . . .	299 "
"(e.) From Eli to Samuel (1 Sam. iv. 18) . . . . .	40 "
"(f.) From Samuel to David (Acts xiii. 21) . . . . .	40 "
"(g.) From David to Solomon (1 K. ii. 11) . . . . .	40 "
"(h.) From the accession of Solomon to the beginning of the building of the Temple . . . . .	4 "
	<hr/> 480 "

Instead of four hundred and eighty years, we read in Acts xiii. 20 of four hundred and fifty years only; in Josephus, on the contrary (Ant. viii. 3, 1), of five hundred and ninety-two, and in two other places (Ant. xx. 10, 1, Cont. Apion, 2, 2), of even six hundred and twelve years. In the passage in Acts (xiii. 20) the number four hundred and fifty is given not as chronologically exact, but approximate only (ἀπρί), and can therefore decide nothing against 1 K. vi. 1 (Bähr, Bibelwerk, A. T. vii. p. 41). But Josephus contradicts himself; four hundred and eighty years must therefore, with Ewald, Winer, Thenius, Rösch, Bähr, and very recently also, Hitzig (Gesch. d. Volkes Israel, i. pp. 13, 14), be held as correct. This being done, then, if we take the twenty-five years of Josephus for the rule of Joshua, the period of the Judges must be shortened, against the reckoning of Starke, by eight years, thus:—

(a.) . . . . .	40 years.
(b. and c.) . . . . .	25 "
(d.) . . . . .	291 "
(e.) . . . . .	40 "
(f.) . . . . .	40 "
(g.) . . . . .	40 "
(h.) . . . . .	4 "
	<hr/> 480 "

Since, however, Josephus generally, as Ewald himself concedes, is not "a good chronologist" (p. 484), we ought not to lay too much stress on his twenty-five years in and of themselves (comp. also the explanation of ch. xviii. 4 ff. in reference to the date ἐν ἑβδόμῃ μηνί in Ant. v. 1, 21, ad fin.). It is possible that Joshua's command lasted so long, and so Des Vignoles and Winer also assume, and that our book embraces thus a space of a quarter of a century, but it is possible also that this space was shorter. The results of our investigation would accordingly be these: (1) the passage of the Jordan by the people of Israel took place in the spring of the year about 1460 B. C.; (2) the conquest was effected in not less than five, at the most in seven, years (1460–1455 or 1453 B. C.); (3) the leadership of Joshua, embraced a period of at least fifteen years, at the most twenty-seven (1460–1445 or 1433 B. C.); (4) the same number of years is included also in our book.

OBSERVATION 1. The time of the elders mentioned in ch. xxiv. 51, and again in Judg. ii. 17, we agree with Ewald in ascribing to the יְהוֹשֻׁעַ of Joshua. He assumes that to the time of Solomon from the Exodus (that being regarded as the terminus a quo of the Hebrew time-reckoning, p. 479) such יְהוֹשֻׁעַ, twelve of forty years each, are to be recognized (pp. 481, 482). So also Fürst, pp. 351, 352, 409.

OBSERVATION 2. Departing altogether from all other inquirers, Bunsen, in his Biblischen Jahrbüchern, incorporated into his Bibelwerk, vol. 1., places the crossing of the Jordan in the year 1280 B. C. on the authority of Egyptian and Assyrian chronology. He further assumes that Moses died in the twenty-second year of the Exodus (1299 B. C.); that Joshua, who at that time took upon him the command, completed the conquest and division of the land in seven years, and immediately thereupon, in the forty-seventh year of the Exodus (1274 B. C.), closed his life. According to this reckoning also Joshua was leader of the people for twenty-five years (pp. cxviii, cxxx).

not all, however, in Canaan proper, but eighteen years in the land east of the Jordan, and seven on this side. The accuracy of the chronological notice contained in 1 K. vi. 1, Bunsen likewise disputes, since, according to his calculation, the Exodus took place in the year 1390 B. C. during the nineteenth Egyptian dynasty, and the building of the Temple in 1004 B. C. during the twenty-first dynasty, not four hundred and eighty years, therefore, but only three hundred and sixteen after the Exodus.

§ 5. Character of Joshua.

As at the time of the Exodus, which as an event of the very highest significance was ever after retained in the mind of the people so vividly as to become their epoch for the reckoning of time, as then Moses, the chosen instrument of God's providence, led his nation and impressed upon it the stamp of his own mighty soul; so Joshua, in the period immediately subsequent, carried forward the work already begun, and by the establishment of a regulated theocratic commonwealth, brought it to a definite conclusion. His period is, as we at least cannot but view it, something more than "a beautiful twilight after the descending sun of the Mosaic day" (Ewald, ubi sup. p. 311). It has an original, fresh, youthful aspect of its own, is a true image of the spirit which lived in Hosea the son of Nun, as he was called at first (Num. xiii. 8) until Moses named him Joshua (Num. xiii. 16). He was a man in whom there was spirit (Num. xxvii. 18), and that a spirit of wisdom (Deut. xxxiv. 9) such as must fill the real man of God in the O. T. Joshua was not indeed a prophet, as Jesus Sirach makes him out (ch. xlv. 1), and Josephus also (Ant. iv. 7, 2: Μωϋσῆς δὲ γεραίτερος ἤδη τυγχάνων, διδόντων αὐτοῦ Ἰησοῦν καθίστασθαι ἐπὶ τοῖς προφηταῖς, καὶ στρατηγὸν εἶπον δεήσειε γενησόμενον), since he was directed, Num. xxvii. 21, to seek the divine will through Eleazar the high-priest; but he was a divinely inspired General and Regent, greater than any of the heroes who followed him through the time of the Judges, a real Joshua (יְהוֹשֻׁעַ) or יְהוֹשֻׁעַ contracted Neh. viii. 19, יְהוֹשָׁ; LXX. Ἰησοῦς, "whose help is Jehovah," like יְהוֹשֻׁעַ 2 Sam. v. 15; 1 Chron. xiv. 5), a warrior of God, whose help was Jehovah. On this very account also could he become a savior of his people. Truly did Moses "at the right moment perceive the real greatness of this hero, and give him the right name; instead of Hosea (יְהוֹשָׁ), i. e. help, which he was already called as the delegate of his tribe, Moses named him thereafter, with little change of the sound but with an important addition to the sense, Jehoshua, i. e. God-help" (Ewald, p. 306).

Born in Egypt, Joshua had, in common with all other Israelites, deeply felt the load of oppression which weighed the people down, and joyfully hailed the hour of freedom from the house of bondage, of deliverance from the iron furnace (Deut. iv. 20; 1 K. viii. 51; Jer. xi. 4). He was early allowed an opportunity, as one of the chief men of Ephraim (Num. xiii. 8), to show his bravery, when at Moses' command, he opposed the swarms of wild Amalekites in Rephidim (now Erraha, or Raha, see Knobel on Ex. xvii. 6), and, supported by the prayer of Moses, triumphantly overcame them. For Joshua discomfited (יִגְדֹּל) Amalek and his people with the edge of the sword (Ex. xvii. 8-13). By this exploit Joshua rose in the estimation of Moses, accompanied him (Ex. xxiv. 13) on the Mount of God, was at other times constantly about him (Ex. xxxiii. 11) as his minister (see on ch. i. 1), and, being then in the strength of his life (Ex. xxxiii. 11, יָעַץ), laid the foundation in this intercourse with Moses of his knowledge of God and confidence in Jehovah who had for the first time revealed himself (Ex. vi. 2, 3) as such to Moses. Through such confidence in God, which was never afterward more gloriously manifested than in the victory at Gibeon (Josh. x. 12-15), his native bravery gained a mighty support, so that he trembled not, whether the enemy met him in open fight, or the excited people, believing rather the extravagant reports of the other spies than the plain and truthful words of Caleb and himself, cried out that he should be stoned (Num. xiii. 31-34, xiv. 6-9, 10).

With this boldness, invigorated by filial trust in the Lord, there was joined in him a gift of keenest observation, which enabled him to perceive that their defense had departed from the Canaanites (Num. xiv. 9), so that it might be foreseen that they must become a prey to the Israelites, "bread" for them, as he expresses it in that popular style which we elsewhere recognize in him (e. g. Josh. xvii. 14-18; xxxiii. 10; xxiv. 12).

These qualities fitted him in a high degree for the position which Moses, before his death, by the command of God, assigned to him (Num. xxvii. 16-23, comp. with xxxii. 28; Deut. iii. 28; xxxi. 23). He was appointed, as Moses had desired of Jehovah, to go in and out before the congregation, and lead them out and in, that the congregation of Jehovah might not be as a flock without a shepherd (Num. xxvii. 17). Being now, probably, of about the same age as his trusty companion Caleb, of the house of Judah, the latter being then, as would seem, about eighty years old (s. § 4), and the sole survivor besides himself of all the Hebrew men who came out of Egypt (Num. xiv. 30, 38), he inherited the leadership of his people. From this time onward how eminently did he prove himself ever a God-fearing commander (ch. iii. 5, 9, 10; iv. 6, 7, 21-24; v. 1-9; vii. 6-9), trusting confidently in the help of God (ch. iii. 5; vi. 6 ff.; viii. 3 ff.; x. 12-15, 19, 25), often strengthened and consecrated to the strife by God himself (ch. i. 1-9; vi. 2, 3; viii. 1, 2; x. 8; xi. 6, especially v. 10-15), circumspect and prudent (ch. i. 11; ii. 1; viii. 4-8), quick and bold (ch. x. 9; xi. 7; x. 28-43; xi. 10-23), always taking full advantage of victories gained, of unexceptionable energy (ch. viii. 26; x. 10, 19, 28-42; xi. 8, 9). A commander, nevertheless, who humbly and modestly asked for himself (ch. xix. 49, 50) only a small possession, and in his farewell discourse (ch. xxiii. 1-16; xxiv. 1-15), despising self-laudation, gave all the honor to Jehovah, of whom it is said that he was with Joshua so that they spoke of the latter in all lands (ch. vi. 27). If he at times dealt fearfully according to our conceptions with some, as against the King of Ai (ch. viii. 29), and against those other five kings (ch. x. 1, 16, 23-27) whom he shamefully humbled and pitifully hanged, let us not forget the vast difference between our time and his. If he — to touch yet on one chief complaint brought against him by Eichhorn and Paulus (not, however, by Herder, as Keil assumes, p. liii. (53)), — if he proceeded not only against individuals, but against the Canaanites generally with the edge of the sword (לִפְיֵי הַחֶרֶב), burning their cities with fire, and casting them down unsparingly (ch. vi. 24; viii. 24; x. 28-43; xi. 10-19), and this all, as is repeatedly stated (viii. 2; x. 25, 40; xi. 15), by divine command, with the coöperation of Jehovah, by whom the heart of the Canaanites had been hardened to meet the children of Israel in battle (xi. 20), we may with Ewald reply to all such attacks upon Joshua, nay, even upon God himself, "that a people, sinking ever more deeply into divisions and moral perverseness, as the Canaanites, in great part at least, then were (comp. vol. i. p. 324 ff.; Wisd. Sol. xii. 2-6), should fall before another people in whom there arises the harmonious strength of a life trusting in divine powers, and so striving upward, is an eternal necessity."<sup>1</sup> Thus it happened also in the storms of the popular migrations, in which old but corrupted states of much cultivation crumbled before the pressure of mighty natural races. Not less do the conquering expeditions of the Arabs in the seventh and eighth centuries after Christ furnish an analogy. So much on this topic here. We shall have frequent occasion in the interpretation of the book to touch upon it again. We here simply remark that there was no lack of mildness in the hero of Ephraim. He spared Rahab, faithful to the promise which the spies had given, and with her her father's house (ch. vi. 25), saved the Gibeonites from the hand of the children of Israel (ch. ix. 26), although they had deserved for their cunning falsehood a far different punishment from that which was inflicted on them, namely, to perform menial service in the sanctuary (ch. ix. 27); and appointed the cities of refuge for the manslayers (ch. xx. 1-9).

<sup>1</sup> ["It is better" — so spoke a theologian of no fanatical tendency, in a strain, it may be, of excessive (?) but still of noble indignation, — "it is better that the wicked should be destroyed a hundred times over than that they should tempt those who are yet innocent to join their company. Let us but think what might have been our fate, and the fate of every other nation under heaven at this hour, had the sword of the Israelites done its work more sparingly. Even as it was, the small portion of the Canaanites who were left, and the nations around them, so tempted the Israelites by their Molatrous practices, that we read continually of the whole people of God turning away from his service. But had the heathen lived in the land in equal numbers, and, still more, had they intermarried largely with the Israelites, how was it possible, humanly speaking, that any sparks of God's truth should have survived to the coming of Christ? Would not the Israelites have lost all their peculiar character? and if they had retained the name of Jehovah as of their God, would they not have formed as unworthy notions of his attributes, and worshipped him with a worship as abominable as that which the Moabites paid to Chemosh, or the Philistines to Dagon?"]

But this was not to be, and therefore the nations of Canaan were to be cut off utterly. The Israelite's sword, in its bloodiest executions, wrought a work of mercy for all the countries of the earth to the very end of the world. They seem of very small importance to us now, those perpetual contests with the Canaanites, and the Midianites, and the Ammonites, and the Philistines, with which the books of Joshua and Judges and Samuel are almost filled. We may half wonder that God should have interfered in such quarrels, or have changed the course of nature, in order to give one of the nations of Palestine the victory over another. But in these contests, on the fate of one of these nations of Palestine, the happiness of the human race depended. The Israelites fought not for themselves only, but for us. It might follow that they should thus be accounted the enemies of all mankind — it might be that they were tempted by their very distinctness to despise other nations: still they did God's work, — still they preserved unhurt the seed of eternal life, and were the ministers of blessing to other nations, even though they themselves failed to enjoy it." Arnold's (Dr. Thos.) Sermons, vi. 36-37, as found in Stanley's Lectures on the Jewish Church, lect. xi. p. 238 ff. And see Stanley's whole treatment in that Lecture of the moral difficulty connected with the extermination of the Canaanites. — T.]

Joshua, moreover, was not only as a general an illustrious, highly endowed leader of his people, and one filled with the spirit of God, but, conspicuous equally in the deeds of peace as in the deeds of war, he was not less capable as a regent than as a soldier. In this relation also he acts always from the higher, theocratic motive. He will establish a commonwealth for his people; but this commonwealth must correspond to the description given in grand outlines by God, through Moses, in the wilderness. It should be a commonwealth consecrated to Jehovah, in the midst of which should stand the sanctuary, whose people should be holy to Jehovah. For Israel was to be a holy people (Ex. xix. 6). Accordingly, as soon as the Jordan is crossed, by God's marvelous help, and they tread the soil of Canaan, the land of the fathers, Joshua causes the long-neglected circumcision to be performed at Gilgal (ch. v. 1-9); and then immediately, on the same ground, the Passover to be celebrated for the first time (v. 10-12). He divides the land not according to his own preference, but by the lot, that God himself might, as it were, give the decision (chaps. xiii.-xix.), raises the holy tent in Shiloh (xviii. 1), arranges not only the cities of refuge which have been mentioned, but also the Levitical cities (ch. xxi.), acts in harmony with the high-priest Eleazar (xvii. 4; xxi. 1), maintains the unity of the cultus when the two and a half tribes build the altar on the bank of the Jordan (xxii. 12-34), in his farewell address admonishes to fidelity towards Jehovah, warns against apostasy (ch. xxiii. 1-16; xxiv. 1-15), and, having already earlier—perhaps directly after the conquest of the country west of the Jordan—caused blessing and curse to be proclaimed from Gerizim and Ebal (viii. 30-35), solemnly renews the covenant between Israel and Jehovah at Shechem (ch. xxiv. 25) with an earnest demand that all other gods which might possibly still be cherished, should be put away. Conscious as he was, therefore, as a general, of his commission from God, he was not less so as a ruler, who constantly kept in view, and followed with all tenacity and perseverance, his great, heaven-appointed aim, namely, to found a theocratic commonwealth. If he was adorned, as a general, with a bravery supported by fear of God and confidence in him, so as a regent he wore the most beautiful ornament of civil rule: an unselfish, noble spirit of justice coupled with gentleness and wisdom. It was a spirit which gave to every man his own (xiv. 6-15; xxi. 1), but claimed for itself only what was reasonable and moderate (xix. 49, 50), and which could sharply repel unjustifiable demands (xvii. 13-18), although not with "humiliating sarcasm" or with "pointed scorn," as Ewald represents (ub. sup. 317, 316). Of this charge, however, we shall have to take fuller notice in our explanation of the passage.

Thus Joshua stands before us distinguished equally as general and as ruler of his people, a worthy follower of Moses; not a prophet like the latter, and no lawgiver, as was the son of Amram, but filled with the same spirit of fidelity towards Jehovah, and of zeal for the newly incipient commonwealth of God; a man of God in all that he does and in all that he omits. "In the kingdom of God," says Kurtz (Manual of Sacred History, p. 102), "he is great who knows that of himself he is nothing. This greatness had Joshua. Among the heroes of the sacred history he stands forth as the one, above almost all others, free from self-will. The most conscientious fidelity towards the law, and a disposition the most imperturbably theocratic, distinguish him. He is prudent, circumspect, where he has to act of him self, for he conducts the wars of the Lord; but unhesitating, quick, and decided where the Lord sends him. His courage is humility, his strength is faith, his wisdom is obedience and fear of the Lord. A gentle disposition, but the furthest possible from feebleness, as is proved by his sternly solemn sentence upon Achan, and the strictness with which he executes the curse upon the Canaanites. Such a union of mildness with strength, of simplicity with prudence, of humility with magnanimity, has in it something evangelical. This peculiarity of his character, together with the peculiarity of the period in the kingdom of God in which he lived, and of the position which he took, makes him and his work a rich type of Him that was to come. He leads the people into the land of promise and of rest, but there is yet a better rest to be enjoyed, to which his antitype and namesake must introduce us (Heb. iv. 9)." With this glance at that unique, glorious antitype, at Christ the true Joshua, we close the attempt at a description of the hero of our book.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> [Baumgarten's characterization of Joshua in Herzog's Real-Encyc., s. v. Joshua, is in much the same tone as the above. From Stanley's Lectures on the Jewish Church, vol. i. lect. 10, we extract the following vivid and impressive sketch of the sacred leader of Israel, breathing a somewhat different sentiment, and hardly giving (as many will think) that regard to his sacredness which it deserves:—

"The difference, indeed, between Moses and Joshua, was marked as strongly as possible. Joshua was the soldier,—the first soldier consecrated by the sacred history. He was not a teacher, not a prophet. He, one may say, hated the extension of prophecy (?) with a feeling which recalls a well-known saying of the great warrior of our own age. He could

OBSERVATION 1. In the N. T. Joshua is mentioned only twice: (1) in the speech of Stephen before the chief council, Acts vii. 45, where it is said that the fathers brought in the tabernacle with Joshua into the possession of the Gentiles, whom God drove out before their face (ἐξώσαν δ θεός); (2) Heb. iv. 8 (see on ch. i. Doctrinal and Ethical, No. 4). From this passage Starke gives some intimations concerning the typical relation of Joshua to Christ. He says: "Joshua was in name and action a beautiful type of the Messiah. As he led the children of Israel through the Jordan into the land of Canaan, so the latter leads his believing followers finally through death into the heavenly Canaan. He carried out what Moses could not effect; the law of Moses could insure to men no peace and no blessedness, which Jesus and his gospel can, Rom. viii. 3; Heb. vii. 25. Jesus and Joshua begin after Moses leaves off. Joshua was the leader of the bodily Israel, overcame their enemies, distributed to them their land; all which Jesus, the Captain of Salvation, does for the spiritual Israel, Heb. ii. 10" (Starke on ch. i. 1).

Obs. 2. "We find in the East historical traces of Joshua's heroic deeds, outside of the Hebrew writers. Thus Procopius, Vandal. ii. 20, mentions a Phœnician inscription near the city Zingis in Mauritania, which had originated with the Phœnicians who had fled from Canaan, and ran thus: 'Ἡμεῖς ἔσμεν οἱ φεύγοντες ἀπὸ προσώπου Ἰησοῦ τοῦ ληστοῦ υἱοῦ Ναυῆ (Suidas s. v. Xavadr: 'Ἡμεῖς ἔσμεν Χαναανοὶ οὓς ἐδίωξεν Ἰησοῦς δ ληστής'); and a letter of the Persian king Shaubec in Chron. Sam. c. 26, names Joshua likewise "lupus percussor," but according to another recension, "lupus vespertinus," זאב ערבֿור (comp. Hab. i. 8). Winer, Realw. s. v. Josua. Ewald regards the inscription as a fabrication (p. 298); and in the Chron. Sam., from its character before described (§ 1 obs.), no confidence can be placed. "Other accounts similar to that in Eutropius are more simple, such as the brief statement that Tripolis in Africa was founded by the Canaanites fleeing before Joshua (apud Euseb. Chron. Gr. ed. Scaliger, p. 11); but present too little that is definite, and may have arisen out of vague conjectures in which later writers so richly abound" (Ewald, p. 299).

§ 6. The Holy Land.

The land captured by the Israelites under the brave leadership of Joshua, we call commonly Palestine, or the holy land, sometimes also, after Hebrews xi. 9 (cf. Gen. xv. 18; L. 24; Num. xxxii. 11, etc.), the promised land. It was called a holy land (אֶרֶץ קֹדֶשׁ) by Zechariah (ii. 12), by the author of the Second Book of Maccabees (i. 7), and in later ages with preference by the Catholics; against which Bachiene (in von Raumer, Palästina, p. 23, Anm. 3), without reason remarks, that "this designation rests merely on superstition." It is rather, as Zech. ii. 12 shows, more Biblical than the name Palestine, פְּלִשְׁתִּין, which originally referred only to the southwestern part of the land, the country of the Philistines. So Jerome not restrain his indignation when he heard that there were two unauthorized prophets within the camp. 'My lord Moses forbid them.' He was a simple, straightforward, undaunted soldier. His first appearance is in battle. 'Choose out men, go out, fight with Amalek.' He is always known by his spear or javelin slung between his shoulders or stretched out in his hand. The one quality which is required of him, and described in him, is that he was 'very courageous.' 'He was strong and of a good courage.' 'He was not afraid nor dismayed.' He turned not to the right hand nor to the left; but at the head of the hosts of Israel he went right forward from Jordan to Jericho, from Jericho to Ai, from Ai to Gibeon, to Beth-horon, to Merom. He wavered not for a moment; he was here, he was there; he was everywhere, as the emergency called for him. He had no words of wisdom, except those which shrewd common sense and public spirit dictated. To him the divine revelation was made not in the burning bush nor in the still small voice (?), but as the Captain of the Lord's host, with a drawn sword in his hand; and that drawn and glittering sword was the vision that went before him through the land, till all the kings of Canaan were subdued beneath his feet.

"It is not often, either in sacred or in common history, that we are justified in pausing on anything so outward and (usually) so accidental as a name. But if ever there be an exception, it is in the case of Joshua. In him it first appears with an appropriateness which the narrative describes as intentional. His original name, Hoshua, 'salvation,' is transformed into Jehoshua, or Joshua, 'God's salvation'; and this, according to the modification which Hebrew names underwent in their passage through the Greek language, took, in the later ages of the Jewish Church, sometimes the form of Jason, but more frequently that which has now become indelibly impressed upon history as the greatest of all names, — Jesus.

"Slight as may be the connection between the first and the last to whom this name was given with any religious significance, it demands our consideration for the sake of two points which are often overlooked, and which may in this relation so catch the attention of those who might else overlook them altogether. One is the prominence into which it brings the true meaning of the sacred Name, as a deliverance, not from 'imputed' or 'future' or 'unknown' dangers, but from enemies as real as the Canaanitish host. The first Joshua was to save his people from their actual foes. The second was to 'save His people from their sins.' Again, the career of Joshua gives a note of preparation for the singularly martial, soldier-like aspect — also often forgotten — under which his Namesake is at times set forth. The courage, the cheerfulness, the sense of victory and of success, which runs both through the actual history of the Gospels, and through the idealization of it in 'the Conqueror' of the writings of St. John, finds its best illustration from the older church in the character and career of Joshua.

on Is. xiv. 29 says, "Philistæos Palæstinos significat;" and Willermus Tyr., "Palæstina quasi Philistina a Philistiim dicitur" (in von Raumer, p. 24). In our book we find none of these names. As a general designation appears rather (ch. i. 4) "the land of the Hittites," whose bounds, according to the old promise, Gen. xv. 18–21, are very widely extended. Further we meet principally with two names for the two main divisions of Palestine, for the country west of the Jordan and the country east of the Jordan. The former is Canaan (פְּנֵעַן = lowland, as opposed to אֶרֶם = highland), the latter is Gilead (גִּלְעָד see on the etym. on ch. xii. 5), as may be seen from ch. xxii. 9, 10, 11, 15, 32, where Bashan (בָּשָׁן, from בָּשָׁן, "level, soft soil"), elsewhere standing separate from Gilead, as in ch. xiii. 11, is included with it. Between the east and west country lies the Jordan valley, now Ghor, then called in one part of it פְּנֵי הַיַּרְדֵּן (Gen. xiii. 10, 11), "circuit of the Jordan," as in Matt. iii. 5, ἡ περὶ ἄκρον τοῦ Ἰορδάνου, or briefly הַפְּנֵי (Gen. xiii. 12; xix. 17), and in our book synonymously גִּלְיָלוֹת הַיַּרְדֵּן (ch. xviii. 17; xxii. 10, 11), but in its whole extent called הָעֲרָבָה "low ground, plain, field" [rather, "arid, sterile, desert tract," Gesen., Fürst. — Tr.], (ch. xi. 16; xii. 1, 3). Instead of this in ch. xiii. 27 we have also עֲמָק (see Robinson, Phys. Geog. of the Holy Land, p. 81).

The west side of the Ghor belonged to Canaan, the east side to Gilead; the Jordan, as we learn partly from the boundaries (ch. xiii. 27; xvi. 1, 7; xviii. 12, 19; xix. 22, 34, etc.), partly from the notices in ch. xxii. (vers. 10, 11, 19, esp. 25), formed the border between those two great provinces of West and East Palestine.

Palestine as a whole lies nearly between  $34\frac{1}{2}^{\circ}$  and  $36\frac{1}{2}^{\circ}$  east longitude, and between  $31\frac{1}{4}^{\circ}$  and  $33\frac{1}{4}^{\circ}$  of north latitude, almost equally distant from the equator and the Arctic circle. The greatest extent from north to south is about one hundred and fifty-five miles, and from east to west about eighty-five miles. Reckoning the average width at seventy miles we have a surface of 8,560 square miles. It is therefore about half as large as Switzerland, one third as large as Bavaria (von Raumer, p. 25), about the size of the Prussian Rhine province.<sup>1</sup> "Pudet dicere," writes Jerome, "latitudinem terræ repromissionis, ne ethnicis occasionem blasphemandi dedisse videamur." The boundaries of the land, both for its western and its eastern divisions, are given in our book with accuracy, and will be noticed in the commentary on the passages pertaining thereto, ch. xi. 16, 17; xii. 1–6, 7, 8; xiii. 1 ff. In general, they give us to understand that at that time Palestine was already bounded on the south by Arabia Petræa (ch. xv. 2, 3) and the brook of Egypt (xv. 4); on the west by the Sea (xv. 4), sometimes called also (Num. xxxiv. 6) the Great Sea, that is, the Mediterranean Sea; on the north by the mighty heights of Lebanon and Hermon (ch. xi. 17); on the east by the wilderness of Syria and Arabia, toward which Salcha is mentioned as a border town, ch. xii. 5. To denote the extension of the land from north to south we frequently meet with the expression "from Dan to Beersheba" (e. g. 2 Sam. ch. xvii. 11; Judg. ch. xx. 1; 1 Chron. ch. xxi. 2), but not in the Book of Joshua. A similar designation of the breadth appears not to have been used.

In this its secluded position the land was eminently adapted to the purpose which the people of Israel, according to their historical vocation, had to fulfill. On the south and east, far-stretching deserts separated it from contact with all other nations. On the west was spread out the sea, which in those ancient times was little traversed, and even to that extent only by methods of a very imperfect description. On the north rose the protecting mountain walls of Lebanon and Anti-lebanon. Here might the O. T. commonwealth of God develop itself in admirable separateness from the world, the more so as Palestine, in the quality of its soil, its climate, its fertility, answered all the conditions which are requisite for the prosperous development of a community, and for awakening love and attachment to the country, the possession of Jehovah, where the dwelling of Jehovah was erected (ch. xxii. 19; comp. Lev. xxv. 23; Ps. lxxxv. 1). Truly, Israel should, as God had said to Moses (Ex. iii. 8; comp. w. xiii. 5; Lev. xx. 24; Ezek. xx. 6), be led into a good and wide land (אֶרֶץ טוֹבָה רְחֹבָה), into a land flowing with milk and honey (אֶרֶץ זָבַת חֵלֶב וְדָבָשׁ), the fruitfulness of which is praised (Deut. viii. 7–9) in these words: The Lord thy God leads thee into a good land, a land in which are brooks and fountains and seas, that flow (יְצִיֵּאוּ)

<sup>1</sup> [Robinson says (Phys. Geog. p. 18): "The whole area of the land of Palestine does not vary greatly from twelve thousand geographical square miles, — about equal to the area of the two States of Massachusetts and Connecticut together." See also Smith's Dict. of the Bible, Am. ed. 2286 ff. — Tr.]

De Wette: "spring out") on the hills and in the meadows (רְחֵלִים, prop. valley between mountains), a land of wheat and barley and vines and fig-trees and pomegranates, a land of olive-trees and honey, a land in which thou shalt eat bread without scarceness, in which nothing is wanting, a land whose stones are iron and out of whose mountains thou mayest dig brass." (Comp. Deut. xi. 10-12; 2 K. xviii. 32; Neh. ix. 25, 35; Is. xxxvi. 17, etc.) With these descriptions of the Bible agree Josephus (Ant. v. 1, 21), who praises the fertility and beauty of Palestine; Tacitus, who says, after his manner, with pregnant brevity: "Über solum. Exuberant fruges nostrum ad morem præterque eas balsamum et palmæ" (Histor. v. 26); Justinus (xxxvi. 2); Ammianus Marcellinus (xiv. 8). And these all speak of the later times when many desolating wars on the soil of the "land of the Hebrews" (Gen. xi. 15, and in Joseph.) had robbed it of its excellence. Only one voice, that of Strabo (xvi. 2, 3, 6), appears to contradict these reports. He relates (quoted by von Raumer, p. 92) that Moses led the Jews to the place where Jerusalem stands, and easily took possession of it, because, being rocky and unfruitful round about, no man had claimed it. To this Reland has already replied that this report of Strabo itself, like others, shows Strabo's ignorance in respect to Palestine, and that the vicinity of Jerusalem is not Palestine. True, the soil was not, if we bring before our minds the topography of the land, everywhere equally fruitful; but even in the south of West Palestine, in the Judæa of a later day, where the rough lime-stone hills show in many places only a few traces of vegetation, and, towards the Dead Sea, except in the neighborhood of En-gedi, almost none at all, — even here there were more favored districts like that about Gibeon, the plain of Rephaim near Jerusalem, the low-lands (רְחֵלִים) on the sea-coast, which have maintained their productiveness till the present day. The mountain of Judah which rises northwardly from Beer-sheba like a higher story of the land, to an average height of 2,400 feet (von Raumer, p. 87), gives that region in many places a gloomy aspect; but so much the more beautiful appears the green of the deeply-cleft wadies whose waters flow partly towards the Mediterranean, and partly towards the Dead Sea. Much more fertile was and is the northward extension of the mountain of Judah, called the mountain of Ephraim, "Mount Ephraim," also ch. xi. 16 the mountain of Israel, whose summits, at the time when Joshua divided the land, were still densely covered with forest (ch. xvii. 15). On account of this richer vegetation, the patriarchs also found here in the early days pasture for their herds about Beth-el and Shechem (Gen. xii. 8; xiii. 3; xxviii. 19; xxxvii. 13). It is most luxuriantly produced, either where the Shephelah<sup>1</sup> extends itself through the plain of Sharon even up to the woody and far outstretching promontory of Carmel, or, north of Carmel, in the plain of Jezreel, on the heights of the mountain of Naphthali, named only once in the Bible and that in our book (ch. xx. 7), and in the plain by the sea of Gennesaret. This, now el-Ghuweir, is "described by Josephus (Bell. Jud. iii. 10, 8) in glowing terms for its fertility and productiveness" (Robinson, Phys. Geog. of the Holy Land, p. 77.)

While thus Canaan proper, especially in its middle and northern portions, was eminently adapted to agriculture, the land east of the Jordan offered the most excellent pasture for cattle. Hence the Reubenites and Gadites, abounding in herds, to whom also half of the tribe of Manasseh joined themselves, had early requested of Moses to be allowed to settle on that side of the stream (Num. xxxii. 1 ff. 33; Deut. iii. 12; xxix. 8; Josh. xiii. 7, 8), on those high table-lands which stretch eastward to the mountains of Hauran, and to the Arnon on the south. These, now called en Rukrah and Belka, were then Bashan and Gilead, or merely Gilead. The former is even to this day of extraordinary fruitfulness, and everywhere tillable. The latter, cleft by the deep valleys of the Jarmuk and Jabbok, and other smaller torrents, is famous as a grazing-land, its soil being adorned with a luxuriant growth of grass, out of which rise majestically the evergreen oaks, the oaks of Bashan (Is. ii. 13; Ez. xxvii. 6; comp. Robinson ubi sup. p. 57 ff. 139 ff.). Here on these high grounds (3,000 feet above the Mediterranean, 4,300 feet above the Dead Sea), breathes a fresh and invigorating air, doubly invigorating to the traveller who emerges from the deep Jordan valley. This lies far below the surface of the Mediterranean, — 625 feet below it where the Jordan leaves the Sea of Gennesaret, and 1,231 where it empties into the Dead Sea. In it there is no tillable soil except at Bethshan in the north and about Jericho at the south end of the Ghor; between these two places the river is shut in on both sides by two ranges of chalky hills (von Raumer, p. 58). The region about Jericho in particular was celebrated for its fertility (von Raumer, p.

<sup>1</sup> [The Philistine lowlands. See Smith's Dict. of the Bible, art. "Shephelah." — Tr.]

58, Anm. 118 a). Further south all vegetation is dried up. There the Dead Sea, as we commonly call it, after Galenus and Jerome, but which appears in the historical books of the O. T. under the name of the Sea of the Plain (ים העֶרְבָּה, Deut. iv. 49; 2 K. xiv. 25), or the Salt Sea (ים המֶלַח, Gen. xiv. 3; Num. xxxiv. 3, 12; Josh. xv. 2, 5; xviii. 19), or under both names at once (Deut. iii. 17; Josh. iii. 16; xiii. 3), spreads out its desolate surface, forty-seven miles long and more than ten miles wide, between bare, high, steep cliffs of limestone and chalk, inhospitably silent, aptly called by the son of the desert "a curst sea" (von Raumer, p. 61). From its southern point the southern border of Canaan ran across to Beer-sheba, according to ch. xv. 2, and to the river of Egypt, that is, to the point from which we began this survey of the land.

We have before remarked incidentally how very different is the temperature in the Jordan valley from that on the heights to the east of the Ghor. Other such contrasts appear in the holy land, embracing as it does very lofty heights and profoundest depths; so that on its climate no general judgment can be pronounced, as can usually be done in the case of so small a country, with more uniform quality of soil, and a different situation. Of Lebanon, whose magnificent mountain scenery has been described in the liveliest colors by Furer, in his Wanderungen durch Palästina (p. 356 ff.), a work which we shall often have to quote, the Arabic poets say, "that he bears the winter on his head, the spring on his shoulders, in his bosom the autumn; and that summer slumbers at his feet" (von Raumer, p. 89, after Volney, i. 243). Consistently with this writes Burckhardt as he comes, on the 5th of May, 1812, to the mouth of the Mandhur (Jarmuk, Hieromax), where it empties into the Jordan: "Northward rose the snow-covered Jebel el-Scheick (Hermon); on the east the fruitful plains of Jaulan lay bedecked with the flowers of spring; while in the south the drooping vegetation appeared to show the effects of a tropical heat." The temperature of Jerusalem (and the same is true in general of the whole hill-country west of the Jordan, Robinson, ubi sup. p. 297 f.) is for the most part cool and pleasant, and never oppressively hot except while a sirocco or south wind lasts (p. 293). On the western plain, which rises only a little above the Mediterranean, it is of course warmer, so much so, indeed, that the harvest ripens there about two weeks earlier than on the mountain (p. 298 f.). Disregarding the rough, high mountain regions of Lebanon and Anti-lebanon, and on the other side the tropical heat of the Ghor (where Van de Velde found it more trying than in South Africa, von Raumer, p. 89), the great part of Palestine has a pleasant, generally healthy climate, excellently suited to agriculture and grazing; for there are but few swamps or other causes to operate against the salubrity of the atmosphere (Rob. p. 308). Yet Palestine, as in ancient times so now, is not without contagious diseases, and "the pestilence that walketh in darkness," Ps. xci. 6 (Rob. l. c.).

Of the natural productions of the country, wheat, barley, vines, fig trees, pomegranates, olive trees, and honey are mentioned in the passage (Deut. viii. 7-9) before quoted, and it is there said also, that the stones of the land are iron, and brass is dug out of its mountains. As a matter of fact many iron mines are still found on Lebanon, and, from the communications of Rusegger, who has accurately explored Palestine in respect to its geology, they use the brown iron-stone and spathic iron-stone for building near Merjibah (Ruseg. i. 690, iii. 284, ap. von Raumer, p. 96). "Iron and brass shall be on thy shoes," was promised to Asher in the blessing of Moses (Deut. xxxiii. 25). And according to our book Asher must, with great probability, have received a place precisely on Lebanon (ch. xix. 24-31). So that the occurrence of iron and brass in Palestine is a fixed fact, although it is a question whether by the stones of the land which "are iron," we are not to understand rather (as von Raumer supposes, p. 96), the widespread basalt formation of Hauran, Leja, and Jaulan. The plants mentioned in Deut. viii. 7-9, wheat, barley, vines, fig and olive trees, as well as pomegranates, are still met with, and are often mentioned in the books of travel. The olive trees grow to the height of from twenty to thirty feet; the fruit begins to ripen in October, and is pressed after lying in hot water. Early figs were the first fruit of the year to ripen; a second sort, the summer figs, came on in August, and a third, the winter figs, remained till January on the tree. The vines bear very heavy clusters, grow to be even thirty feet high (Stephan Schultz, in von Raumer, p. 101 [Tristram, Land of Israel, pp. 610, 622]), and yield excellent wine. Pomegranates grow about Gaza, Hebron, and elsewhere in the land. Of the other tall-growing plants of Palestine, we ought specially to indicate the oaks (Is. ii. 13; Ezek. xxvii. 6; Zech. xi. 2) which are found not on the east side of the Jordan alone (Robinson, Bibl.

Res. in Pal., etc. ii. 443 [Tristram, ubi sup. p. 120, etc.]; the palm trees, near Jericho and En-gedi formerly (Judg. i. 16; iii. 13), at the present day near Gaza (Rob. ii. 276), and in Jerusalem (Tobler, Denksblätter, p. 109 [at Jaffa, Tiberias, and elsewhere, Tristram, pp. 413, 429, etc.]); and finally the cedars, the glory of Lebanon (von Raumer, p. 31 [Tristram, p. 630 ff.]). The richness of the land in honey (Ex. iii. 8, 17; xiii. 5; Deut. viii. 8; Jud. xiv. 8; 1 Sam. xiv. 25-45) presupposes the multitude of flowers; hyacinths, anemones, jonquils, on Carmel; on the plain of Sharon, tulips, white and red roses, white and yellow lilies, narcissuses and stockgillies (von Raumer, p. 98).

The mention of honey leads naturally to some remarks on the animals of Palestine. While the bees are a blessing to the country [comp. Tristram, p. 87 f.] the locusts bring upon it the horrors of desolation, such as Joel has pictured with a master's hand (ch. i. 3 ff.). To the locust which rises out of the abyss (Rev. ix. 3, 5, 10) was power given, as the scorpions have power on earth. These latter are found in extraordinary numbers in the Jordan valley below Jericho (von Raumer, p. 103), and the mountain of Akrabbim is named from them (ch. xv. 5, from עֲרַבְיָה, "a scorpion"). Serpents which, like them, are created for vengeance on the wicked (Sirach, xxxix. 36), are in modern Palestine but few (von Raumer, p. 106). Their place, however, is well supplied by numerous birds, especially singing birds, not merely in Samaria and Galilee, but also along the Jordan, where Robinson (Lat. Bibl. Res. p. 316) heard the nightingale warble [comp. Tristram, pp. 513, 523, 585]. Even the Dead Sea is not uncheered by these songsters. "We ourselves," writes Robinson (Phys. Geog. p. 219), "and many other travellers, saw birds flying in all directions over the sea. That no water-fowl are here to be met with is simply owing to the fact that the sea shows no trace of fish or plant on which those birds subsist. But the region is full of birds; and at Ain Jidy we were surprised and delighted to hear their morning song in the midst of the solitude and grandeur of these desolations. The trees, and rocks, and air around were full of the carol of the lark, the cheerful whistle of the quail, the call of the partridge, and the warbling of many other feathered songsters; while birds of prey were soaring and screaming in front of the cliffs and over the waters of the sea."

Of predaceous quadrupeds, the lions (Judg. xiv. 5, 6; 1 Sam. xvii. 34-36; 2 Sam. xxiii. 20; 1 K. xiii. 24, 26; Jer. xlix. 19) which, in the days of Samson and David showed themselves in cultivated districts of Judæa, and when Jeremiah lived still haunted the Ghor, have now disappeared from Palestine. Bears, on the contrary, are yet found in the mountains of the North (von Raumer, p. 106), but especially are foxes and jackals numerous in all the land, and not less so the hares (p. 107). Of domestic animals, the country had dogs, camels, asses, horses (mentioned in our book ch. xi. 4 as belonging to the Canaanites), mules, oxen, buffaloes, numerous flocks of goats and sheep in which the patriarchs, Jacob in particular, were already rich (Gen. xxx. 43).

§ 7. The Original Inhabitants of Palestine.

When the Israelites forced their way into this highly favored land where once their fathers had dwelt as nomads, they found, east of the Jordan, the kingdoms of Sihon and Og (ch. xii. 1 ff.) and, in Canaan proper, thirty-one smaller kingdoms besides, as would appear, one free state, Gibeon with its dependent towns Chephira, Beeroth, and Kirjath-jearim (ix. 3, 17). The land was already cultivated, and owed this cultivation to its inhabitants. These lived in cities, tilled the ground, and had planted olive-yards (ch. xxiv. 13), were acquainted with writing, as the previous name of Debir, Kirjath-sepher (ch. xv. 15), proves, owned horses and chariots (ch. xi. 4; xvii. 18); but in a moral and religious respect were very degraded (Gen. xv. 16; xix. 5; Deut. xii. 29-31; xviii. 9-12; Ex. xxiii. 31-33; xxxiv. 11-14; Josh. xxiii. 12, 13; xxiv. 15). Of them are separately named in our book, —

1. Canaanite tribes (ch. iii. 10; ix. 1; xi. 3, where their places of habitation are given, xii. 8; xxiv. 11):<sup>1</sup>

A. The Hittites, חִתִּים (Xerrāoi), living on the mountain of Judah (Num. xiii. 29; Josh. xi. 3, and in general עֲרֵב near Hebron where Moses bought of Ephron the Hittite, a cave for a burial-place (Gen. xxiii. 3-20; xxv. 9, 10 ff.). The race appears to have been very powerful, since ch. i. 4 the whole land promised to the Israelites is called the land of the

<sup>1</sup> [On the different races of the Canaanites compare the brief but comprehensive sketch by Stanley, Hist. of Jewish Ch. lect. ix., and the articles under the respective titles in Smith's Dict. of the Bible. — Ta.]

Hittites. According to Ewald (Gesch. des Volkes Isr., i. p. 279 ff.) the Hittites were dwellers in the valleys, which, however, does not agree with ch. xi. 3, where they, together with the Amorites, Perizzites, and Jebusites, are reckoned with the inhabitants of the mountain. [This name is used in the Hebrew always in the singular, "the Hittite," with five exceptions.]

B. The Amorites, אֲמֹרִי (Ἀμωρῆαι, according to Ewald, "mountaineers"<sup>1</sup>). Sometimes a name for all the peoples of Canaan (ch. xxiv. 18; Gen. xv. 16; Judg. vi. 10; 2 Sam. xxi. 2, and often), according to ch. xi. 3, dwelling on the mountain also, either on the mountain of Judah, in particular (Gen. xiv. 7, 13), or on the mountain west of the Dead Sea, thence called mountain of the Amorites (Deut. i. 7, 19, 20, comp. w. Num. xiii. 30), and to be regarded as a southerly continuation of the mount of Judah; or, northwardly, on the mount of Ephraim, about Shechem (Gen. xlviii. 22, comp. w. John iv. 5): also on the east of the Jordan where the kingdoms of Sihon and Og in Gilead and Bashan are designated as Amoritical kingdoms (ch. ix. 10, comp. w. xii. 2, 4; Num. xxxii. 33, 39; Deut. iv. 47-49). [Hebrew always singular.]

C. The Canaanites, כְּנַעֲנִי (Χαναανῖται, according to Ewald [and Gesen.] "lowlanders"), a designation in a wide sense for all the people of Canaan (Gen. x. 18; xii. 6; xxiv. 3; Ex. xiii. 11, and often), more strictly for a race along the sea and along the Jordan (ch. v. 1; xi. 3; Num. xiii. 29; Deut. xi. 30). That they dwelt in Gezer, is expressly mentioned ch. xvi. 10, comp. the Comm. in loc. In ch. xiii. 4 the land of the Canaanites is the same as that of the Sidonians (ch. xiii. 5), that is, the Phœnicians. [Almost always plural.]

D. The Girgashites, גִּרְגָּשִׁי (mentioned in ch. iii. 10; xxiv. 11; Deut. vii. 1; Neh. ix. 8, while they are wanting in the lists, ch. ix. 1; xi. 3; xii. 8; Ex. iii. 8; xxxiii. 23; xxxiv. 2; xxxiv. 11), according to Gesenius "those dwelling on clayey or loamy soil" (גִּרְגָּשִׁי). They had probably (ch. xxiv. 11), as von Raumer suspects, settled as colonists on the west side of the Jordan. In Matt. viii. 28 the Cod. Sinait. reads not Γεργασσηῶν, which is probably no more than a conjecture of Origen (von Raumer, Gesen.), but Γαλαθηῶν. [Plural with two exceptions.]

E. The Hivites, חִיטִּי (Εβαῖται, according to Ewald, "townsmen, midlanders" [Gesen.: pagani, villagers]; in the cities Shechem (Gen. xxxiv. 2) and Gibeon (Josh. ix. 7; xi. 19), but also on mount Hermon in the land Mizpeh, ch. xi. 3, cf. Judg. iii. 3). [In the Hebrew always singular.]

F. The Perizzites, פְּרִזִּי (Περριζῖται; according to Gesenius connected with פֶּרֶץ, "open country," whence פֶּרֶץ Est. ix. 16; Deut. iii. 5; 1 Sam. vi. 18, and then also פֶּרֶץ = "countryman, rustic," with which also paganus may be compared), according to ch. xi. 3; Judg. i. 4, 5, likewise living on the mountains, probably with Canaanites, between Beth-el and Ai in Abraham's time (Gen. xiii. 3, 7). It may be questioned, with von Raumer (p. 362), whether also near Shechem? which is, I think, from the connection of Gen. xxxiv. 30 not improbable. [Always singular in the Hebrew.]

G. The Jebusites, יְבוּסִי (from "יָבוֹס," a place trodden down, threshing-floor, ר. פֶּסֶס" Gesenius), at Jerusalem (Jebus), and in the region around Jerusalem (ch. xv. 8, 63; xviii. 28; Judg. xix. 11), according to ch. xi. 3 on the mountain also (cf. besides Num. xiii. 20), like the Amorites, Hittites, and Perizzites; invariably, except ch. xi. 3, named in the lists (ch. ix. 1; xii. 8; xxiv. 11; Gen. xv. 21; Ex. iii. 8; xxxiii. 23; xxxiv. 2; xxxiv. 11; Deut. vii. 1). [Always singular.]

"As regards the origin of the Canaanites," says Winer (Bibl. Realwörterbuch, s. v. "Canaaniter"), "they are reckoned in Gen. x. 15, comp. vers. 6, 18; ix. 22 — as descendants of a certain Canaan who was a son of Ham, and so grandson of Noah, — among the Hamites. But this ethnographical conception, which rests, perhaps (Tuch, p. 245), on the tradition concerning the original abodes of the Canaanites, is contradicted by the language of this race, which was no other than the Hebrew (Is. xix. 18, see Gesenius, Hist. of the Heb. Lang. 16 f.). The prevailing view of antiquity regarded them (the Phœnicians, Sidonians) as immigrants in western Asia, comp. also Justin, xviii. 3, 2; and according to Herod. i. 1; vii. 89, they must have dwelt originally on the Red Sea (that is, on the ocean south of Asia), especially, perhaps, on the Persian Gulf (comp. Strabo, i. 42; xvi. 784), where at a later period, two islands, Tyros and Arados, were pointed out as the home of the Phœnicians (Strabo, xvi. 766). . . . That, finally, the immigrant Canaanites first occupied the northern (Phœn.) coast, and then, crowding back the primitive inhabitants, spread themselves south and east throughout Palestine, is probable under all the circumstances." Knobel has, as Lange remarks (Comm. on Gen., p. 347), "solved the problem by the supposition that the Canaanites who migrated to that country might have received the Shemitic language from Shemites who had previously settled there. Add to this that the affinity of the Phœnicians and Canaanites with the Hamitic nations of the south seems to be established (Kurtz, p. 90, Kaulen, p. 235)." J. George Müller, on the contrary, had still earlier maintained (Schweizerisches Museum, 1837, p. 275 ff. esp. 282), and again repeats (Herzog's Realencyk., vii. 241), in agreement with Grotius, Clericus, and Gesenius, that the Hebrews had, as early as the patriarchal age, received their language from the Canaanites who migrated from the Egyptian sea.

<sup>1</sup> [This interpretation is said by Grove, Smith's Dict. of the Bible, art. "Amorites," "to be due to Simons, though commonly ascribed to Ewald." — Tr.]

On a more careful consideration of these several views, the question at once arises, Whether the ethnological table in Gen. x. shall maintain its historical character or not. This is denied to it by the majority of recent critics. An error in the Table is assumed and then ascribed to national hatred, which is supposed to have shrunk from the idea of a common derivation (Realencyk., ubi sup. 240). Knobel, Bertheau, and J. G. Müller, on the contrary, defend the table, and assume that the Hebrews and Canaanites were of different families, the former belonging to that of Shem, the latter to that of Ham. On this supposition arises the second question: How we are to explain the undeniable agreement in language, as it appears e. g. in the inscription of Eschmunazar, king of the Sidonians (cf. Schlottmann's careful explanation of it in the treatise, Die Inschrift Eschmunazar's Königs der Sidonier, geschichtlich und sprachlich erklärt, Halle, 1868). Knobel supposes that the Canaanites had, upon their settlement in the country, received the language of the Shemites, whom he conceives to have been resident there already. Among them he reckons the Rephaites [Rephaim], Emities [Emims], Susites [Zuzim], Samsumites [Zamzumim], Enakites [Anakim], Avites, Hivites; and he supposes that the Terahites then followed at a later period. Müller, as we have seen, gives the opposite explanation. He maintains that "the Hebrews, who as a rule, throughout their history, have with great facility appropriated to themselves the languages of the peoples among whom they dwelt" (better, perhaps, "appropriate," for whether it was always so we know not, can only conjecture), "without in the least sacrificing their nationality, had substituted the language of the Canaanites for their own, as they also borrowed of them other elements of civilization, especially alphabetic writing, republican institutions (Suffetes), architecture, etc." (p. 242).

This is the present state of the discussion. One class of investigators give up the ethnographical table, and arrive at a not unsatisfactory result; the others have striven to support the historical authority of the table, but are then compelled to propose hypotheses of which that of Knobel, supposing the Rephaites, etc., to have been Shemites, is against all previous views (see below), while that of Müller raises against it the consideration, Whether indeed a people so originally endowed as the Hebrews could so easily have given up their "primitively Indogermanic," more specifically their "Aryan or Iranian language (!)," and adopted that of the Canaanites? Under these circumstances we hold that the whole question concerning the origin of the Canaanites is as yet by no means satisfactorily answered.

2. The Philistines (פְּלִשְׁתִּים), more rarely פְּלִשְׁתִּיִּים, LXX. in Pent. and Josh.: φιλισταῖοι, elsewhere commonly: οἱ ἀλλόφυλλοι, Παλαιστῖνοι Joseph. Ant. v. 1, 18. According to Gesenius: "wanderers, strangers," which is the meaning of ἀλλόφυλλοι, from the Æthiop. falasa, "travel, wander," Heb. פָּלַשׁ, mentioned in our book, ch. xiii. 2, 3.<sup>1</sup> Their cities, according to ch. xv. 45-47, were allotted to the tribe of Judah, but Ekron later to Dan, ch. xix. 43. They were, as appears from Gen. x. 13, 14, descendants of Mizraim, the son of Ham, and hence, like the Canaanites, were Hamites. From [Deut. ii. 23;] Jer. xlvii. 4; Am. ix. 7, we learn that they came from the island Caphtor, probably Crete. With that agrees, as von Raumer observes, Deut. ii. 23, where it is said that the Caphtorim who came out of Caphtor destroyed the Avim, who dwelt in villages unto Gaza (later the city of the Philistines), and then dwelt there, in their stead. From this, through confusion of names, may have arisen the story handed down by Tacitus: "Judæos Creta profugos novissima Libyæ insedisse" (Hist. v. 2). Hitzig, particularly, in his Urgeschichte der Philister (p. 17 ff.), has proved that the designation of David's body-guard הַפְּלִשְׁתִּים (2 Sam. xv. 18; xx. 7; 1 Kgs. i. 38, 44; 2 Sam. viii. 18; xx. 23) lends support to the Cretan origin of the Philistines. That the name of Crete is preserved in הַפְּלִשְׁתִּים is clear at a glance, and in reference to פְּלִשְׁתִּי, Hitzig (p. 21) has shown the possibility of its arising from פְּלִשְׁתִּי. Whether the former of these words is applicable to the southern, the latter to the northern portion, or whether פְּלִשְׁתִּי is the more general, פְּלִשְׁתִּי a more particular term, the Philistines being Cretans, is questionable. Vaihinger (Herzog's Realencyk. xi. 557) decides for the former view, and would make the immigration of the Cretes or Caphtorim (Deut. ii. 23; Am. ix. 7) to have taken place not till after Joshua's time, and at first into the district south of Gaza, which thus included the נֶגֶב (Josh. xv. 21-32), but not the שְׁפֵלָה embracing the five Philistine cities (Josh. xiii. 3; comp. w. xv. 45-47). Be that as it may, it is certain that the whole people of the Philistines inhabited the "southern sea-plain," as von Raumer descriptively calls it (p. 365), and that this plain was preëminently Palestine (see above, § 6). Even in the time of Abraham and Isaac they dwelt about Beer-sheba and Gerar (Gen. xxi. 34; xxvi. 1). Already at an early day they appear as a people practiced in war, whose country Moses on that account avoids (Ex. xiii. 17, 18). Joshua seems, if we consider ch. xiii. 3, not to have come into conflict with them, and the division of the Philistine territory among the tribes of Israel (ch. xv. 45-47; xix. 43) was and remained, as Winer expresses it, "a project." But under the Judges begins the strife with them, thenceforth prolonged through centuries (Judg. iii. 31; x. 7; xiii. 1, 5), most victoriously maintained by David (2 Sam. v. 17-25; viii. 1), after he had already under Saul distinguished himself as a youthful hero, by the overthrow of Goliath especially (1 Sam. 17), but still leaving it necessary for Hezekiah at a much later period to "smite the Philistines"<sup>1</sup> (2 K. xviii. 8). It is historically remarkable that precisely this, the people most hostile to the Israelites, should have given to the country of the latter the name by which it must probably be forever most familiarly known to us of the West, — Palestine.

<sup>1</sup> [The almost entire absence of the article with this name throughout the historical books is noticeable. — Ta.]

3. Other Peoples.

Among these belong, above all, the giant peoples (רִפְאִיִּים), of whom repeated mention is made in our book as well as elsewhere, e. g. ch. xii. 4; xiii. 12; xv. 8; xviii. 16. They were divided into various tribes, of which, in ch. xi. 21, 22; xiv. 15; xv. 13; עֲכָזִים, קִנִּיזִּים, קִנִּיזִּים are specified. Although they are noted, Judg. i. 10, as Canaanites, this statement does not agree with the other places in which they are spoken of. Von Raumer therefore regards them as aborigines. He says: "Before the time of the Canaanitish races, and among them, dwelt giants (רִפְאִיִּים) in Palestine" (p. 364). To these aborigines belonged also, probably, the Horites (Gen. xiv. 6, 36; 20 ff.; Deut. ii. 12, 22), — cave-dwellers, troglodytes (comp. Job xvii. 6; xxiv. 5 ff.; xxx. 1 ff.), but not mentioned in our book; and besides these the Avites (עֲוִיִּים) subdued by the Philistines ch. xiii. 3; Deut. ii. 23; also the Geshurites at the foot of Hermon not far from Maacha (ch. xii. 5; xiii. 13), and the Geshurites (גִּשְׁשֻׁרִים) perhaps connected with גִּשְׁשֻׁר a bridge) in the south of Palestine, near Philistia (ch. xiii. 2; 1 Sam. xxvii. 8), and finally the Giblites (ch. xiii. 5, הַגִּבְלִי from גִּבְלִי, Arab. jebel = mountain) in the region of Lebanon.

§ 8. Division.

PART FIRST.

THE CONQUEST OF THE LAND OF CANAAN; OR, "THE EXPLOITS OF THE WAR"
(F. Burmann). Chaps. i.-xii.

Section First. The preparation. Chaps. i.-v.

1. The summons to the war, ch. i.

a. The command of God to Joshua, i. 1-9.

<sup>1</sup> [See further on the Philistines particularly the very valuable article s. A. c. in Smith's Dict. of Bible. On the whole subject of the aborigines of Palestine, the account given by Ritter in vol. ii. of W. L. Gage's abridgment of his great work may also be strongly recommended. — Ta.]

- b. The command of Joshua to the leaders of the people, and to the Reubenites, Gadites, and the half tribe of Manasseh, i. 10-18.
2. The mission of the spies to Jericho, ch. ii.
  - a. Sending of the spies and their reception by Rahab, ii. 1-7.
  - b. Preservation of the spies by Rahab on their promise to her that they would spare her and her father's house in the capture of the land, ii. 8-21.
  - c. Return of the spies to Joshua, ii. 22-24.
3. The passage of the Israelites through the Jordan, chaps. iii., iv.
  - a. Regulations of Joshua in regard to the passage through the Jordan, iii. 1-13.
  - b. The passage itself of the people through the Jordan, iii. 14 - iv. 18.
  - c. The erection of the memorial at Gilgal, iv. 19-24.
4. The consecration to the holy war, ch. v.
  - a. The effect of the entrance into Canaan on the inhabitants of the land, v. 1.
  - b. The circumcision of the people, v. 2-9.
  - c. The Passover. Bread of the land, v. 10-12.
  - d. The war-prince of God, v. 13-15.

Section Second. The contests of Israel with the Canaanites. Chaps. vi.-xi.

A. Contest against particular cities. Chaps. vi.-viii.

1. The capture of Jericho, ch. vi.
  - a. Preparation for it, vi. 1-14.
  - b. Capture and destruction of Jericho, vi. 15-27.
2. Achan's theft, ch. vii.
  - a. The crime, vii. 1.
  - b. The evil consequences in the unfortunate expedition against Ai, vii. 2-5.
  - c. Joshua's humble prayer and God's answer thereto, vii. 6-15.
  - d. Detection and punishment of the culprit Achan, vii. 16-26.
3. Conquest and destruction of the city of Ai, ch. viii. 1-29.
  - a. Joshua's stratagem against Ai, viii. 1-13.
  - b. Apparent flight of the Israelites. Their victory, capture of the city, and its destruction, viii. 14-29.
4. The altar of the blessing and curse on Ebal, ch. viii. 30-35.

B. Contest against the allied kings of the Canaanites. Chaps. ix.-xi.

1. The first league of Canaanitish kings against Israel, ix. 1, 2.
2. The fraud of the Gibeonites, ix. 3-27.
  - a. Coming of the Gibeonites to Joshua and league with them, ix. 3-15.
  - b. Discovery and punishment of their fraud, ix. 16-27.
3. The great victory at Gibeon over the five allied Canaanite kings, x. 1-27.
  - a. Investment of Gibeon by the five allied kings, x. 1-5.
  - b. Battle at Gibeon, x. 6-15.
  - c. Flight and destruction of the five kings, x. 16-27.
4. Conquest of South Canaan, x. 28-43.
5. Vanquishment of the northern Canaanites. Capture of their land. General review of the conquest of Canaan, ch. xi.
  - a. The second league of Canaanitish kings, xi. 1-6.
  - b. The great victory at the water of Merom, xi. 7-9.
  - c. Subjugation of the rest of northern Palestine, xi. 10-15.
  - d. General review of the conquest of West Palestine, xi. 16-23.

Section Third. Catalogue of all the kings conquered under the leadership of Moses and Joshua, in East and West Palestine.

1. Catalogue of the kings conquered in East Palestine, xii. 1-6.
2. Catalogue of the kings conquered in West Palestine, xii. 7-24.

PART SECOND.

THE DIVISION OF THE LAND OF CANAAN; OR, "DEEDS OF THE PEACE"
(F. Burmann). Chaps. xiii.-xxiv.

Section First. God's command to Joshua to distribute the land in West Palestine. Retrospective glance at the territory already assigned to the two and a half tribes east of the Jordan. Beginning of the division. Caleb's portion. Chaps. xiii., xiv.

1. God's command to Joshua to distribute the land, xiii. 1-7.
2. The territory of the two and a half tribes east of the Jordan, as already granted to them by Moses, xiii. 8-33.
  - a. Its boundaries. The tribe of Levi, xiii. 8-14.
  - b. The possession of the tribe of Reuben, xiii. 15-23.
  - c. The possession of the tribe of Gad, xiii. 24-28.
  - d. The possession of the half tribe of Manasseh. More concerning the tribe of Levi, xiii. 29-32.
3. Beginning of the distribution, xiv. 1-5.
4. The possession of Caleb, xiv. 6-15.

Section Second. Division of West Palestine among the nine and a half tribes remaining. Appointment of the cities of refuge, and the cities of the Levites. Chaps. xv.-xxi.

1. Territory of the tribe of Judah, ch. xv.
  - a. Its boundaries, xv. 1-12.
  - b. Caleb's possession. His daughter Achsa. Conclusion to vers. 1-12, xv. 13-20.
  - c. Catalogue of the cities of the tribe of Judah, xv. 21-63.
    - α. Cities in the south, xv. 21-32.
    - β. Cities in the lowland, xv. 33-47.
    - γ. Cities on the mountain, xv. 48-60.
    - δ. Cities in the wilderness, xv. 61-63.
2. Territory of the tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh, chaps. xvi., xvii.
  - a. Its boundaries, xvi. 1-4.
  - b. Portion of the tribe of Ephraim, xvi. 5-10.
  - c. Portion of the tribe of Manasseh, xvii. 1-13.
  - d. Complaint of the children of Joseph on account of an insufficient possession, xvii. 14-18.
3. Territories of the seven remaining tribes: Benjamin, Simeon, Zebulun, Issachar, Asher, Naphtali, Dan, and the possession of Joshua, chaps. xviii., xix.
  - a. Setting up of the Tabernacle at Shiloh. Description of the land yet to be divided.
  - b. Portion of the tribe of Benjamin, xviii. 11-28.
    - α. Its boundaries, xviii. 11-20.
    - β. Cities of the tribe of Benjamin, xviii. 21-28.
  - c. Portion of the tribe of Simeon, xix. 1-9.
  - d. Portion of the tribe of Zebulun, xix. 10-16.
  - e. Portion of the tribe of Issachar, xix. 17-23.
  - f. Portion of the tribe of Asher, xix. 24-31.
  - g. Portion of the tribe of Naphtali, xix. 32-39.
  - h. Portion of the tribe of Dan, xix. 40-48.
  - i. Joshua's possession, xix. 49, 50.
  - j. Conclusion, xix. 51.
4. Appointment of the cities of refuge, ch. xx.
  - a. God's command to Joshua, xx. 1-6.
  - b. Fulfillment of this command, xx. 7-9.
5. Appointment of the cities for the priests and Levites, ch. xxi.
  - a. Demand of the Levites that cities should be given them, xxi. 1-3.
  - b. General account of the Levite cities, xxi. 4-8.
  - c. Cities of the children of Aaron, xxi. 9-19.
  - d. Cities of the other Kohathites, xxi. 20-26.
  - e. Cities of the Gershonites, xxi. 27-33.
  - f. Cities of the Merarites, xxi. 34-42.
  - g. Conclusion, xxi. 43-45.

Section Third. Release of the two and a half tribes belonging across the Jordan. Joshua's farewell discourse. His own and Eleazar's death. Chaps. xxii.-xxiv.

1. Release of the two and a half tribes, ch. xxii.

- a. Joshua's parting discourse, xxii. 1-8.
- b. Return of these tribes to their home. Erection of an altar on the Jordan, xxii. 9, 10.
- c. Embassy of Israel to these tribes on account of the altar, xix. 11-20.
- d. Apology of the two and a half tribes for building the altar, xxii. 21-31.
- e. Return of the embassy. Naming of the altar, xxii. 32-34.
2. Joshua's parting with the people. His death and that of Eleazar. The bones of Joseph, chaps. xxiii., xxiv.
  - a. The first parting address, ch. xxiii.
    - α. Promise that Jehovah will still further contend for his people and help them to the complete possession of the land, xxiii. 1-11.
    - β. Warning against apostasy from God, xxiii. 12-16.
  - b. The second parting address. Renewal of the covenant. Conclusion, ch. xxiv.
    - α. The second parting address, xxiv. 1-15.
    - β. Renewal of the covenant, xxiv. 16-28.
    - γ. Death of Joshua and Eleazar. Joseph's bones, xxiv. 29-33.

§ 9. Literature.

I. Isagogical. — Besides the Introductions to the O. T. of De Wette [translated into English by Theo. Parker], Bleek [translated by Venables, 2 vols. London, 1869], Hävernick [translated, Edinb. 1852], [Horne (Davidson)], and Keil [translated by C. Douglass, 2 vols. Glasgow, 1870], the following treatises are worthy of special mention: C. H. Van Herwerden, Disputatio de Libro Josuæ sive de Diversis, ex quibus constat, Josuæ Liber Monumentis deque Ætate, quæ eorum vixerunt Auctores, Gröning. 1826. G. A. Hauff, Einige Bemerkungen über das Buch Josua in Klaiber's Studien der würtemb. Geistlichkeit, ii. 1, 105-126; and by the same author: Offenbarungsglaube und Kritik der biblischen Geschichtsbücher am Beispiele des Buches Josua in ihrer nothwendigen Einheit dargethan, Stuttgart, 1843. König, Alttest. Studien, Heft. 1. Authentie des Buches Josua, Meurs, 1836. See Theol. Studien und Kritiken, xi. 260 ff. Baumgarten, on Josua, also on das Buch Josua in Herzog's Theol. Realencyklopædie, vii. 38-43. Winer, in his Bibl. Realwörterbuch, art. Josua. Knobel, Kritik des Pentateuch und Josua in the Exeget. Handbuch, 1861, part xiii. pp. 489-606. Nöldeke, Die alttestamentliche Literatur, Leipz. 1868, pp. 13-42. Nöldeke, Untersuchungen zur Kritik des Alten Testaments, Kiel, 1869, pp. 1-144. Fürst, Geschichte der biblisch. Literatur, Leipz. 1867, vol. i. Fürst, Der Kanon des Alten Testaments, Leipzig, 1868. Schlottmann, Die Inschrift Eschmunazars, Königs der Sidonier, Halle, 1868, pp. 9-34.

II. Commentarii—s.

"Ephraem Syri, Explanatio in Libr. Josuæ in vol. i. of his Opera Syriace. Theodoret, Quæstiones in Josuam, in vol. i. of his Opera, ed. Schulze. Aurel. Augustini, Quæstiones in Libr. Josuæ, in vol. iii. of his Opera, Antwerp, 1700, fol. R. Sal. Jarchi (Raschi), Comment. Heb. in Libr. Josuæ, etc., Lat. vers. a Jo. Fr. Breithaupto, Goth. 1714, 4to.

"Jo. Calvini, Commentarii in Libros Mosis necnon in Librum Josuæ, Amstelodami, 1667, fol. Nic. Serarius, Comment. in Libr. Josuæ, etc., Mog. 1609, vol. i. fol. Andreas Masius, Josuæ Imperatoris Historia illustrata, Antwerp, 1574, fol. Dav. Chytræi in Historiam Josuæ, etc., Explicationes Utilissimæ, Lips. 1592, fol. J. A. Osiander, Commentarius in Josuam, Tüb. 1681, fol. J. Christ. Ysing, Exercitationes Historiæ in Pentateuchum et Librum Josuæ, Regiom. 1683, 4to. Seb. Schmidt, Annotationes in Libr. Josuæ, appended to his Comment. in Jesaiam, ed. 2, Francof. 1692, 4to. Critici Sacri, containing Annotata in Libr. Josuæ by Seb. Munster, Fr. Vatablus, Isid. Clarius, A. Masius, Jo. Drusius, and Hugo Grotius, vol. i. ed. 2, Francof. 1696, fol. Synopsis Criticorum, etc., adorn. a Matth. Polo, Francof. 1694, vol. i. 4to. Corn. a Lapide, Comment. in Josuam, etc., Antwerp, 1718, fol. Jo. Clerici, Veteris T-st. Libri Historici, etc., ed. nov. Tüb. 1783, fol.

"Aug. Calmet, Commentaire Literal sur le Vet. Test., Josue, le Juges, etc., Paris, 1711, 4to. J. D. Michaelis, Anmerkungen für Ungelehrte, with his Germ. translation of the O. T., part v. i. Götting. 1774, 4to. Jo. Christ. Frid. Schulzii, Scholia in Vet. Test., vol. ii., Norimb. 1784, 8vo. Exegetisches Handbuch des Alten Test., part i. with appendices in three parts., Leipz., 1797, 8vo. Thadd. Ant. Dereser, Anmerkungen zu der heiligen Schrift des Alten Test. (as edited by him and Dom. v. Brentano) part ii. vol. i., Frankf. 1801, 8vo. F. J. V. D. Maurer, Commentar über das Buch Josua, Stuttg. 1831, 8vo. Ern. Fr. Car. Rosenmüller, Scholia in Vet. Test., part xi. vol. i. Josuam continens, Lips. 1833, 8vo."

To this list of Commentaries given by Kell, and very carefully prepared, we may add still: Walch, Bibl. Theol. iv. 466 sqq., 980. Das Buch Josua nach dem Masoretischen Texte neu übersetzt (by Edward Kley), edited by Frankel, Leipz. 1817. F. J. V. D. Maurer, Commentarius grammaticus criticus in V. T. in Usum maxime Gynasiorum et Academiæ adornatus, vol. i. 97-126, Lips. 1835, 8vo. K. F. Keil, Kommentar über das Buch Josua, Erlangen, 1847, 8vo. [translated into English, Edinb. 1857<sup>1</sup>]. Kurzgefasstes Exegetisches Handbuch zum Alten Test., part xiii.; Numeris, Deuteronomium und Josua, erklärt von Dr. A. Knobel, Nebst einer Kritik des Pentateuch und Josua, Leipz. 1861, 8vo. Biblischer Kommentar über das Alte Test., edited by K. F. Keil and F. Delitzsch, Zweiter Theil. Die prophetischen Geschichtsbücher, Erster Band: Josua, Richter und Ruth, von K. F. Keil, Leipz. 1863.<sup>2</sup> (An abridged edition of his former work, revised with reference to the commentary of Knobel, which had appeared in the interval [translated into English, Edinb., 1865]).

[Many of the general Commentaries on the O. T. and special Treatises on pertinent topics mentioned in the first volume of this Commentary on the N. T., p. 19, and in the first on the O. T. pp. 62, 63, might here be recalled. In particular, our old popular commentators should not be altogether overlooked: Mat. Henry, Scott, Gill, Ad. Clarke, etc. Though they may be often less than satisfactory on the "hard places," and sometimes unduly swayed by their theological systems respectively, their insight into the religious significance and uses of the divine word at times shows itself very instructively.]

We may mention especially on the Book of Joshua:—

Bush, Notes Critical and Practical on the Books of Joshua and Judges, 1838.

Chr. Wordsworth, Holy Bible with Notes, ii. part i. pp. 1-74, Lond. 1865.—Tr.]

Of the numerous monographs which have been published on particular passages of our book, especially on ch. x. 9 ff., we specify the following: A. Calmet, Concerning the Command of Joshua that the Sun and the Moon should stand still, and the Rain of Stones which fell on the Canaanites, Josh. x. 11 ff., in his Biblical Researches, iii. 1, 53 ff. An Attempt to prove from the Scripture that the Sun did not stand still in Joshua's Time: in the Theological Repository, vol. i. See Allgem. Deutsche Bibliothek, iii. 29 ff. Biblisches-astron. Abhandlung von der Kopernischen Meinung der Weltban, als der heil. Schrift nicht entgegen, Leipz. 1774. Sturm, Ist Jos. x. 12 der Stillstand des Sonnes oder des Hagelwetters zu verstehen? Schleitz, 1778. J. D. Ilgen, De Imbre Lapideo et Solis et Lunæ Mora inter Pugnam Israelitarum sub Josuæ Auspiciis cum Amorrhæis, Lips. 1793, 4to. J. Chr. F. Steudel, Was sagt der Stillstand der Sonne auf Josua's Geheiß? in the Tübing. Zeitschrift, 1813, i. 126-152. N. A. Chr. Weigle, Ueber Josua x. 7-15, ibid. 1834, iv. 107-165. Hengstenberg, in the Evangelische Kirchenzeitung, 1832, No. 88, and ibid. 1868, Nos. 47 and 49. Das Wunder des Herrn in der Schlacht wider die Amoriter: A Reply to the Essay in the Evang. Church Gazette (Nov. 1832) on the standing still of the Sun, Josh. x., Barmen und Schwelm, 1833. G. F. Goltz, Die Stillstehende Sonne zu Gibeon, nach Grundsätzen des Koperkanischen Systems erläutert und vertheilt. Dr. G. Barzilai, Un Errore di Trente Secoli, 1868, translated into German by Dr. J. M. Triest, under the title: Josua und die Sonne: Explanation of the passage Josh. ch. x. 9-14 by Dr. G. Barzilai, Printing-House of the Austrian Lloyds, 1868. Zöckler, Kopernikus oder Ptolomæus? Betrachtung über Josua x. 12, 13, in the Beweis des Glaubens, iv. (July and August 1868), p. 248 ff. G. Jahn, Der gesunde Menschenverstand und die stillstehende Sonne zu Gibeon, Ducherow, 1868. A. Hengstenberg (in Bochum), on Josh. x. 12-14, in the Beweis des Glaubens, v. (June 1869), pp. 287, 288.

III. Historical Writings.

J. J. Hess, Geschichte der Israeliten vor den Zeiten Jesu, Zürich, 1776-1778, 12 Bde.; in particular Bd. 1, History of the Commanders. Bertheau, Israelit. Geschichte, p. 271 ff. H. Ewald, Geschichte des volkes Israel bis Christus, Bd. 2, p. 296 ff. (2 Ausg.) Göttingen, 1853 [translated into English by Russell Martineau, Lond. 1868. The references in this work are to the 2d Germ. edition, but the nature of the topics will easily lead in all cases to the place intended.—Tr.] J. H. Kurz, Lehrbuch der heiligen Geschichte, 6 Aufl., Königsberg, 1853, pp. 97-103.

<sup>1</sup> [References to this earlier work of Keil in the present commentary will be adapted to the English translation.—Tr.]

<sup>2</sup> [References to this work in these pages will apply to the German Edition.—Tr.]

[Translated into English, Edinb. 1859.] L. Noach, Von Eden und Golgotha, Biblisch-geschichtl. Forschungen, Leipz. O. Wigand, 1868. (Hitherto two volumes have appeared full of the strangest hypotheses suited to confound all previous researches. See the critique in the Literar. Centralblatt, 1869, No. 25). F. Hitzig, Geschichte des Volkes Israel vom Anbeginn bis zur Eroberung Masada's im Jahre 72 nach Christus. In two parts, Part I. To the end of the Persian Rule. Leipz. 1869, p. 95 ff. [Oehler, Das Volk Gottes, in Herzog, Realencyk. vol. xvii. p. 259 f. Dean Milman, History of the Jews, N. Y. 1867, book v. Dean Stanley, Lectures on the History of the Jewish Church, 1st Series, lects. ix.-xii. "The Conquest of Palestine." Rawlinson's Historical Evidences, Boston, 1860, lect. iii. — Tr.]

IV. Geographical Writings.

1. Books of Travel. As important towards the geographical explanation of the Book of Joshua, we must mention particularly: Travels in Syria and the Holy Land, by Burckhardt, Lond. 1822. In German: J. L. Burckhardt's Reisen in Syrien, Palästina und der Gegend des Berges Sinai, edited by Gesenius, Weimar, 1823, 2 Bde, 8vo. Seetzen's Reisen durch Syrien, Palästina, Phönizier, die Transjordanländer, Arabia, Petraea und Unteregypfen, edited by Kruse, Berlin, 1854, 3 Theile. G. H. v. Schubert, Reise in das Morgenland in den Jahren 1836 u. 1837. Erlangen, 1838-40, 3 Bde. Biblical Researches in Palestine, Mount Sinai, and Arabia Petraea; A Journal of Travels in the Year 1838, by E. Robinson and E. Smith, edited by Edw. Robinson, D. D.; 3 vols. Boston, 1841.<sup>1</sup> [2d ed. 1856, 2 vols. 8vo.] Later Biblical Researches in Palestine, by the same, 1856, 8vo.<sup>2</sup> [Next in importance to Dr. Robinson's invaluable writings, for the American student, and almost indispensable to interpret even them to our imagination and heart, must now be reckoned Stanley's Sinai and Palestine (Am. ed. N. Y. 1868). The praise bestowed on this by Grove in the Dict. of the Bible, is not exaggerated. Singularly valuable towards a revision of the English version of the O. T. is the Vocabulary of Topographical Terms, with which, as an appendix, this work is enriched. — Tr.] Strauss, Sinai und Golgotha, 7 Aufl. Berlin, 1859. J. Rusegger, Reisen in Europa, Asien und Africa, Stuttg. 1841-50, 7 Bde. Philip Wolf, Reise in das Gelobte Land, with a new plan of Jerusalem, Stuttg. 1849. E. W. Schultz, Reise in das Gelobte Land, Mülheim a. d. M. 1853. Titus Tobler, Dritte Wanderung nach Palästina, im Jahr 1857; A ride through Philistia, travels on foot in the mountain of Judaea, and gleaning in Jerusalem; Gotha, 1859, with a map. Titus Tobler, Nazareth in Palästina. Nebst Anhang der vierten Wanderung, with a supplement of Illustrations; Berlin, 1868. Konrad Furrer, Wanderungen durch Palästina, with a view and plan of Jerusalem and a map of Palestine (by Henry Lange), Zurich, 1865. Fr. Valentiner, Das heilige Land, "wie es war" und "wie es ist." Keil, 1868. Van de Velde, Memoir, in explanation of his Map of the Holy Land, mentioned below. See on the whole subject, Titus Tobler, Bibliographia Geographica Palaestinae, Leipz. 1867.

[This work is said by Dr. Hackett (Smith's Dict. of the Bible, art. Palestine, p. 2319) to present the names of 1066 writers on subjects connected with the geography of Palestine. The appendix to Dr. Robinson's Biblical Researches gives a chronological list of such authors, embracing almost all of much importance up to that time, and the catalogue published in Gage's Translation of Ritter (vol. ii.), with that at the close of the article, Palestine, in the Dictionary of the Bible, Amer. edition, will supply all that is needed to fill out this department of bibliography to the present date. And here we take occasion to say that in that Dictionary almost every geographical topic, mentioned in the present work, and scarcely less topics of biography, antiquities, ethnology, will be found treated with a satisfactory fullness of learning and admirable succinctness. The corrections and additions of the American edition are valuable throughout, and within the sphere of sacred geography are quite essential to the due presentation of a few important questions. It may almost replace for the English student, and is in some respects superior, in point of geographical information, to the great German Theological Dictionary, Herzog's Theologische Realencyklopädie für Protestantische Theologie und Kirche, Stuttg. & Hamb. 1844-1866.

Much of the same praise is believed to be due to the geographical articles in the last edition of Kitto's Cyclopædia of Biblical Literature, and Fairbairn's Imperial Bible Dictionary, illustrated; with which, however, the present writer is less well acquainted.

<sup>1</sup> [The references to this work in the present volume are adapted to the edition of 1841. The copious indices will in almost all cases readily direct to the desired portion of either edition. — Tr.]

<sup>2</sup> [The references to Later Bibl. Res. in this work are conformed to the 2d ed., Boston, 1867.]

We repeat the titles of two or three books of travel, besides those named above, which seem most likely to be accessible and of service to Biblical students generally, in this country, so far as the Book of Joshua is concerned.

H. B. Tristram, The Land of Israel, a Journal of Travels in Palestine, undertaken with Special Reference to its Physical Character. Lond. 1866. Worthy to stand on the same shelf with Robinson and Stanley.

Wm. M. Thomson, The Land and the Book; or Biblical Illustrations drawn from the Manners and Customs, the Scenes and the Scenery of the Holy Land; with maps, engravings, etc. 2 vols. N. Y. 1865. Full of general information on the country, the fruit of twenty-five years' experience as a missionary there, and rendered more useful by a large number of really illustrative pictorial representations.

A multitude of American and English travellers in Palestine have published books within a few years, all contributing something towards a complete knowledge of the land, its present aspect and condition, its productions, its ancient monuments, and its history. We name the following without pausing to give full titles, because their works are, for the most part, familiar and easily procurable: Bausman, Miss Beaufort, Drew, Durbin, Fiske, Hackett, Herschell, Lieut. Lynch, McGregor (Rob Roy on the Jordan), Miss Martineau, Olin, Osborne, Miss Rogers, Stephens, Wilson. — Tr.]

2 Geographies of Palestine. Adriani Relandi, Palæstina ex Monumentis Veteribus illustrata, Trajecti Batavorum, 1714, 4to. K. Ritter, Erdkunde, 2 Ausg., Berlin, 1850–1852 (Bd. 15 u. 16). [Of these remarkable volumes, which must long remain the great storehouse of all that had been communicated concerning the Bible-lands, the portions most essential to the Biblical student have been translated by Wm. L. Gage, and published in four octavo volumes. The Comparative Geography of Palestine and the Sinaitic Peninsula, N. Y. 1866. — Tr.] By the same author: Der Jordan und die Beschiffung des toten Meeres, Berlin, 1850; and, Ein Blick auf Palästina und seine christliche Bevölkerung, Berlin, 1852. K. v. Raumer, Palästina; with a map of Palestine, 4 Aufl., Leipz. 1860. I. Völter, Das heilige Land und das Land der Israelitischen Wanderung, with a map of Palestine and a number of engravings, 2 Aufl., Stuttg. 1864. Edw. Robinson, Physical Geography of the Holy Land, Boston, 1865 (excellent). G. Arnoud, La Palestine Ancienne et Moderne ou Géographie Historique et Physique de la Palestine, avec 3 cartes chromo-lithographiées, Paris, 1868 (leaves much to be desired, and in the accompanying maps also. Comp. the Review in the Jahrbüchern für Deutsche Theologie, xiv. 2).

[On the Geography of Palestine we may add, as perhaps more appropriately belonging under this head, —

N. C. Burt, The Land and its Story: or the Sacred Historical Geography of Palestine, N. Y. 1869.

H. S. Osborne, Palestine, Past and Present, with Biblical, Literary, and Scientific Notices, Phil. 1859.

Very full and valuable on the Geography of Palestine are the articles, "Palestina," by Arnold, in Herzog's Realencyk., vol. xi., and "Städten und Ortschaften," vol. xiv. by the same.

"The Bibliotheca Sacra (vols. 1–26, 1864–1869) is particularly rich in articles on Biblical Geography from Dr. Robinson and various American missionaries in Palestine and other parts of the East." — (Hackett).

The following are worthy of notice more particularly in reference to the Natural History of the Holy Land: —

The Natural History of the Bible, by W. H. Tristram, published by the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge. The sketch by the same author in the article Palestine in the Dictionary of the Bible, p. 2307 ff. is a real multum in parvo.

H. S. Osborne, Plants of the Holy Land with their Fruits and Flowers. Illustrated. Phil. 1860.

W. S. Gage, Studies in Bible Lands, with 72 Illustrations, N. Y.

H. B. Hackett, Illustrations of Scripture suggested by a Tour through the Holy Land, Boston, 1866.

J. G. Wood, Bible Animals: being a Description of every Living Creature mentioned in the Scriptures, from the Ape to the Coral. N. Y. 1870.

Finally we must notice the publication of a work which, from the proved ability of its authors and the peculiar advantages which they have enjoyed, is sure to add much to the accuracy of our knowledge of the Holy Land:—

The Recovery of Jerusalem; a Narrative of Exploration and Discovery in the City and in the Holy Land. By Capt. Wilson, R. E., Capt. Warren, R. E., etc., etc. With an Introduction by Arthur Penrhyn Stanley, D. D., Dean of Westminster. Edited by Walter Morison, M. P., Honorary Treasurer to the Palestine Exploration Fund, London, 1871. — Tr.]

3. Maps. Besides those given in the different travels and geographical works on Palestine we will mention: Karte von Palästina, principally after the itineraries and measurements of Robinson and Smith, constructed and engraved by H. Kiepert, Berlin, 1840. Karte von Palästina nach den neuesten Quellen bearbeitet und gezeichnet von H. Kiepert, edited by C. Ritter, Berlin, 1842. H. Kiepert, Wandkarte von Palästina in acht Blättern, 3 Aufl. 1866. Karte von Palästina, by C. W. M. Van de Velde. Eight sheets printed in colors, Gotha, Justus Perthes, 1866. A German edition of the 2d English edition of the map of the Holy Land, first published in Gotha by Justus Perthes, 1858. The scale is 1-315000. (Extremely valuable for the study of the second part of our book, and in general quite excellent). — From the same publisher appeared in 1868: Der Bibelatlas in acht Blättern, von Dr. Theodor Menke, which has rightly met with high appreciation in all the criticisms upon it, and has rendered us the most essential aid in the preparation of our commentary, by its clear cartographic representation of the territory of the twelve tribes of Israel before the exile. It even distinguishes by the appropriate numbers (Map iii.), the groups of cities (Jos. xv., xviii.) in Judah and Benjamin.

[Preëminently valuable is the Bible Atlas of Maps and Plans by Samuel Clark, M. A. (Lond. 1868), published by the Society for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge. Except for the expense, this might satisfy all wants until further discoveries, especially of the Palestine Exploration Fund shall, as they must, supersede the best representations heretofore possible.

Only less complete and accurate than this is Menke's Bible-Atlas, deservedly praised above, and which, although the names are given in German, will still be quite intelligible to any English scholar, — at less than one third the cost.

What the foregoing collections of Maps are for hand use, in the study, that is the large Wall Map of Palestine and other parts of Syria, by H. S. Osborne, LL.D., and Lyman Coleman, D. D., Philadelphia, for public exhibition in the Sunday-school, or lecture room. It is 6 feet by 9 in size, with a side map of Jerusalem and its immediate vicinity, on a scale much larger still. Its delineation of the boundaries of the tribes west of the Jordan differs, however, considerably from that on Menke's Maps, and needs to be carefully tested by the record in our book.

About two thirds the size of the former is Kiepert's Wall Map of Palestine, very highly recommended and costing about half as much.

Raaz's New Wall Map of Palestine, photo-lithographed from a very excellent relief, so that "all the effects of the relief in light and shadow, mountains, valleys, lakes, streams, etc., are produced on a plane surface without destroying the illusion of a raised surface," has been reproduced in this country with the names and descriptions in English, and at a very moderate price. N. Y. 1870. Size 52 inches by 32.

There is also an excellent Relief Map of Palestine, after Van de Velde, easily obtainable through the German bookstores. Size 22 by 17 inches.

Less ambitious and costly than most of these are several good atlases and maps (but varying in excellence), published by the American Tract Society, the American Sunday School Union, and by private publishers, such as Colton, New York; Garigues & Co., Philadelphia, etc., etc.

A small relief map, prepared by W. L. Gage, is worth far more than its cost; and quite marvelous for its combination of accuracy, fullness, and cheapness is the little Atlas designed to accompany the New Hand-Book of Bible Geography, Carleton & Lanahan, New York, 1870. — Tr.]

V. Homiletical Literature.

Besides the well-known Commentaries of Starke, von Gerlach, Lisso, Dächsel, the Berleburger, Herschberger and Calwer Bibles, we cite also: Franciskus Burmannus, Die Richter

Israels oder Auslegung und Betrachtung der Bücher Josua, der Richter und Ruth, Frankfurt bei Jost Hinrich Drecker, Ao. 1695, 4to. Handel has musically wrought Joshua into his glorious Oratorio.

[J. N. Darby, Synopsis of the Books of the Bible, in 5 vols. Vol. i. pp. 299-345. 2d ed. Lond.

Matthew Henry deserves to be specially mentioned under this head. Many of his quaint remarks equal both in piety, aptness, and point, the rich comments of the German writers given in the following pages.

The Gospel in the Book of Joshua (Anon. N. Y. 1870) may suggest some profitable Christian applications of the language of the O. T., although, like Darby above, but in a greater degree, too much inclined to make gospel where the revealing spirit had only seen fit to put something else, perhaps equally good in its place. — Tr.]

THE BOOK OF JOSHUA.

PART FIRST.

THE CONQUEST OF THE LAND OF CANAAN, CHAPTERS I.-XII.

SECTION FIRST.

THE PREPARATION.

CHAPTER I. 1-V. 15.

1. The Summons to the War,

CHAPTER I.

a. The Command of God to Joshua.

CHAPTER I. 1-9.

1 Now [And<sup>1</sup>] after the death of Moses, the servant of the Lord [Jehovah], it came to pass, that the Lord [Jehovah] spake unto Joshua the son of Nun, Moses' minister, saying, Moses my servant is dead; now therefore [and now<sup>2</sup>] arise, go over this Jordan, thou and all this people, unto [into] the land which I do [omit: do] give to them, even [omit: even] to the children [sons<sup>3</sup>] of Israel. Every place that the sole of your foot shall tread upon, that have I given unto you, as I said [יְבַרַּכְתִּי] properly: spoke] unto Moses. From the wilderness and this Lebanon even [and] unto the great river, the river Euphrates, all the land of the Hittites, and unto the great sea toward the going down of the sun, shall be your coast [border<sup>4</sup>]. There shall not any man be able to [Not a man shall] stand before thee all the days of thy life: as I was with Moses, so [omit: so] will I be with thee: I will not fail thee, nor forsake thee.<sup>5</sup> Be strong and of a good courage [strong and firm<sup>6</sup>]: for unto this people shalt thou divide for an inheritance [for a possession<sup>7</sup>] the land which I swore unto their fathers to give them. Only be thou strong and very courageous [firm], that thou mayest observe to do according to all the law which Moses my servant commanded thee: turn not from it to the right hand or [Heb. and<sup>8</sup>] to the left, that thou mayest prosper per whithersoever thou goest. This book of the Law shall not depart out of thy mouth; but [and] thou shalt meditate therein day and night, that thou mayest observe to do according to all that is written therein: for then shalt thou make thy way prosperous and then thou shalt have good success.<sup>9</sup> Have not I commanded thee? [,] Be strong and of a good courage [firm]; [?] be not afraid, neither be thou dismayed: for the Lord [Jehovah] thy God is with thee whithersoever thou goest.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 1. The obvious and exact rendering of the conjunction here by "and" seems required to indicate the true grammatical relation of this to the preceding books. It is a circumstance of some, although perhaps not great, significance.]

canon, in respect to the composition of the historical books of the O. T. that, as the first four books of the Pentateuch are closely joined together by the copulative conjunction at the beginning of each after the first, so the historical books, without exception as far as to First Chronicles, are thus linked to each other, and all to the Pentateuch as parts of one great whole. The Chronicles appear to make a new beginning; and various reasons might be assigned why Deuteronomy should in this point differ from the three preceding books of Moses. — Ta.]

[2 Ver. 2. — וְעַתָּה. In rare instances the conj. in this compound needs to be understood in an illative sense; but generally it marks the simple succession of thoughts, and what there is of inference is equivalently expressed by our "and now." So, invariably, De Wette and Fay; but the English Version almost always renders as in this passage. — Ta.]

[3 Ver. 2. — בְּנֵי יִשְׂרָאֵל. Fay also translates: "children of Is.," De Wette, always, "sons." This is exact and much more faithful to the spirit of the East which now, precisely as in ancient times, names a people with reference to its males, "the Beni Hassan," "Beni Sakkar," etc. So the Hebrew nation were the Beni Israel, even when, in many instances, probably the women and children were distinctly thought of; but generally the men were considered in a political respect as instar omnium. — Ta.]

[4 Ver. 4. — The word "coast" is in this book synonymous with border (boundary line), except in the three places, ch. ix. 1; xii. 23; xix. 23, where it was intended to denote "coast" in our present sense, but incorrectly, as would appear, in the last two passages. "Border" is what we should now say, and that, especially in the plural, signifies figuratively, like the Hebrew, "territory," "tract," "country." — Ta.]

[5 Ver. 5. — Gesen. s. v. יָצִיטִי: I will not cast thee off and not forsake thee. So substantially Fay; De Wette, on the contrary: I will not withdraw myself from thee, etc. "Fall thee," etc., in our familiar expression, is, perhaps, as near the Hebrew as anything proposed. — Ta.]

[6 Ver. 6. — וְעַתָּה יָצִיטִי. "Verbum proprie notat vires quæ sunt in manibus ad prehendum retinendum-que viriliter; sicut contra וְעַתָּה firmitudinem, quæ in genibus est, ad consistendum, ne ab alio quis evertatur," Michaëlis; (conf. וְעַתָּה Job iv. 4, וְעַתָּה, 1 K. xii. 18, וְעַתָּה, equus alacer, Zech. vi. 8." Maurer. — Ta.]

[7 Ver. 7. — Fay here renders "divide for an inheritance" with the English Version, but De Wette gives simply "to partition," and Gesenius appears to be abundantly warranted in saying, s. v. לָקַח, that "the specific idea of inheritance in this verb is rare." — Ta.]

[8 Ver. 8. — The expression is stronger with "and," and "that vav is put as a disjunctive between words, i. q. or, is hardly supported by a single probable example." Gesen. Lxx. p. 236, Robinson's Trans. Fay after this "and" supplies [not]. — Ta.]

[9 Ver. 9. — וְעַתָּה יָצִיטִי should in consistency with ver. 7 be translated "shalt thou prosper," and the whole clause might then perhaps be rendered "for then shalt thou have success in thy way, and then shalt thou prosper." — Ta.]

b. Joshua's Command to the Leaders of the People, and to the Reubenites, and to the Gadites, and to the Half Tribe of Manasseh.

CHAPTER I. 10-18.

- 10, 11 Then Joshua commanded the officers [overseers<sup>1</sup>] of the people, saying, Pass through the host [camp] and command the people, saying, Prepare you victuals; for within three days ye shall pass over this Jordan, to go in to possess the land which the Lord [Jehovah] your God giveth you to possess it.
- 12 And to the Reubenites [Reubenite], and to the Gadites [Gadite], and to half the tribe of Manasseh, spake Joshua, saying, Remember the word which Moses the servant of the Lord [Jehovah] commanded you, saying, The Lord [Jehovah] your God hath given [giveth] you rest, and hath given you this land. Your wives, your little ones, and your cattle shall remain in the land which Moses gave you on this [the other<sup>2</sup>] side [of the] Jordan; but ye shall pass [pass over] before your brethren armed [eager for war, or, in ranks<sup>3</sup>], all the mighty men of valour [strong heroes<sup>4</sup>], and help them; until the Lord [Jehovah] have given [shall give] your brethren rest, as he hath given you, and they also have possessed [shall possess] the land which the Lord [Jehovah] your God giveth them; then ye shall return unto the land of your possession, and enjoy [possess] it, which Moses the Lord's [Jehovah's] servant gave you on this [the other] side [of the] Jordan toward the sun-rising. And they answered
- 16 Joshua saying, All that thou commandest us, we will do, and whithersoever thou sendest us, we will go. According as we hearkened unto Moses in all things,<sup>5</sup> so will
- 18 we hearken unto thee: only the Lord [Jehovah] thy God be with thee, as he was with Moses. Whosoever he be [Every man] that doth rebel against thy commandment [literally, mouth], and will not hearken unto thy word, in all that thou commandest him [or, us] he shall be put to death: only be strong and of a good courage [firm].

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL

[1 Ver. 10. — To indicate distinctly the office of the שֹׁמֵר, is desirable, but perhaps (with our scanty data) scarcely possible. While etymologically (שָׁמַר) scribe or clerk, would suit very well, yet from the passages cited in the exegetical notes on this verse, and from many others, it appears that the name designates a kind of overseer of a section of the people, in some way ordering them, and on the other hand representing his charge to the judge, governor, or commander to whom he was subordinate. Thus in Egypt they stood between the people and the task-masters. According to Num. xvi. 18, the shoterim appear then to have been chosen from the elders of the people, and to have constituted sometimes a council of advisers, with Moses, and sometimes (Deut. i. 16; xvi. 18) a sub-magistracy who, in connection with the "Judges" dispensed justice to the people. Superintendent, overseer, or director (Fay: Vorsteher, Ordner), probably gives substantially the sense, but is not so clearly specific as we could wish. — Ta.]

[2 Ver. 14. — מִן הַיַּרְדֵּן. This phrase constantly denotes the region beyond the Jordan where the speaker then was: "Scriptor ex eo, in quo ipse constitutus erat, loco, i. e. ex Palestina rem mittitur." Maurer. — Ta.]

[3 Ver. 14. — Fay, in Schaaren. See the authorities in exegetical note. — Ta.]

[4 Ver. 14. — De Wette, Fay: alle streitbaren Männer. But while the English phrase "mighty men of valor," implies something too marvelous, it may well be doubted whether מְבַרְכֵי הַיָּדָיִם does not often convey the idea of special ability in the military service, from natural endowments or extraordinary experience of war, something like "heroes," or "veterans in war." — Ta.]

[5 Ver. 17. — A little more exactly for the sense: In all respects as we hearkened unto Moses, etc. — Ta.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

a. Vers. 1-9. The Command of God to Joshua. The history of the conquest of the land of Canaan, commencing here and constituting the first part of the Book of Joshua, connects itself closely with Deuteronomy. There, at the end, ch. xxxiv., the death of Moses is reported, Israel's mourning for him described, and mention made of Joshua (ver. 9) his successor, while yet Moses himself is once more celebrated in words of highest praise as a prophet and leader of the people without parallel in all the subsequent times. Only Samuel afterward in some sense reached the same level (Jer. xv. 1). Here in ver. 1, Moses, after notice of his death, is honorably entitled מֹשֶׁה אֶלֶּיךָ as in ver. 7, as in Deut. xxxiv. 5; Num. xii. 7, 8, in a long series of places in our book (i. 7, 13, 15; viii. 31, 33; ix. 24; xi. 15; xii. 6; xiii. 8; xiv. 7; xviii. 7; xxii. 2, 4, 5), 1 K. viii. 56; 2 K. xviii. 12; xxi. 8; 2 Chr. i. 3; xxiv. 6; Ps. cv. 26. Sometimes also he is called מֹשֶׁה אֱלֹהִים. Ps. xc. 1; 1 Chr. vi. 49; 2 Chr. xxiv. 9; Dan. ix. 11; Neh. x. 29. Besides Moses there are so designated or so addressed by God: the Patriarchs, Deut. ix. 27, especially Abraham, Gen. xxv. 24; Ps. cv. 6, 42; Job i. 8; ii. 3; xlii. 7, 8; Kings, as David (Ps. xviii. 1; xxxvi. 1; lxxviii. 70; 1 K. viii. 66; 2 K. viii. 19; Ezr. xxxvii. 24), and Hezekiah, 2 Chr. xxxi. 16, as a theocratical leader, but Nebuchadnezzar also as one who executed God's designs (Jer. xxv. 9; xxvii. 6; xliii. 10); Prophets, as Isaiah xx. 3, whom God himself so names (Is. xliii. 10; xlv. 26; Jer. vii. 25; xxvi. 5; Am. iii. 7; Dan. ix. 6, and often). Properly all the Israelites also are servants of God (Ex. xix. 5; Lev. xxv. 42-55) and recognize themselves as such, the authors of the Psalms most freely expressing this consciousness in their distinct individuality (Ps. xix. 12, 14; xxxiv. 23; xxxv. 27; lxix. 37; xc. 16; cxix. 47, 65, 84, 122, 176; cxxxv. 14; cxliii. 2). Hence in the second part of Isaiah, the whole people is so named (Is. iv. 8, 9; xlii. 19; xlv. 1, 2, 21; xlv. 4; xlviii. 20), and then again He who is the Israelite κατ' ἐξοχήν, the Messiah, (Zech. iii. 8; Is. xlii. 1-7; xlix. 3, 5, 8; lii. 13-15, 53). On the sense of this designation, see below under Doctrinal and Ethical. — Concerning Joshua see Introduction.

Moses' Minister. Observe that Joshua is not spoken of as Moses' servant, but as מִשְׁכָּח, minister; "adjutant," we should now say, in so far as Moses was not law-giver but commander-in-chief. The formal installation of Joshua in this position is reported to us in Num. xxvii. 15 ff.

Jordan. יַרְדֵּן, almost everywhere in the O. T. with the art., from the r. יָרַד "to go down," or, when a stream is spoken of, "to flow." "The Jordan therefore means, the 'flowing' ["the Descender," Stanley], perhaps with allusion to its extremely abrupt fall and rapid course. At the present day it is called by the Arabs esh Scheriah, 'the drinking-place,' occasionally with the addition el-Kebir, 'the great.' The name el-Jurdun (Jordan), is however not unknown to the Arabic writers. . . . The length of the Jordan from where it leaves the sea of Genesaret to the Dead Sea is about sixty miles," measured in a straight line [but following the sinuosities of the stream two hundred miles]. Furrer, Wanderungen, p. 155. Robinson, Phys. Geog. p. 144 ff. Von Raumer, Palestina, p. 54 ff.<sup>2</sup>

Ver. 4. Here the boundaries of Canaan are laid down very much as they are given in Deut. xi. 24. In the other passage, however, the wilderness, Lebanon, and the Euphrates are taken together as opposed to the great sea, while here, (1.) the wilderness and Lebanon (south and north), and then again (2.) the Euphrates and the great sea (east and west) are brought together. Substantially they amount to the same. The land should be bounded on the south by the Arabian desert, on the north by Mount Lebanon, on the east by the Euphrates, and on the west by the Mediterranean Sea, as was already promised to Abraham (Gen. xv. 18-21). Still more vaguely is it expressed (Ex. xxiii. 31) "from the Red Sea even unto the sea of the Philistines," and "from the desert unto the river" (Euphrates), while in Num. xxxiv. 1-12; Josh.

<sup>1</sup> [It will be noticed by the reader of the English Bible that in references to the Psalms, the title sometimes counts as one verse. — Ta.]

<sup>2</sup> [The article on the Jordan in Smith's Dict. of the Bible, will be found quite full and satisfactory. See also the art.

"Palestine" in the same work; Bibl. Syria, Aug. 1848, p. 396 ff., Nov. 1848, p. 764 ff., Apr. 1850, p. 393 ff. Lynch's Expedition to the Dead Sea; Cruise of the Rob Roy on the Jordan, N. Y. 1870. — Ta.]

xiii.-xix., the boundaries, stated only in a general way in our passage, are quite accurately fixed.

The territory to be occupied by the people of Israel is further and more exactly ascertained from the definition, "all the land of the Hittites."

This Lebanon, as in ver. 2 this Jordan, because the river was visible close at hand, and the mountain could be seen although at a great distance.

הַלְבָנוֹן (in prose always with the art.) is, from לָבָן "to be white," the white mountain. Further particulars see in the Introduction, and in von Raumer p. 29 ff. Concerning the Hittites as well as the other Canaanitish peoples, comp. the Introduction, § 7.

Ver. 6. Be strong and firm. Luther translates finely but not accurately: "Be comforted and undismayed." De Wette: "Be firm and strong." Schroeder: "Be strong and firm," Deut. xxxi. 6;

vii. 23. We prefer this rendering of חֲזָק וְאִמָּץ, since the words, as J. H. Michaelis has noted, signify not firmness and strength in general, but the strength in the hands (חֲזָק) and the firmness in the knees (אִמָּץ, Is. xxxv. 3, cf. Heb. xii. 12, 13). Joshua must lay hold boldly and with a strong hand, and then when he has done so, allow nothing to drive him from his position. It will be noticed that in ver. 6 we find simply repeated, in almost the same words, what has been said to Joshua in Deut. xxxi. 7, 23, precisely as the promise ver. 5 is a repetition of Deut. xxxi. 6, 8.

Vers. 7, 8, admonish Joshua to a careful observance of the law, in order that the great work laid on him by the Lord may be successfully accomplished. Not depart out of thy mouth, is the same as "to be continually in the mouth." Joshua must, on the one hand, speak to the people in the words of the law, in order rightly to impress on them its sacred design, and on the other, must also ground himself always more deeply therein. Hence it is added:—

Thou shalt meditate therein day and night. We are not to think of this meditation as a learned study, but rather as a mature reflection upon the law by which Joshua penetrates more deeply into its meaning, and thus becomes qualified to speak more clearly, pointedly, and powerfully to the people. For to that particularly, and not to the "reading aloud," as Bunsen explains it, is the reference in the command, that the law should not depart out of his mouth. Comp. Deut. vi. 7; xi. 19; xvii. 19. Comp. further, Ps. i. 2, and on תַּצְלִיחַ, ver. 3 especially.

Ver. 9: "The assurance gains in strength when to the positive חֲזָק וְאִמָּץ there is added also the negative אַל תַּעֲזֹב וְאִל־תַּחַח, as in Deut. xxxi. 6, 8." Keil.

How did God speak to Joshua? By the Urim and Thummim, as Hess (Gesch. Jos. i. p. 29) supposes, appealing to Num. xxvii. 21, or, as most interpreters assume, immediately, by an inward revelation? Probably the latter, because, although we must admit that Joshua had been directed by God himself to employ the other means, and therefore with the mediation of the high-priest, yet the Lord himself by whom—observe that—the initiative is here taken, was not bound to this means, as appears very clearly from the manifestation of the angel, ch. v. 13-15. The Lord spoke to Joshua as he had spoken to Moses, and as he afterwards spoke to the prophets. Together with the divinely regulated office there went on this free communication of God's purposes without disturbance to the functions of that office when they were in proper exercise, but sometimes also to awaken them to life when light and right was extinguished in Israel, 1 Sam. iii.; Joel i. 13.

b. Vers. 10-18. The Command of Joshua to the Magistrates of the People as well as to the Reubenites, Gadites, and the Half Tribe of Manasseh.

After Joshua has received the command from God to cross the Jordan with the people, he adopts his plans and immediately enjoins upon the שָׂרִים (comp. Ex. v. 10; Num. xi. 16; Deut. xvi. 18; Josh. viii. 33; xxiii. 2; xxiv. 1) to go through the camp, and call on the people to provide themselves with victuals (the need of which is explained by the cessation of the manna, ch. v. 12), since within three days the march would begin. This statement of time is not exact, since rather, as Keil also assumes, seven days in all intervene, namely, one day for the journey of the spies to Jericho, three days for their stay in the mountain, three days for the march from Shittim to the Jordan, and the delay there, after all which the crossing of the river took place. Keil says concerning this: "We give up the attempt to identify the three days in ch. iii. 2 with those mentioned in ch. i. 11, since the text in ch. iii. 2 contains not the slightest hint of such a combination.

The article is not found with יָמִים (ch. iii. 2) by which the שְׁלוֹשֶׁת יָמִים might be referred to ch. i. 11; and we stand by the simple statements of the text, assuming that the spies were sent out immediately after the command in ch. i. 11, probably on the same day, i. e. on the third of Nisan, that they returned after three full days, i. e. on the 6th of Nisan, at evening (ch. ii. 22), and that on the next morning, i. e. on the 7th of Nisan, Joshua broke up from Shittim, came on to the bank of the Jordan (ch. iii. 1), where he rested three days, and on the tenth effected the passage." Not so Gerlach, who says rather: "As regards the chronological succession of these events, we see from ch. iv. 19 that the passage of the Jordan was effected on the tenth of the first month. That command of Joshua (ch. i. 11) was given therefore on the 7th. Early the same day he sent out the spies, and they so quickly accomplished the journey of perhaps scarcely a dozen miles that they left Jericho before the approach of that night;" (but how does this agree with ch. ii. 2, 5 ff.?) "the three days which they spent in the mountain were not full days" (where are we told that?) "being the remainder of the 7th" (which must thus have been an uncommonly long day), "the 8th, and part of the 9th. On this last they returned to Joshua, and thus he was able, in accordance with his orders received early on the 7th, to cross over on the 10th. Thus we have a very satisfactory correspondence between the series of events and the successive dates." The perplexity in which these two interpreters find themselves may be very simply cleared up if, with Knobel, we assume that the three days mentioned in ch. iii. 2 are identical with the three days here in ver. 11, but that ch. ii. was a separate report here worked in by the author, and in the insertion of which, attention was not paid to the exact determination of the dates.<sup>1</sup>

1 [In his later work (Bib. Com. in loc.) Keil still denying that the "three days" here, ver. 11, are the same as in ch

There follows now, vers. 12-18, a special demand of Joshua upon the Reubenites, Gadites, and the half tribe of Manasseh. These had, according to Num. xxxii. on account of their wealth in flocks and herds, received their possession in the land of the conquered Amorite kings, Sihon and Og, east of the Jordan. This was on the condition, however, that they should help the other tribes to conquer West Palestine; and Joshua now calls upon them to fulfill that condition and carry out the promise they had made. This they declare themselves ready to do.

Ver. 13. Remember the word which Moses commanded you, etc. Num. xxxii. 20-24 is quoted not literally but freely according to the sense, for מנחה לכם does not occur in the passage cited, — a very beautiful expression: to afford rest, to cause to rest. It is the same as giving a dwelling-place secure and undisturbed by enemies (Deut. xxv. 19), after the long, restless wanderings through the wilderness. The disobedient (Num. xiv. 26 ff.) come not into this rest (Ps. xcv. 11); but not even this is the true rest, the full κατάπαυσις, the true εσθλαίσις of the people of God, Heb. iii. 11, 18; iv. 1, 3, 8, 9.

This land (Deut. iii. 18) as in ver. 2, this Jordan, ver. 4, this Lebanon: the land in which then the whole people as yet and the speaker also were, the land east of the Jordan, — while בעבר, translated by Luther, De Wette, and Eng. Vers. "on this side," means on that side, or beyond, and is employed from the writer's point of view.

Ver. 14. מִשְׁפָּחִים is variously derived; either (Gesen.<sup>1</sup> Fürst, [with whom agree Masius, De Wette, Keil]), from מִשְׁפָּח, lumbus, venter, tanquam, sales, roboris = lumbis accincti, with which comp. Num. xxxii. 27, 32 (מִשְׁפָּחִים); also Job xxxviii. 3; Lu. xii. 35; Eph. vi. 14; 1 Pet. i. 13, — or, (Ewald) from מִשְׁפָּח, five = arranged in fives, i. e., in companies. With this Knobel sides, in so far that in Ex. xiii. 18, he defines the word, which is met with only here and in ch. iv. 12; Ex. xiii. 18; Judg. vii. 11 (cf. also the

Hi. 2, seeks to reconcile the present date with the actual time of the crossing, by assuming first that it is not meant that they should pass over within three days, but only begin to move towards it; and secondly, that although Joshua did design to reach the Jordan and cross it within three days, his intention was frustrated by the delay which his spies unexpectedly experienced. He says: "The designation 'in three days' (i. e., as appears from a comparison of Gen. xi. 13 and 19 with ver. 20, reckoning from the day of giving this command, on the third day following) 'shall ye pass over the Jordan,' is not to be taken as an announcement of the time within which the crossing should actually take place, but, with Vatabl, and J. J. Hess, as the term against which the people should be prepared for the crossing; as if he had said: Prepare your viaticals in order to go over the Jordan within three days, i. e., in order then to break up from Shittim, to cross the Jordan and be able to commence the conquest of Canaan. Thus apprehended this statement agrees with chapters ii. and iii. For according to ch. ii. Joshua sent from Shittim spies to Jericho, who after their escape from that city had to hide themselves three days in the mountain, before they could come to the camp of Israel. They were absent therefore certainly three or four days, and returned at the earliest on the evening or in the night of the fourth day from that on which they were sent out. Not until then did the Israelites break up from Shittim in the morning, and moved to the Jordan, where they still tarried, and then after three days more, crossed over the stream. At the least, therefore, eight full days, 4 + 1 + 3, must have מִשְׁפָּח, Num. xxxii. 17, which should be amended to this form), as meaning, drawn together, collected, i. e., in separate divisions or fixed companies, as opposed to individual separateness and irregular dispersion. Knobel seeks the proper etymon in the Arabic with a comparison of the Heb. מִשְׁפָּח, to compress. We translate with Ewald, Knobel, and Bunsen, "arranged in companies."<sup>2</sup>

But ye shall pass before, etc. So had they promised Num. xxxii. 17, 27, 32.

All, not to be taken strictly, since according to ch. iv. 13, only forty thousand men went over, while the two and a half tribes had, according to Num. xxvi. 7, 18, 34, 110,580 men.

Vers. 16-18 contain the joyful answer pervaded by the spirit of obedience and fraternal love, closing with the same call from the two and a half tribes, to be strong and firm, which God had addressed to Joshua. So David also addresses himself when he sings: Be of good courage and he shall strengthen thy heart, מִשְׁפָּחִים לְפָנֶיךָ, Ps. xxvii. 15.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. If we would accurately determine the meaning of the distinguishing title "servant of Jehovah," ascribed to Moses in ch. i. 1, we cannot be content to say merely that it signifies a "worshipper of Jehovah" who may be also a messenger, an ambassador of Jehovah. We are concerned rather to know how it comes to pass at all that the pious worshippers and messengers of God are called his servants. The answer might be given in the following hints. In the first place, we must not forget that we are here on oriental ground, where kings and subjects stand related to each other as lords and slaves, where the inferior towards the superior studies the most humble submission and unconditional obedience, and expresses himself also in a proportionately humble manner (Gen. xiv. 27, 32; Dan. x. 17). And thus God himself appears only as under the figure of the Most High, the Ruler of all worlds, the Lord of Hosts, before whom all the world keeps silence (Hab. iii. 20; Zach. ii. 13), passed between the first mission of the spies and the passage of the Jordan by the people. Without doubt Joshua designed to march to the Jordan within three days from the sending of the spies, and to go over the river; and simultaneously with his command to the people to prepare to cross over within three days, he had sent the spies, so that he was warranted in hoping that they would have accomplished their errand and returned within two or three days. But since they, through the unforeseen discovery of their arrival in Jericho, and the chase of the pursuers, were obliged to hide themselves three days in the mountain, Joshua could not until the day after their return break up from Shittim, and proceed to the Jordan. Neither then could he immediately cross the river, but must tarry yet three days after his arrival at the brink."

As this provides for the loss of only three days of the eight, it would appear that Joshua's "design" must have been still a misapprehension by at least two days. In other respects the explanation is not as successful as could be desired. — Ta.]

1 [Gesenius derives the word not from מִשְׁפָּח but from an assumed root מִשְׁפָּח, acrem, strenuum esse; and the sense in which he understands the partic. is strenuus, alacer. Theol. p. 494. — Ta.]

2 [After all is said, the derivation remains very obscure, and the considerations in favor of the two principal renderings very evenly balanced. For the meaning "armed" the lexicographers give little authority. — Ta.]

before whom also on his throne, the seraphim veil their faces (Is. vi.). He is, therefore, the master, men the servants. Those, however, among men (more particularly in Israel, the סְבִלֵת, Ex. xix. 5; Deut. vii. 6; xiv. 2; xxvi. 18) who serve him with special obedience, and, with extraordinary talent, like the angels in heaven (Job iv. 18), perform his will, are called his servants in a preëminent sense. So Moses; before him Abraham; after him David, Hezekiah, the prophets; all Israel, moreover, in so far as they are, according to Deut. xxxiii. 5, xxxiii. 5, 26; Is. xlv. 2, the Jeshurun, the beloved, pious people, who rightly (צִדְקָה) from צִדְקָה walk before Jehovah; and lastly the Messiah, since in Him all the excellences of his people are combined. In the second place, it is carefully to be considered that in the economy of redemption we are still on the ground of the old covenant, therefore on the ground of the Law, where God commands, and man has unconditionally to perform his dictates exactly to the letter, without any freedom whatever, hence as a slave, not as a child (Rom. viii. 15). Not even the most pious, therefore, can claim any higher distinction than this. A relation of freedom between God and man does not yet exist. Man stands yet under the law, not yet under grace (John i. 17); but precisely this absolute obedience leads to freedom. Moses is the instrument of effecting the deliverance of his people out of the slavery of Egypt, where they pined in the house of bondage (Ex. xx. 2), the iron furnace (Deut. iv. 20); but the Messiah makes many righteous (Is. liii. 11) and is a Servant, the Branch (Zech. iii. 9). In his time God gives holy increase, takes away the sins of the land in one day (Zech. iii. 9), and makes peace, so that one invites his neighbor under the vine and fig-tree (Zach. iii. 10). He is the true αἰὼς θεοῦ (Matt. xii. 18; Acts. iii. 13, 26, iv. 27, 30), whom, on account of his obedience, God acknowledges as his Son; on which cf. Nitzsch, Treatise on the αἰὼς θεοῦ in the Acts (Studien u. Kritiken, 1828, 2).

2. The declaration in ver. 4, that God has assigned to the people of Israel its portion of the earth, is in accordance with Deut. xxxii. 8 and Acts xvii. 26, in which passages he marks off to the nations their bounds. This is involved in God's government of the world, which embraces everything, the least as well as the greatest, so that all accident is excluded. As He determines for each particular man his place on earth, by birth, education, external circumstances, so He determines for each people its habitation in congruity with the disposition and character which He has lent to them, and the design which He entertains concerning them. That was peculiarly the case with Israel, when He actually gave to them the land promised to the fathers, where they might in beautiful seclusion serve the Lord their God. True, the previous inhabitants must give way, but jure divino, because through their enervating idolatry they had forfeited the right to a historical existence. It is not just, therefore, in the manner of the Wolfenbüttler fragmentist, to charge God and his agents with cruelty and injustice, but rather to heed the fundamental laws of divine Providence, according to which also his judgments are executed. An analogy may be seen in the destruction of the Roman empire amid the storms of the northern invasions. See Introd. § 3.

3. The silent collection of one's thoughts, holy meditation, is, in the over-busy activities of our time, an aid to all religious and moral life, which cannot be too earnestly recommended. It is enjoined upon Joshua in ver. 8, in simple but very suitable words, and is necessary, in order that the soul may constantly remember its origin, that the heart may lose itself in God and his word, that from this inward concentration of the living faculties, word and deed may come forth in noble perfection. "Oratio, meditatio, tentatio," make not only the theologian, but in general every religious, pious, and, in his piety, morally capable, man.

4. The rest which God gives (ver. 15) is, first, the secure possession of the land of Canaan which had been promised to the people of Israel. This מנוחה however is not, according to the view of the Epistle to the Hebrews (iv. 8), the true rest; rather, since God long after Joshua offered through David (Heb. iv. 7) an entrance into rest, must there still be another rest; "for if Joshua had brought them to the rest, He (God) would not speak of another day after this time" (ver. 8). "Therefore," the conclusion is from these arguments, "there yet remains (ἀπολείπεται) a Sabbath rest (σαββατισμός) for the people of God. For he who has entered into his (God's) rest, has given himself also rest from his works" (i. e. the works of the labor-week). It is still to be carefully noted that to express this rest of God, not κατάπαυσις but, in allusion to ver. 4, or to Gen. ii. 2, the word σαββατισμός, occurring nowhere else in the N. T., is employed. The σαββατισμός is the completed κατάπαυσις, the holy and blessed Sabbath rest in eternity for the people of God, the ἱεραγία τοῦ θεοῦ, after the pilgrimage of life is finished with the toils of the hard week of our earthly existence. Of this rest the מנוחה in the earthly Canaan is a type. So speak the Rabbins also of the שְׁכֵת הַקְּדוֹלָה (Tr. Thamid. f. 33, 2; Jabk. Rub. f. 95, 4). Compare also the beautiful, profoundly tender hymn by Jno. Sigismund Kunth († 1779), "A rest there is which yet awaits us."

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL

God's command to Joshua that he should cross the Jordan, indicates (1) the task proposed to him; contains (2) the promise of his assistance in its accomplishment; but requires also (3) the conscientious observance of his law, in order to success; and closes (4) with another enlivening exhortation to the new leader of Israel. — As Moses was a servant of the Lord, so should we also be his servants, that we may be found faithful like him. (Num. xii. 7; Heb. iii. 2) — Moses the servant of the Lord. Joshua as a type of a good servitor (not slave). — The earthly Canaan a type of the heavenly — God is faithful (ver. 5). I will not fail thee nor forsake thee, — a promise; (1) its rich import; (2) under what conditions to be appropriated by a Christian to himself. — Be strong and firm, comforted and undismayed, a text in connection with Ps. xxvii., xli. of inexhaustible use for the field-worship of God. — Of fidelity to the commands of God. — How should a true general be characterized? (1) He should be strong and firm, but (2) also pious and conscientious, that all may go well with him. — Fear not, neither be dismayed, for the Lord thy God is with thee in all which thou shalt do; to be well considered before the outbreak of a war, as well as before a battle. — Joshua and the Gileadite tribes; (1) his powerful appeal to them for fraternal assistance; (2) their cheerful answer

(ver. 12-18). — The Rest of the people of God: (1) Who gives it? (2) In what does it consist? (3) How do we attain to it? (ver. 13). How beautiful when the call of a commander, or a governor of the people, meets with a joyful readiness on their part! Should we not so meet the claims which God himself by his Word makes on us, and especially those which call for brotherly help, even though sacrifices also be required?

STARKE: O soul, remember here first of all the true Joshua, thy Saviour Jesus Christ, who has for thy good acquired the heavenly Canaan, to prepare for thee a place there, that thou also mayest dwell there and remain; fight, therefore, and subdue thy foes under the lead of thy Jesus, that thou mayest also one day take it. Whom God sends, him He also qualifies and procures for him authority and respect. The Bible and the sword with Christian rulers go very well together. O that these would also avail themselves rightly of both! One Christian should take upon him the necessity of another — and bear his burden. In the strife of Christianity also one should not be pusillanimous, but strong and firm (2 Tim. ii. 3). A spirit that would all goods and blood fain for thy mere pleasure proffer, and the heart's desires all offer, give me, Supreme Good, through thy precious blood.

CRAMER: As the eyes of the servants are to the hands of their masters, and the eyes of a maiden unto the hand of her mistress, so should our eyes also look constantly to the Lord, Ps. cxxiii. 2. If God is for us who can be against us? (Rom. viii. 31). Christian rulers also are bound to submit themselves to God's commands; it should not be with them, quod libet licet, i. e. what I please I do, 1 K. xxi. 7.

MARGINAL NOTE (of Luther): He who walks according to God's words acts wisely and happily, but he who goes according to his own head acts unwise and to no profit.

BIBL. WIRT.: In dangerous duties and circumstances there is no better comfort than when one has a regular call to the position, and God for his patron and protector. God's command should be promptly performed without any long discussion as to whether we will do it or not; for God requires obedience.

BIBL. TUB: Consoling promise! O soul mark it well, for what God says to Joshua He says also to thee. Therefore be of good courage in the struggle with sin and Satan; God will stand by thee.

OSIANDER: We should (in many cases) first care for our neighbors, for love seeks not her own, 1 Cor. xiii. 5.

GERLACH: The first revelation of God after the death of Moses installs Joshua formally in his office, gives him the double commission to lead the people into the promised land and to distribute this among them, renews the assurance of divine aid, and admonishes to steadfast fidelity towards God's law and imperturbable confidence in Him (ver. 1-9).

[DARBY: "Every place that the sole of your feet shall tread upon, that have I given you." They must go there, overcome the obstacles with the help and by the power of God, and take actual possession. . . . They never took possession of all the land which God had given. Nevertheless to faith the promise was sure, ver. 3. Spiritual strength and energy, the courage of faith, are necessary in order that the heart may be free from the influences, the fears, and the motives which act upon the natural man, and that he may take heed to the Word of God.]

MATTHEW HENRY: The removal of useful men should quicken survivors to be so much the more diligent in doing good. Such and such are dead, and we must die shortly, therefore let us work while it is yet day. It is a great mercy if, when useful men are taken away in the midst of their usefulness others are raised up in their stead to go on where they broke off, ver. 2. It is a great comfort to the rising generation of ministers and Christians that the same grace which was sufficient for those that went before them shall not be wanting to them if they be not wanting to themselves in the improvement of it (ver. 5). — When God has given us rest we ought to consider how we may honor Him with the advantages of it, and what services we may do to our brethren who are unsettled, or not so well settled as we are (ver. 15). — We must not so magnify them that are gone, how eminent so ever they were, either in the magistracy or in the ministry as to be wanting in the honor and duty we owe to those that survive and succeed them.

G. R. B.: As Joshua received and doubtless profited by the admonition of his Gileadite brethren, so may the leaders in Israel at all times gain benefit from the pious and well intended, even though superfluous, counsels of God's "plain people." — Tr.]

2. The sending out of the spies to Jericho.

CHAPTER II.

a. Sending of the Spies, and their Reception by Rahab.

CHAPTER II. 1-7.

- 1 And Joshua the son of Nun sent out of Shittim two men to spy [as spies] secretly, saying: Go, view the land, even [and] Jericho. And they went, and came into an har-
- 2 lot's house, named Rahab, and lodged [lay down] there. And it was told the king of Jericho, saying, Behold, there came men in hither to-night of the children [sons] of
- 3 Israel, to search out the country [Y<sup>7</sup>N, land]. And the king of Jericho sent unto Rahab, saying, Bring forth the men that are come to thee, which [who] are entered

- 4 into thine house, for they be come to search out all the country [land]. And the woman took the two men, and hid them, and said thus, There came men unto me
5 [and said: True,<sup>1</sup> the men, came to me] but I wist [knew] not whence they were; and it came to pass about the time of shutting of the gate, when it was dark, that the men went out; whither the men went, I wot [know] not: pursue after them quickly
6 for ye shall overtake them. But she had brought them up to the roof of the house [omit: of the house<sup>2</sup>], and hid them with the stalks of flax, which she had laid in 7 order [spread out, or stacked up for herself] upon the roof. And the men pursued after them the way to [the] Jordan unto [to] the fords: and as soon as they which pursued after them were gone out, they shut the gate.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 4. — So the lexicographers and interpreters with one consent understand יָדָע. — Tr.]

[2 Ver. 6. — "Of her house" is purely superfluous. The LXX. had substituted οἴκου for .יָדָע, and the Vulgate combined both notions, and was followed by the English Version. — Tr.]

b. Rescue of the Spies by Rahab on their Promise to her that, in the taking of the Land, they would spare her and hers.

CHAPTER II. 8-21.

- 8 And before they were laid down, she came up unto them upon the roof; and she 9 said unto the men, I know that the Lord [Jehovah] hath given you the land, and that your terror is fallen upon us, and that all the inhabitants of the land faint
10 [מָלַג, melt] because of you. For we have heard how the Lord [Jehovah] dried up the water of the Red Sea for [before] you, when ye came out of Egypt; and what ye did unto the two kings of the Amorites that were on the other side [of the] Jordan, Sihon and Og, whom ye utterly destroyed [ye devoted<sup>1</sup>]. And as soon as we had heard these things, our hearts [heart] did melt [מָלַג, flow down], neither did [does] there remain any more courage in any man, because of you [ch. v. 1]: for the Lord [Jehovah] your God, He is God in heaven above, and in earth beneath.
12 Now therefore [And now], I pray you, swear unto me by the Lord [Jehovah], since<sup>2</sup> I have showed you kindness, that ye will also show kindness unto my father's 13 house, and give me a true token [a token of truth]; and that ye will save alive my father, and my mother, and my brethren, and my sisters, and all that they have
14 [ch. vi. 23, 25], and deliver our lives from death. And the men answered her, Our life for yours, if ye utter not this our business. And it shall be,<sup>3</sup> when the Lord
15 [Jehovah] hath given us the land, that we will deal kindly and truly with thee. Then she let them down by a [the] cord through the window: for her house was upon 16 the town-wall [in the "wall-side," Gesen.], and she dwelt upon the wall. And she said unto them: Get you to the mountain, lest the pursuers meet you, and hide yourselves there three days, until the pursuers be returned; and afterward may ye go 17 [go ye] your way. And the men said unto her, We will be [are] blameless of this thine oath which thou hast made us swear, [unless thou doest what we now say to thee].
18 Behold, when we come into the land, thou shalt bind this line of scarlet [crimson] thread in the window which thou didst let us down by: and thou shalt bring [gather] thy father, and thy mother, and thy brethren, and all thy father's household home unto thee. And it shall be, that whosoever shall go out of the doors of thy house into the street, his blood shall be upon his head, and we will be guiltless [blameless, as ver. 17]: and whosoever shall be with thee in the house, his blood
20 shall be on our head, if any hand be upon him. And if thou utter this our business, then we will be [are] quit [blameless] of thine oath which thou hast made us
21 to [omit: to, as ver. 17] swear. And she said, According unto your words, so be it. And she sent them away, and they departed: and she bound the scarlet [crimson] line in the window.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 10. — מָלַג. The meaning of this verb is well indicated in the Exegetical Note on the verse. It seems very desirable to express it more specifically than is done by the vague phrase "utterly destroyed." In employing for this purpose, throughout, the word "devote," which is used Lev. xvii. 23, 29, Num. xviii. 14, etc., it is to be regretted that we have not a cognate noun to denote the devoted object. Still we may come near to the Hebrew directness by adhering to "devote," "devoted thing," etc. — Tr.]

[3 Ver. 12 — וְיָ ut aliis sapissime significat quod וְיָ. Maur. To imitate exactly the Hebrew construction is not possible in idiomatic English. A nearer approach to it would be: Swear . . . that I have shown you kindness and ye will also show kindness to my father's house, and give me a token of truth (ver. 13), and save alive, etc. Fay explains by inserting after "that" [as], De Wette, "because," and both omit, of course, the "and" before "give me," or rather substitute "also." Either way gives us substantially the proper sense so far, but whether the verbs וְיָ and וְיָ and וְיָ are to be translated as coordinate with וְיָ and subordinate to וְיָ (which they grammatically are), or as coordinate with the latter, the practice of interpreters differs. We incline to side with Masius, who translates the verbs in question as all depending alike on וְיָ: jurate . . . Vos usuros esse . . . pietate; et daturus . . . conservaturosque . . . crepturosque. — Tr.]

[3 Ver. 14. — Modify, and connect the two sentences thus: Our life for yours! If ye utter not this our business, then it shall be that when, etc. — Tr.]

c. Return of the Spies to Joshua.

CHAPTER II. 22-24.

22 And they went, and came to the mountain, and abode there three days, until the pursuers were returned: and the pursuers sought them throughout all the way, but
23 found them not. So the two men returned, and descended from the mountain, and passed over, and came to Joshua the son of Nun, and told him all things that befel
24 them. And they said unto Joshua, Truly [omit: Truly<sup>1</sup>] the Lord [Jehovah] hath delivered into our hands all the land; for even [and also] all the inhabitants of the country [land] do faint [melt] because of us.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 24. — וְיָ simply introduces the following clause as quoted See Gesen. Lex. B. 1, b. — Tr.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

a. Vers. 1-7. Sending out of the Spies and their Reception by Rahab. Probably still the same day on which Joshua had received the divine command to cross the Jordan, he sends forth secretly two spies to go over to Jericho, which was somewhere about fourteen miles distant.

Ver. 1. Shittim, Num. xxxiii. 49, Abel-shittim, i. e. Meadow of the Acacias, from שִׁטָּה, acacia, probably lying northward from Beth-jeshimoth in the land of Moab, the last camping-place of the Israelites east of the Jordan, at the outlet of the Wady Heshban, known from the history of Balaam (Num. xxv. 1; Micah vi. 5), not far from the Jordan, 60 stadia = 3 hours from the place of crossing according to Josephus (Ant. iv. 8, 1; v. 1, 1; Bell. Jud. iv. 7, 6). Near to this evidently well chosen camp-ground (Num. xxiv. 5, 6) lay the city of Beth-peor, where Moses delivered his last discourse and was buried (Deut. iv. 46; xxxiv. 6). Compare, further, Knobel on Num. xxii. 1, [and Stanley, S. & P. p. 291 f. Am. ed. — Tr.]

Spies. According to the LXX. two young men, nothing like which is said in the Heb. here, but in vi. 23 we learn that the spies were young men. At all events Joshua would choose brave and prudent men for this mission, because, having himself been one of the twelve spies (Num. xiii. 9)

he knew from experience the dangers to which they would be exposed. He takes only two and sends them secretly (שֵׁתָּה, prop.: Silence, here used adverbially) that the enemy might get no intimation of it.<sup>1</sup> Should he have done this? the question has been asked.<sup>2</sup> Toward the answer it may be said, That the use of human prudence, with all trust in divine providence, is not only allowable, but often also a binding duty. Joshua ought not, in his position as a general, to enter into a strange and hostile land without having explored it first. He proceeded in full conformity with the example of Moses, Num. xiii.

Jericho. Written here "and everywhere in our book יְרִיחוֹ, but in the Pent. only יְרִיחוֹ," Keil; 1 K. xvi. 34, יְרִיחוֹ; a very strong city (ch. vi. 1), the key to all the land west of the Jordan, the city of palm-trees (עֵיר הַתְּמָרִים, Dent. xxxiv. 3; Judg. i. 16; 2 Ch. xxxviii. 15); in the LXX., in the N. T. (Matt. xx. 29; Mark x. 46; Luke xviii. 35, xix. 1, x. 30, Heb. xi. 30), and in Josephus (Bell. Jud. iv. 8, 3), ἱερὶκὴ; in Strabo xvi. 2, § 47, ἱερὶκός; the city of odors and fragrance (from יְרִיחַ, יְרִיחַ, fragrant place; the ending י being for וִן, comp. שְׁלִיחַ, Gesen.<sup>3</sup>); just as far west of the Jordan as Shittim was east

1 [The accent connects יְרִיחוֹ with יְרִיחוֹ, and it is probable that the secrecy is to be understood as referring equally to the Israelites and to the Canaanites. Maurer would seem to confine it to the former. He quotes Schultz as follows: "Cum Josua tristis experientia edoctus (Num. xiii. 14) sicut, quantum periculi habere posset exploratorum et multitudo et missio publica, duos tantum eisdemque clam sive inano populo emisit, ne, si tristia referrent, in vul-

gus dimanaret narratio, timidoque ac fracto animo serent Israelite luto ceteroquin duorum seque ac plurium nuntio facile alacriores futuri." — Tr.]

2 [E. g. by Masius in loc., who formally discusses the question and decides it in favor of Joshua's course. — Tr.]

3 [For other derivations and other forms of the word, see art. "Jericho." in Smith's Bibl. Dict. where also a full topographical and historical account of the city may be found. See Stanley, S. & P. pp. 299-304. — Tr.]

of it. The immediate vicinity of Jericho is very fertile. As the climate approximates to that of Egypt the harvest is ripe here by the end of March. Toward the Jordan, however, the surface is arid, and the region between Jericho and Jerusalem was a rocky wilderness, — the Quarantania, not even to this day entirely safe for travellers (Luke x. 30). Comp. Furrer, pp. 149, 151–154.

The spies successfully reach Jericho, towards evening (ver. 2); "at a time, therefore, when the courtzeans traversed the streets (Prov. vii. 9 ff; Is. xxiii. 16); they met with Rahab and followed her to her house" (Knobel). She was a לִבְיָא, פְּרוֹסָה (Heb. xi. 31; Ja. ii. 25), and not an innkeeper פְּרוֹסָה, παροικέτρια (Josephus, Ant. v. 1, 2, Chald., Rabb., Vatabb., Hess, Hist. of Josh. i. p. 37). Her name is mentioned also in the Genealogy of Jesus (Matt. i. 5) where she appears as wife of Salma or Salmon, and mother of Boaz. "The Rabbins derive from her eight prophets and priests" (Knobel). The Epistle to the Hebrews, and that of James celebrate her memory and glorify her faith and her works (Heb. xi. 31; James ii. 25). See on this the Doctrinal and Practical below. In our narrative she is seen as a very prudent person (ver. 4), of great presence of mind, degraded indeed, but by no means sunk in vice, and who therefore has intimations of the power of Jehovah the Almighty God (vers. 10, 11).

To-night (הַלַּיְלָה) as in Gen. xix. 5, 34, here more precisely defined (ver. 5). The king of Jericho receives word that in the evening twilight two strange men have arrived in Jericho and been received into Rahab's house. Perhaps there were, as Calvin conjectures, men standing at the gates, to notice suspicious people, especially as they were aware, no doubt, in Jericho, of the intentions of the Hebrews beyond the Jordan. The king sends to Rahab, therefore (ver. 3), and demands that she shall give up the men. At the same moment (not earlier, as Keil supposes) she hides the spies, as the demand of the king's servants was probably made from the outside, with which the "bring forth" (ver. 3) plainly agrees. She boldly lies to the king's messengers (ver. 4, 5) who go away, frustrated, in order to pursue as soon as possible Joshua's spies, whom they suppose to have escaped and fled toward the Jordan (ver. 7).

Ver. 3. Notice the full circumstantiality of the king's command.

Ver. 4. In וַתִּסְתֵּר the suff. sing. is not to be changed into וַתִּסְתֵּר, but is an instance rather of "the free discourse in which one passes from the plural to the singular" (comp. Ewald, Gramm. § 309 a.).<sup>1</sup> I knew not. . . . Spoken with the air of simplicity.

Ver. 5. And it came to pass about the time of shutting of the gate. Heb. וַיְהִי הַשָּׁעַר לִבְיָא as Gen. xv. 12, וַיְהִי הַשָּׁמֶשׁ לָבֵא, and it came to pass about the time of the going down of the sun (cf. Gesen. § 132, Rem. 1).

<sup>1</sup> [Speculations of the Rabbis on this, given by Masius, are curious. "This use of the sing. R. Solomon thinks to indicate both the delay of the woman in hiding them, and the narrowness of the place in which they were stowed away. RR. Kimchi and Levi. however, suppose them to have been hid not in one and the same place, but each one separately, either that the flax piled on them both might not rise too high and become thus an object of suspicion, or

When it was dark, וַיְהִי עֶרְבַּיִם, De Wette: as it grew dusk. It may, however, well be translated, "when it was dark," since in the East, night comes on soon after sundown, and the evening twilight (וַיְהִי עֶרְבַּיִם, Job xxiv. 15; Prov. vii. 9) is of very short duration, so that sometimes וַיְהִי עֶרְבַּיִם signifies simply night (Is. v. 11; xxi. 4; lix. 10).

Ver. 6, relates further where and how Rahab had hidden the spies (ver. 4) on the roof, under the stems of flax. The roof was flat (Mark ii. 4). According to the Jewish law it must be provided with a "battlement" (Deut. xxii. 8), that blood should not come upon the house by any one falling therefrom. "Here many men," as Starke observes, "might stay together, Judg. xvi. 27 (comp. also Acts ii. 1); they could walk about there within the battlement securely (2 Sam. xi. 2); could speak from thence to others (Matt. x. 27), and there they used to pray (Acts x. 9). The Romans also, but not all, had such roofs, and not over the whole house; but parts of some of their houses were furnished with such flat roofs which were called solaria, because they lay exposed on all sides to the sun, and also maniana, as the Italians now also call them altana. וַיְהִי עֶרְבַּיִם, LXX. correctly ἐν τῇ λινκαλδύμῃ, Vulg. stipula lini, therefore flax-stalks, not cotton, as De Wette (cf. also Furrer, p. 151, obs. 2), following the Arab. translation, will have it, "since וַיְהִי עֶרְבַּיִם and וַיְהִי עֶרְבַּיִם or וַיְהִי עֶרְבַּיִם are everywhere else used only of flax" (Knobel). Unbroken flax is meant, the stalks of which, about Jericho as in Egypt, reach a height of more than three feet and the thickness of a reed (comp. Winer, Realw., s. v. "Flachs" [and Smith's Dict.])

Ver. 7. To the fords — A more exact determination of "the way," and not to be referred to "they pursued after." The fords themselves cannot be identified; one may consult the maps, especially Van de Velde, who gives a road from Jericho southeasterly to a ford.

c. Vers. 8–21. Rescue of the Spies by Rahab, on their Promise to her that in the taking of the land they will spare her and hers. After the departure of the royal messengers Rahab goes up on the roof to the spies, describes to them the faint-heartedness of the people, desires an oath from them as security that they will show kindness to her and her family in return for her kindness to them, and after receiving this lets the men down by a rope through the window (vers. 8–15).

Ver. 9. Jehovah. The word is remarkable as used by Rahab, but she might easily, as even Knobel grants, be acquainted with the name of the God of Israel, as the people had already camped long in the neighborhood.

Terror is fallen upon us [וַיִּפֹּל, suff. having the force of obj. Gen.], Deut. ii. 25; xi. 25, cf. particularly Ex. xv. 13–16. The vision which was there expressed in Moses' song of triumph (ver. 15) has now been fulfilled. The inhabitants of the land melt away for fear; for they have heard how God (ver. 10) has dried up the Red Sea (Ps.

lest they should both be discovered at once. . . . What is handed down in the Commentary which we have said to be called Tanhuma, is a Jewish dream, to wit, that when the woman had hidden Caleb, the other, Phinehas, said to her: I am a priest. Now the priests, being like the angels, are visible when they please to be, when not they are not perceived; therefore the other one alone, not he, was hidden by the woman." Con. in Josuam, in loc. — Tr.]

cvi. 7, 9, 22; cxxxvi. 13, Heb. reed-sea, sea of reeds, and in Egypt, Schari-sea (schari = reed) i. e. the Arabian Gulf; and have heard also how ill it has gone with Sihon king of the Amorites (Num. xxi. 21-31; Deut. ii. 30-37), who refused the Israelites a passage through his land (Num. xxi. 23; Deut. ii. 30), and after him with Og king of Bashan (Num. xxi. 33-35; Deut. iii. 1-7). Both have lost land and people by the edge of the sword, and the recollection of this victory lived yet in the memory of after ages, as may be seen from Ps. cxxxvi. 19, 20. Gesenius derives סיחון from סח = סָחַ, from which also סָחַץ, sweepings, filth (περικάρμα, περίφθμα, 1 Cor. iv. 13), comes. Granting the correctness of this etymology, the name Sihon might perhaps be rather a nickname which the Hebrews had applied to the Amorite chief than his real name; but this we will not assume to decide. The name עֹלֵב, from עָלָה, according to the Arab., to bend, med. E. to be bent, crooked = the crooked one, would suit well with that supposition.

Ye devoted (הַחֲרִימָה, Hiph. of חָרַם). The ground signification of the unused Kal is "to cut off."<sup>1</sup> in support of which we may compare partly חָרַם, a sickle, and partly the related words חָרַץ, חָרַשׁ, חָרַת, חָרַם. Accordingly חָרַם is that which is cut off, separated, and especially, separated for God, devoted to him (Lev. xxvii. 21, 28, 29; Num. xviii. 14; Deut. vii. 26; xiii. 18; Josh. vi. 17, 18; vii. 1 ff.; 1 Sam. xv. 21; Ezek. xlv. 29), and that too "without a possibility of redemption." ἀνδραπα (Rom. ix. 3; 1 Cor. xii. 3; Gal. i. 8, 9; 1 Cor. xvi. 22).<sup>2</sup> καρὰ (Gal. iii. 13). Objects of such a doom might be persons, as here Sihon and Og (comp. further 1 K. xx. 42; Is. xxxiv. 5) or things (Josh. vi. 17, 18; vii. 1 ff.). Therefore חָרַם is to put something under the ban, to doom, i. e. to consecrate or devote it exclusively to Jehovah without a possibility of redemption, whereby the consecrated object perishes, being destroyed. Thus the word is to be understood here as often in our book, viii. 26; x. 28, 37; xi. 21;<sup>3</sup> found in xi. 12, as in 1 Sam. xv. 8, having "with the edge of the sword" appended. [See further on this subject the exeget. note on ch. vi. 17, and the doctrinal and ethical there, No. 1.]

Ver. 11. Neither did there remain any more courage, that is, on account of fear. Differently in 1 K. x. 5, where "there was no more spirit in her" expresses the result of astonishment, — Rahab recognizes God as the Almighty and Omnipotent, a knowledge which is possible to the heathen (Rom. i. 19-21).

Ver. 12. A token of truth, Heb. אֵימָן, a sign, σημεῖον, tessera, as in Ex. iii. 12; 1 Sam. iii. 34; x. 7, 9; 2 K. xix. 29; xx. 8, 9; Is. vii. 11, 14; xxxviii. 7, 22; Lu. ii. 12; 2 Cor. xii. 12; 2 Thess. iii. 17. ["Sign of truth, i. e. a sign by which they guarantee to her the truth, or reality, of the exhibition of the תּוֹקָן desired by her," Keil.] Knobel interprets: "a proof, an evidence (Job xxi. 29), that you are honest and true men," and supposes further that "Rahab points them to the moral law, which for a favor shown prescribes a thankful and true return," and he rejects the common supposition of an outward sign, with the remark that "this would have been demanded by her not till after the request in ver. 13, and would have been given by the spies now before they were let down."<sup>4</sup> But (1.) such a sign might be required just as well before as after the request in ver. 13; (2.) all the passages quoted above, especially 2 K. xx. 8, 9; Is. vii. 11, 14; xxxviii. 7, 22; Lu. ii. 12; 2 Thess. iii. 17, favor the common explanation which is supported by an actual instance in 1 Sam. xviii. 3, 4; (3.) in ver. 18 the crimson line is in fact given as such a "token;" (4.) Rahab might provisionally content herself with the oath given in ver. 14, although the sign was not yet given her, but she received it afterwards.

Ver. 14. Our life for yours, [lit. "our soul instead of yours for death," anima nostra pro vobis moriatur, Maur.] i. e. "You with the population of Jericho are threatened with death, but it shall not strike you but us, if we prove false; God shall in this case destroy us instead of you" (Knobel).

Ver. 15. Her house was, etc. The house was built against the city wall, but she dwelt on the city wall, that is, her chamber was in the upper story of the house, which rose above the wall. Many such houses still stand in old cities, as along the Rhine, for instance.<sup>5</sup> As the spies were rescued here so was Paul (Acts ix. 25) at Damascus. Starke makes here the following honest observation: "It was generally held, particularly in ancient times, punishable to leap or climb over a wall; but we readily see that this was so considered properly on account of the wanton contempt that was shown, comp. Neh. iv. 2. But here the thing was done to save the lives of innocent people and servants of God; besides, as has already been seen, Rahab was no longer bound to seek the interest and honor of her town, accursed and doomed by God."

The men have reached the ground and stand below. Rahab, from above, advises them to turn to the mountain, while they point out to her the special conditions on which they will keep the oath; and then go their way (vers. 16-21).

Ver. 16. Get you to the mountain. Probably the cavernous mountain to the north of Jericho, which the Arabs now call Kuruntul (see Robinson, ii. 303 [Quarantania, see Stanley, S. & P. 301 f.]). On the road to the Jordan the king's messengers would undoubtedly have met them, as Rahab implies in the beginning of her counsel, "lest the pursuers meet you."

Ver. 17. We are blameless, etc. To understand these words we must supply: Unless you do what we shall now say to you, Gen. xxiv. 41.

render and did render, ver. 14." This view, however, it may be remarked, is entirely precluded by the translation of vers. 12 and 13, advocated above in the textual note on the passage; for what the men are called upon to swear that they will do, they cannot in the very act be doing. — Ta.]

<sup>5</sup> [Knobel supposes the house may have been partly embraced within the wall, and Rahab's chamber strictly on top of the wall "which must therefore have been tolerably thick." — Ta.]

<sup>1</sup> [So Winer (Simonia Lex.): Gesen. and Fürst take separate views of the etymology of the verb, but all agree as to the meaning of this form. — Ta.]

<sup>2</sup> [See Smith's Dict. of the Bible, art. Anathema. — Ta.]

<sup>3</sup> [Whatever unholy object was devoted to Jehovah, being of course, incapable of use, for him and for his cause, and an abomination in his sight, must needs be destroyed. — Ta.]

<sup>4</sup> [Keil also supposes that "this sign consisted in nothing else than the solemn oath which they were called upon to

Vers. 18-20. This line of crimson thread תִּהְיֶה = קוֹ is line, not rope, תִּהְיֶה. This line was spun out of "crimson thread" (חֵשֶׁן תִּשְׁנִי).
 תִּשְׁנִי is the crimson color produced by תולעת תִּשְׁנִי, Coccus ilicis, Linn. a cochineal insect living on the holm-oak, the larvæ of which yield the crimson dye ("crimson," from the Arabic name of the insect, Kermes). This line is to be distinguished from the cord (ver. 15), and not identified with it as is done by Luther, who even connects the relative clause בִּלְבָד — תִּהְיֶה ungrammatically with 'הָהָא instead of תִּהְיֶה, as Knobel also approves. This is the "token" given by the spies to Rahab, and by her (ver. 21) fastened to the window.<sup>1</sup> A thick red cord would hardly have been proper for this, as Schulz perceived when he remarked: "Neque etiam probabilis est, eundem illum funem, quo Rachab in demittendis exploratoribus usa sit (ver. 15), fenestræ alligatum fuisse, uti Lutheri versio vernacula statuit multis sequacibus; funis enim iste facilem suspicionem movisset, exploratores in Rachabis ædibus quæsitos ejus restis ope demissos esse, cum contra tenuis ac leve flum coccineum nihil suspecti haberet." This view is held also by Maurer and Keil, and before Schulz, by J. D. Michaelis. From its bright red color the line was visible at a distance. But how did Rahab reach the line when the men were below and she above at the window? They probably fastened it to the cord which she then drew up. To this first condition the spies add a second, namely, they would be clear of their oath also if she did not gather all her relatives into her house, which they were not to leave (vers. 18, 19). The third and last condition is that Rahab shall betray nothing (ver. 20).

His blood be upon us. Blood = blood-guilti-ness, responsibility for blood, Gen. xxxvii. 26; Lev. xvii. 4. In this signification we have the plural also דָּמִים. Hence יָרֵד דָּמִים, יֵרֵד, 2 Sam. xxi. 1; Ezek. xxii. 2; "man of blood," Ps. v. 7; xxvi. 9; lv. 24. Compare besides Matt. xxvii. 19, 24, 25.

Ver. 21. She fastened the line in the window, not the cord.

c. Vers. 22-24. Return of the Spies to Joshua.
 The last verses of the chapter relate the return of the spies who, after tarrying three days in the mountain, recrossed the Jordan [probably by swimming, as the water at this season was too high to ford.—Tr.] and came with joyful tidings to Joshua (vers. 22-23).

All that befel them. "The כָּל־הַמַּצְאוֹת
 כָּל־הַיְּהוּדָה אֲחֵיהֶם is synonymous with אֲחֵיהֶם Gen. xlii. 29" (Keil) "On מָצָא, to overtake, befall, comp. Ex. xviii. 8; Num. xx. 14. Similarly קָרָה, Gen. xlii. 29." (Knobel)

Ver. 24 contains the most important part of their report, that the inhabitants of Canaan were very much dispirited and fearful (בָּטָן, as in
 ver. 9).

1 [Knobel denying the reference to any material sign in ver. 12, is obliged by the art. in תִּהְיֶה to identify תִּהְיֶה (line) with תִּהְיֶה (rope) ver. 15.—Tr.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. Besides that Rahab has received an honorable position in the genealogical record of Jesus (Matt.
 i. 5), she is mentioned with praise by the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews (xi. 31) as well as by James (ii. 25), as a woman of vigorous faith. "The former of these," as Rüetschi observes (Real-Encyklop. xii. 514), is followed by Clemens Rom. who not only makes Rahab a pattern of πίστις and φιλοφροσύνη, but praises in her a certain προφητεία, since he finds in the red line a sign of the redemption through Christ's blood of all who believe and hope in the Lord." This red line is applied allegorically by Starke also, "This red, scarlet precious line," he says, "leads us to the blood of the paschal lamb of the O. T. . . . but still more plainly points us to the precious, crimson blood of Jesus, shed for us, etc., by which we are upheld and kept unto salvation, as Rahab and her family were kept alive and safe by that red line."

It need scarcely be said that the Scripture itself knows nothing of this signification of the red line, and yet it may be well worth while to subject the two passages, Heb. xi. 31 and Jas. ii. 25, to a brief examination. In Heb. xi. it had just been said that the walls of Jericho fell down through faith after they had been compassed about by the Israelites seven days. Then we read: "by faith the harlot Rahab perished not (οὐ συναβλήτο) with them that believed not (τοῖς ἀπειθήσασι,) since she received the spies with peace (μετ' εἰρήνης, Luth.: with friendship). Faith is thus ascribed to her as to the Israelites, that faith, namely, which is the "substance" a confident expectation (ὁπδοσῆσις) of that for which one hopes, and the "evidence," or conviction of the reality of things not seen (Heb.
 xi. 1). She is also called, honestly, πόρνη, while the Rabbins (see above, after the example of Josephus, Ant. v. 12, 7), uniformly make of her an inn-keeper, or also a concubine (Kinchi). On the same track Christian interpreters followed later, proposing to translate the זָרָה "stranger" or "heathen woman." But in this matter we must abide by the historical truth of the Epistle to the Hebrews, as Matthew also, in bringing in Tamar, Rahab and Bathsheba into the genealogical register, "without doubt aimed to show the Jewish-Pharisaic spirit that there was a higher righteousness than that of outward Jewish holiness" (Lange, Comm. on Matt.
 i. 5). By her faith Rahab was led to this higher righteousness, "and rose above the fact that she had until then been a heathen and a harlot" (Lange,
 l. c.). Therefore she perished not with the unbel-iefers when she had received the spies with peace.
 Her faith in the God of heaven and earth (Josh. ii.
 11) had so sharpened her sight that she distinctly foresaw the conquest of the land (ch. ii. 9) and clearly perceived the disheartened mind of the Canaanites. It was a strong faith, which showed its fruits in works of love (Gal. v. 6). Hence James places her beside Abraham (ch. ii. 24) and says of her that by (ἐξ) works she was justified;
 "likewise also was not Rahab the harlot justified (δικαιώθη) by works since she received the messengers (ἀγγέλους not κατασκόπους, as in Heb. xi.
 31) and sent them out another way." We first notice here that, as in Heb. xi., Rahab is called πόρνη, then that her practical faith exhibited in the reception of the spies is praised, as Abraham's practical faith manifested in the offering of Isaac is in ver. 21. But yet it is in James also expressly faith (ver. 22) which constitutes the principle of all outward conduct. Therefore, since we must deny all fundamental difference between Paul and James, we cannot agree with Rüetschi in saying (ubi sup.): "The author of the Epistle to the Hebrews brings forward Rahab as an example of faith, and James (ii. 25) consistently with his position, as an example of righteousness through works." For, in reference to δικαιοσύνη, Lange has hit the truth when he says on this passage, "The term δικαιοσύνη means with James, according to the O. T. way of speaking but with a N. T. depth, that God declares righteous in the theocratic forum before the theocratic congregation regarded as permanent. It is the divine declaration of the proof [proved reality?] of faith in God's kingdom and for it, while the λογισθεῖσθε εἰς δικαιοσύνην of James, or the δικαιοσύνη of Paul is an act which passes simply between God and the sinner in the forum of his consciousness." In this theocratic sense now Rahab was justified, "not merely in that her life was granted (Josh. ii. ; vi. 22 ff.), but in that, still further, she became a highly honored mother in Israel" Lange, Comm. on James in L. c.). Her faith was not a dead faith but living and effectually active. But faith remains ever, even according to the view of James, the principle of her action, for he adds in confirmation of this (ver. 26): "For as the body without the spirit is dead, so is faith also without works dead." Faith must perfect itself through works (ver. 22) that it may suffice for justification not only before God but also before the congregation. So was it with Abraham's and also with Rahab's faith. Both stand justified before God and before men; before God immediately through faith, before men through faith, evincing, certifying, displaying itself in works.

[If God acts He goes beyond the limits of the existing dispensation, and oversteps his established relationships with man. It is thus that the divine nature of Jesus, and the divine rights of his person, manifested themselves. He was sent only to the lost sheep of the house of Israel. That was the limit of his formal relationship with men. But if faith lays hold of the goodness of God, can that goodness deny itself, or limit itself, to those who for the time being were alone the subjects of his dispensation? No, Christ could not say, God is not good, I am not good, to the degree you have imagined. How could God deny himself? The Syrophenician woman obtains what she asks for. Precious prerogative of faith, which knows and owns God through everything; which honors Him as He is, and ever finds Him what He is!"]

"Wherein was manifested that faith in Rahab which the Apostle cites as a pattern? Admirable proof that the way in which God acts in grace is before and above law, that grace overleaps the boundary which law ascribes to man, even while maintaining its authority,—an authority, however, which can only manifest itself in condemnation. What then was Rahab's faith? It was the faith which recognizes that God is with his people, all weak and few as they may be, unpossessed of their inheritance, wandering on the earth without a country, but beloved of God. If Abraham believed God when there was not a people, Rahab identified herself with this people when they had nothing but God." Darby, p. 309.—Tr.]

But Rahab lied to the messengers of her king. Did this falsehood also come through faith? Certainly not; rather in it she showed her natural disposition, precisely as it was with the Hebrew midwives (Ex. i. 19) who, although they feared God (Ex. i. 17), nevertheless deceived Pharaoh; or with that woman at Bahurim (2 Sam. xvii. 18–20), who denied that Ahimaaz and Jonathan, David's spies, were with her when Absalom's servant sought them. Abraham on the other hand, when Isaac's perplexing question (Gen. xxii. 7) tempted to a so-called "white" lie, answered from faith (Gen. xxii. 8) and gave in so doing an example for every one in such cases.

[ADDED FROM KEIL BY THE TRANSLATOR: The falsehood with which Rahab was shrewd enough not only to turn off all suspicion of her being in collusion with the men of Israel who had come into her house, but also to lead the further pursuit of them away from her house, and to frustrate the attempts to capture them, can be excused neither as a lie of necessity to accomplish a good end, nor with Grotius on the unfounded plea, that "ante Evangelium mendacium viris bonis salutare culpæ non ducatur." Nor can it be explained as either "allowed" or "even praiseworthy," because the author simply reports the fact without judgment of his own, nor yet because Rahab, as appears from what follows (ver. 9 ff.), being persuaded of Jehovah's omnipotence and of the reality of the miracles wrought by God for his people, acted in pious faith that the true God would give the land of Canaan to the Israelites, and that all opposition to them was vain and a resistance to Almighty God himself. For a lie is and always must be a sin. Although, therefore, Rahab in this was moved by no thought of protecting herself and her family from destruction, and the disposition from which she acted was rooted simply in faith in the living God (πίστει, Heb. xi. 31), so that what she did in this disposition for the spies, and so for God's cause, is reckoned to her for righteousness (ἐξ ἔργων δικαιοσύνη, James ii. 25), still the course which she adopted was a sin of weakness, which for her faith's sake was graciously forgiven her,—an "infirmity, quæ ipsi ob fidem gratiose condonata est." Calov.—Tr.]

2. That the spies gave their oath was quite proper, since "necessity required it." Generally in antiquity, and so also among the Israelites, the taking of oaths was much more common than with us (Gen. xxiv. 37; 1. 5; Judg. xxi. 5; 1 Sam. xiv. 24 etc., Matt. xiv. 7), and this was especially the case in private intercourse. To avoid, as far as possible, the use of God's name in this, they in later times availed themselves of other objects by which to swear, as clearly appears from Matt. v. 33–37; xxiii. 16 ff.; James v. 12. Against such frivolous swearing both Christ and the Apostle James speak, while both alike indicate the ideal of Christian truthfulness in that yea should be yea, and nay, nay. The more our life and the life of others approaches to perfection, the less need will there be of oaths and confirmation of the nature of oaths. In the private intercourse of Christians with each other, this is indeed the case now wherever the spirit of Christianity is in any considerable degree active in their hearts. The state also will have to strive after this, but as things in general now are, and representing as it does the law and not the gospel, it cannot yet forego the oath as a means of justice.<sup>1</sup> Therefore the Christian also, out of

<sup>1</sup> [On the propriety in itself of the appeal to God by a sincere worshipping in confirmation of his veracity (which is essentially the oath), see Tholuck's Com. on the Sermon on the Mount, at Matt. v. 33–37. But this being fully granted, it seems to the present writer extremely questionable whether the entire disuse of such appeals before our courts, custom obedience to "the powers that be." (Rom. xiii. 1) will have to submit to the taking of the oath. The rejection of the oath by Anabaptists, Mennonites, and Quakers, was closely connected with that of military service, and with the refusal to assume public offices, and rested on antinomianism. — That to pledge the soul, therefore the life, as is done here, ver. 14, and elsewhere in the O. T., is not allowable for us Christians, needs no argument. On the other hand, it is carefully to be observed, and has with right been specially pointed out by interpreters of this passage, what care the spies take with the conditions, under which they should be clear of their oath; how precisely they put them in form, how clearly and plainly they express them, that they might not afterwards be charged with perjury (vers. 14, 17 ff.) Another example of great conscientiousness in reference to an oath, see in ch. ix. 19, 20.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

The sending of the spies to Jericho. (1.) Sending forth and reception by Rahab (ver. 1-7); (2.) their rescue (ver. 8-21); (3.) their return to Joshua (ver. 22-24). — The heathen woman Rahab as a heathen of true faith, with reference to Heb. xi. 31; James ii. 25. — Base things before the world and things which are despised has God chosen — proved by the example of Rahab especially as presented by Matt. i. 5. Comp. i Cor. i. 28. — How faith sharpens discernment concerning the condition of an individual or of a whole people. — Dependency as a result of heathen sentiment and life. — Even yet we may hear what the Lord does if only we will hear. — The glory of God as (1.) above in heaven, and (2.) below, on the earth. — One should care not only for himself but for all those belonging to him. — Rahab as a faithful daughter and sister. — Kindness and truth a beautiful ornament of God, not less also of men. — The rescue of the spies out of Jericho and that of Paul out of Damascus compared with each other (ver. 15; Acts. ix. 25). Good advice ought always to be received. Proceed carefully when you have to take an oath, that no one afterwards may charge you with its violation. — Of an oath; (1.) when is it allowable? (2.) what is it? (3.) what results from it? — Let it be as you say — much spoken in few words. — The joyful return of the spies to Joshua with praise and thanksgiving to the Lord.

STARKE: Christian! To us also heaven is promised, Luke xiii. 24; Col. iii. 1, 2 [Heb. iv. 1, 11]. Truth and friendship are never better sought than in extreme danger. — Woman's craft exceeds all craft, therefore beware of it. By God's name only house officials, revenue assessors, etc. etc., would not rather promote the ends of justice, while it would certainly do away with a shocking scandal to religion. This is of course, on the supposition that something like the "affirmation" now allowed should be regularly substituted, and the civil penalties for falsehood here be righteously assigned and rigorously exacted. It is one thing to conjecture of what use the oath might be in these civil transactions if reverently administered and intelligently taken; it is quite another thing which we actually witness, and are likely to witness, when men by myriads throughout the land daily mumble over the most solemn form of words, without a thought of their significance, and seal the mockery for the most part by an act of superstitious nonsense. When we consider that should one swear, Deut. vi. 13, Zeph. i. 5. — How sacred and inviolate must the oath have been at all times among the Israelites, when even a heathen woman would trust her life to it. O, that Christians would observe this, and keep their oaths also sacred and inviolate! Ecc. v. 4. — In making contracts men should explain themselves clearly to each other, and use no ambiguous language. — Christians should be silent, for a loquacious tongue brings many into sorrow, Prov. xiii. 3, 16, 26; [James ii. 2 ff.]. In time of persecution to conceal one's self is quite proper for the ministers and servants of God also. God can soon take courage away from enemies.

HEDINGER: While one has ordinary means one should use them; but if these fail one may betake one's self to God's immediate help. We enter not by the little side door except when the great portal is shut. Even the greatest sinners when they truly repent, are agreeable to God (Jer. v. 3). One discreet and faithful person in a house is wont to cause much good; where, on the contrary, all are careless and secure, then it often happens that they all perish together (Gen. xxxix. 2-5).

CRAMER: For the best good of his country every patriot should give himself up even to the hazard of body and life (1 Sam. xvii. 41). Those who are on their journeys God can wonderfully keep from dangers, Ps. xxxi. 21, xci. 1.

OSIANDER: Right faith breaks forth thus in free confession of the truth, magnifying and praising God, and streaming out in love towards fellow men.

[MATTHEW HENRY: There are many who before their conversion were very wicked and vile, and yet afterward come to great eminence in faith and holiness. — They who truly believe the divine revelation concerning the ruin of sinners, and the grant of the heavenly land to God's Israel, will give diligence to flee from the wrath to come, and to lay hold on eternal life, by joining themselves to God and to his people. — They that will be conscientious in keeping their promises will be cautious in making them, and perhaps may insert conditions which others may think frivolous. — Sinners' frights are sometimes sure presages of their fall.

THOS. SCOTT (on ver. 12, 13): When we really discover the danger to which our souls are exposed, from the wrath of an offended God, and are earnestly seeking salvation, we shall begin to feel for those who are not sensible of their own lost condition. This will induce us to attempt what we can to forward the salvation of our beloved friends and relations; and thus they who have been the grief and disgrace of their families, may, by the grace of God, become their protection as well as ornament. — Tr.]

an oath thus carelessly employed, is in the most aggravated sense, taking the name of God in vain, and that our laws almost necessitate this in cases so numerous that their united sound may be imagined rising as a constant murmur to heaven amidst the voice of our public life, we may well dread the condemnation due to a profane people. Is there really any counterbalancing gain in the ascertainment of the truth?

Is not the evidence now got by affirmations as satisfactory as that by oaths? The word of the man who actually regards God needs not the sanction of an oath; for him who does not the penitentiary alone has any terror, and to that he might as well appeal. — Tr.]

3. The Passage of the Israelites through the Jordan.

CHAPTERS III.-IV.

a. Joshua's Regulations concerning the Passage through the Jordan.

CHAPTER III. 1-13.

- 1 And Joshua rose early in the morning; and they removed [broke up<sup>1</sup>] from Shittim and came to [the] Jordan, he and all the children [sons] of Israel, and lodged there before they passed over. And it came to pass after three days, that the officers
 2 [overseers] went through the host [camp]; and they commanded the people, saying, When ye see the ark of the covenant of the Lord [Jehovah] your God, and the priests the Levites bearing it, then ye shall remove [break up] from your place, 3 and go after it. Yet there shall be a space between you and it, about two thousand cubits by measure: come not near unto it, that ye may know the way by which ye must go; for ye have not passed this way heretofore.
 4 And Joshua said unto the people, Sanctify yourselves; for to-morrow the Lord
 5 [Jehovah] will do wonders among you. And Joshua spake<sup>2</sup> unto the priests, saying, Take up the ark of the covenant, and pass over before the people. And they took up the ark of the covenant, and went before the people.
 6 And the Lord [Jehovah] said unto Joshua, This day will I begin to magnify thee in the sight of all Israel, that they may know that as I was with Moses, so I will 7 be with thee. And thou<sup>3</sup> shalt command the priests that bear the ark of the covenant, saying, When ye are come to the brink of the water of [the] Jordan, ye shall stand still in [or, at the] Jordan.
 8 And Joshua said unto the children [sons] of Israel, Come hither, and hear
 9 the words of the Lord [Jehovah] your God. And Joshua said, Hereby ye shall know that the [a] living God is among you, and that he will without fail<sup>4</sup> drive out from before you the Canaanites [Canaanite], and the Hittites [Hittite], and the Hivites [Hivite], and the Perizzites [Perizzite], and the Girgashites [Girgashite], and 10 the Amorites [Amorite], and the Jebusites [Jebusite].<sup>5</sup> Behold the ark of the covenant of the Lord of all the earth passeth over before you into [through the]
 11 Jordan. Now therefore [And now] take you twelve men out of the tribes of Israel, 12 out of every tribe a man. And it shall come to pass, as soon as the soles of the feet of the priests that bear the ark of the Lord [Jehovah] the Lord of all the earth, shall rest in the waters<sup>6</sup> of [the] Jordan, that the waters of [the] Jordan shall be cut off from [omit; from], the waters that come down from above; [,] and they [omit; they] shall stand upon a heap [in, or, as a heap.]

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

1 [Ver. 1. —  $\text{סִפְּדוּ}$ , see Gesen. s. v. — Ta.]

2 [Ver. 6. — Prop.: said,  $\text{אָמַר}$ , but since, when this verb is (very rarely) repeated as here, our language would not now bear "he said . . . saying," there is no way but either to render the first verb "spake" with English Vers. or omit the participle altogether. — Ta.]

3 [Ver. 8. — Fay translates, "and now," as though he read  $\text{וְעַתָּה}$  instead of  $\text{וְעַתָּה}$ . — Ta.]

4 [Ver. 10. —  $\text{וְהָיָה כִּי יִשְׁמַע ה' אֶת הָעָם}$ . The emphatic force of the infin. absolute in connection with the finite verb is habitually neglected in translation by De Wette and Fay. Herein we think our version certainly is to be preferred, although it doubtless sometimes makes too much of this peculiar Hebrew combination. To give as nearly as possible the shade of meaning intended is often a matter of much nicety of expression. Cf. Gesen. Gram. § 133, 3 a. — Ta.]

5 [Ver. 10. — The Gentile names here are all in the sing., and although the Hebrew usage in this respect does not always coincide with the English, in the present case at least our version would gain as much in force as in fidelity by an exact imitation of the original. — Ta.]

6 [Ver. 13. — The Hebrew noun for water is always plural, but construed with verbs of either number. The English Vers. varies capriciously between the two. In some connections the plural is doubtless more adequate in the English, but generally "water" would be the right expression. — Ta.]

b. The Passage of the Jordan.

CHAPTER III. 14-IV. 17.

- 14 And it came to pass, when the people removed [broke up] from their tents to pass over [the] Jordan, and the priests bearing the ark of the covenant before the 15 people; and as<sup>1</sup> they that bare the ark were come unto [the] Jordan, and the feet of the priests that bare the ark were dipped in the brim of the water, (for [the] Jordan overfloweth all his [its] banks all the time of harvest,)<sup>2</sup> that the waters which came down from above stood and rose up upon an heap, very far from [by<sup>3</sup>] the city Adam, that is beside Zaretan; and those that came down toward the sea of the plain [the Arabah<sup>4</sup>] even [omit: even] the salt sea, failed, and were cut off [were entirely cut off]: and the people passed over right against Jericho. And the priests that bare the ark of the covenant of the Lord [Jehovah] stood firm on [the] dry ground in the midst of [the] Jordan, and all the Israelites passed over on [the] dry ground, until all the people [nation, אֲרָצִי] were passed clean over [the] Jordan.

1 IV. And it came to pass, when all the people were clean passed over [the] Jordan, that the Lord [Jehovah] spake unto Joshua, saying, Take you twelve men out of the people, out of every tribe a man, and command ye them, saying, Take you hence out of the midst of [the] Jordan, out of the place where the priests' feet stood firm, twelve stones, and ye shall carry them over with you, and leave them in the lodging-place where ye shall lodge this night.

4 Then [And] Joshua called the twelve men, whom he had prepared of the children 5 [sons] of Israel, out of every tribe a man; And Joshua said unto them, Pass over before the ark of the Lord [Jehovah] your God into the midst of [the] Jordan, and take you up every man of you a stone upon his shoulder, according unto the 6 number of the tribes of the children of Israel: that this may be a sign among you, that [omit: that] when your children ask their fathers [omit: their fathers] in time 7 to come, saying, What mean ye by these stones? Then ye shall answer them [say to them], That the waters of [the] Jordan were cut off before the ark of the covenant of the Lord [Jehovah]; when it passed over [the] Jordan, the waters of [the] Jordan were cut off: and these stones shall be for a memorial unto the children 8 [sons] of Israel forever. And the children [sons] of Israel did so as Joshua commanded, and took up twelve stones out of the midst of [the] Jordan, as the Lord [Jehovah] spake unto Joshua, according to the number of the tribes of the children [sons] of Israel, and carried them over with them unto the place where they lodged, 9 and laid them down there. And Joshua set up twelve stones in the midst of [the] Jordan, in the place where the feet of the priests which bare the ark of the covenant 10 stood, and they are there unto this day. For [And] the priests which bare the ark stood in the midst of [the] Jordan, until every thing was finished that the Lord [Jehovah] commanded Joshua to speak unto the people, according to all that Moses 11 commanded Joshua: and the people hastened and passed over. And it came to pass, when all the people were clean passed over, that the ark of the Lord [Jehovah] passed over, and the priests in the presence of [before] the people. And the children [sons] of Reuben, and the children [sons] of Gad, and half the tribe of Manasseh passed over armed [eager for war, or, in companies ch. i. 14] before the 13 children [sons] of Israel, as Moses spake unto them. About forty thousand prepared for [the] war passed over before the Lord [Jehovah] unto battle, to the plains [desert plains, steppes, אֲרָצֵי] of Jericho.

14 On that day the Lord [Jehovah] magnified Joshua in the sight of all Israel, and they feared him [,] as they [had] feared Moses, all the days of his life.

15 And the Lord [Jehovah] spake unto Joshua, saying, Command the priests that bear the ark of the testimony [law, Gesenius] that they come up out of [the] Jordan. Joshua therefore [And Joshua] commanded the priests, saying, Come ye up 16 out of [the] Jordan. And it came to pass, when the priests that bare the ark of the covenant of the Lord [Jehovah] were come up out of the midst of [the] Jordan, and [omit: and] the soles of the priests' feet were lifted up [plucked out אֲרָקָה] unto the dry land, that [and] the waters of [the] Jordan returned unto their place, and flowed over all his [its] banks, as they did before.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

1 [Ch. 3. Ver. 15. — Our version is here particular to mark the difference between אֲרָצִי with Inf. const. (אֲרָצִי) and אֲרָצִי in the same connection in ver. 13 (אֲרָצִי). The distinction is slight, and in many cases probably none was deliberately aimed at in the choice of the particle; yet strictly the latter (ב) denotes an action as contained in another (in time), the former (ו) denotes it as bearing a comparison with that other in respect to time (or quality or condition), as simultaneous, following close upon, about the same as, etc. — Ta.]

* (Ch. iii. 15. — Literally, and the Jordan was full on all its banks all the days of harvest. — Ta.]

* (Ch. iii. 16. — Very far ("sc. from the place of crossing," Keil) at or by the city of Adam. Our version followed the Keri here apparently without good reason. — Ta.]

* (Ch. iii. 16. — The Arabah (as in ch. xviii. 18, 22) the definite, individual "plain," which bordered the Jordan River and the Dead Sea. See the Exeget. Note on this verse. — Ta.]

[5 Ch. iv. 13. — These were the expanse of the Jordan-valley (Arabah) in the neighborhood of Jericho, greatly widened here by the retreat of the mountains toward the west. — Ta.]

[6 Ch. iv. 13. — The exact translation would be: "And it came to pass — were come up out of the midst of the Jordan, the soles of the priests' feet were plucked out unto the dry land, and the waters of the Jordan returned and went as before on all its banks." The return of the water to its course is thus carefully associated with the last step of the priests from the muddy bed of the stream. — נִתְּקוּ אֶל הַחֲרָבָה is prag. for, "were plucked up out of the bed of the stream and stepped on the dry or solid land." Keil. — Ta.]

c. The Erection of the Memorial at Gilgal.

CHAPTER IV. 19-24.

19 And the people came up out of [the] Jordan on the tenth day of the first month, 20 and encamped in Gilgal, in the east border of Jericho. And those twelve stones 21 which they took out of [the] Jordan, did Joshua pitch [set up] in Gilgal. And he spoke unto the children [sons] of Israel, saying, When your children shall ask their 22 fathers in time to come, saying, What mean these stones? Then ye shall let your 23 children [sons] know, saying, Israel came over this Jordan on [the] dry land. For the Lord [Jehovah] your God dried up the waters of [the] Jordan from before you, until ye were passed over, as the Lord [Jehovah] your God did to the Red sea, 24 which he dried up from before us, until we were gone over: that all the people [peoples] of the earth might know the hand of the Lord [Jehovah], that it is mighty, that ye [Fay: they] might fear the Lord [Jehovah] your God for ever.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

a. Joshua's Arrangements for the Passage of the Jordan. — And Joshua rose early. אֶתֵּן as in Gen. xix. 2, 27; xx. 8; xxii. 3; xxviii. 18; xxxii. 1, with and without the addition "in the morning." Properly אֶתֵּן is a denom. from אָנַן, "to load up, on the backs of beasts of burden, which among the nomads is done early in the morning," = אָנַן Is. xxxiii. 20. — This breaking up took place immediately after the return of the spies, and this verse accordingly belongs properly to ch. ii.

Ver. 2 is in continuation of ch. i. 10-16. The three days here are the same as in ch. i. 11. In ch. ii. which is otherwise very appositely inserted, and in a way completely suiting the connection, the differences in the dates were not, we must simply admit, duly taken into account. On the other hand it seems to us unnecessary, to assume a contradiction between ver. 1 on one side and vers. 2-6 on the other, on the grounds that (a.) the people, according to ver. 1, were at the Jordan and not 2,000 cubits off from it; (b.) the Israelites spent only one night (לַיְלָה) there, and so could not have been there after three days. Although we grant that the word here translated "lodge" commonly means to "spend the night" (Gen. xix. 2; xxiv. 25; xxviii. 11; xxxii. 14, 22), still in view of such passages as Job xix. 4; xli. 14; Ps. xxv. 13; xlix. 13, we may well take it here in the sense of to encamp, to tarry, as the Vulgate, when it translates

"orati sunt. [The English word "lodge" very appropriately represents לוֹן.] Again: "they came to the Jordan," וַיָּבֹאוּ עַד-הַיַּרְדֵּן is certainly not to be understood with literal preciseness. It means: they came near to the Jordan, not exactly on the brink of the river. Two thousand cubits may very naturally still have intervened, especially when we take into account the great extent of the camp. This view is very evidently supported by vers. 14, 15, which, according to Knobel from the same author as ver. 1 a, state that the people removed out of their tents and the priests came to the Jordan. Had they encamped close on the river-brink, as ver. 1 is interpreted by Knobel, we should have been told immediately of the dipping of their feet in the water, but not certainly of their coming to the Jordan.

Ver. 3. Overseers. As in ch. i. 11 so also here אֲמִלֵּטִים, LXX. ὑπαμεινῶτες; Vulg. procones; Luther, Hauptleute (head-men); Stier, Amleute (officials); at first probably altogether general officers, head-men of the people (Ex. v. 6-19; Num. xi. 16), those who knew how to write. Later, the magistrates in the towns (Deut. xvi. 18; 1 Chron. xxxiii. 4). In Arabic شاطر signifies simply to write. In 2 Chr. xxvi. 11 שַׁטָּר and כַּתֵּב stand side by side. In Prov. vi. 7, the former, English Vers. "overseer," stands with מְנַל "guide" and קֹדֵשׁ "ruler."<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> [Leyrer, in Herzog's Encyclop., vol. xiv. p. 1, note, supposing the ground-meaning of שַׁטָּר to have been "to put in order," "set in a row, hence to make a row, of letters," says: "we may rather conceive that the שַׁטָּר, from the ground-meaning of the word and from their primary function, are called ordinatores, than from a derived

Ark of the Covenant. Here "ark of the covenant of Jehovah," elsewhere also "ark of God," 1 Sam. iii. 3, "ark of the testimony" [law], Ex. xxv. 22: the sacred ark with the tables of the law (according to Heb. ix. 4, with other objects also), prepared by Moses (Ex. xxv. 10 ff.) after a divine pattern. It was two and a half cubits long, one and a half cubits high, and the same in breadth. It was made of acacia wood, overlaid within and without with gold plate. The name אֲרוֹן is derived from אָרַן, to bore out, hollow out, and signifies properly something hollow, hence also "a coffin," Gen. i. 26. Figures may be seen in Hoffmann and Redlob, Universal Bibel-Lexicon for the People, i. 244; Kiepert, Bible Atlas, v. Fig. 15. [Smith's and other Bible Dictionaries, and works of the same design, may be consulted. Also Jahn, Coleman, and other writers, on Hebrew antiquities. — Tr.]

Ver. 4. Yet there shall be a space . . . . two thousand cubits by measure. As a reason it is given that the ark should show the way. Had the masses of the people, who by no means marched as soldiers, crowded around it, those that were behind could not have seen it. The sacredness of the ark is not here directly the reason, as various interpreters have supposed (Mas., C. a Lapide, Seb. Schmidt, v. Lengerke and Knobel), but yet may come in as a secondary consideration. According to Num. iv. 15 the sons of Kohath bore the sanctuary, but might not touch it. Uzziah died when he did this (2 Sam. vi. 7). We may notice also what Starke has pointed out, that no longer the pillar of cloud but the ark of the covenant leads the way. The manna likewise ceased at this time. The days of the pilgrimage are past. Two thousand cubits = one Sabbath day's journey (Acts i. 12) = three thousand feet. The Kethib בִּינִי is to be retained instead of Keri, בִּינִי. So also ch. viii. 11, "since the plural בִּינִי is limited almost entirely to the case where the suff. also has the plural sense. Comp. Ewald, § 266 a." (Keil).

Ver. 5. [Sanctify yourselves. "The sanctification of the people consisted not in the washing of their clothes, which is mentioned Ex. xix. 10-14 with the שִׁטְףָם, for there was no time for this; nor in the changing of garments merely, which according to Gen. xxxv. 2, might take the place of washing, and in abstinence from conjugal intercourse, Ex. xix. 15. These were only the outward signs of the sanctification which really consisted at the same time in the spiritual purification, the turning of the heart to God, in faith and trust in his promise, and in willing obedience to his commands, that they might rightly take to heart the wonder of grace which the Lord would the next day perform among them." Keil. — Tr.]

To-morrow. According to ch. iv. 19 the 10th of Nisan.

Ver. 6. And they took up the ark of the covenant. This statement is not exact [not in place here], the correct account is given in ver. 15, since vers. 7-13 could not be spoken after the procession was already in motion. Keil: "Whether the command in ver. 6 was given the evening before, as Maurer, or on the morning of the crossing, as Rosenmüller supposes, cannot be determined, since both were equally possible. The former is the more probable; but it is certain that the execution of this command in the last words of the verse is anticipated. For the following revelation of God to Joshua, together with Joshua's discourse to the people, cannot have taken place after the priests with the ark had already begun the march." Knobel refers the words to the breaking up of the camp from Shittim.

Vers. 7, 8. Revelation of God to Joshua, in which the Lord promises to make him great from this day forward as he had made Moses great; agreeing substantially with ch. i. 2-9. Then follows, ver. 8, God's command that "Joshua should direct the priests bearing the ark to halt when they came to the edge of the water of the Jordan, i. e., as soon as they reached the water in the bed of the Jordan, and their feet stood in it, and to remain standing. On פָּקַד comp. Gen. xliii. 15. What Jehovah communicated further is not here told, because it appears from the following." (Knobel).

Ver. 9-13. In these verses we have to think of ourselves as addressed in a solemn assembly of the people, a congregation of Jehovah. They contain the purport of the divine revelation, and more fully than it had been stated in vers. 7 and 8.

Ver. 9. "בָּאֵן with accent drawn back as in Ruth ii. 14; 1 Sam. xiv. 38, comp. Ewald, § 100 a, and 227 b." (Keil).

Ver. 10. Hereby shall ye know that a living God is among you. The design of the miracle, the furtherance of the knowledge of God as a living mighty God, is significantly put first. אֱלֹהִים

God is here called אֱלֹהִים from אֱלֹהִים, prop. the Strong One in opposition to the gods of the heathen, which are אֱלֹהִיִּם, Lev. xix. 4; xxvi. 1, nothings, אֱלֹהִיִּם, prop. breaths, Deut. xxxii. 21; Jer. viii. 19; xiv. 22; Ps. xxxi. 7, or even שִׁוְיוֹת, Jon. ii. 8, "lying vanities." He is, however, not called אֱלֹהִים merely, which term in the plural occurs also of the gods of the heathen (Ex. xv. 11), but אֱלֹהִים, to indicate that he is not dead like them, comp. Jer. x. 9, 10. On the original inhabitants of Palestine see the Introduction, § 7. As here, so previously in Deut. vii. 1, and again in this book ix. 1; xi. 3; xxiv. 11, seven races are enumerated, but in varying order. The Jebusites, however, always, except in ch. xi. 3, stand last.

Ver. 11. Lord of the whole earth. A significant appellation of God, where the conquest of a land is in question. From Him Israel has his title to Canaan.

Verse 12 compared with ch. iv. 2 occasions difficulty. Two questions arise: (1.) When was this direction given; before the crossing or during the crossing? The former according to this passage, the latter according to iv. 2. The former seems more probable, because the twelve men could not possibly be chosen during the passage. (2.) Does the choice of the twelve men rest as Knobel teaches, according to our passage, on the regulation of Joshua alone, or on the divine command, as ch. iv. 1 expressly says. Answer: The author has here the same view of the divine authority of the command as in iv. 1, otherwise he would not have incorporated these words in a discourse which contains the solemn announcement of a divine revelation.

meaning and from a mere accident of their office. See Vater, vol. iii. of his Com.; Von Bohlen, Genesis, p. xlii;

Lengerke, Kern, p. 374, Anm.; Hoffman, the Art. "Hebr. Schrift" in Fisch u. Gruber's Encyclop. — Tr.]

Ver. 13. Soles of the feet, comp. ch. i. 3. —

The water . . . shall be cut off, יִכָּרְתֶּן. Luther: be broken off; De Wette: part; literally: "shall be cut off," that is, the water above the place of crossing stood still, so that no more flowed by. The water below ran away toward the Dead Sea.

b. Chaps. iii. 14-iv. 18. The Passage of the People through the Jordan. This took place according to ch. iv. 19, on the tenth day of the first month (called Nisan or Abib), hence in the same month as formerly the departure out of Egypt. This like that was immediately before the Passover, which according to ch. v. was celebrated four days later for the first time on the soil of the Holy Land. The harvest here, in the deeply sunken heated valley of the Jordan, was already begun. The "yellow" water of the river stands high at this season, because the snows are melting on the mountains (comp. Furrer, p. 154). So much more wonderful was the event, a proof of the actual help of the "living God."

Ver. 15. And the Jordan overfloweth . . . harvest. A parenthetical sentence. The Jordan-valley, the Ghor, is two hours across, the proper river-bed, through which the stream flows, only a quarter of an hour, and the stream itself, according to Furrer's estimate (p. 154), only 90 feet in breadth. This latter valley was overflowed, and is still overflowed, by the "high-water" at the time of harvest, precisely as then. See Seetzen, Burckhardt, Robinson, [Stanley, S. & P.,] Furrer. The last named says: "When, late in the spring, the snow on Hermon begins to melt, the Jordan commonly overflows its lower bank, and puts reeds and bushes under water. So found it, as was related in Israel, the fathers under Joshua; 'The Jordan was full on all its banks all the time of harvest.'"

Ver. 16. Near Adam. Heb. אָדָם. The Kethib is to be preferred, since its meaning is that very far from the place of crossing, by the city Adam which lay at the side of Zaretan, the water stood still. This city Adam was situated, probably, where now we find the ford Damieh with remains of a bridge of the Roman period (Lynch's Report, p. 150 f., Van de Velde, Narrative, ii. p. 322 f.), "Several hours north of Jericho" (Knobel). Zaretan. "Not improbably Kurn Sartabeh, near the ford Damieh, a long, prominent rocky ridge, from which a lower range of hills reaches almost to the Jordan, and seems to extend itself obliquely through to the eastern mountains. Here the Jordan valley is compressed within its narrowest limits, and the Ghor divides itself into the upper and the lower. On Kurn Sartabeh it is reported that there are still ruins." So Knobel after Robinson (Lat. Bibl. Res. pp. 283 f., 217 f.). It is worthy of remark that just here the water "is cut off" where from both sides the mountain ridges narrow the river, and the river valley. The name Zaretan, perhaps identical with Zareda, the home of Jeroboam (1 K. xi. 26), as Knobel conjectures, is explained from the Arabic: elatus montium locus. Gesenius likewise holds the two names identical, but derives from זָרֵת, according to the Arabic, to be cool = cooling, also a suitable name for a town on a fresh hill-top in the vicinity of a river. The name Adam calls to mind Admah, one of the five cities in the vale of Siddim (Gen. x. 19; xiv. 2; Hos. xi. 8), as also Adami, a city of the tribe of Naphtali (Josh. xix. 33). Edom may also be compared with it.

Failed and were cut off. [The conception of this scene indicated by the Keri ("very far from Adam,") is different from that of our author and the recent commentators generally. It coincided with (although not necessary to) what we suppose to have been the common (popular) view, well stated and explained by Gill (among others) on the place. He naively remarks, indeed, that "both readings, as is usually, if not always the case, are to be received," but his own exposition does not require anything so unreasonable. Let the waters have been actually "cut off" above where the priests stood, in full view of the people (as the spirit of the whole account seems to lie in the visibility of the wonder to the people), and still the water would be arrested and "stand," before the crossing was finished, "very far off." The current might have ceased "at Adam," though that were thirty or even more miles above. Not only would this be immeasurably more impressive to the multitude as an exhibition of the divine power than the mere phenomenon of a bare river bed, the reason for which they could not see, but thus the fear with which "they hastened and passed over" (see on ch. iv. 10), is much more naturally accounted for. This view of the miracle ought, at least, not to be wholly ignored. Indeed, Keil seems so to conceive the scene, and he even represents (on ver. 8) the priests with the ark (symbolizing the divine presence) as constituting the dam, so to speak, by which the rushing waters were restrained and piled up in a heap. — Tr.]

Toward the sea of the plain (Arabah), the salt sea. It is evident that the Dead Sea is meant, concerning whose origin we have a report in Gen. xix. 24. It is called sea of the plain in Deut. iii. 17; iv. 49 also.<sup>1</sup> The region round about is desolate, yet birds sing on the shore of the sea in numerous choirs and fly freely over the water (Furrer, p. 258, Robinson, Phys. Geog., p. 219). The water of the sea is clear but very strongly tinged with salt, and hence fatal to fish. Bathers become covered with an oily envelope, sometimes painful, sometimes not. From the southern point of the Dead Sea clear to Elath stretches the desert valley in which the Israelites wandered for forty years.<sup>2</sup>

Mr. Grove's article on the Arabah in Smith's Dict. of the Bible, and Foulke's on the Jordan, in the same work. — Tr.]

<sup>1</sup> [A very full and interesting digest of what is known concerning the Dead Sea is given in Smith's Dictionary, Art. 'Sea, the Salt.' In reference to the relation between this sea and the cities of the plain, the criticisms of Dr. Wolcott on the views of Mr. Grove in the article just named and in those on Sodom and Zoar, and Siddim, should by all means be carefully considered. See also Conant's instructive note on his Revised Version of Genesis, p. 79. Nor should Stanley's vivid and flowing representation in ch. ix. of Sin. & Pal., "The Jordan and the Dead Sea," be overlooked. The colored views of the sea and its surroundings in Tristram's Land of Israel assist the imagination greatly in picturing to itself the scene. — Tr.]

1 ["The plain" here (תְּהֵיבָה), is the arid bottom land in the gorge of the Jordan — "the Ghor" (see Introd. § 6). To this remarkable feature of the country the name is uniformly applied throughout our book, where it is never applied to anything else. It always has the article in this connection, and nothing seems to hinder its being understood simply as a proper name (in which sense our version twice views it, xv. 6; xviii. 18) except the occurrence of the plural form to denote the broader parts of the depressed valley, as about Jericho. Robinson (Phys. Geog. p. 78) nevertheless declares it decidedly "the proper name of this valley." This plain encompassed the Dead Sea also, more or less distinctly, and then stretched on in the modern Wady el-Arabah to the head of the Persian Gulf. But see, for a complete account of this very extraordinary natural phenomenon,

Ver. 17. יָרַדָּה: "Properly: firmando, i. e. firm-iter, with solid foot." יָרַד used here of Israel, as ch. iv. 1; v. 6, 8; x. 13; Ex. xix. 6; xxxiii. 13; Deut. xxxii. 28. Where the passage took place cannot now be determined.

Chap. iv. After the author has, in ch. iii. 14-17, briefly related the history of the crossing, he completes his report in this chapter. The account is not strictly speaking without order, and confused, as some have said, but yet neither is it without repetitions which indicate a variety of authorities, blended together by a later hand. These, however, we cannot assume that it is possible to determine accurately, according to their original parts, as Knobel has with much acuteness attempted to do.

Ver. 1. And it came to pass when all the people were clean passed over the Jordan. These words were omitted by Luther in his translations. Why? Did he possibly consider the immediately following Piska (o) as a sign of their spuriousness? This Piska is, according to Keil (Bib. Com. in loc.), "a sign in use before the Masoretes, and by them left remaining to denote a division in the middle of a verse where a Parasche begins: comp. Hupfeld, Ausfuhr. Hrb. Gramm. pt. i. pp. 86 and 89. Gesenius in his Lehrgeb. p. 124, takes a different view."

Ver. 2. See ch. iii. 12.

Ver. 3. For יָרַדָּה we should read יָרַדָּה, as in ch. iii. 17.

Ver. 4. Knobel regards this as a continuation of ver. 1, a. What intervenes he refers to the second source of his Jehovist, according to which the choice of the twelve men rested on a divine direction, while the first knew nothing of it. We confidently hold that ch. iii. 12 presupposes a divine direction, which however is first stated here in the way of a supplement.

Ver. 6-9. When your children ask. Comp. xxii. 27-28; Ex. xiii. 8-14. — Stones. Here it is a heap of twelve stones, in Gen. xxviii. 18; xxxv. 14 a single stone, but in Gen. xxxi. 46, again as here, a heap of stones. They were sacred memorials of the simplest kind. According to ver. 9, "Joshua takes twelve other stones, and sets them up in the bed of the Jordan on the spot (רִחֵת) as in Ex. x. 23; xvi. 29) where the feet of the priests stood, and where the stones have remained till the time of the narrator" (Knobel). It has been asked: To what purpose, since afterwards the water streamed over them again? They might become visible in a low stage of the water.<sup>1</sup> This second measure Joshua adopts of himself without express divine direction.

Unto this day. A very common phrase in our book, as Bleek (Introd. to O. T. § 135) observes: ch. v. 9; vi. 29; vii. 26 (bis); viii. 28, 29; ix. 27; x. 27; xiii. 13; xiv. 14; xv. 63; xvi. 10.

Ver. 10. The priests remain standing in the Jordan until all the people have passed through. They had therefore, when the camp broke up, only gone the two thousand cubits in advance to show the way, then remain standing after they have taken their position in the midst of the dried bed of the stream until the passage is completed. Their quiet waiting was well calculated to impart courage to the people who hastened and passed over through fear. The contrast well deserves consideration. Knobel assumes that this very standing still of the priests was the ground of this haste. He says: "The people passed as quickly through as possible, and that on account of the priests, who during this long passage must stand in one place and bear the ark." This reason may possibly have operated also, yet such a consideration is rather modern than conformable to the sentiment of antiquity. The chief reason for the haste was certainly fear.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> [Or might it be that the "midst of the Jordan" where the priests stood in this time of the freshet, was at the edge of the dry flat in ordinary seasons? Then the pile of twelve stones would in general be visible and less exposed to the force of the water when high. Here the caution of Maurer, Ne premas, יָרַדָּה vocabulum, is to be heeded. — Ta.]

Ver. 11. After the passage, the ark again takes the lead, as in ch. iii. 3 ff.

After the history of the crossing has thus been given first briefly in ch. iii. 14-17, then more completely ch. iv. 1-11, we have some supplementary notices in vers. 12-17, and finally the conclusion ver. 18 announcing the return of the water.

On vers. 12 and 13 comp. ch. i. 12-18.

On ver. 14 comp. ch. iii. 7.

What is related in ver. 15-17 is a more particular statement of the fact mentioned in ver. 11 of this chapter, referred by Knobel, on account of the designation of the ark as "the ark of the testimony," to the Elohist original. This he supposes to have been used here first in the book of Joshua.

Ver. 18. States the conclusion, pointing back to ch. iii. 16.

c. On ch. iv. 19-24. Erection of the Monument at Gilgal. — Ver. 19. The date, on the tenth (day) of the first month, is very exact, and on this account Knobel ascribes the verse to the Elohist. The first month (as Ex. xii. 2, 18; xl. 2, 17 and often) is elsewhere called also Abib, i. e. month of green ears (Ex. xiii. 4; xxiii. 15; Deut. xvi. 1), and subsequently Nisan (Neh. ii. 1; Est. iii. 7.) "This name is probably of Persian origin, and to be explained from the Zend naraçan, new day, which was transferred to the first month of the year, from New Year's day. See Benfey, Names of the Months, p. 131 ff." Gesenius.<sup>3</sup> Fürst, in his Hist. of Bibl. Lit. p. 400, fixes the year as having been 1454 B. C. There were four days before the Passover which fell on the 14th, ch. v. 10.

Ver. 20. Gilgal, see ch. v. 9.

Ver. 21 like ver. 6, with Epic breadth as in Homer.

Ver. 22, 23, might, from the repetition of הִיבֵשׁ הַיָּרְדֵּן, seem to be a citation from a poetical panegyric on the Passage of the River, as Bunsen assumes in ver. 7 when he translates: —

"As through the Jordan passed the Ark, Flowed away the waters of the Jordan."

Here we are reminded of the "Book of Jasher," mentioned ch. x. 13, which, however, was not a "Law-book" but precisely the opposite, a poetical Hero-book. See Introd. and on ch. x. 13.

Ver. 24. All the peoples of the earth, [Keil: of the land, sc. of Canaan. But not well.] Might know the hand of Jehovah. A beautiful catholicity! The miracle made the passage possible and easy for Israel, but was at the same time to serve also for imparting to the heathen nations of all ages a knowledge of the power of Jehovah, and a fear of the Almighty," (Knobel). Instead of וַיִּסְּקוּ read וַיִּסְּקוּ (Ewald, Maurer, Knobel), with reference to the coördinate וַיִּסְּקוּ. [This is quite doubtful; we rather agree with Keil, that the Masoretic pointing should stand. — Tr.]

<sup>2</sup> [This fear would evidently be much more natural on the supposition stated above on ch. iii. 16, that the waters were cut off and stood in a threatening precipice immediately above the place of crossing. But is not the haste of the people sufficiently explained by the fact which Keil emphasizes, that so vast a multitude must cross in one day? — Ta.]

<sup>3</sup> [But see this disputed in Smith's Dict. of the Bibl. s. v. Montas, p. 2006. — Ta.]

[Stanley in the following paragraphs has finely combined the various incidents of this marvelous event, and we have only to regret that he should, as his custom too often is, bring in the Septuagint version, and Josephus, and what not, as if of about equal authority with the inspired text. His work thus wears, with all its charms of learning, arrangement, and style, too much the air of a secular relation of the history of the ancient "Church."]

"The scene of the passage of the Jordan is presented to us in the Sacred Narrative in a form so distinct, and at the same time so different from that in which it is usually set forth in pictures and allegories, that it shall here be given at length, so far as it can be made out from the several notices handed down to us, namely, the two separate accounts in the Book of Joshua, further varied by the differences between the Received Text and the Septuagint, the narrative of Josephus, and the 114th Psalm.

"For the first time they descended from the upper terraces of the valley, they 'removed' from the acacia groves and came to the Jordan, and 'stayed the night' there before they passed over.

"It was probably at the point near the present southern fords, crossed at the time of the Christian era by a bridge. The river was at its usual state of flood at the spring of the year, so as to fill the whole of the bed, up to the margin of the jungle with which the nearer banks are lined. On the broken edge of the swollen stream, the band of priests stood with the Ark on their shoulders. At the distance of nearly a mile in the rear was the mass of the army. Suddenly the full bed of the Jordan was dried before them. High up the river, 'far, far away,'<sup>1</sup> 'in Adam the city which is beside Zaretan,'<sup>2</sup> 'as far as the parts of Kirjath-jearim,'<sup>3</sup> 'that is, at a distance of thirty miles from the place of the Israelite encampment, 'the waters there stood which "descended" from the heights above,' — stood and rose up, as if gathered into a water skin;<sup>4</sup> as if in a barrier or heap, as if congealed;<sup>5</sup> and those that "descended" towards the sea of 'the desert,' the salt sea, failed and were cut off.' Thus the scene presented is of the 'descending stream' (the words employed seem to have a special reference to that peculiar and most significant name of the Jordan), not parted asunder, as we generally fancy, but, as the Psalm expresses it, 'turned backwards'; the whole bed of the river left dry from north to south, through its long windings; the huge stones lying bare here and there, embedded in the soft bottom; or the shingly pebbles drifted along the course of the channel.

"The ark stood above. The army passed below. The women and children, according to the Jewish tradition, were placed in the centre, from the fear lest they should be swept away by the violence of the current. The host, at different points probably, rushed across. The priests remained motionless, their feet sunk in the deep mud of the channel. In front, contrary to the usual order, as if to secure that they should fulfill their vow, went the three Transjordanic tribes. Their own memorial of the passage was the monument already described.<sup>6</sup> But the national memorial was on a larger scale. Carried aloft before the priests as they left the river-bed, were the twelve stones, selected by the twelve chiefs of the tribes. These were planted on the upper terrace of the plain of the Jordan, and became the centre of the first sanctuary of the Holy Land, — the first place pronounced "Holy," the "sacred place" of the Jordan valley, where the tabernacle remained till it was fixed at Shiloh. Gilgal long retained reminiscences of its ancient sanctity. The twelve stones taken up from the bed of the Jordan continued at least till the time of the composition of the Book of Joshua, and seem to have been invested with a reverence which came at last to be regarded as idolatrous.<sup>7</sup> The name was joined with that of the acacia groves of the farther side, in the title, as it would seem given in popular tradition or in ancient records, to this passage of the history: from Shittim to Gilgal" [?] Lects. on Jewish Church, i. 255 ff. — Tr.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

The ark which was borne by the priests and Levites in front of the people, takes henceforth, as was noticed above, the place of the pillar of cloud and fire which had led Israel through the wilderness (Ex. xiii. 21, 22). It may take this place because it not only serves for the preservation of the tables of the Law (Ex. xxv. 16), but is also a symbol of the presence of God among his chosen people. On the cover of the ark, the Kapporeth adorned with the Cherubim, God sits enthroned (Ex. xxv. 17-22; Num. vii. 89; Ps. xcix. 1), and from this place speaks with Moses (Ex. xxv. 22; Num. vii. 89). Hence, as follows indirectly from our passage, and directly from passages like Num. iv. 20; 1 Sam. vi. 19; 2 Sam. vi. 6 (compared with Lev. xvi. 13), the ark is unapproachable. But hence also, on the other hand, here is the true place of atonement for the people, where the blood of atonement was sprinkled on the cover of the ark (Lev. xvi. 15), once in the year only, on the great day of atonement, by the high-priest's hand. To this Paul refers, Rom. iii. 25, when he calls Christ the true mercy-seat, whom God has set forth before (πρόθετος) all the world, as a manifestation of his righteousness, for those who through faith in the efficacy of Christ's reconciling death, approach this New Testament place of atonement. "The θεοθήκη is brought out of the most holy place into the public view of the whole world for those who believe" (Lange on Rom. iii. 2). In Christ God dwells among his New Testament congregation (John i. 14), goes before them (John xiv. 6), and is reconciled to them (2 Cor. v. 19.)

2. The conception of the living God, the יְיָ (ch. iii. 10), is of great importance for the present

<sup>1</sup> Μακρὰν ἀποτόλιν ἀποτόλιν, LXX.

<sup>2</sup> LXX.

<sup>3</sup> Symmachus, as the LXX. in Ps. xxxiii. 7.

<sup>4</sup> LXX.

<sup>5</sup> [This is Professor Stanley's interpretation of the occurrence mentioned ch. xxii. 10, 11. — Tr.]

<sup>6</sup> [The passages adduced in support of this only show that a superstitious sanctity was afterwards ascribed to the place Gilgal. — Tr.]

day also, since it appears to have vanished utterly from the consciousness of many of our contemporaries, especially that of the Materialists. These, after the example of Epicurus, substitute for this living author of all things, Chance, that is, an ultimate cause which they omit to define because it is utterly incapable of logical definition. Other thinkers, better schooled in philosophy, replace the living God with an Order of Nature determining everything by inevitable law, to which order, as such, they deny self-consciousness and maintain that it comes to self-consciousness only in the consciousness of rational beings—never in and of itself. This they do from fear of transferring human limitations to the Absolute, especially the conception of personality. Of personality it is maintained that it is predicable of the human individual, never of the Godhead; as if Goethe were unquestionably in the right when he says,—

"The professor is a person
But God is none."<sup>1</sup>

But still we think humanly of God even then when we identify him with the Order of Nature, nay, it is absolutely impossible for us to think in any other way concerning God than consistently with our faculties, that is humanly. We certainly shall not, therefore, be found in the wrong course if we again turn more and more toward the sound Biblical realism which recognizes a living God who is at the same time "the Lord of the whole earth" (ch. iii. 11); therefore a God who is the conscious, independent and free Creator and Ruler of all things, of whom, in whom, and for whom we are, who also wakens life in us, so that we possess power, develop power, and bring forth new power. For life is fullness of power; where powerlessness enters—there is death.

Such a living God can perform even miracles. He can, since He is independent and free, establish exceptions to rule, which are and remain exceptions, but which, because planned by his wisdom, no more endanger the continuance of order than any exceptions to rule which a wise house-father may make will disturb the order of his house. Compare Rothe, Dogmatik, p. 80 ff.

Rationalistic explanations of miracles, such as have been attempted in reference to the passage of the Jordan by the people of Israel, are to be avoided. On the other hand, investigation of the Scripture, reverent and believing but not fettered by the spirit of prescription, cannot be avoided. Every report of any miraculous transaction is as much to be examined as the report of any other fact (Introd. p. 17). Such investigation will readily concede that reports, especially these reaching back to the most ancient times, may possibly have acquired a mythical coloring; the more readily, when it is demonstrated that poetical elements have been admitted into the text. As such mythical coloring we regard what is said in the passage before us (ch. iii. 16) about the water of the Jordan standing by Zaretan.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> [Against the arrogance and unreason of godless science some of the Essays of Rev. James Martineau (2 vols. Bost. 1868, 1868) are very effectively directed, e. g. that on Nature and God, i. 121 ff. See also a recent article by the same author: "Is there any Axiom of Causality?" in the Contemporary Review for August, 1870.

<sup>2</sup> The Materialism of the Present Day, a critique of Dr. Büchner's system; translated from the French of Janet by Gustave Masson, London, 1886 (in Ballière's Library of Contemporaneous Philosophy), is a very able and convincing

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

The regulations of Joshua touching the passage of the Jordan (ch. iii. 1-13).—Even without pillar of cloud and without ark of the covenant, the Lord still and forever goes before his people.—Sanctify yourselves! A word of preparation for the Lord's supper.—Whom the Lord makes great, he is truly great, as once Moses and Joshua.—Joshua's discourse to the people. It contains: (1) a demand to hear the word of the Lord; (2) a promise of the effectual help of the living God.—By what do we also recognize the presence of a living God among us? (1) By his word which He still causes to be perpetually published among us; (2) by his deeds which He is still perpetually performing.—The Living God! (ver. 10). How should we think of God? (1) Not as a rigid order of nature, but (2) as the living God and ruler over all the earth. The ruler over all the world: (1) The mightiest, (2) the best Ruler.

The wonderful passage of Israel through the Jordan (ch. iii. 13-4; 18) to be treated as a Bible Lesson, for which use all these longer sections are generally speaking, well adapted.—As Israel went dryshod through the Jordan so we go unharmed through many a danger.—The memory of God's mighty deeds. It is (1) to be faithfully preserved by the parents, (2) carefully to be impressed on the children.—The erection of the memorial at Gilgal.—After the pilgrimage comes the rest.—Increase of the knowledge and fear of God is the holy aim of all his works.

STARKE: He that will enter into the promised land on high must also be up early and waste no time, otherwise he will not reach it, Matt. vi. 33.—Whoever will be and be called a right spiritual priest must not only have Christ in his heart but also by an edifying example make him known to others and praise him, 1 Tim. iv. 12; Eph. v. 25-27.—God may indeed well allow us to erect memorials by which we may remember his wonderful works and his benefits, Gen. xxviii. 18; xxxi. 45; 1 Sam. vii. 12; Esth. ix. 27, but we must not worship such things, for that is an abomination to the Lord, Matt. iv. 10.—Teachers and preachers must be an example in faith and constancy, and let no danger terrify them.—A Christian on the journey towards the heavenly fatherland must not tarry, must not put off repentance, nor be lazy and slothful in God's ways, Phil. iii. 14; 1 Cor. ix. 24.—It is not enough to begin to be pious, but one must persevere even to the end, Rev. ii. 10.—A Christian should never act without, but always according to, God's will and word, Matt. xxi. 6.—It is the duty of the magistracy also to care that the youth should be educated in the fear of the Lord, Luke vii. 5.—Parents should relate to their children and hold before them, not their own vile deeds but God's merciful deeds, Ex. x. 1, 2, Deut. vi. 20.—That is the right application of God's marvelous and beneficent acts when we learn from them truly to know, fear, and love him, John ii. 11.

CRAMER: When we go to church to hear God's refutation, in short compass, of the doctrines which would explain the universe without a God.—Ta.]

<sup>2</sup> [This statement, however, seems quite consistent with the rest. If we are to imagine the water cut off perpendicularly above the path of the Israelites, the fluid wall would continually be raised by the down-coming flood, and the distance to which the water would set back ("stand"), must depend on the time during which the interruption lasted. So that there is no need of suspecting myth particularly in this.—Ta.]

word and to receive the holy sacraments, we should carefully prepare ourselves, and approach God with a chaste, temperate heart, and hold up holy hands, 1 Tim. ii. 8. — Whom God will make great, him he first makes small through wearisome cross, and care, and toil, and danger, Ps. xviii. 36. — If often the faithful God before our eyes graciously helps others out of need and peril, while we, in our own thought, are left far behind, still our hour also shall yet come. Let us only await the right time, (ver. 17.) God has patience even with the weak, Rom. xiv. 4; Matt. viii. 25, xiv. 30. — So long as Christ, the true mercy-seat, is under us, and his ministers in this unquiet life preach the gospel, we need not fear; the great floods of sins and of the wrath of God must retire, because for them that are in Christ Jesus there is now no condemnation, Rom. viii. 1. Nor can the enemies of the Church proceed further than has been appointed to them. But if Christ and his word depart from us then must we be eternally overwhelmed and perish and experience the wrath of God. — Christ with many saints has passed over into his father's house through much water of affliction, which came in even unto his soul, Ps. lxi. 1. But he has left a memorial behind him, namely, his twelve apostles and their writings. Happy they who understand this, and thank him therefor.

HEDINGER: If those who are to be merely spectators of the great works of God should first sanctify themselves, how much more have those need of sanctification whom God will employ as his servants for the performance of his work, 1 Cor. ix. 27.

BIBL. TUB.: Before thee also, O soul! there stand waters of affliction, through which thou must travel, before thou canst enter the heavenly Canaan. But only go in with good heart, and trust thyself to God's help; He will open a way for thee, so that the streams cannot drown thee, Ps. lvi. 12; Is. xlii. 2.

OSLANDER: Dear Christian, remember here the twelve apostles, who have by the preaching of the gospel spread through the world the kindness of Christ in that He would lead us, through the power of his death unto everlasting life; remember them, and heartily thank God for them, — God can cause respect for the magistracy, and also take it from them again and cover them with contempt because of their ungodly life, Ps. cvii. 4.

[MATT. HENRY: Those that would bring great things to pass must rise early, "Love not sleep lest thou come to poverty." Joshua herein set a good example to the officers under him, and taught them to rise early, and to all that are in public station, especially to attend continually to the duty of their place. — They must follow the priests as far as they carried the ark, but no further; so we must follow our ministers only as they follow Christ. — Though the opposition given to the salvation of God's people have all imaginable advantages, yet God can and will conquer it. — God's works of wonder ought to be kept in everlasting remembrance, and means devised for preserving the remembrance of them. — God had said in his wrath, that they should wander forty years in the wilderness, but to make up that forty years we must take in the first year, which was then passed, and had been a year of triumph in their deliverance out of Egypt, and this last, which had been a year of triumph likewise on the other side of Jordan, so that all the forty were not years of sorrow; and at last he brought them into the land of Canaan five days before the forty years were ended, to show how little pleasure God takes in punishing, how swift He is to show mercy, and that, for the elects' sake, the days of trouble are shortened. — Those that will be wise when they are old must be inquisitive when they are young. Our Lord Jesus, though He had in himself the fullness of knowledge, has, by his example, taught children and young people to hear and ask questions. — In all the instructions and informations parents give their children, they should have chiefly in their eye to teach and engage them to fear God for ever.

SCOTT (on iii. 3): We cannot in general go wrong in keeping close to the ordinances of God, and thus, as it were, following the ark in all its removals. In so doing we need not fear rivers of trouble, mountains of difficulty, nor hosts of opposing foes; but confiding in the faithful promise, the Almighty power and covenant-love of our God, "the living God, the Lord of the whole earth," we may proceed with boldness and alacrity.

THE SAME (iv. 10): When with careful attention to the commands and providence of God, we have taken the place and engaged in the service assigned us, we ought patiently to abide in it, and not to attempt to remove till He evidently commands us thence. — TR.]

4. The Dedication to the Holy War.

CHAPTER V.

a. The Effect of the Invasion on the Inhabitants of the Land.

CHAPTER V. 1.

- 1 And it came to pass, when all the kings of the Amorites which were on the [other] side of [the] Jordan westward, and all the kings of the Canaanites which were by the sea, heard that the Lord [Jehovah] had dried up the waters of [the] Jordan from before the children [sons] of Israel, until we were passed over, that their heart melted; neither was there spirit in them any more, because of the children [sons] of Israel.

b. The Circumcision of the People.

CHAPTER V. 2-9.

2 At that time the Lord [Jehovah] said unto Joshua : Make thee sharp knives [knives
3 of stone], and circumcise again the children of Israel the second time. And Joshua made him sharp knives [knives of stone], and circumcised the children of Israel at 4 the hill of the foreskins. And this is the cause why Joshua did circumcise : all the people that came out of Egypt, that were males, even [omit : even] all the men of war
5 [had] died in the wilderness by the way, after [as] they came out of Egypt. Now [For] all the people that came out were circumcised ; but all the people that were born in the wilderness by the way as they came forth out of Egypt, them they had 6 not circumcised. For the children [sons] of Israel walked forty years in the wilderness, till all the people [nation] that were [omit : that were] men [the men] of war, which came out of Egypt were consumed, because they obeyed not [hearkened not to] the voice of the Lord [Jehovah] : unto whom the Lord [Jehovah] sware that he would not show them the land which the Lord [Jehovah] sware unto their fathers 7 that he would give us, a land that floweth with milk and honey. And their children [sons], whom he raised up in their stead, them Joshua circumcised : for they were 8 uncircumcised : because they had not circumcised them by the way.<sup>1</sup> And it came to pass when they had done circumcising all the people, that they abode in their 9 places in the camp, till they were whole [healed]. And the Lord [Jehovah] said unto Joshua, This day have I rolled away the reproach of Egypt from off you. Wherefore [And] the name of the [that] place is called Gilgal unto this day.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

1 [Ver. 7. — More accurately : And their sons he raised up in their stead : them Joshua circumcised ; for they were uncircumcised ; for they had not circumcised them by the way. — Tr.]

c. The Passover. The Corn of the Land.

CHAPTER V. 10-12.

10 And the children [sons] of Israel encamped in Gilgal, and kept the passover on 11 the fourteenth day of the month at even, in the plains of Jericho. And they did eat of the old corn [the produce] of the land in the morrow after the passover, un-12 leavened cakes and parched corn [roasted ears] in the self-same day. And the manna ceased on the morrow after they had eaten of the old corn [produce] of the land ; neither had the children of Israel manna any more ; but they did eat of the fruit of the land of Canaan that year.

d. The Captain of the Lord's Host.

CHAPTER V. 13-15.

13 And it came to pass when Joshua was by Jericho, that he lifted up his eyes and looked, and behold there stood a man over against him with his sword drawn in his hand : and Joshua went unto him, and said unto him, Art thou for us, or for our 14 adversaries ? And he said, Nay ; but as captain<sup>1</sup> of the host of the Lord [Jehovah] am I now come.<sup>2</sup> And Joshua fell on his face to the earth, and did worship, 15 and said unto him, What saith my Lord unto his servant ? And the captain of the Lord's [Jehovah's] host said unto Joshua, Loose thy shoe from off thy foot, for the place whereon thou standest is holy : and Joshua did so.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 14. — Scarcely any problem is more perplexing to the translator of the O. T. than to find appropriate designations for the officials and dignitaries, civil and military, among the Jews and related nations. The word סַרְסֵרִים has already afforded an illustration. An identical revision of the entire O. T. with reference to this point would doubtless be requisite to remedy the difficulty, and could then, from the very nature of the case, attain only to partial success. The English Vers. is, however, unnecessarily vague. Thus, besides "captain," as here, סַרְסֵרִים is rendered by at least a dozen different terms, while "captain" answers to nearly or quite as many Hebrew words. The same is true of מֶלֶךְ, prince, and in a great measure of many others. The result is indistinctness and confusion to the reader where the Hebrew to the Hebrews was probably clear and specific. Doing our best, we could not, perhaps, from our inadequate terminology in this sphere, do with less than three different words for מֶלֶךְ. In its civil, military, and occupational applications; as captain or general (used 1 Chr. xxvii. 34), governor, chief. And so mutatis mutandis with the rest. — Tr.]

[? Ver. 14. — If, as many suppose, the angelic communication was interrupted here by Joshua's startled sense of awe and reverence, the connection would be better indicated by a dash in place of the period, thus: Am I now come — And Joshua etc. — Tr.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

STARKER has given to this chapter the somewhat clumsy yet substantially correct superscription: "The things which followed immediately upon the passage through the Jordan." Thus we have here brought before us in succession, related and displayed, (a.) the effect of the invasion of Canaan upon the heathen, ver. 1; (b.) the circumcision of the people, ver. 2-9; (c.) the enjoyment of the bread of the land and the Passover in connection with the cessation of the manna, ver. 10-19; and finally, (d.) the appearance of the war-prince of God (ver. 13-15). In a critical point of view, this chapter offers, when compared with chapters 3 and 4, no difficulties, so to speak; since the continuity of the narration is interrupted by nothing and no repetitions occur. Even Knobel has received the same impression of the present chapter, except ver. 10-12. He ascribes all the rest to one and the same author, namely, that of the "Law Book." Since for us this "Law Book" in Knobel's sense has no existence, we can agree with him only in so far as we believe that in ver. 1-9 and 13-15 we meet with the same hand.

As to vers. 10-12, they stand nearly related to ch. iv. 17, 19, through the exact designation of time which characterizes them. In ver. 10 also, as there in ver. 19, Gilgal is mentioned, so that all which is reported between may be omitted, and in ch. v. 10 the author takes up the thread which he had dropped in ver. iv. 19. On the other hand ch. v. 10 connects itself easily and naturally with ch. v. 9, so that there appears to be no absolute necessity to go back to iv. 19. When, however, we examine ver. 9 b more sharply, the whole turn of the sentence, and also the expression, here again repeated, "until this day," presents itself as designed to introduce vers. 10-12, which we must refer to the Elohist document, on account of its character in other respects, and therefore regard as the proper continuation of ch. iv. 19.

a. Ver. 1. The Effect of the Invasion upon the Hittites. The verse stands in the most exact connection with ch. iv. 24. All the peoples of the earth were to learn how mighty is the hand of the Lord and fear Him. A first example of this effect is given by the Canaanites, whose heart melts, and whose courage flees. The terror which, according to the words of Rahab, had before seized them (ch. ii. 9-11), had been increased by the marvelous passage of the Jordan. A panic had fallen upon them.

— מֶלֶךְ does not refer here, as in ch. i. 14-15, to the country east of the Jordan, but as is shown by the careful addition מִן הַיַּמִּי, to the west side of the river. — The more difficult Kethib מֶלֶךְ, is to be retained like לֵב, ver. 6. "In מֶלֶךְ the author assumes the person of the people and speaks in their name, as in ver. 6, comp. Ps. lxxvi. 6." (Knobel).<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> [Yet this form of expression has been not without reason long held, and still is by Keil and others, as a proof that the narrative was written by one who had shared in the transaction. — Tr.]

b. Ver. 2-9. The Circumcision of the People. This takes place upon an express command of Jehovah because, as vers. 4-6 state, it had been omitted in the wilderness. The covenant-people should, as such, bear the sign of the covenant which Abraham had formerly received as a seal (σφραγίς) of the righteousness of faith (Rom. iv. 11), and with it, as a sanctified people, holy to the Lord, enter into the promised land.

Knives of stone. Thus and not "sharp knives" must we translate יָדֵי אֲבָנִים. Joshua follows the custom of antiquity which, as Ex. iv. 25 shows, performed circumcision with stone knives, because they had as yet no others. Afterwards this kind of knives, as being more venerable, were still employed in sacred transactions. [Among the additions of the LXX. at the end of this book, is the curious statement after ch. xxiv. 30: "there they placed with him in the tomb where they buried him, the knives of stone (τὰς μαχαίρας τὰς περσίδας) with which he circumcised the sons of Israel in Gilgal. — Tr.] "The testi samia with which the priests of Cybele castrated themselves (Plin. 35, 46), and the stone knives of the Egyptian embalmers (Herod. 2, 86), may serve as parallels" (Winer, Bibl. Realw., s. v. "Messer") "The Vulgate has rightly fac tibi cultros lapideos; the LXX. mingle together a right translation and wrong interpretation: πολὺς οὖν αὐτῷ μαχαίρας περσίδας ἐκ πέτρας ἀποτόμου. Stone knives were found also at the discovery of the pile-dwellings, e. g. in the lake of Zurich near Meilen (1854), where I myself saw them. They are very finely ground, and cut, not indeed like a knife of steel, but better than one would believe. Always, however, the operation with these instruments was a very imperfect one, and in the case before us extremely painful.<sup>2</sup>

[Circumcise again . . . the second time.

מֶלֶךְ does not indicate, of course, that the circumcision of the same people was to be repeated, but that, as the whole people which came out of Egypt had been circumcised, so now there should be a circumcision of the present people. Cf. Keil, Bib. Com. in loc. Masius understood מֶלֶךְ to mark the reintroduction of the rite with reference to its first employment by Abraham. Com. in Josuam, p. 81. This is too far sought. — Tr.]

Hill of foreskins. Perhaps so named from this transaction. Lev. xix. 23, where circumcision of the trees is spoken of, appears not to belong here [against an intimation of Knobel's].

Ver. 4-7. Statement of the reason why Joshua performed this rite. Knobel expresses doubt whether what is here reported is historical fact. In support of this he appeals to the Elohist, who says nothing of such omission, ch. iv. 19 compared with v. 10. But even assuming that these passages are, as we concede, Elohist, they do not suffice to impeach the historical character of the reason assigned, since they furnish at the most a very weak argumentum e silentio, while on the other side it is highly probable that although circumcision "had been sharply enjoined" on the Israelites at Sinai (Lev. xii. 3), they had, in their unsettled wanderings, neglected to follow the command of God. The same thing took place later in the case of the Passover, through hundreds of years, as we learn from 2 K. xxiii. 22.

<sup>2</sup> [See Dr Hackett's addition to art. "Knives," in Smith's Dict. of the Bible, Amer. ed. — Tr.]

Ver. 6. All the nation, the men of war. According to Num. xiv. 22-30 the adult generation, with the exception of Joshua and Caleb, were doomed to die in the wilderness, and a new generation must enter into Canaan. That the men of war specially are mentioned, agrees with Num. xiv. 29-32, according to which all who were mustered after their number (Comp. Num. i. 45 ff.), from twenty years old and upward, should die in the wilderness. Since, then, the former circumcised men of war were no more, their bodies having fallen in the wilderness, on account of disobedience, the present race of young men must, before they dare undertake the conquest of Canaan, first receive the sign of the Lord's covenant of which we just now spoke.

A land that floweth with milk and honey. Ex. iii. 8, 17; xiii. 5; xvi. 14; xxxiii. 3; Lev. xx. 24; Num. xiii. 27; xiv. 8; Deut. i. 3, and often. "Milk and honey are productions of a land rich in grass and flowers which make residence therein pleasant and beautiful. Both articles were abundantly produced in Canaan, even in a state of devastation, Is. vii. 15, 22. Milk, eaten partly sweet and partly thick or curdled, that of cows as well as of goats and sheep (Deut. xxxii. 14), was prominent in the diet of the ancient Hebrews, as in that of the Orientals of the present day. This is because Palestine was and is so well suited to the care of cattle, comp. Winer. Realw. ii. 768 ff. The land yielded great quantities of honey also, especially that from wild bees (Judg. xiv. 8; 1 Sam. xiv. 26; Matt. iii. 4), and still yields it in its wasted condition" (Keil). [See references Introd. § 6, p. 27.] That we are to understand here real honey and not syrup, appears from its connection with milk. Keil quotes similar descriptions from Euripides and Theocritus. Thus it is said in Eurip. Bacchæ, 142:

ῥεῖ δὲ γάλακτι νέβον
ῥεῖ δ' οἶνον. ῥεῖ δὲ μελισσίνων Νέκταρ.

No mention is made here of wine, although the vine thrives extraordinarily well, especially in the region of Hebron. Compare also Num. xiii. 21, 24, as well as the beautiful expression that each one dwell, or should dwell, under his vine and fig-tree, 1 K. iv. 25; Mic. iv. 4.

Ver. 7. Them Joshua circumcised, that is, as in ver. 3, Joshua ordered their circumcision. The operation itself was performed by the several fathers of families, as it is related of Abraham, Gen. xvii. 23 ff., for which Acts xvi. 3 also may be compared. Thus we most easily escape the difficulty which otherwise arises, (a) in view of the great number to be circumcised, and (b) of the shortness of the time, since according to ver. 10 they celebrated the Passover on the fourteenth of the month Abib. We surely cannot think of help from the mothers and other women (Rosenmüller). We refrain from an exact determination of the number of those circumcised, such as Keil has attempted (pp. 74, 75).<sup>1</sup>

Ver. 8. Till they were healed. "When the whole people were circumcised they remained in their place (Ex. x. 23; xvi. 29) in the camp, that is, did not leave the camp nor undertake anything until they were healed. This is בִּרְפָּאָה, prop. to live, become lively (Gen. xiv. 27), revive (Job xiv. 14; Ezek. xxxvii. 3), then also to be healed (2 K. i. 2; viii. 8). On the third day the pain was at its height (Gen. xxxiv. 25)." (Knobel.)

Ver. 9. The reproach of Egypt. The reproach which has attached to the people all the way from Egypt, and which consists in the misery of the people who had there become a people of slaves. This reproach had not yet been removed while they were journeying through the wilderness, because God had been angry with his people for their disobedience, and they on their part had neglected circumcision.<sup>2</sup> Now a new day has dawned. The reproach is rolled away through the resumption of the sacred covenant-rite. Hence Isaiah also, at a later period, warns them (ch. xxx. 1-3) against alliances with Egypt, lest the strength of Pharaoh should become a shame (בִּשְׁתָּה) to them, and prophecies expressly that Egypt will be no help nor any profit at all, but a shame and a reproach. One day, however, a time will come, according to the testimony of the same prophet (xxv. 8), when the Lord will swallow up death forever, and wipe away the tears from every face, and take away the reproach of his people from off the earth. The reproach of former slavery is meant, the reproach of banishment, of widowhood, as it is called, Is. liv. 1. בִּרְפָּאָה is synonymous with בִּשְׁתָּה, or בָּנִי, קָלִיָּן, בִּרְפָּאָה (Is. xxx. 5; Ps. lxxix. 20; cxix. 22; Prov. xviii. 3; Ezek. v. 15).

And the name of this place is called Gilgal unto this day; according to the view of the author, because God had in this place rolled away the reproach from off his people. Knobel, Fürst, and others, question this derivation because two cities besides of this name are mentioned, one between Dor and Thirza (Josh. xii. 23), and another, six Roman miles north of Antipatris (Deut. xi. 30), "which Eusebius still knew by the name of Magdala, and accurately indicates." Accordingly other derivations have been sought. The name should signify, in reference to ch. iv. 19-24, the place of the stone-heap, or stone-heap monument, or = גִּלְגָּל, a wheel-shaped height, to which גִּלְגָּלִית = Gollgotha might be cited as analogous. Fürst, and placet filios quam impiorum parvulum urbat animos, quem viderent liberos suos sacrosancti faleris symbolo carere. Huc enim, mihi certe, videntur spectare illa in Numeris xiv. 38 Dei verba, cum dicit: Vestra ipsorum corpora, etc., q. d. quia abdicastis vos a mea familia per rebellionem, filii quoque vestri adoptionis nota carbunt quamdiu vos in civis eritis. Several modern critics (Keil, Hengstenberg) make this the principal reason for the long abeyance of circumcision. — Ta.]

<sup>1</sup> [Keil elaborately calculates that from 670,000 to 720,000 required to be circumcised, while there were besides from 280,000 to 330,000 circumcised in early life who might perform the labors of the Passover celebration. — Ta.]

<sup>2</sup> [Besides the common answer to the question, Why the rite of circumcision had been disused for thirty-eight years in the wilderness, namely, that the unsettled condition of the people would not allow it to be practiced conveniently or safely (?) Masius subjoined: "Quod filii non circumciderentur, penae species fuisse videtur quae Deus non tam ipsos

Knobel (on ch. xv. 7) explain the word by circle, circuit, like the cognate גִּלְגָּל (hence Galilee), as also we have גִּלְגָּלִית, Josh. xviii. 7 for גִּלְגָּל, xv. 7, and according to LXX. גִּלְגָּל, Josh. xii. 23. Subsequently גִּלְגָּל was pronounced גִּלְגֹּל (Γολγολ, Golgol, cf. Phoen. גִּלְגָּל (coast of the circle), pr. nom. of the city Igilgili (Γιγίλεις, Ptol. 4, 2, lucus Igilgilitanus, in Amm. 29, 5, 5; now G'it-gelli, near the river Ampsaga in Algiers); גִּלְגֹּל (Gulgog), pr. nom. of a Phœnician settlement in Cyprus." We adopt this last-named etymology, since manifestly these places previously bore the name Gilgal, and not, like Bethel or Bethlehem (Gen. xxviii. 19; xxxv. 15, 19), a different one. But after a definite historical event had occurred here, which was recalled by the word, the name Gilgal was subsequently interpreted symbolically by the Israelites. Compare with this, out of the most recent history, the symbolical significance of the name Königgrätz = (dem) König g'räth's [the king succeeds].<sup>1</sup>

c. Ver. 10-12. The Passover, connected with the first Enjoyment of the Bread of the Land, and the Cessation of the Manna. On the special relation of this short passage, which in every view suits very well with the entire narrative, we have already commented, on ch. iv. 15-17, 19. "The children of Israel encamped in Gilgal where they had already pitched, according to ch. iv. 19, and observed the passover on the fourteenth day of the month at evening. The designation of time recalls Ex. xii. 6, 18; Lev. xxiii. 5; Num. ix. 3; xxviii. 16, and is not met with elsewhere in the Pentateuch" (Knobel).

Ver. 11. On the morrow after the passover; not as Keil strangely supposes, on the sixteenth, but on the fifteenth, precisely according to the precept of the law, Lev. xxiii. 5, 6.<sup>2</sup>

In the self-same day, "on which they observed the Passover." For the evening of the fourteenth belonged to the fifteenth day, see Ex. xii. 6; Gen. i. 5 (Knobel). [Or, the self-same day on which they ate the unleavened bread from the new grain.

Tr.]—עֲבוּר הָאֵרֶץ, of the produce of the land. According to Gesen. the etymology is uncertain. Fürst derives עֲבוּר from עָבַר = to make fruitful.

Both compare the Aram. עוֹבְרָא, fætus, surculus.

Targum and Peshito use עֲבוּר for דָּגָן and יֵבֶל. Instead of עֲבוּר הָאֵרֶץ, which occurs nowhere else in the O. T., תְּבִיאַת אֶרֶץ is used Lev. xxiii. 39, as well as here in the latter part of ver. 12. In the translation, the distinction between the words is attempted to be preserved by "produce" (not old corn) and "fruit" (yield). The word תְּבִיאַת means precisely "income" (from בָּרָא).

[There is no evidence, however, that there had been any town or inhabited place here before to require a name at all. No trace of one has been discovered or is likely to be. It was merely a suitable camping-ground, as they found it, perhaps on the easternmost verge of fertile land—Josephus says it was about one and a quarter miles from Jericho, and was named simply by and for themselves. And why not Gilgal (as suggested by "rolling") then as well as anything? It certainly is not against this that people of the same language gave the same name to many other places for related reasons. — Tr.]

<sup>1</sup> [There is no evidence, however, that there had been any town or inhabited place here before to require a name at all. No trace of one has been discovered or is likely to be. It was merely a suitable camping-ground, as they found it, perhaps on the easternmost verge of fertile land—Josephus says it was about one and a quarter miles from Jericho, and was named simply by and for themselves. And why not Gilgal (as suggested by "rolling") then as well as anything? It certainly is not against this that people of the same language gave the same name to many other places for related reasons. — Tr.]

<sup>2</sup> [And yet, considering that the law forbade them (Lev. xxiii. 14) to eat roasted ears, etc., until the day on which

Roasted ears. Roasted harvest ears are meant; an article of food still much esteemed by the Arabs. [See Smith's Dict. of the Bible, art. "Ruth, Book of," p. 2756 b.]

Ver. 12. And the manna ceased on the morrow after they ate, etc. On the sixteenth therefore, the manna ceased, because the people had now arrived in Canaan, and no longer needed this bread of the wilderness (Ex. xvi. 15, 31 ff.; Num. xi. 6 ff.; Deut. viii. 3; Neh. ix. 20; Ps. lxxviii. 24; John vi. 31, 49, 58; Rev. ii. 17). At this place also the ark was substituted for the pillar of cloud and of fire, as the guide in the way.<sup>3</sup> They stand in the most intimate relation to each other, since in the plan of God, the historical development of the people was gradually to take the place of his immediate guidance and support.

In respect to the manna itself, it is well known that reference has often been made to the tamarisk-manna of the Sinaitic peninsula, which results from the puncture of the leaves of the Tamarix mannifera, or orientalis, by an insect of the coccus family (Coccus maniparus), and in the form of a sweet, honey-like resin. So the whole body of rationalist interpreters explain. On the other side, von Raumer (The March of the Israelites, p. 21 ff.) maintains that, "that manna of the Israelites differed from the present tamarisk-manna to celo; the honest student of Scripture cannot possibly regard that "corn of heaven," that "angel's food," as it is called (Ps. lxxviii. 25 ff.), with which God fed his people, as being the same as the louse-production (!) of the naturalist." Stiff supernaturalism! to which even Hengstenberg and Keil do not agree. These assume rather that in the feeding with manna, "the supernatural rises on the ground of the natural, as in the case of the miracles in Egypt, and in that of the quail-food." See Keil on this passage (p. 83 ff.).

As analogous to this we might cite the miraculous feeding in John vi. where also the natural basis of bread and fish was present (John vi. 9). The miracle consists in both cases in the increase, on the grandest scale, of the food which they already had. While now, even in the most rainy seasons, not more than fifty or sixty pounds is gathered, the Israelites gathered, according to von Raumer's calculation, at least on certain occasions, near 600,000 pounds. It lay after the dew like frost around the camp (Ex. xvi. 14). God rained it on the Israelites (Ps. lxxviii. 25). This last expression, which however is employed also concerning flesh, Josephus follows when he says (Ant. iii. 1, 6), that it still rains manna in the wilderness of Sinai. Keil disputes this statement of Josephus, because (a) it is supported by no trustworthy authority; (b) it is made by him evidently on the ground of uncertain accounts which had come to him by hearsay. Recent travellers know nothing at all of any manna rain.<sup>4</sup> The great abundance of the they brought an offering to their God, which offering (ver. 12) was to be made on the day in which they "waved the sheaf," which again (ver. 11) was the morrow after "the Sabbath" (commonly understood to mean here the day of "holy convocation," i. e. the fifteenth of the month), there is much reason for Keil's view. And so many commentators have always held. The chief doubt seems to rest on the reference of the word Sabbath in this passage. See the main points of the dispute indicated in Smith's Dict. of Bible, Art. "Passover," (α) p. 2346, and Pentecost, note b, p. 2341 f.—Tr.]

<sup>3</sup> [This is probable, yet the pillar of cloud and fire has for some time disappeared from the narrative. — Tr.]

<sup>4</sup> [Comp. the phenomena of "Honey-dew" familiar to

manna, therefore, remains a miracle. In respect to the substance also a difference between the manna of the Bible, and that of the present day seems to hold good, since the latter cannot be pounded, ground, baked in cakes, as is reported (Num. xi. 7, 8) concerning the former. A further, "essential" difference we cannot assume, with Keil, at least not on the ground that "the present manna is used only as an accompaniment to other food and as a dainty, or even as a purgative medicine," since Num. xi. 6 proves how greatly the Israelites loathed the manna as the solitary staple of their diet. Their soul was dried away (יָבֵשׁ) upon it. They longed therefore for flesh, which the Lord also gave them (Num. xi. 31; Ps. lxxviii. 27; cv. 40), as conversely he had before (Ex. xvi. 13) given them first quails and then manna. Keil concludes his explanation of our passage in these words: "The feeding of the Israelites with manna remains, therefore, a miracle of God which has indeed, in nature, a faint analogue, but can never be explained on natural principles." In this he means right, as his preceding exposition shows, but ought rather to have said that this miracle rises indeed on a foundation given in nature, but can by no means be identified with the phenomenon of the manna still commonly exhibited at the present day, nor be fully explained by it.<sup>1</sup>

As to the etymology, the word מָן according to Ex. xvi. 15, 31, has its name from מָן, what?, but this is elsewhere only Chaldee. Gesenius derives it from the Arabic, and explains it as meaning part, present, gift, namely of heaven, as the Arabs actually call it. He thus follows Kimchi, and Ibn Eser, who also compare Heb. מָן. Fürst resorts to an extra-Semitic etymology, because the manna was strange to the Hebrews, and they (Ex. xvi. 15, 31) had no name for it. We think this unnecessary, and would rather refer the word to the unused root מָנַן = מָנָה, to divide, to part, to measure, precisely as מָן, Ps. lxxviii. 24. Compare also מָן from מָנַן, מָן (in compounds like מָן־מָן, sounded also מָן) from מָן.

c. Ver. 13-15. The War-Prince of God. As the people receive the consecration to the holy war through circumcision and the Passover, so Joshua, their leader, receives his through the appearance of the prince over Jehovah's army, who commands him, as was done to Moses (Ex. iii. 5), to take off his shoes because the place whereon he stands is holy.

Ver. 13. By Jericho [lit.: in Jericho], (cf. ch. x. 15; xxiv. 26; Gen. xlii. 18). The man bears drawn (Luther: bare) sword in his hand. Such an one is borne also by the angel who meets Balaam in the way (Num. xxii. 23), and not less by the Cherub at the gate of Paradise (Gen. iii. 24). Joshua, thus proving that God has not in vain admonished him (ch. i. 6, 7, 9) to be strong and firm, goes near the apparition and asks the man: Art thou for us or for our adversaries? "The question was appropriate for the military leader of the Israelites" (Knobel).

Ver. 14. "The one addressed answers in the negative, and belongs, therefore, neither to one nor to the other, but is rather the captain of Jehovah's host, that is, prince of the angels. For these, called also the host of heaven (1 K. xxii. 19), are to be understood as the מַלְאָכִים, as Ps. ciii. 21; cxlviii. 2" (Knobel). Compare further, 2 Chron. xviii. 18, and Luke ii. 13. And Jehovah himself is "Jehovah of hosts," or more fully, "Jehovah God of hosts" (Jer. v. 14; xv. 16), as God is called by the prophets and frequently in the Psalms, Is. vi. 3; xxxvii. 16; li. 15; Jer. xxxiii. 11; Am. ix. 5; Ps. xxiv. 10; lxxx. 8, 20; lxxxiv. 2; in the N. T. Jas. v. 4. On the significance of this angel see below, Theological and Ethical.

Am I now come.<sup>2</sup> For what, is not told, since Joshua interrupts the angel, and with the deepest reverence asks: What speaks my Lord (יְהוָה) as Gen. xix. 18, not יְהוָה, should be read [?] because Joshua recognizes the man as a higher being; Knobel) to his servant.

Ver. 15. Loose thy shoes from off thy feet, prop. throw off thy shoes from thy feet. We point according to Ex. iii. 5, מַעַל רַגְלֶיךָ לְשַׁלְּחָן, instead of מַעַל רַגְלֶיךָ וּלְשַׁלְּחָן. [This change is of very doubtful warrant.] De Wette and Luther also adopt the plural in their translations. The shoes must be removed because to them cleaves defilement from the earth, which God has cursed (Gen. iii. 17.) Hence the priests also must wash their hands and feet, when they entered the sanctuary (Ex. xxx. 19; xl. 32), and went in probably barefooted. But a direct precept to go barefoot is nowhere found.

For the place . . . is holy. It is holy from the appearance here of the angel. Probably the latter communicated still further to Joshua what he was to do. Knobel supposes directions for the approaching war, as well as promises and encouragements; rightly.

[There is much in favor of the view advocated by Keil, and many before him, that the communication of the angel to Joshua is contained in ch. vi. 2-5. Chapter v. 13-vi. 5, would thus constitute one paragraph; ch. vi. 1 being a parenthetical statement of the historical circumstance which gave occasion for this divine intervention; and the division of chapters ought to be before or after the entire paragraph. That the Angel should be at last recognized by the narrator as Jehovah and so designated, ch. vi. 2, is in full accordance with Gen. xviii. 17, 20. This conception of the scene prevents the theophany from being so aimless and void of result as it otherwise appears.

Is it accidental merely that the former appear-every naturalist. This sometimes occurs over wide districts of America and Europe in such abundance as to drop freely from the leaves and twigs of various species of trees, while yet several years may elapse without any at all, or at the most only a trifling quantity being seen. Apianians have much occasion to notice it. Whether it is uniformly the excretion of Aphides in any of their widely different kinds, or sometimes a direct exudation from the trees, and if the latter, from what cause, are still disputed questions. On the whole subject of the manna see the Dict. of the Bible, s. v.; Ritter in Gage's Transl. ii. pp. 271-292. — Ta.]

[1 Dr. Stowe in the Bible Dict. s. v. regards it as wholly miraculous.]

[2 The מָן, "now," in this phrase is probably designed to indicate that the speaker is present to make a communication of importance, cf. Dan. ix. 23; x. 11, 14. So Masius, referring to those passages: "Significans ista verba cum qui se loquitur de re quapiam singulari adesse, suamque presentiam declarare." — Ta.]

ance also of the Jehovah-angel, to Abraham, is represented as having occurred immediately after the circumcision of his family, Gen. xvii. — Tr.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. Circumcision and the Passover were the two covenant signs and seals (σφραγίδες) of the O. T.

The former was, as Christ himself testifies, older than Moses; it was of the fathers (John vii. 22), since God, as Stephen says, Acts vii. 8, had given the covenant of circumcision to Abraham. By it the nation was, through its fathers and youths, consecrated to Jehovah. That was to be indeed a holy people, which belonged to him as the people of his possession. To the true Israelites, therefore, who perceived in the circumcision of the flesh an index to the circumcision of the heart, which must be freed from all impurity even through pain, it was a token of exalted honor.<sup>1</sup> In later times, indeed, upon the entrance of heathen customs, many became ashamed of it, and artificially removed the traces of it. It was performed, as is well known, on the eighth day (Gen. xvii. 12; Luke ii. 21), and only he who was circumcised could partake of the Passover which was the other covenant sign of the O. T. (Gen. xii. 1 ff., and especially 43 ff.). This latter was of Mosaic origin, and was first of all a meal of thankful, joyous remembrance of the deliverance of the people out of Egypt, of their exemption (ἡ ἐξέλευσις) from the plague, of the rescue from the house of bondage. Both signs point beyond themselves to other and greater things, to baptism and the Lord's supper, which are of a more universal, spiritual nature, but just as exactly and intimately connected with each other as circumcision and the Passover.

2. The captain of the Lord's host is the angel of the presence or face (Ex. xxiii. 20) in whom was God's name (ver. 21), of whom God says to Moses (xxxiii. 14), "My presence shall go, thereby will I lead thee." From the passages quoted he assumes an altogether peculiar position towards God, who raises him above all other angels, so that we may perhaps recognize in him the ἀγγελος incarnandus. Comp. also Prov. viii. 30.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

The terror of the Canaanites. — The heart melts, courage flees when one knows not the living God yet hears of his mighty deeds. — Where there is no confidence in God there is no courage. The consecration of the people for the occupancy of the Holy Land through, (1) the circumcision of the warriors born in the Wilderness. (2) The Passover kept by all Israel. — Circumcision and the Passover in their typical relation to baptism and the Lord's supper. The sacraments of the Old and those of the N. T. — As the enjoyment of the paschal lamb and the sweet bread was conditioned on the circumcision of the participant, so is that of the Holy Supper on baptism. — Of the true circumcision, which is performed not on the body but on the heart (Rom. ii. 29; Col. ii. 11). — Death the punishment of disobedience. — Through the wilderness to Canaan! — The heavenly Canaan much richer, more lovely and beautiful than the earthly, of which, however, it is said that it is a land flowing with milk and honey. — To-day have I rolled away the reproach of Egypt from off you! This word is fulfilled, (1.) at Gilgal; (2.) much more gloriously at Golgotha. — The reproach of Egypt — sin and its misery.

The first Passover on the soil of Canaan: (1) A feast of thankful remembrance; (2) a feast of blessed hope. The bread of the land although not manna, yet also bread from heaven! — There is a manna which never fails. Comp. John vi., Rev. ii. — The true bread of life.

The consecration of the army-leader Joshua by the appearance of the captain of God's army. (1) Who stood opposite him? (2) How did Joshua behave? (3) What command did he receive? — The brave question of Joshua: Art thou for us or our adversaries? — The prince of the Lord's host in his relation to Christ the prince of life. — Joshua's humility the more beautiful because accompanied with steadfast courage. So should Christians also be as Joshua was, courageous and humble minded. They will be so if they themselves know the true source of courage and humility, the living God. — Loose thy shoes from off thy feet, for, etc. Comparison of the call of Moses (Ex. 3) and the consecration of Joshua. — Comparison of the consecration of the leader Joshua and of the prophet Isaiah (Is. 6). — "And Joshua did so." Let us also always do what God commands.

STARKE: God's words and works have not the same effect with the ungodly and the pious. — If the Israelites could not without the bodily circumcision enter the earthly Canaan, how should it be possible for any one without the spiritual circumcision of the heart to enter into the heavenly Canaan. — Who loves God, him God loves in return and reveals Himself to him (John. xiv. 21). — Even the exalted in this world should not be ashamed to bow the knee before God. 1 K. viii. 54; Ps. xc. 6.

BIBL. WIRT: When God will punish a land or a people He gives them first a fearful and faint heart, Lev. xxvi. 36; Deut. xxviii. 65, xi. 25.

CRAMER: He who will have prosperity and a blessing, must begin his enterprise with God, with his word and the use of the holy sacraments, Prov. i. 7, Matt. vi. 33. God usually performs no miracles when one can have natural means to accomplish something, and then He points us to the ordinary way of subsistence and toil; He will bless that and will support us therein. Therefore, Christian, sing, pray, and go on in God's ways.

GERLACH: "The Lord cometh," when his people especially feel their need of his help, and become comfortably conscious of his presence and aid, Gen. xviii. 1.

[MATT. HENRY (on vers. 13-15): Observe, I. the time when he was favored with this vision; it was immediately after he had performed the great solemnities of circumcision and the Passover; then God made Himself known to him. Note, we may then expect the discoveries of the divine grace, when we are found in the way of our duty, and are diligent and sincere in our attendance on holy ordinances.

II. The place where he had this vision; it was by Jericho. . . . There he was (some think) meditating and praying; and to those who are so employed God often graciously manifests Himself. Or, perhaps, there he was to take a view of the city, to observe its fortifications and contrive how to attack it, and perhaps he was at a loss within himself how to make his approaches, when

<sup>1</sup> [On the significance of circumcision, see Ebrard's interesting views in his Dogmatik, § 526, briefly stated by the present writer in the Baptist Quarterly for July, 1860. — Tr.]

God came and directed him. Note, God will help those that help themselves: Vigilantibus non dormientibus succurrit lex—"The law succors those who watch, not those who sleep." Joshua was in his post as General when God came and made Himself known to him as Generalissimo.—TR.]

SECTION SECOND.

THE CONTESTS OF ISRAEL WITH THE CANAANITES.

CHAPTERS VI.-XI.

A. CONTESTS AGAINST PARTICULAR CITIES.

CHAPTERS VI.-VIII.

1. The Capture of Jericho.

CHAPTER VI.

a. Preparation for the Capture.

CHAPTER VI. 1-14.

- 1 Now Jericho was straitly shut up [lit. had shut up (her gates) and was shut up],
- 2 because of the children [sons] of Israel: none went out, and none came in. And the Lord [Jehovah] said unto Joshua, See, I have given into thine hand Jericho, and the king thereof, and [omit: and] the mighty men of valour [strong heroes].
- 3 And ye shall compass the city, all ye men of war, and go round about the city
- 4 once: thus shalt thou do six days. And seven priests shall bear before the ark seven trumpets of rams' horns [seven alarm-trumpets<sup>1</sup>]: and the seventh day ye shall compass the city seven times, and the priests shall blow with the trumpets.
- 5 And it shall come to pass, that when they make a long blast with the ram's horn [alarm-horn], and [omit: and] when ye hear the sound of the trumpet, all the people shall shout with a great shout: and the wall of the city shall fall down flat, and the people shall ascend up every man straight before him.
- 6 And Joshua the son of Nun called the priests, and said unto them, Take up the ark of the covenant, and let seven priests bear seven trumpets of rams' horns
- 7 [alarm-trumpets] before the ark of the Lord [Jehovah]. And he [they<sup>2</sup>] said unto the people, Pass on, and compass the city, and let him that is armed<sup>3</sup> pass on before the ark of the Lord [Jehovah].
- 8 And it came to pass, when Joshua had spoken unto the people, that the seven priests bearing the seven trumpets of rams' horns [alarm-trumpets] passed on before the Lord [Jehovah], and blew with the trumpets: and the ark of the covenant of the Lord [Jehovah] followed them. And the armed men went before the priests that blew with the trumpets, and the rere-ward came [went] after the ark, the priests [omit: the priests] going on, and blowing with the trumpets.<sup>4</sup>
- 10 And Joshua had [omit: had] commanded the people, saying, Ye shall not shout, nor make any noise with your voice [let your voice be heard], neither shall any word proceed out of your mouth, until the day I bid you shout, then shall ye shout.
- 11 So [And] the ark of the Lord [Jehovah] compassed the city, going about it once: and they came into the camp, and lodged in the camp.
- 12 And Joshua rose early in the morning, and the priests took up the ark of the
- 13 Lord [Jehovah]. And [the] seven priests bearing seven trumpets of rams' horns [alarm-trumpets] before the ark of the Lord [Jehovah] went on continually, and blew with the trumpets: and the armed men [as in ver. 9] went before them; but the rere-ward came [went] after the ark of the Lord [Jehovah], the priests [omit:

14 the priests] going on, and blowing with the trumpets [as in ver. 9]. And the second day they compassed the city once, and returned into the camp. So they did six days.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 4. — שופרות תיובל = תיובל (ver. 5). The specific character of the trumpets or horns here mentioned, as indicated by the very obscure word תיובל, is elaborately discussed in the Exegetical Notes, to which may well be added the information contained in Smith's Bibl. Diet. articles "Cornet" and "Jubilee." See also Leyrer's remarks in Herzog's Theol. Realencyk. s. v. "Musik," vol. x. p. 181. With reference to the translation to be adopted, a word is ventured here. From a comparison of the passages cited below it is obvious that the תיובל (whether meaning directly a sound or an instrument of sound) indicated a loud sound, a sound of a very impressive, if not formidable character. It was a sound always serving as a signal, or alarm in the more general sense of this word. Hence, that it was produced literally by a "rams' horn" employed as the instrument (making תיובל denote a ram), seems a physical impossibility; even if the etymological ground for such an interpretation were more than a chimera. But it is not; this meaning, therefore, may unhesitatingly be set aside. In their uncertainty as to the real derivation of the word, many lexicographers and interpreters have then been content to pass it with the vague sense of Jubilee (Jubel) horn, because this particular instrument was employed to signalize through the land the return of the Sabbatical (Jubilee) year. But this is a Hysteron-proteron, for the word is used before the Sabbatical year had ever been mentioned (Ex. xix. 18), to indicate the signal or alarm by which the people should be warned of the appearance of God on Mount Sinai. It is, furthermore, significant that down to the last mention of the תיובל in Scripture, there had been no occurrence of the year of Jubilee to give a denomination to the trumpet or anything else connected with its observance. The Sabbatical year, therefore, received its name as the year of the תיובל, or as itself the תיובל, from the name of the instrument or of the sound by which it was to be ushered in and heralded to all the people. Instead of learning the character of the instrument from that of the sacred year, we must, vice versa, learn that of the year (so far as intimated by its name) from the peculiar mode of its announcement. Its intrinsic character to the experience of the people had yet to be ascertained by them, and could now be only obscurely foreseen.

We are left then to study the actual quality and use of the horn of תיובל, first from the passages outside of the circle of the jubilee year, and then from those relating to that year, to get practically at the meaning of the word.

Perhaps neither of the meanings "signal," "alarm," to which we are thus brought can be rigidly adhered to in all places. In the Pentateuch generally "signal" would perhaps be more appropriate; here in Joshua "alarm" is at least equally so. If we were at perfect liberty to make compound words, "loud-horn" might pretty well cover all the uses. Zuss's excellent version gives schmetterndes Horn, "rattling," "clattering horn." — Tr.]

[2 Ver. 7. — וְיִשְׁמְרוּ. "The plural is not to be altered here, but to be explained from the fact that Joshua made the announcement not in person but through the Schotermim (I. 10; III. 2) by whom his orders were officially published." Keil. — Tr.]

[3 Ver. 7. — Him that is armed (the armed body), הַחֲרָדִים, ("expeditus, stripped . . . i. q. armed, ready, etc." Gesen. s. v.) here distinguished from הַמִּנְחָמִים "re-re-ward" ver. 9, as a part only of the "men of war," verse 8. They may have been a special branch of the forces (light-armed, νεμεταί, which the etymology would slightly favor), or, more probably, the soldiery of the Transjordanic tribes who were to cross the river יַרְדֵּן, iv. 12, comp. Keil in loc. — Tr.]

[4 Ver. 9. — The Heb. leaves the subject of this indefinite; our knowledge otherwise gained suggests the priests. — Tr.]

b. Capture and Destruction of Jericho.

CHAPTER VI. 15-27.

15 And it came to pass on the seventh day, that they rose early about the dawning of the day, and compassed the city after the same [this] manner seven times: only on 16 that day they compassed the city seven times. And it came to pass at the seventh time, when the priests blew with the trumpets, Joshua said unto the people, Shout;
17 for the Lord [Jehovah] hath given you the city. And the city shall be accursed [devoted], even [omit: even] it, and all that are therein, to the Lord [Jehovah]: only Rahab the harlot shall live, she and all that are with her in the house, because 18 she hid the messengers that we sent. And ye, in any wise keep yourselves from the accursed thing [from that which is devoted], lest ye make yourselves accursed, when ye take of the accursed thing [that which is devoted], and make the camp of Israel a
19 curse [devoted thing], and trouble it.<sup>1</sup> But [And] all the silver, and gold, and vessels of brass and iron, are consecrated unto the Lord [Jehovah]: they shall come 20 into the treasury of the Lord [Jehovah]. So the people shouted when the priests blew<sup>2</sup> with the trumpets: and it came to pass, when the people heard the sound of the trumpet, and the people shouted with a great shout, that the wall fell down flat, so that the people went up into the city, every man straight before him, and they 21 took the city. And they utterly destroyed [devoted] all that was in the city,

- both man and woman, young and old, and ox, and sheep, and ass, with the edge of the sword.
- 22 But Joshua had [omit: had] said unto the two men that had spied out the country, Go into the harlot's house, and bring out thence the woman, and all that she hath, as ye sware unto her. And the young men that were spies went in, and brought out Rahab, and her father, and her mother, and her brethren, and all that she had; and they brought out all her kindred [Heb. families, and so Bunsen], and left them without the camp of Israel. And they burnt the city with fire, and all that was therein: only the silver, and the gold, and the vessels of brass and of iron, they put into the treasury of the house of the Lord [Jehovah]. And Joshua saved Rahab the harlot alive, and her father's household, and all that she had; and she dwelleth in [in the midst of] Israel even [omit: even] unto this day; because she hid the messengers which Joshua sent to spy out Jericho.
- 26 And Joshua adjured them [caused them to swear] at that time, saying, Cursed be the man before the Lord [Jehovah], that riseth up and buildeth this city Jericho: he shall lay the foundation thereof in his first-born, and in his youngest son shall he set up the gates of it. So the Lord [Jehovah] was with Joshua; and his fame was noised [omit: noised] throughout all the country [in all the land.]

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

1 [Ver. 18. This verse would be more correctly given somewhat thus: "Only do ye keep yourselves from what is devoted, lest ye devote, and take of what is devoted, and make the camp of Israel a devoted thing, and trouble it." To devote (to Jehovah) and to take (for themselves) were two incompatible things: "Utrumque consistere non poterat, pugnantia erant, . . . aut non erat res devocenda, aut cum devotum esset ab ea abstinendum erat." Lud. de Dieu ap. Keil in loc. — Ta]

2 [Ver. 20. Lit.: And the people shouted, and they blew with the trumpets. — Ta.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

With this sixth chapter begins the second section of the first part of our book, giving us in a continuous narrative the history of the conquest of the land. It offers critical difficulties in only a few passages (ch. viii. 12, 13 compared with viii. 3 and viii. 30-35), so that even Knobel describes it as "an exhibition, in the main regular and consistent, of the wars of Joshua," by the hand of the Jehovist. In so far it is advantageously distinguished from the report of the passage through the Jordan (chaps. iii. iv.) The style is excellent, and rises often (ch. vii. 8; x. 1-27) to a strikingly beautiful representation of deeds of war wrought by God through Joshua and the people of Israel; comp. Introd. § 1, p. 3. Poetical passages are twice (chaps. vi. 26 and x. 12-15) introduced. A certain delicate humor is betrayed in ch. ix. From ch. x. 28 to xi. 23, the traits just noticed are absent, and a sort of monotony in the chronological enumeration of conquests appears. Chapter xii. is a very valuable historical document, from ver. 9 onward in particular, to which Bunsen has rightly called attention.

So much in general concerning this extremely interesting section, chaps. vi. 1-xi. 23. We proceed now to the explanation of ch. vi., which relates the capture of Jericho.

[On the connection between this and the preceding chapter, see the translator's remarks on p. 66.]

a. Ver. 1-11. Preparation for it. Jericho had, at the approach of the Israelites, closed its doors so that no one went out and no one came in. Jehovah now commands Joshua to march around the city with the ark preceded by priests giving blasts on alarm trumpets, once each day for six days in succession, but on the seventh day seven times, and promises that then her walls shall fall down. This command Joshua imparts to the priests with the people, for immediate execution, (ver. 6, 7), which then also follows (vers. 8-11).

Ver. 2. See, I have given We find a similar expression in ch. xi. 6. Here, however, the Israelites themselves were to adopt no warlike measures for the taking of the city. Jericho must fall rather through the immediate help of God, that is, through a miracle.

Ver. 3-5. Signal trumpets. שופרות = הויבלי. That these two designations (ver. 4, 5) signify the same musical instrument is clear, and may be inferred directly from our passage. It may be also further assumed as probable that שופר and הוצצקד (Num. x. 2, 8) are not identical, but ש', rather a crooked instrument, and hence called קרן, and ח, the straight trumpet frequently represented on Egyptian monuments (Keil, Com. on J., p. 158). The interpretation of הויבל on the other hand occasions difficulty. According to Fürst it has two significations: "(1) Ram, Aries, from the unusual, intrans. בל, to be compressed, hard, strong, according to this שופר חל, שופר חל or even יובל alone, Ex. xix. 13, would mean ram's horns as a wind instrument. This signification appears already in the Targum (הוצצקד) and the Jewish expositors, who follow indeed the tradition (Rosh-ha-Shana 3); and from the latter we learn that in old Arabic the word had the same sense; Phœnic. הבל the same (Mass. 7); (2) (from הבל II) Sound of Jubilee, sound of joy (related to the pr. nom. הויבל) as a designation of the great feast of Jubilee on the tenth of the seventh month in each fiftieth year, which was proclaimed with trumpets through the whole land. Lev. xxv. 8." That the same word should have these two radically different significations is, if not exactly impossible, yet in this case improbable, since the year of jubilee (שְׁנַת הַיּוֹבֵל) was announced, as Fürst himself says, by the שֹׁפָר הַיּוֹבֵל, and from this evidently had its name, as Winer (Realw. s. v. "Jubeljahr"). Oehler (Realencycl. x. p. 131) take for granted, after the example of older interpreters, especially Groddeck, De verisim. voc. יוֹבֵל signif., Danz. 1758. On this supposition the question arises, whence the derivation of יוֹבֵל, and how it is to be explained. Either it is from a root יָבַל not in use, which, as Fürst assumes, should mean to be compressed, hard, strong, the same as the Phœn. יָבַל, from which then יָבַל or יוֹבַל = the strong, the ram (as also אֵיל means properly strength): this is supported by reference to the inscription of Mar-seilles, l. 7. In this view, הַרְוֹת־הַיּוֹבֵל would be rams-horn, שֹׁפָר־הַיּוֹבֵל rams-horn-trumpet, and שְׁנַת־הַיּוֹבֵל the year at the beginning of which they blew the rams-horn, and which received its name from this. Or, as Gesenius (Thez. ii. 361) teaches, from an onomatop. יָבַל, to sound out, to shout, Lat. jubilare, as the related יָבַב, Judg. v. 28, signifies to call, to call aloud, and in Aram. is employed expressly of the call of jubilee. Thus שֹׁפָר יוֹבֵל would be = הַרְדָּעָה, and שֹׁפָר־הַיּוֹבֵל = שֹׁפָר־הַרְדָּעָה (Lev. xxv. 8) = alarm-signal or jubilee-trumpet. The הַרְוֹת־הַיּוֹבֵל would mean the same, and שְׁנַת־הַיּוֹבֵל would be the year at whose commencement the alarm-horn or trump of jubilee was sounded, and which hence derived its name. This etymology is decisively favored by the name, יוֹבֵל, of the son of Lamech, Gen. iv. 21, who was the inventor of the harp and syrinx. We must therefore adopt this explanation. The double plural שֹׁפָרֹת־הַיּוֹבֵל, as in Num. xiii. 32, אֲנִי־שֹׁמְרוֹת, Deut. i. 28, אֲנִי־עֹמְדִים. Ewald, § 270. [See Gesen. Lex. s. v. יוֹבֵל.]

The number seven of the trumpets, priests, days, is significant, for which compare Gen. xxi. 30, and a multitude of Old and New Test. passages in Winer, art. "Zahlen." [Smith's Dict. art. "Seven."] The circuit marches were thirteen in all, six during the first six days, and seven on the last, which was probably, as the Rabbins have assumed, a Sabbath. It might be objected that, according to Ex. xx. 9-11, no work was to be done on the Sabbath; but this circuit was no work, but rather a religious transaction of the nature of worship, performed in obedience to a special command of God, to whose glory the walls of Jericho fell precisely on the Sabbath. The object of these encompassing marches, about which much has been said, has been well indicated by Knobel, who says: "Jericho was to fall as the first-fruits of the Canaanitish cities manifestly by Israel's God. The repeated compassing of the city directed attention with the sharpest intensity towards what was finally to come to pass, and when the event came, left no doubt that Jehovah was its cause, while the courage of Israel is thereby raised also, and the despondency of the Canaanites increased."

In substantial agreement with this Keil remarks, that "The repetition during several days of this procession about the city could only be designed to exercise Israel in unconditional faith and patient trust in the power and assistance of God, and to impress deeply upon him that it was the omnipotence and fidelity of Jehovah alone which could give into his hand this fortified city, the bastion of the whole land."

Ver. 5. Every man straight before him. Over the prostrate walls should the Israelites enter Jericho, and "each one straight forward," so that their order should be preserved as far as possible. In Joel ii. 9, it is said likewise of the locusts: "like men of war they climb a wall, and every one marches on his way."

Vers. 6, 7. Joshua issues the needful commands.

Vers. 8-11. The first circuit, in which the order of procession was, (1.) the armed men; (2.) the seven priests with their seven trumpets; (3.) the priests with the ark of the covenant; (4.) the remaining warriors as a rear-guard. אֲחֵרֵי = agmen claudere. This duty on the march through the wilderness devolved, according to Num. x. 25, on the tribe of Dan; whether on this occasion also cannot be determined.

Ver. 9. That blew with the trumpets. Not according to the Kethib הִקְרִיעוּ, but the Keri הִקְרִיעוּ which Knobel prefers as unquestionably the true reading. [Keil holds to the Kethib.]

Ver. 10. Ye shall not shout. That should be done first on the seventh day, at the express command of Joshua. Silently and without a voice, for six long days, under the prolonged clangor of the trumpets, the people marched around and around the City of Palms, whose inhabitants ventured no sortie. Perhaps they were imposed upon by the sublime silence which was maintained throughout this delay.

Ver. 11. At evening of the first day they came into the camp to spend the night.

Vers. 12-14. So they did for six days, without intermission.

b. Capture and Destruction of Jericho. Vers. 15-20. The seventh day. Now the Israelites begin their march very early, with the dawn, because they have to make the circuit seven times. If we suppose that Jericho had a compass of an hour's journey, then a formal procession like this, which moved slowly, would require at least one hour and a half, to accomplish it. This would give for the seven circuits ten and a half hours. But to this we must add the absolutely necessary rests of at least a quarter of an hour each; and if we assume one after the first, second, and third circuits, and so on to the end, the six will amount to an hour and a half. This added to the ten and a half makes twelve hours. The fall of the wall, accordingly, must have taken place near evening. The Sabbath would then be about over and the work of destruction might begin.

Ver. 17. And the city shall be devoted. הָרָם (only once הָרָם, Zech. xii. 11) from הָרַם = to cut off, in the Hiph. to devote, to withdraw from common use and consecrate to God = sacrare, is, (a.) with active signification, the devotement of anything by Jehovah, his putting under the ban, the result of which is destruction, Mal. iii. 24; Zech. xiv. 11; 1 K. xx. 42; Is. xxxiv. 5; or (b.) with pass. signif. thing devoted, doomed, laid under the ban, that is, devoted to Jehovah without the possibility of being redeemed (in distinction from other devoted objects), Lev. xxvii. 21, xxviii. 29. In the latter sense it stands here, vers. 17, 18, and in ch. vii. 1 ff., 1 Sam. xv. 3-9. Quite correctly therefore, Starke long ago remarked: "A devoted thing (Bann) (LXX. ἀνδραπα, Num. xxi. 2, 3; Deut. vii. 2, xx. 17) was that which had been doomed to the Lord, which no man might employ for his own use, but which was either put away and destroyed utterly to the honor of God, as the men and beasts in this passage, a propitiation, as it were, to the divine justice, that this might be glorified; or it was consecrated to the special service of God, as here all precious and useful metals, Lev. xxvii. 21, 28; Deut. ii. 34, iii. 6, vii. 2, 26, xiii. 15-17, xx. 26 ff." See also the explanation to ch. ii. 11.

Rahab alone should be spared, because she had concealed the spies. The oath of the latter is mentioned only to them (ver. 22), but not before the people.

Ver. 18 contains a warning which Achan, to his own destruction and that of his family, neglected (ch. vii.).

Vers. 20, 21. Capture of the City. At Joshua's command, the people who have before marched in silence around the city raise a battle shout. The trumpets clang. The walls of Jericho fall flat (prop. under themselves, יָרָדוּ מֵתַחְתָּם), the people of Israel pass in and devote everything that is in the city, man and woman, boy and gray-haired sire, cattle, sheep, and asses, with the edge of the sword (Gen. xxxiv. 26, and very often in our book). [On ? instrumenti, see Ges. Lex., p. 501 e. fin.] — The miracle here related has been explained by a sudden earthquake (J. D. Michaelis; Bartholm, Jewish History, ii. p. 22; Jahn, Bibl. Archaeologie, ii. p. 174 ff.). "But nothing of that stands written here" (Knobel). Nor is anything said of undermining the walls; manifestly a miracle was wrought, according to the entire view of the author, by the God of Israel "present upon the ark of the covenant." See Doctrinal and Ethical 2.

Vers. 22-25. Rescue of Rahab. This is effected in consistency with the promise, and oath of the spies.

Ver. 22. Go into the harlot's house. This house appears not to have fallen, although it was built on [or against] the wall.

Young men. The Heb. נָעָרִים has very often this signification, Gen. xxii. 3, xxxiv. 19, xxxvii. 2; Judg. viii. 20; Jer. vi. 6; 1 Sam. xxx. 13; LXX. ὄδο νεανίσκοι; Vulg. juvenes.

Ver. 23. And left them without the camp. After the analogy of Lev. xxiv. 14, Num. xxxi. 19. They were, as heathen, unclean, and must therefore remain for a specified time, probably, as in the case of other things unclean, seven days, without the camp.

Ver. 24 breaks the connection, and would perhaps stand better, as Knobel conjectures, before ver. 21. [That cattle and other property in Jericho were put under the ban, and the whole city reduced to ashes, was "because this was the first city of Canaan which Jehovah had given a prey to his people. It, therefore, should Israel offer as the first-fruits of the land to the Lord, and even consecrate to Him as devoted, for a sign that they received the whole land from his hand, as a loan and as what had fallen to Him, not what they would snatch for themselves." Keil. — Tr.]

Ver. 25 takes up again the thread of the narrative concerning Rahab's position.

She dwelt in Israel. See the Exegetical and Homiletical on chap. ii.

Ver. 26. Curse upon Jericho. Since a devoted city might not, according to Deut. xiii. 17, be rebuilt, Joshua pronounces an imprecation on the foundation and soil of Jericho. Such a curse, as Strabo says, xiii. p. 601, Agamemnon uttered upon Ilium, and Scipio, according to Appian (Punica, § 135 f.), upon Carthage (Knobel). In connection with this they used, as Hadrian did at Jerusalem, to plough around the site of the city (Starke). "The Jews also probably scattered salt over the place, Judg. ix. 45, as a curse and sign of barrenness, Deut. xxix. 22, 23; Ps. cvii. 33, 34; Jer. xvii. 6; Zech. ii. 9," Starke. Of ploughing and sowing salt there is no mention here, but so much the more impressive sounds the curse which Joshua poetically utters. That this curse was fulfilled is related in 1 K. xvi. 34, when Hiel of Bethel ventured in Ahab's time to rebuild Jericho. It is at variance with this late restoration of the city that its name reappears in our book ch. xviii. 21; Judg. iii. 13; 2 Sam. x. 5. The difficulty may be obviated (a) by assuming, with Winer, that in 1 K. xvi. 34 the language relates only to the fortifications of Jericho, — which reference of the word יְרִיחוֹ is established by 1 K. xv. 17 and 2 Chr. xi. 5 — and that Joshua himself as military leader had respect only to the fortifications; or (b) by availing ourselves of the hypothesis of Knobel, that the Jericho spoken of during the time between Joshua and Ahab was in a different place from that which Hiel first rebuilt. In support of his view Knobel recalls that neither Troy nor Carthage was built up again on the old spot, because the ground of both places had been cursed. For the rest, Knobel conceives the execration in the special form which it had received, as wholly vaticinium ex eventu, and views the matter thus: (1) Joshua had expressed an imprecation, but a "general imprecation;" (2) This general imprecation was known, and had for its effect that when Jericho was rebuilt in the time between Joshua and David, it was not placed on the old site; (3) the rebuilding on the old site was effected under Ahab, by Hiel, who lost his oldest son at the time of laying the foundation of the wall, and his youngest at the setting up of the gate; (4) the author of our book knew of these occurrences, and assumed that Joshua had not only uttered a general malediction, but had extended this to so minute points as were afterwards brought to light. We confess that we here meet too many hypotheses, and therefore stand by the explanation of Winer, which is grammatically well established.

Ver. 27. Joshua's fame, שִׁמְעוֹ, Jos. ix. 9.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

In order to determine the notion of יָרָדוּ, we must have regard above all to the passage Lev. xxvii. 28, 29: "Only no devoted thing (יָרָדוּ) which a man shall devote (יָרָדוּ) to Jehovah of all that he hath, of man and beast, and of the field of his possession, shall be sold or redeemed (יִקָּדֹשׁ) every devoted thing is most holy to Jehovah. No devoted thing which is devoted by men shall be redeemed; it shall surely be put to death." Everything else of man, of beast, of house, of field which one only consecrated to Jehovah (שְׁמִי) might be redeemed, but what any one had devoted, that is, given over to complete and unconditional sanctity, that could not be redeemed. It was, as Rüetschi says (Realencyk. i. p. 677), "a doomed gift" (Baugeschenk), an object laid under the ban (בְּרִיחַ in its first, active sense), a thing most holy to Jehovah. If it was a living creature, it was, according to this precept of the law, put to death; if it was a piece of land it was (as we may rightly conclude from Lev. xxvii. 21, comp. also Num. xviii. 14; Ezek. xlv. 29) the possession of the priests; if it was any other valuable property it belonged, as our history teaches (ch. vi. 19, 24) and as is shown also by Num. xxxi. 54, to the treasury of Jehovah. If an entire city like Jericho was put under the ban, it was burnt up (Josh. vi. 24; x. 28, 35, 37, 40; xi. 11; Num. xxi. 1-3; Deut. xiii. 16); yet not always, Josh. xi. 13, as they also sometimes let the cattle live, and divided them as booty (Deut. ii. 34 f., iii. 6 ff., and Josh. viii. 26 ff.). Such a devotedness might be, as Rüetschi has explained with special clearness, directed inwardly, on the people of Israel themselves, comp. ch. vii., or outwardly against those of other nations. In both cases, however, as a long line of passages (Ex. xxii. 20; Deut. xiii. 16 ff., ii. 34, iii. 6; Josh. vi. 17 ff., etc., see above) will show, the destruction of every unholy, idolatrous creature was the design, since Israel must be a holy people. The latter case, the outward direction of it, is met with earlier in the history, but with special frequency in our book. "Dreadful, certainly," says Winer (i. 135, obs. 3), "was such devotedness of conquered cities, only there is no good reason for complaining of Hebrew antiquity so bitterly as Tindal, Morgan, and others have done. Humanity toward prisoners of war, especially toward the inhabitants of conquered cities, was unknown to the ancient nations generally. Every war was at first a war of annihilation, and that treatment of the Canaanitish towns was, on political, and (in the sense of that age) religious grounds, as truly demanded, as is very much besides which even civilized and Christian nations hold valid, as flowing from the right of conquest."

The destruction of these Canaanite cities followed upon an immediate, divine direction (Ex. xvii. 14; Deut. vii. 2; xx. 16; 1 Sam. xv. 3), at another time, the Israelites vow the same (Num. xxi. 2). Again in other cases, the devotedness, in its inward direction and in its outward, takes place in consequence of appointments of the law (Lev. xx. 2; Deut. xiii. 16 ff.). By this a limit was set to all caprice, for, the holiness of Israel in rigid separation from everything of a heathen nature, and from every abomination of idolatry (Ex. xxiii. 32; Deut. xx. 18), was to be the only ground of the ban. Otherwise every murderer might with hypocritical mien have appealed to such a devotedness of his neighbor. He who seized upon anything for himself that had been devoted paid the penalty with his life (Josh. vi. 18; Deut. xiii. 17; Josh. vii. 11 ff.).

By these views we must interpret the expression of the high-priest (John xi. 49, 50), and so also St. Paul's designation (Gal. iii. 10) of the crucified Redeemer, as κατάρα.

Finally we may mention that similar statutes were in force among the Gauls and ancient Germans; and to the Romans and Greeks they were not at all strange. Cæsar relates of the Gauls

(Bell. Gall. vi. 17): "Huic (sc. Marti) quam prælio dimicare constituerunt, ea, quæ bello ceperint, plerumque devotent. Quæ superaverint, animalia capta immolant; reliquas res in unum locum conferunt. Multis in civitatibus harum rerum extractos tumulos locis consecratis conspiciari licet; neque sæpe accidit, ut, neglecta quispian religione, aut capta apud se occultare, aut posita tollere auderet; gravissimumque ei rei supplicium cum cruciati constitutum est." The practice therefore was similar to what happened in the case of Achan, the penalty of death for theft of what had been devoted. Tacitus (Annal. xiii. 57) tells concerning the Hermunduri, that a war in which they had been engaged with the Catti had turned out fortunately for the former, for the latter ruinously (eritiosius); "quia victores diversam aciem Marti ac Mercurio sacravere, quo voto, equi, viri, cuncta victa occidioni dantur." Livy (iii. 55) recalls a law passed under the consuls L. Valerius and M. Horatius: "Ut qui tribunis plebis, ædilibus, judicibus, decemviris nocuisset, ejus caput Jovi sacrum esset; familia ad cædem Cereris, Liberi, Libereque venum iret." We may remember further the ver sacrum, so beautifully described by Uhland in his familiar poem, and the burning up of a part of the spoils, to consecrate them to the gods, as was also done in Roman antiquity (Appian, Pun. ch. cxxxiii; Mithr. ch. xlv.). Similar is the taboo of the South Sea islanders, a ban the violation of which was punished with death. See the Calver Missions-Geschichte by Blumhardt, ii. pp. 238, 243. [Murray's Encyc. of Geog. iii. p. 156; Cook's Voyages (2 vols. Lond. 1842), vol. ii. pp. 112, 113, 255, and often.]

2. The fall of the walls of Jericho is just as much referred to the immediate causality of God, as the miraculous passage of the Israelites through the Jordan. It is a soulless expedient, therefore, to think of an undermining of the walls. Much rather might we approve the resort to an earthquake, because in such a natural event the divine agency is directly involved. But there is nothing said of that in the text, and it is therefore best simply to recognize the fact. It was for the Canaanites a terror, to the Israelites a most cheering sign of the continued presence of God with his people. For us its symbolical significance is not to be lightly estimated, especially for those among us to whom the Bible is indeed precious but much of what is related in it difficult to receive,—really earnest Christians, whom we should not on this account (as is, alas, so commonly done) immediately characterize as infidels. This name, indeed, it would in general be far better to apply somewhat more sparingly, unless all investigation of Scripture is to be threatened with the ban.

"By this" (namely, its occurrence, through the direct efficiency of God), "the fall of Jericho became the image and type of the fall of every world-power before the Lord, when He comes to lead his people into Canaan and to establish his kingdom on earth. On the ground of this fact it is, that the blast of the trumpet becomes, in the writings of the prophets, the signal and symbolical prognostic of the revelations of the Lord in the great judgments by which He, through the destruction of one world-power after the other, maintains and extends his kingdom on earth, and carries it onward toward perfection. This it will reach when He descends from heaven in his glory at the time of the last trumpet, with a shout, with the voice of the archangel and trump of God, to raise the dead and change the living, to hold the judgment of the world and cast the devil, and death, and hell into the lake of fire, to create heaven and earth anew, and in the New Jerusalem to set up the tabernacle of God with men forever and ever." (1 Cor. xv. 51 ff.; 1 Thess. iv. 16 f.; Apoc. xx. and xxi.) Keil.

"By ordering that the walls of Jericho should fall only after the circuit of the city during seven days, and on the seventh day seven times with the sound of the alarm-trumpets and the war-cry of the warriors of God's people, God would make this city, the key of Canaan, a type of the final destruction of the powers of this world which stand in hostile opposition to the kingdom of God. By this would He not only intimate to his people that not immediately, but after protracted and patient struggles, finally at the end of the world, will the hostile world-power be subdued, but also hint to the enemies of his kingdom, that their strength, although they may long resist, yet at last will perish in a moment." Keil.—Tr.]

3. It is worthy of notice how the Redeemer has signalized Jericho. Here he entered into the house of Zacchæus (Luke xix. 5, 9); here he healed Bartimeus of his blindness (Mar. x. 46, 52; Luke xviii. 35); in the neighborhood of this city he repeated the announcement of his sufferings (Luke xviii. 31; Matt. xx. 28). He thinks of Jericho in the parable of the good Samaritan (Luke x. 30). Then Jericho was a prominent city by reason of Herod's magnificent buildings there; now it is a miserable village. [See the references on ch. ii. 1.]

4. As the blessing operates in its effects through centuries, so not less does the curse, when a moral justification accompanies it. The curse upon Jericho was the curse upon everything of an idolatrous nature, upon the Canaanite race with all its heathenish abominations; it was therefore a theocratic curse on sin itself. Such a curse Paul utters, on the principles of the N. T., against all teachers of error and corruptors of the congregation (1 Cor. xvi. 22; Gal. i. 8), with the same propriety as did Joshua. The more the leaven of Christianity spreads and pervades all things, the less occasion shall we have for cursing; we shall have occasion rather for praising God and blessing the brethren. But he who sees everywhere only apostasy and error, who will not perceive that even now salvation is nearer to us than before, he will doubtless rather curse than bless, as in fact not only ultramontane Catholics, but also some professing Protestantism abundantly do. But they are no Joshuas, neither of them. Their glance reaches not even into the near future, to say nothing of distant ages. So their sentences of curse die away in silence, to our great comfort, because they have no moral justification.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

The closed and barred Jericho an image (1) of a closed heart; (2) of a closed house; (3) of a closed congregation.—As the Lord gave Jericho into the hand of Joshua, so He still always gives every closed heart, and every closed house, and every closed congregation (or even city) into the hand of his servants.—The trump of the year of jubilee and the trump of Judgment.—Before the war-shout of the spiritual Israel fall all the walls which the world has reared for its own defense, especially the walls of self-righteousness behind which sin pursues its courses.—The procession around Jericho, (1) silent, (2) but with the accompaniment of trumpet blasts, a procession in the name of the Lord God of Israel.—The capture of Jericho, (1) well prepared for by Joshua, (2) gloriously accomplished by God's almighty power. The dawn of the seventh day a dawn of victory. The confidence of Joshua's faith.—Shout for God has given you the city.—The holy curse.—The holy deliverance (ver. 17.)—Judgment and mercy shown by the devotement of Jericho on the one hand, and on the other by the deliverance of Rahab.—Keep yourselves from that which is devoted.—The treasure of the Lord, consisting (1) in Israel, in gold and silver, and brass (2) among us, in the holy gospel of the blessed God, in Christ Jesus.—The walls fell down that! O, how shall we rejoice when one day all the walls which proud worldliness has built fall down, even those which statutes have erected—the walls of cloisters and the walls of Rome!—The glorious victory of the people, a condemnation at the same time of Jericho.—The rescue of Rahab considered in reference (1) to her person (description of her character according to ch. ii., Heb. xi. 31; Ja. ii. 25); (2) to the conscientiousness of Joshua, who would have the word which had been given kept; (3) to the future of the kingdom of God (Rahab from among the heathen, the mother of a family, and what is connected with that: Rahab the heathen woman is received into Israel, that through Israel the heathen also might be saved).—The imprecation upon Jericho; (1) a well deserved sentence; hence (2) fulfilled as a prophetic word, when Hiel again built the city, 1 K. xvi. 34.—Rather bless than curse, because we are Christians.—Men not to be cursed, but only sin.

STARKE: That is the way of the sons of this world; seeing need and danger at the door they resort only to human plans and expedients for escape, when they ought to betake themselves to God and seek shelter with him, Jer. xviii. 11; Ps. l. 15.—To build fortresses and to fly thither in time of need is not indeed wrong in itself, but let not one trust too much in them, because without God no inclosure can help, Hos. viii. 14; Ps. cxxvii. 1.—Those who sit at the helm should not sleep at mid-day, but be up betimes, and attend to their duties, Rom. xii. 7.—A believing and fervent prayer is the true war-shout by which we may conquer our spiritual foes and destroy the devil's kingdom. Christian brother, avail thyself of that therefore with diligence (Eph. vi. 18).

HEDINGER: Every carnal heart is a closed Jericho; God sits down before it and shoots mercy and grace up against its walls. Well for those who do not harden themselves!

CRAMER: God's promises are as certain as if they had already been fulfilled and gone into effect, 2 Cor. i. 20; Ps. xxxiii. 4.—God thinks also of compassion when He is most angry, for in the midst of wrath He is gracious, Gen. vi. 8, 11, 12, 13 f.—What God curses no man must bless, and what God blesses let no man curse, Num. xxiii. 8; 1 K. xvi. 34.

GERLACH: Through the silence of the people it should be more clearly manifest that it was the Lord who fought for Israel. Exercised in faith, under the scorn of their foes should the strength granted them by God be kept till the moment of action.

[G. R. B.: In the progress of his spiritual kingdom also God has chosen to employ means for vanquishing the strongholds of unbelief and worldliness very different from what would suggest themselves to human contrivance. But God's "foolishness" in this, as we might be sure beforehand, has proved itself wiser than all the wisdom of men, and alone efficacious in subduing the proud and bolted heart to repentance and the trustful acceptance of Christ's gracious rule, 1 Cor. i. 18-

25. Therefore let Israel only persevere in sounding the gospel trumpet, patient under delays but constant in the wondrous, even though despised, proclamation, and in due time the stoutest walls of opposition shall fall flat. — Tr.]

2. Achan's Theft.

CHAPTER VII.

a. The Crime.

- 1 But the children [sons] of Israel committed a trespass in the accursed thing [in respect to what was devoted]: for [and] Achan, the son of Carmi, the son of Zabdi, the son of Zerah, of the tribe of Judah, took of the accursed thing [of what was devoted]: and the anger of the Lord [Jehovah] was kindled against the children [sons] of Israel.

b. Its evil Effects in the unfortunate Expedition against Ai.

CHAPTER VII. 2-5.

- 2 And Joshua sent men from Jericho to Ai, which is beside Beth-aven, on the east side of Beth-el, and spake unto them, saying, Go up and view the country [spy out the land]. And the men went up, and viewed [spied out] Ai. And they returned to Joshua, and said unto him, Let not all the people go up; but [omit: but] let about two or three thousand men go up and smite Ai: and [omit: and] make
- 4 not all the people to labour thither; for they are but [omit: but] few. So [And] there went up thither of the people about three thousand men: and they fled before
- 5 the men of Ai. And the men of Ai smote of them about thirty and six men: for [and] they chased them from before the gate even unto Shebarim, and smote them in the going down: wherefore [and] the hearts of the people melted, and became
- as [omit: as] water.

c. Joshua's humble Prayer and God's Answer thereto.

CHAPTER VII. 6-15.

- 6 And Joshua rent his clothes, and fell to the earth upon his face before the ark of the Lord [Jehovah] until the even-tide, he and the elders of Israel, and put dust
- 7 upon their heads. And Joshua said, Alas! O Lord God [Jehovah], wherefore hast thou at all brought this people over [the] Jordan, to deliver us into the hand of the Amorites, to destroy us? would to God [O that] we had been content, and dwelt on the other side [of the] Jordan. O Lord [Fay: Pray, Lord; Bunsen: Forgive, Lord; De Wette: Pray, my Lord], what shall I say, when Israel turneth
- 9 their backs [has turned the back] before their [his] enemies? For the Canaanites [Canaanite], and all the inhabitants of the land shall hear of it, and shall environ us round, and cut off our name from the earth: and what will thou do unto thy great name?
- 10 And the Lord [Jehovah] said unto Joshua: Get thee up; wherefore liest thou
- 11 thus upon thy face? Israel hath sinned, and they have also transgressed my covenant which I commanded them; for [and] they have even [also<sup>1</sup>] taken of the accursed [devoted] thing, and have also stolen, and dissembled also, and they have
- 12 put it even [also put it] among their own stuff. Therefore the children [sons] of Israel could not stand before their enemies, but turned their backs before their enemies, because they were accursed [have become a devoted thing]: neither will I be with you any more, except ye destroy the accursed [devoted] thing from
- 13 among you. Up, sanctify the people, and say, Sanctify yourselves against tomorrow: for thus saith the Lord [Jehovah] God of Israel, There is an accursed [a devoted] thing in the midst of thee, O Israel: thou canst not stand before thine enemies, until ye have put away the accursed [devoted] thing from among
- 14 you. In the morning therefore [And in the morning] ye shall be brought according to your tribes: and it shall be, that the tribe which the Lord [Jehovah] taketh shall come according to the families thereof; and the family which the Lord [Jehovah] shall take [taketh] shall come by [the] households; and the household 15 which the Lord [Jehovah] shall take [taketh] shall come man by man. And it shall be, that he that is taken with the accursed [devoted] thing shall be burnt with fire, he and all that he hath: because he hath transgressed the covenant of the Lord [Jehovah], and because he hath wrought folly in Israel.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 11. — וְהָיָה] repeated to the fifth time very emphatically distinguishes the several momenta of their crime: . . . sinned, and also taken . . . and also stolen, and also dissembled, and also put it, etc. See Ezig. Note. — Tr.]

d. Discovery and Punishment of Achan the Transgressor.

CHAPTER VII. 16-26.

16 So Joshua rose up early in the morning, and brought Israel by their tribes; and 17 the tribe of Judah was taken: And he brought the family [Fay: families <sup>a</sup>] of Judah; and he took the family of the Zarhites [of Zarhi]: and he brought the 18 family of the Zarhites [of Zarhi] man by man; <sup>b</sup> and Zabdi was taken: And he brought his household man by man; and Achan the son of Carmi, the son of Zabdi, the son of Zerah, of the tribe of Judah, was taken.
 19 And Joshua said unto Achan, My son, give, I pray thee, glory to the Lord [Jehovah] God of Israel, and make confession unto him [Gesen.]; so De Wette and Bunsen; Fay: give him [the] praise; and tell me now what thou hast done, 20 hide it not from me. And Achan answered Joshua, and said, Indeed I have sinned against the Lord [Jehovah] God of Israel, and thus and thus have I done.
 21 When [And <sup>1</sup>] I saw among the spoils a goodly Babylonish garment [mantle of Shinar], and two hundred shekels of silver, and a wedge [tongue] of gold of fifty shekels weight, then [and] I coveted them, and took them, and behold they are hid in the 22 earth in the midst of my tent, and the silver under it. So Joshua sent messengers, and they ran unto the tent, and behold, it was hid in his tent, and the silver under it.
 23 And they took them out of the midst of the tent, and brought them unto Joshua, and unto all the children of Israel, and laid them out before the Lord [Jehovah].
 24 And Joshua, and all Israel with him, took Achan the son of Zerah, and the silver, and the garment [mantle], and the wedge of gold, and his sons, and his daughters,
 25 and his oxen, and his asses, and his sheep, and his tent, and all that he had: and they brought them unto the valley of Achor. And Joshua said, Why hast thou troubled us? [or, What trouble hast thou brought upon us?] The Lord [Jehovah] shall trouble thee this day. And all Israel stoned him with stones, and they burned
 26 them with fire, after they had stoned [and pelted] them with stones. And they raised over him a great heap of stones unto this day. So [And] the Lord [Jehovah] turned from the fierceness of his anger: wherefore the name of that place was called, The valley of Achor, unto this day.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 21. — וְהָיָה. The וְהָיָה is as nearly redundant here probably as it ever is (it is treated as if it were entirely so by De Wette, Zuns, and Fay), and yet is not redundant. It betrays the confusion of thought in which Achan spoke: Thus and thus have I done; and I saw . . . and I coveted them, etc.

The manner in which our version, and perhaps all others, not unfrequently substitute a conditional sentence ("when I saw; then I coveted") for two coördinate, copulative sentences of narration ("and I saw — and I coveted") sometimes gives a welcome variety to the monotonous succession of copulative clauses with which the Hebrew is content; but by just so much it misrepresents the child-like artlessness of the Hebrew. It is scarcely ever exactly equivalent to the original expression of the thoughts. It is strictly allowable only when, if ever, the former of two facts may be assumed as known or obvious, and the latter is to be represented in its dependence upon that. — Tr.]

<sup>a</sup> Different Codd., the LXX., the Vulg., instead of מִשְׁפָּחַת יְהוּדָה read מִשְׁפָּחַת יְהוּדָה, which pointing we follow with Kell and Bunsen. [But it seems sufficient and quite consistent with the principle of the following foot-note to understand מִשְׁפָּחַת to be "used laxly for tribe, לְעָמָה." Gesen. — Tr.]

<sup>b</sup> Different Codd., some old editions, the Syr., Vulg., have instead of לְבָרִים, the reading לְעָתִים to make an agreement with ver. 16. But since the former is the more difficult reading we hold fast to it with Kell and Bunsen. See Exegetical Notes.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

a. Ver. 1. The Crime of Achan. The very first words with which the account of Achan's theft begins show that the sin of the individual is regarded as compromising all; for it is said: The children of Israel committed a trespass in that which was devoted. מָעַל signifies properly to cover, from which מָעִיל a mantle; hence to act underhandedly, treacherously, Prov. xvi. 10; 2 Chron. xxvi. 18; xxix. 6, 19; Neh. i. 8; specially frequent in the combination which we find here מָעַל מָעַל = to sin through falsehood, treachery, namely, מַדְלִיחַ, 1 Chron. v. 25; x. 13; 2 Chron.

xii. 2, here בָּרוּרם therefore indirectly ביחודה ch. xxii. 20; 1 Chron. ii. 7.

Achan. In 1 Chron. ii. 7 the man is called עָקֵר = the troubler, with which chaps. vi. 18; vii. 26, may be compared. "Josephus also calls him, therefore, Ἀχάρις, the LXX. in Cod. Vat. Ἀχάρις, while Cod. Alex. has Ἀχάρις" (Keil). Stier and Theile's polyglott reads with Vat. Ἀχάρις. Instead of Zabdi we read in 1 Ch. ii. 6 Zimri, arising perhaps, as Keil supposes, from confounding letters.

Then the anger of Jehovah was kindled against the children of Israel. Luther: "was fierce;" but "blazed," "was kindled to a blaze," is perhaps more adequately suggestive, since the anger itself is regarded as a flame which blazes up and turns its destructive force in this or that direction. It is said concerning men: Gen. iv. 5; 2 Sam. xii. 5; Ex. xxxii. 19, 22; 1 Sam. xviii. 8; xx. 7 and often; Acts xvii. 16; but by preference concerning God; Num. xi. 1, 10; xxii. 22; Job xix. 11; xlii. 7; Zech. x. 3; Hab. iii. 8. In the N. T. also concerning Christ, John xi. 33, 38; God himself is a consuming fire; Ex. xxiv. 17; Dent. iv. 24; ix. 3; Heb. xii. 29. Fire goes before him: Dent. ix. 3; Joel ii. 3; Ps. xviii. 9, 16. His anger is therefore a destructive anger when it is revealed from heaven against the unrighteousness of men, Rom. i. 18. Here it blazes not against Achan only, but against the whole people, because Achan, a member of the people, has through his crime brought the whole people into a partnership of suffering. The consequences of his deed show themselves immediately in the unfortunate expedition against Ai.

b. Vers. 2-5. Its evil Effects in the unfortunate Expedition against Ai. Joshua sends men from Jericho to Ai, to explore the land, pursuing the same course as before (ch. ii.). They bring back a favorable report, advise to let only two or three thousand men go forward, and persuade Joshua so to do. The ill success of the movement shows that they had underrated the strength of Ai.<sup>1</sup> Although the loss of thirty-six men is comparatively small, the people are disheartened. Their heart melts and becomes water.

Ver. 2. Ai, Beth-aven, ch. xviii. 23. — Bethel, xviii. 13.

Ver. 3. They are few. According to ch. viii. 25, Ai had 12,000 inhabitants. The scouts had not estimated rightly.

Ver. 5. Shebarim. שְׁבָרִים, probably "stone quarries" which lay in that vicinity but have not yet been found by travellers, while there are such near Anathoth, according to Robinson (ii. 110), and Tobler (Topography of Jerusalem, ii. p. 395, in Knobel). Noticeable is the translation of the LXX. ἡς συνέτριψαν αὐτοὺς, which supposes instead of the Masoretic עָרֵה שְׁבָרִים the reading עָרֵה שְׁבָרִים. According to that the defeat should have been total, and the discouragement of the people more intelligible than when only the thirty-six were lost.

Wherefore the heart of the people melted and became water. Ch. ii. 11; v. 1; Dent. i. 28. A very striking addition: "became water." Is it, perhaps, that they wept?

c. Ver. 6-16. Joshua's humble Prayer and God's Answer thereto. The section falls into two divisions: (a.) Ver. 6-9. Filled with deep distress, Joshua, with the elders of Israel, falls down before the ark of God, and continues with them in penitent prayer till evening. (b.) Ver. 10-15. God answers that there is one devoted among the Israelites, who must be destroyed, after he has been discovered by casting lots.

a. Ver. 6-9, Joshua's Prayer.

Ver. 6. And Joshua rent his clothes. A sign of mourning and distress. The clothes were torn in front over the breast, yet not for more than a hand-breadth (Othon. Lex. Rabb. p. 360, apud Winer). The custom appears also among Greeks and Romans. Suet. Cæs. 33 (veste a pectore discissa). In the O. T. many passages remind us of it, yet in Winer precisely the passage before us is wanting. It is remarkable that in 2 Sam. iii. 31, the rending of the garments is commanded by the king, "but it is no more strange," as Winer well observes, "than if among us, on the death of the ruler of the land, the mode of personal mourning were prescribed by an edict." Tearing the clothes had gradually become among the Jews, as we cannot but think, the fashion in mourning, precisely as among us the wearing of black garments and crape badges for a specified time. [See Bibl. Dict. art. "Mourning."] Hence the prophet Joel admonishes the people: "Render your hearts and not your garments" (ii. 13). But when the high-priest (Matt. xxvi. 65), or Paul and Barnabas tear their clothes (Acts xiv. 14), it was in the deepest displeasure, when the feelings were excited, since such a state is related to mourning.

Dust. Likewise a sign of mourning 1 Sam. iv. 12; 2 Sam. i. 2; Lam. ii. 10, and often, Iliad xvii. 23 ff.; xxiv. 164.

Ver. 7. Joshua first asks God why He has brought his people over the Jordan, if He would now destroy them; for it would have been better if they had been content to stay in the land east of that river.

Would that we had been content and dwelt on the other side of the Jordan. Luther: O that we had remained on the other side of the Jordan as we had commenced, — the ut cepimus of the Vulgate, by which הוֹאִילֵנוּ is translated. Unquestionably הוֹאִילֵנוּ means to commence, and is eleven times rendered by the LXX., according to Gesenius, ἀρχομαι; here, however, as Judg. xix. 6, xvii. 11, it means, to let one's self be pleased, and with the accessory notion, of "to be content." The translation of the Vulgate and of Luther is tame, <sup>1</sup> [And yet the subsequent statement (viii. 25) that the entire population of the city amounted to only twelve thousand, would imply on general principles that a few thousand chosen warriors would be sufficient to overcome its military force. Something must be allowed for the effect of the divine displeasure. — Ta.]

while the LXX. hits the correct sense: Εἰ κατεμύναμεν καὶ κατακλίσθημεν παρὰ τὸν ἱερδάρη.

Ver. 8. Continuation of the complaint, with the additional element that Israel has fled before his enemies.

Ver. 9. Portrays the great danger if the Canaanites hear of this, and finally, ver. 10: "What wilt thou do for thy great name? God himself is, as it were, concerned."

β. Vers. 10-15. God's Reply. The entire tone of this answer attests that God's anger is indeed kindled against the children of Israel. Israel is himself to blame for the defeat (vers. 10, 11) because he has sinned, nor will he hereafter be able to stand before his enemies on this account; and God will not be among the children of Israel unless they destroy that which is devoted from among them (ver. 12). Joshua must therefore rise up, sanctify the people against the following day, and discover the guilty man by casting lots (vers. 13, 14). When he is discovered, he and all which he has must be burned up with fire (ver. 15). It is a mighty and deeply impressive word from God which is here imparted to Joshua.

Ver. 10. Get thee up! Wherefore, etc. Divine displeasure. "Joshua might well divine that they had merited Jehovah's ill-will. Hence God's somewhat impatient question, why he lay there on his face. He should rather be up and trying to detect and put away the sin" (Knobel).

Ver. 11. "The כִּז is scarcely more than and," Knobel remarks, but we would call attention to the rhetorical climax—suited to express God's vehement displeasure—in the several designations of their sin as connected by וְ: transgressed—taken—stolen—dissembled—put among their own stuff. For here was the culmination of the crime, that they had appropriated to themselves what belonged to God. [Cf. ch. vi. 18.] Thus conceived, the language is more dramatic, laden with the most intense emotion.

Ver. 12. They have become a devoted thing, ch. vi. 18.

Ver. 13 begins with a repeated admonition to Joshua to arise. God gives him this admonition, as indeed the entire answer, directly, not as Clericus supposes, through the high-priest, of whom the context has not a word.—Sanctify yourselves against to-morrow, ch. iii. 5.

Ver. 14. The tribe which Jehovah shall take. That is through the lot (בִּזְרִי) which is here used, as in 1 Sam. xiv. 42 (Jonah i. 7), in a criminal investigation; elsewhere in divisions of land and people, of prisoners, in elections, warlike undertakings. "Commonly dice were thrown, as is probable ("to cast lots," xviii. 8, "to throw," xviii. 6, "the lot falls," Jon. i. 7; Ezek. xxiv. 6), or drawn out of a vessel ("the lot came forth") Num. xxxiii. 54, "came up" Lev. vi. 9." Winer. First the tribe, then the clan, then the household, ("father-house"), finally the particular man was to be discovered. The manner itself in which this was done is not known; it is natural to suppose that white and black stones were used, especially as

בִּזְרִי from זָרַל = זָרַל to be rough, signifies properly a small stone, ψῆφος. Farther particulars may be found in Mauritius, De Sortitione apud Hebræos, Basil, 1692. [Dict. of the Bible, art. "Lot."]. Like the Hebrews, the Romans also resorted to the lot in divisions (sortes dimisorie), and elections ("sortes urbana" and "peregrina" in the choice of a prætor)

as also to explore the will of the divinity (staff-oracle, rhabdromancy). The Homeric heroes cast lots (αληροῦν ἀλήπος) whenever the accomplishment of any heroic deed was in question, as was done also Judg. xxii. 10. They too had rhabdromancy as well as the Romans (see Pierer s. v. "Loos").

Ver. 15. Shall be burnt with fire. "Not alive, but according to ver. 25 he was first stoned to death, and then his corpse burned as an aggravation of the death penalty" (Keil).

פֶּלֶא, פָּלָה. The פָּלָל is not so much a fool in an intellectual respect as in a moral; hence פָּלָה is more the moral than the intellectual folly = to iniquity, comp. Gen. xxxiv. 7; Deut. xxii. 21; Judg. xix. 23, 24; 2 Sam. xiii. 12. For the idea of פָּלָל, Ps. xiv. 1; liii. 2, are classical texts.

d. The Discovery and Punishment of Achan the Evil-doer. Ver. 16-20. Conformably to God's command, Joshua the next morning brings the tribes of Israel before Jehovah, when Achan is indicated by the lot as the transgressor (vers. 16-18). Being exhorted to confess his fault Achan owns all (vers. 19-21). The stolen property is found in his tent according to his statement (vers. 22-23); he himself with what belonged to him is stoned and burnt (vers. 24-26).

Vers. 16-18. The difficulty which the text offers, ver. 17, has been already intimated above. In

מִשְׁפָּחָהוּ it requires only a different punctuation to bring it into harmony with ver. 14. We therefore read the plural without hesitation instead of the singular of the Masoretes. It is different with לְבָבֵיהֶם. Here we have a different word before us, and a more difficult one, which we can the less make up our minds to change, since, as Keil, following Vatablus, has happily remarked, not the father-houses or family groups, but only the men representing the clan, the heads of the several father-houses, came forward to the lot. So also Bunsen: "Man, that is, house, ver. 14."

We may perhaps best represent the whole process thus:—

THE PEOPLE OF ISRAEL.

First lot . . . . .	Tribe of Judah.
Second lot . . . . .	Clan of Zerah.
Third lot . . . . .	House of Zabdi. <sup>1</sup>
Fourth lot . . . . .	Man Achan.

Ver. 19-21. My son, give, I pray thee, glory to the Lord God of Israel, and give him (the) praise [or, make confession to him]; and tell me now what thou hast done; hide it not from me, ver. 19. The demand of Joshua upon Achan was certainly meant by him honestly and frankly, not craftily, as some of the Rabbins assume. Achan should confess his sin in order to receive inward forgiveness, although he has outwardly fallen under the irrevocable sentence of God. The form of the demand is the same as in John ix. 24. Reverence for the Omniscent God should move to the confession of the truth. The circumstances, indeed, are here essentially different from those in John ix. Honest and frank Joshua stands before Achan, crafty and treacherous the Pharisees seek, under an appeal for honor to God, to extort from the man born blind a confession injurious to our Lord.

Ver. 20. Achan humbly confesses his sin as a sin against Jehovah, God of Israel.

<sup>1</sup> ["Father-house," represented by Zabdi. — Ta.]

Ver. 21. Babylonish garment, prop. mantle of Shinar = Babylon (Gen. xi. 2, 8, 9; x. 10). What it was made of we know not, since particular statements are wanting. Starke suspects it was of gold and silken threads, and that it was wrought in many colors mixed, Jon. iii. 6; 2 K. ii. 13. "Concerning the elaborate and beautiful products of the Babylonian looms, see Heeren, Asiat. Nations, i. 2, p. 422 ff. [Bohn's Eng. ed.]. Movers' Phœnicians, ii. 3, p. 238 ff." (Knobel). [See further particulars in Dict. of the Bibl., art. "Babylonish Garment."]

Two hundred shekels of silver =  $200 \times 0.60$  = \$120. For details concerning the calculation, vid. in Winer, Realw. s. v. "Sekel," or in Herzog's Realencyk. vol. iv. p. 764. [Gesen. s. v. שקל, Dict. of the Bibl. art. "Money," "Shekel," and "Weights and Measures."]

A wedge (prop. tongue) of gold. Vulg. regula aurea, a golden bar. Rather, "a tongue-shaped article made of gold" (Knobel). The weight is given at fifty shekels, equal in value to cir. thirty dollars.

I coveted them, Gen. iii. 6; Jas. iv. 13-15. יִצְחָק, the article as Lev. xxvii. 33.

Under it. The mantle lay probably on the top, and the tongue of gold next below, and the silver lowest.

Vers. 22, 23. Discovery of the stolen Goods in Achan's Tent. The messengers laid it down, after they had found it, before Jehovah. יָצַק from יָצַק, to pour out, is equivalent to יָצַק, to set, to place, 2 Sam. xv. 24.

Before Jehovah = before the ark of Jehovah, where He was enthroned, vi. 8.

Ver. 24-26. Achan, son of Zerah; in a wide sense son of Zerah; strictly he was his great grandson. He is now, together with the articles appropriated by him, as well as his whole property, and also all his sons and daughters, given up to destruction. How does this sentence passed on Achan, under which his innocent sons and daughters also fell, agree with the decision of the law, Deut. xxiv. 16, according to which the fathers should not die for the children, nor the children for the fathers, but every one for his own sin? This difficulty has been met in various ways: (1) Some Rabbins, Schulz, Hess, and others suppose that Achan's family were brought into the valley of Achor merely as spectators, to take a terrifying example, contrary to what is written, ver. 25. (2) C. a. Lapide, Cler., Mich., Rosenmüller, think they had had a share in their father's crime. For this an analogous case might be cited in Acts v. 1 ff., but while there it is made conspicuous that Sapphira was privy to the sin of Ananias; here every intimation of that kind is wanting. Hence (3) Calvin, Masius, Seb. Schmidt, leave the matter undecided, appealing to the unfathomableness of God's counsels; while others again, like Knobel, and Starke also, at least by intimations, remark that we have here to do with a judgment executed by the immediate direction of God, and therefore a divine judgment, similar to the case, Num. xvi. 32, whereas the ordinance in Deut. xxiv. 16, holds good only for the usual every-day administration of justice. Before God, the searcher of hearts, the sons and daughters of Achan were guilty of participation in their father's sin, because in them the same "corrupted nature and disposition," which Keil rightly notices, was present, which in the father produced the evil deed [?]. God visits the sins of the fathers on the children, Ex. xx. 5; Num. xiv. 33. Accurately considered, the decision pertaining to private rights, in Deut. xxiv. 16, has no application to this higher public right of God.

Ver. 24. Valley of Achor. Ch. xv. 7; Hos. ii. 15; Is. lxx. 10. The origin of the name is given, ver. 25. It lay north of Jericho on the northern border of the tribe of Judah. In Jerome's time the name was still in use.

Ver. 25. And all Israel stoned him. Here יָצַק is used, afterwards at the close of the verse, in an addition which the LXX omit, יָצַק. Both words are used in the Bible of stoning, but יָצַק has the more general signification, and is found only once, Lev. xxiv. 14, without יָצַק. Achan is condemned to be stoned because he had by his robbery violated the honor of God, as did blasphemers, Sabbath breakers, idolaters, sorcerers, wizards, etc. The addition אֶחָד מֵאֵלֶּיךָ is superfluous, and may perhaps be intended, as Knobel conjectures, to obviate a misunderstanding of יָצַק in the former half of the verse. Not only the LXX but the Vulg. omits it. Luther has aimed to avoid the difficulty by attaching the words to the following verse, and translating: "And when they had stoned them they raised," etc. [Nearly so the Eng. vers.]

Ver. 26. Over Achan they raised a great heap of stones which served to commemorate his disgrace (ch. viii. 29; 2 Sam. xviii. 17); and that even to the writer's time. The casting of stones on certain graves was customary in other nations also, e. g. among the Arabs (Schulte's Hist. Jotamidarum, pp. 118, 144), and the Romans (Propert. 4, 5, 74 ff. Serv. ed. Lion, i. p. 1), but had not always that dishonorable import. It had not, e. g. among the Bedouins who often heap up stones over one buried (Burkhardt, Bedouins, p. 81), Knobel.

And Jehovah turned from the fierceness of his anger, Ex. xxxii. 12.

THEOLOGICAL AND ETHICAL.

1. God's anger is not an ebullition of blind passion, but a holy displeasure against the unrighteousness of men. When this unrighteousness is removed God's anger ceases, as the close of our chapter, ver. 26, shows. All which has been injuriously said concerning the blood-thirsty and wrathful God of the O. T. rests on a failure to apprehend this holy displeasure of God against the unrighteousness of men. That brings upon them indeed judgment and penalty, but never goes so far as to shut up his compassion, although men may think so and with Asaph sigh: Hath God forgotten to be gracious, hath He in anger shut up his tender mercies? (Ps. lxxvii. 10.) Eternal justice which belongs as a constitutive element to the nature of God, without which we cannot conceive of any government at all of the world, is constantly limited by his love. But conversely his love towards men is not a blind love, but rather a truly paternal affection which leaves no fault, no transgression of his commands, unproved. Both justice and love coexist in God, and are mutually blended in him with an interpenetration of the most intimate, highest, absolute kind. Hence the jurists may say: Fiat justitia percat mundus! God never has and never can.

2. Properly Achan alone is the transgressor, but since he is a member of the body politic his act compromises all the children of Israel, and hence draws after it injurious consequences upon all, so that the anger of God is kindled against all. In the eyes of God the whole community appears infected by the sin of the one, so that they stand before him, not as a pure and holy congregation, as they should be according to their high vocation, (Ex. xix. 6; Deut. vii. 6; 1 Pet. ii. 9). If we keep firmly to this point of view, we shall cease from complaining of God as being in any way unrighteous, as if He recklessly punished the innocent with the guilty. We shall rather, in this matter, agree with Keil when he says: "As member of a community established by God, the good or evil action of the individual involves the whole congregation in blessing or destruction." As Paul writes: "if one member suffer, all the members suffer with it; and if one member be honored all the members rejoice with it" (1 Cor. xii. 26). So may we also say, that if one member becomes guilty, all the members share the guilt, and if one of the members does well, all the members share the blessing of this good deed. It is important in these matters to look not only at the individual but also at the community, that we may comprehend at least in some measure the procedure of the divine justice over against the guilt of mankind. We emphasize "in some measure," because we need yet to lay to heart the advice which Calvin here gives: "Suspensas tenere nostras mentes, donec libri aperiantur, ubi clare patebunt quæ nunc nostra caligine obtenebrantur Dei judicia."

[As clearly as the whole Scripture makes the individual an object of the divine mercy and justice, so clearly does it teach us also to regard the totality of a people as an organic unity, in which the individuals are only members of the body, and not capable of being separated, as so many atoms, from the whole. The state as a divine institution is built on the family, to promote the mutual love of the members, and the common love of all to the one invisible head of all. . . . But if the state is of divine appointment, not a mere civil establishment, not a human institution, conventionally agreed upon by men, the fact following as a necessary consequence from the moral unity of the organism, that the good or evil deed of the one member is reckoned to the whole body, loses the appearance of caprice and unrighteousness which it has while one, without perceiving their fundamental connection, has only a one sided regard to the infliction of the consequences of the sin. Keil — Tit.]

3. The deep humility of Joshua before the Lord reminds us of Moses, Ex. xxxiii. 32, of Ezra (ix. 3), of his own and Caleb's course when the people murmured (Num. xiv. 6). How mighty appear these O. T. saints in their grief because of the sins of their people, how independently they stand up against God, in behalf of God's honor, and yet how humbly! Their sorrow is truly a λύπη κατὰ θεόν (2 Cor. vii. 10), from which proceeds the μετάνοια ἀμεταμέλητος. Hence God raises them up again, and gives them again fresh courage for his work, for He knows that their grief, in its deepest root, is a grief for him, for his name's glory and honor. Themselves pure and clean, they mourn over the misdeeds of the people, while an Ahab (1 K. xxi. 27) if he does this has to exercise penitence for his own sin. Si duo faciunt idem, non est idem. Compare still Ps. lxxxv; cii. 14-19; cxxx. 7, 8.

4. It is to be observed that God (ver. 14 ff.) reserves to himself the discovery of the crime. Jehovah will strike, take (חָבַד, properly, "select,") the tribe, the clan, the house, the particular man, by the lot, the disposing of which is ascribed (Prov. xvi. 33) to the Lord. Such an employment of the lot as is here presented, could only be brought in at the immediate direction of God, or with special appeal to him (1 Sam. xiv. 41), and belonged to the extraordinary measures which He prescribed for his people. The certainty with which the whole process goes forward, the quiet which accompanies it, makes a very solemn impression. The control of the divine justice is most directly brought to our thought when we read the narrative of the transaction, distinguished as it is by an unadorned simplicity; how much more powerful must have been the original impression which this judgment of God made on the assembled people at its actual occurrence! An analogous example is presented in the N. T., Acts v. 1 ff.

5. That all wickedness is folly (חֲסִידוּת), that every sinner is a fool (כֶּסֶף), not indeed so much in an intellectual but above all things in a moral respect, this cutting truth is proclaimed by the O. T. loudly and impressively. A very significant hint for hamartiology; the nature of sin is so difficult to explain because it is merely absolute irrationality, because it is foolishness!

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

How human iniquity provokes divine anger. — The sin of an individual in its destructive effects on an entire people shown in the case of Achan. — Of God's anger. (1) What are we to understand thereby? (2) How can we guard against it so that it may not be kindled against us? — The unfortunate expedition of Joshua against Ai. — Human sagacity alone helps not if God be not with us. — Despise no enemy; for you may in meeting him be greatly deceived concerning his strength. — How soon, alas, is the heart of man discouraged! — Against despondency of the heart helps God's grace alone, Heb. xiii. 9.

Joshua's humble prayer before God. — God withstands the proud but giveth grace unto the humble. Joshua's grief for his people compared with the lamentation of Moses and Ezra. — Joshua as an example of mourning before God. — Parallel between Joshua's penitence and that of Ahab. — Rending of the garments a significant symbol of the rending of the heart, Joel ii. 13. — How God hears prayer.

The discovery and punishment of Achan the transgressor, a case of the divine administration of Justice. — (1) How Achan was hit upon; (2) how he confessed his sin; (3) what punishment he received; or (1) the discovery of the criminal; (2) his confession; (3) his punishment. — Joshua and Achan; (1) How Joshua seeks to bring Achan to a confession of his guilt; (2) how the latter actually confesses it. — We give honor to God when we say the truth. — Achan's lowly confession of sin. — Every sin a sin against the Lord. — Covetousness, unlawful desire, a source of every sin. — The stoning of Achan. — The judgment in the valley of Achor. — The monument of the crime a warning to Israel. — The stoning of Achan, and that of Stephen — what a contrast?

STARKE: He who has done iniquity should own the truth to the honor of God. But woe to those who deny their misdeeds, Ps. xxxii. 1. Si fecisti age, is not a divine but a devilish rule. Ye advocate, put nothing of such into any man's head.

CRAMER: However shrewdly men begin a thing it does no good except in so far as God gives it success. For if God is not with us all is lost. — The heart of man can nowhere observe a just proportion. In prosperity it is too proud, in adversity too pusillanimous.

BIBL. TUB.: When God goes with us into the field the mightiest foe cannot hurt us, but where God is not we cannot resist the weakest enemy. — God lets us not sink away in our mourning, but when He has sufficiently humbled us and laid us in the dust, and sees in us a true repentance for our sins, He himself also raises us up again and exalts the miserable from the dust, Ps. cxlii. 7; 1 Cor. x. 13.

HERDINGER: If, in the spiritual conflict also we are left to come off worsted, there is often nothing to blame but some, perhaps hidden, sin which yet lurks in us and of which we have not yet repented.

GERLACH, CALVIN: That they in this prayer turn straight to God, and recognize that He who has wounded can heal them, springs from their faith; but carried away by excess of grief they transgress all limits. Hence the boldness of their controversy with God; hence the perverse wish: O that we had remained in the wilderness! But it is nothing new that when men with holy zeal seek God, the light of their faith is dimmed by the intensity, the tempest of their emotions. . . . And yet when they thus strive with God and pour out before Him all which weighs them down, though this their simplicity needs forgiveness, it is still far more agreeable to God than the mock-humility of hypocrites, who take great care that no word of assurance may cross their lips, while they are inwardly filled with pride. — It is a fine trait in this narrative that the criminal, detected by the lot, should be condemned only on his own confession. Joshua does not promise him exemption from punishment, but by his confession God was honored before all the people, since the accuracy of the lot was confirmed. At the same time there lies in these words a hint of a divine judgment hereafter, before which guilt and penalty will be abated when one has given himself up to suffer the earthly penalty ordained by God, confessing that he has deserved it. There is manifested here a truly holy, paternal disposition in Joshua, as a judge who relaxes nothing of the rigor of the divine command, but, so far as is possible in consistency with that, deals mercifully with the transgressor. — By his robbery of the sanctuary Achan had entirely broken the covenant with God, and he and his had become the same as the Canaanites; as they had snatched for themselves what had been devoted to destruction, they must themselves now be destroyed. Similar in this respect was the punishment, which in ancient times was inflicted on the families of those guilty of high treason, and in some degree is still inflicted among us.

[SCOTT: Every failure in such undertakings as evidently accord to the will of God, and the duty of our place and station, should cause us to humble ourselves before him, to flee to his mercy seat, to pour out our hearts in prayer, and inquire "wherefore he contendeth with us;" and to plead his promises and the glory of his great name, as engaged to support that cause which we are endeavoring to promote whatever becomes of us and our worthless names. — Would we avoid the commission of gross iniquity, we must "make a covenant with our eyes" and all our senses; we must repress the first movements of concupiscence, and pray earnestly not to be led into temptation, we must habituate ourselves to meditate on the future consequences of sinful gratification; and to place ourselves, by an effort of the imagination, in those very circumstances in which we should be were the sin committed, and the infatuation vanished; and to consider what our judgment and feelings in that case would be. — Finally, though atrocious criminals, should be punished with unrelenting firmness, and all should unite in protesting against their crimes; yet their misery should not be insulted, nor their immortal souls forgotten; but calm exhortations, serious instructions, and compassionate exhortations, should be used to bring them to repentance, that they may obtain mercy from God in a future world.

G. R. B.: Jehovah is a prayer-hearing God — blessed be His name! — but with what impatience He listens to the cries of those, however proper the matter of their petitions, who have need themselves to act in order that their wishes may be granted! "Up! sanctify thyself," we may hear Him saying to many an earnest suppliant; "put away thy sins, supply thy own deficiencies, and do thy part to remove the stumbling-blocks from among thy brethren; then expect my help towards what thou desirest further." Happy for us if we get even this answer to our mistaken prayer! — Tr.]

3. Capture and Destruction of Ai.

CHAPTER VIII. 1-29.

a. Joshua's Stratagem against Ai.

CHAPTER VIII. 1-13.

- 1 And the Lord [Jehovah] said unto Joshua: Fear not, neither be thou dismayed, [i. 9]: take all the people of war with thee, and arise, go up to Ai: see, I have
- 2 given into thy hand the king of Ai, and his people, and his city, and his land: And thou shalt do unto Ai and her king as thou didst unto Jericho and her king: only the spoil thereof, and the cattle thereof, shall ye take for a prey unto yourselves: lay thee an ambush for the city behind it.

- 3 So [And] Joshua arose, and all the people of war, to go up against Ai: and Joshua chose out thirty thousand mighty men of valour [strong heroes] and sent them away
 4 by night. And he commanded them, saying, Behold, ye shall lie in wait against the city, even [omit: even] behind the city; go not very far from the city, but be 5 ye all ready: And I, and all the people that are with me, will approach unto the city: and it shall come to pass when they come out against us, as at the first, that
 6 we will flee before them, (for [and<sup>1</sup>] they will come out after us,) till we have drawn them from the city; for they will say, They flee before us as at the first: there-
 7 fore [and] we will flee before them. Then ye shall rise up from the ambush and seize upon the city: for the Lord [Jehovah] your God will deliver it into your 8 hand. And it shall be when ye have taken the city, that ye shall set the city on fire; according to the commandment [word] of the Lord [Jehovah] shall ye do. See, I have commanded you.
 9 Joshua therefore [And Joshua] sent them forth; and they went to lie in ambush, and abode between Beth-el and Ai, on the west side of Ai: but Joshua lodged that 10 night among the people. And Joshua rose up early in the morning, and numbered [mustered] the people, and went up, he and the elders of Israel, before the people
 11 to Ai. And all the people, even the people [omit: even the people] of war that were with him, went up, and drew nigh, and came before the city, and pitched on the north side of Ai: now there was a valley [and the valley was] between them
 12 [him] and Ai. And he took about five thousand men, and set them to lie in ambush
 13 [as an ambush], between Beth-el and Ai, on the west side of the city. And when they had set the people, even all the host [camp] that was on the north of the city, and their liers in wait on the west of the city, Joshua went<sup>1</sup> that night into the midst of the valley.*

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 6. — וַיֵּשְׁבִי]. The train of thought will probably be better represented by beginning the sentence anew and dropping the parenthesis, so as to connect this clause with the following. So Fay and De Wette: And they will come out after us till, etc. Zuns, however, continues from the preceding: "that they may come out," etc. — Ta.]

b. Sham Flight of the Israelites. Their Victory. Capture and Destruction of the City.

CHAPTER VIII. 14-29.

- 14 And it came to pass when the king of Ai saw it, that they hasted and rose up early, and the men of the city went out against Israel to battle, he and all his people, at a [the] time appointed [or, to the appointed place<sup>1</sup>], before the plain [Jordan-valley]: but he wist not that there were liers in ambush [was an ambush] against 15 him behind the city. And Joshua and all Israel made as if they were beaten before 16 them, and fled by the way of the wilderness. And all the people that were in Ai were called together to pursue after them; and they pursued after Joshua, and 17 were drawn away<sup>2</sup> from the city. And there was not a man left in Ai, or Beth-el, that went not out after Israel: and they left the city open, and pursued after Israel.
 18 And the Lord [Jehovah] said unto Joshua, Stretch out the spear that is in thine hand toward Ai; for I will give it into thine hand. And Joshua stretched 19 out the spear that he had in his hand toward the city. And the ambush arose quickly out of their place, and they ran as soon as he had stretched out his hand; and they entered into the city, and took it, and hasted, and set the city on fire. And when the men of Ai looked behind them, they saw, and behold, the smoke of the city ascended up to heaven, and they had no power to flee this way or [and] that way: and the people that fled to [had fled towards] the wilderness turned back
 21 upon the pursuers. And when Joshua and all Israel saw that the ambush had taken the city, and that the smoke of the city ascended, then they turned again, and 22 slew [smote]<sup>3</sup> the men of Ai. And the other issued out of the city against them: so that they were in the midst of Israel, some on this side, and some on that side:
 23 and they smote them, so that they let none of them remain or escape. And the king of Ai they took alive, and brought him to Joshua.

* Some Codd. read וַיֵּשְׁבִי (lodged) instead of וַיֵּשְׁבִי.

24 And it came to pass when Israel had made an end of slaying all the inhabitants of Ai in the field, in the wilderness wherein they [had] chased them,<sup>4</sup> and when they were all fallen on [by] the edge of the sword, until they were consumed, that all the Israelites [prop.: all Israel] returned unto Ai, and smote it with the edge of the sword. And so it was, that all that fell that day, both of men and women, 25 were twelve thousand, even all the men of Ai. For Joshua drew not his hand back wherewith he stretched out the spear [which he had stretched out with the spear], 26 until he had utterly destroyed [devoted] all the inhabitants of Ai. Only the cattle and the spoil of that city Israel took for a prey unto themselves, according unto the 27 word of the Lord [Jehovah] which he commanded Joshua. And Joshua burnt Ai, 28 and made it a heap for ever, even a desolation unto this day. And the king of Ai he hanged on a [the] tree until even-tide: and as soon as the sun was down, Joshua commanded that they should take his carcass [corpse] down from the tree, and cast it at the entering of the gate of the city, and raise thereon a great heap [גִּלְגַּל, mound] of stones, that remaineth [omit: that remaineth] unto this day.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 14. — So Fay, De Wette, Kell. Either way מוֹעֵד has the article. Perhaps "to the appointment," meaning in respect either to time or to place, would represent the Hebrew with sufficient definiteness. — Tr.]

[2 Ver. 16. — הִכָּהָרְקָה here, "were torn away," "completely separated." See Exegetical Notes. — Tr.]

[3 Ver. 21. — כִּי as in the next verse. — Tr.]

[4 Ver. 24. — That is, "wherein (or whither) the men of Ai had chased the Israelites." — Tr.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

As soon as Achan's crime is expiated by his death God restores his favor to Joshua and the people, exhorts them to be cheerful and bold, and for the second time to undertake the expedition against Ai. This is done, and now with complete success (ch. viii. 1-29). To the rhetorical beauty of this section we have already referred in the introduction (§ 1); the critical difficulty (vers. 12, 13) will be discussed below.

a. Joshua's Stratagem against Ai, ch. viii. 1-13. Ver. 1. The same encouraging address as in ch. i. 9; now very much needed in reference to ch. vii. 5.

All the people of war. Not as in the first attempt 3000 men only, ch. vii. 4.

Ver. 2. Only the spoil thereof . . . shall ye take for prey. At the capture of Jericho, the spoil also (the property) was devoted to Jehovah; but at this time it should belong to the people to whom ample gain had been promised (Deut. vi. 10 ff.)

An ambush. Concerning the question so extensively discussed by the old interpreters, Whether the employment of stratagems (wiles in war) was consistent with the dignity of God, Calvin observes briefly and convincingly: "Quod hic querunt nonnulli, donec et per insidias liceat hostes opprimere, ex crassa imperitia nascitur. Certum est non feriendo solum geri bella, sed eos censeri optimos duces, qui arte et consilio pollent magis quam impetu. Ergo si legitimum sit bellum, extra controversiam est, consuetis vincendi artibus patefactam esse viam: modo ne vel pacis iniuriis, vel alio modo fidem datam fallamus."

Ver. 3 does not agree with vers. 13, 14. Here it is said that 30,000 men are placed in the ambush; according to ver. 12 they are only 5,000. Further, the 30,000 men were, according to this verse, sent out already on the evening before; in ver. 13, on the contrary, the 5,000 betake themselves to their safe concealment first on the morning of the battle. These contradictory statements taken from different sources cannot be reconciled, as Keil indeed perceives, while yet he strangely attempts to harmonize them. He takes vers. 12 and 13 to be a "supplementary remark" to vers. 3, and says:

Before the לִלְחָם לַיְלָה, ver. 3, we must supply from the supplementary remark, that Joshua out of the 30,000 men separated again about 5,000 and sent them out by night into the ambush."<sup>1</sup> Against this Maurer correctly says, on vers. 12, 13: "Hæc repugnant iis quæ vers. 3-8 et 9-11 expostulo leguntur. Quam repugnantiam recte plerique repetunt ex annalibus diversis alio et alio ordine diversisque verbis scriptis, in quibus contrahendis is, qui hunc librum composuerit, non satis ad diversitatem attenderit. Confer similem locum, iv. 9. Alex. ver. 12 prorsus non exhibet, tertii decimi, maximam partem omittit; habet enim hæc tantum: καὶ τὰ ἐνδρα τῆς πόλεως ἔπο θάλασσης (Itala; et insidiae erant civitatis a mari), nihil amplius." Such is the judgment of Knobel also. The 30,000 might reach the neighborhood of Ai before daybreak, since the distance from Gilgal to Ai was not more than five to six hours. (Robinson, ii. 307-12.) Joshua still remained that night in Gilgal.

Vers. 4-8. Clear and exact instructions to the soldiers how they were to proceed. They must put themselves in ambush, not too far from the city, and be in readiness; he would make an attack in front and pretend to flee. Then they should break forth into the city abandoned by the enemy, and set it on fire. "See," he concludes his address, <sup>1</sup> [Keil supposes that Joshua also, and the main army had gone from Gilgal to the neighborhood of Ai (ver. 3), that from there he sent out the ambush (vers. 3-9), and there (near Ai) he spent that night in the midst of the people (ver. 9). In ver. 12, 13, then he finds only a repetition with some more particularity of the statement concerning the ambush previously mentioned. The only difficulty in the way of regarding both accounts as relating to the same movement is the great difference of the numbers of the men. Here he thinks there has been simply an error of transcription, the letters representing the 5,000 having been by mistake replaced in ver. 3 by those denoting 30,000. — Tr.]

"I have commanded it to you," that is, "Take heed that you do well your part."

Ver. 9. Between Beth-el and Ai. "Ai lay forty-five minutes southeast of Beth-el (ch. xii. 9; Gen. xii. 8); between the two places rise two rocky heights, behind which the liars in wait appear to have taken their position (Van de Velde: Narrative, ii. p. 280)." (Knobel.)

Ver. 10. In the morning Joshua leads up the rest of the army, comes before the city and encamps to the north of it, so that a valley, probably "the present Wady Mutyah," lay between him and Ai.

Vers. 12, 13. See above on ver. 3. According to Keil, לַיְלָה הַהוּא means the same night as ver. 9. But on that night (ver. 9) Joshua was not yet certainly before Ai, for which he started only in the morning (ver. 10). The reading בַּבֹּקֶר instead of בַּבֹּקֶר, originated perhaps in the same effort to harmonize ver. 15 with ver. 9.

b. Sham-flight of the Israelites. Their Victory, Capture and Destruction of the City (vers. 14-29). The plan succeeds admirably. The king of Ai, seeing Joshua's army in front, leads out against him. The latter pretends to run away. The inhabitants of Ai now pursue the Israelites and leave the city standing open. Then Joshua gives the ambush a signal with his spear. They rush forth, seize the city, and set it on fire. Joshua himself with his army turns about at the same moment. The men of Ai find themselves suddenly attacked in front and rear at once, and are annihilated. The other inhabitants of Ai also, about 12,000<sup>1</sup> in men and women, are slain. The city is razed to the ground, its king hanged on a tree.

Ver. 14. When the king of Ai saw it, namely, Joshua and his army, — pointing back, therefore, to ver. 11, the continuation of which we have here. It cannot refer to ver. 13 because he could not see the ambush nor have any knowledge of it, as is shown by the close of ver. 11.

Vers. 16, 17. The men of Ai in their excessive ardor recklessly leave the city, without care about covering their line of return to Ai, and without protection to the city itself which they leave open. The expression יִקְרְאוּ is striking: "they were torn away," Van Ess; "they were cut off."<sup>2</sup>

Ver. 18. A direct command of God renewed, under whose special order the whole affair proceeds.

Spear. Heb. צִיּוֹן, dart, javelin, a small spear which is hurled (Job xli. 20. Eng. 28), distinct from the צִיּוֹן there mentioned in connection with it. From our passage compared with ver. 26, some would conclude that the צ must have been furnished with a flag or standard. Possibly, though not necessarily, since the waving motion which Joshua made with his spear might be seen a long distance, especially if we suppose that there was a bright sunshine. As a weapon of the Babylonians and Persians, it is spoken of Jer. vi. 23; 1. 42. The rendering of the Vulg. by "clypeus" is erroneous.

Ver. 20. יָדָם had no power, Vulg. non potuerunt. Others, e. g. Gesenius, explain יָדָם with reference to Deut. xxiii. 13; Num. ii. 17; Is. xvii.

<sup>1</sup> [But it was "all that fell that day" (ver. 26), not "the other inhabitants" that made up the 12,000. — Ta.]

<sup>2</sup> [It is the same word which, iv. 18, denotes the with-

8, as meaning place, room; but whether the dual can mean this appears to us doubtful. We should rather approve the rendering "sides" (Keil). The first signification, however, is to be preferred, because then the thought is this, that being held fast by terror, they had no power to flee this way or that. The whole situation of the men of Ai, who saw before them the enemy, behind them the burning town, is admirably pictured in a few strokes.

Ver. 26. "Joshua drew not back the hand which he had stretched out with the spear, until all the inhabitants of Ai had been destroyed. The signal for attack on Ai was also a signal for the destruction of the inhabitants, and remained until its design was fulfilled" (Knobel).

Ver. 28. The city is made even with the ground — κατ' ἕδαφος.

Ver. 29. Heap of stones, as in ch. vii. 26.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. It should not be overlooked that the spoil to be taken in Ai is given over to the Israelites, which was not the case at Jericho. Jericho was the first of the cities of Canaan captured, and belonged on this account wholly to the Lord, as the first-born of man and beast (Ex. xiii. 2, 12, 15), and as the firstlings of the fruits of the field (Ex. xxiii. 19; xxxiv. 26; Lev. ii. 12; xxiii. 10, 17, 20; Num. xv. 20, 21). This was no longer so at Ai.

2. If the justice of the war is conceded, it follows that a stratagem such as was here adopted by Joshua against Ai, is likewise morally allowable, since notoriously wars are not carried on exclusively through "hard blows" (feriendo), as Calvin has well remarked. Yet stratagem, as Calvin also calls us to notice, has its limits. A treacherous termination of a truce, and the like, is morally reprehensible. Of such things there is no mention here, but simply an instance of strategy like what is witnessed in almost every great battle.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

God's renewed call to Joshua — the same word indeed as before, but now of quite a different import, since God by it not only assures him of his support, but also gives him to understand that He is again gracious to him. — The capture and destruction of the city of Ai. (1.) Preparation. (2.) Execution. — See, I have commanded it to you — a strict military admonition, which may apply also to the spiritual conflict. — How God gives his enemies into the hands of his servants, while he (1.) blinds and disheartens the former; (2.) enlightens and strengthens the latter.

STARKE: Although every victory comes from God, it is still in the order of our own fidelity and bravery. — From God alone comes the victory and He it is who can subdue and root out the peoples.

LANG: In so far as a war is justifiable, so far is stratagem therein justifiable also, provided only that it conflict not with the special agreements existing, and lead not to inhuman measures; for as much as possible, the people must be spared.

BIB. TUB.: The fortune of war is changeable, but it turns as the Lord will have.

CRANMER: Just wars are not in themselves against God. But without necessity, recklessly, and from trifling causes to begin war, is iniquitous, 2 Chr. xxxv. 20; 1 K. xx. 3.

drawment of the priests feet from the mud of the river-bed to the dry land; "were lifted," more exactly "plucked, up." — Ta.]

4. The Altar of Blessing and of Cursing on Ebal.

CHAPTER VIII. 30-35.

- 30 Then Joshua built an altar unto the Lord [Jehovah] God of Israel in Mount Ebal, 31 as Moses the servant of the Lord [Jehovah had] commanded the children of Israel, as it is written in the book of the law of Moses, An altar of whole stones, over which no man hath lifted up any iron : and they offered thereon burnt-offerings unto the 32 Lord [Jehovah], and sacrificed peace-offerings. And he wrote there upon the stones a copy of the law of Moses, which he wrote [had written] in the presence of 33 the children [sons] of Israel. And all Israel, and their elders, and officers [overseers], and their judges, stood on this side the ark, and on that side, before the priests the Levites, which [who] bare the ark of the covenant of the Lord [Jehovah], as well the stranger, as he that was born among them ; half of them over against mount Gerizim, and half of them over against mount Ebal ; as Moses the servant of the Lord [Jehovah] had commanded before,<sup>1</sup> that they should bless the people of 34 Israel. And afterward he read all the words of the law, the blessings and cursings, 35 according to all that is written in the book of the law. There was not a word of all that Moses commanded, which Joshua read not before all the congregation of Israel, with the women and the little ones, and the strangers that were conversant [the stranger that walked] among them.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[<sup>1</sup> Ver. 33. — בְּרִיחַ qualifies rather the following clause, "to bless the people of Israel in the beginning," or, "at first:" probably with reference to the injunction in Deut. xxvii. 2, taken literally, and so far removing the improbability that what is recorded in this paragraph should have occurred before the completion of the conquest. — Tr.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

This paragraph, which contains the fulfillment of the command given by Moses, Deut. xxvii. 1 ff., breaks the connection between chaps. viii. 29 and ix. 1, and would appear to be in place later, perhaps after ch. xi. 23, since it is not likely that before the complete conquest of the land, Joshua could have undertaken such a celebration : and besides, we find him still, chaps. ix. and x., in the south of Palestine. Keil, in his prejudiced opposition to all which is called criticism, naturally allows no weight to this, and hence seeks, among other things, to show that when (ch. ix. 6) the camp at Gilgal is spoken of, this is not Gilgal near Jericho but another place of that name in the region of Shechem. If this were correct the author would certainly in some way have given an intimation of the fact that in ch. ix. 6 we no longer are to understand the Gilgal near Jericho but a Gilgal near Shechem. As he omits this, the whole connection points to the former, and Joshua is in the southern part, not in central Palestine.

Ver. 30. Ebal. On the alleged fertility of Gerizim, and barrenness of Ebal, many fables have been told by travellers and interpreters. According to Robinson (Bib. Res. iii. 96-103, and Later Bib. Res. 131, 132 [Phys. Geog. of H. L. p. 36 f.]), both mountains are alike desolate, while the vale of Shechem lying between them is extremely pleasant and fertile. [Comp. Dict. of the Bible, articles, Ebal, Gerizim, Shechem.] According to Deut. xxvii. 6, the altar was to be erected on Ebal, which would thus have the advantage over Gerizim, which, however, is distinguished in its turn by the fact that from it the blessing was to be pronounced. Probably Ebal had been like Sinai, like Moriah (Gen. xxii.), an old place of sacrifice, and so rendered sacred. The name עֵיבָל, from עָבַל, to strip off (leaves), signifies the naked (mountain) : compare also עֵיבָל (Gen. x. 28), a region of Joktanite Arabia. Gerizim (גֵּרִיזִים) ver. 33 is = mount of the Gerizites. The גֵּרִיזִים (from גָּרַז in Arab. to hew, to exterminate, in Heb. only in Niphal, Ps. xxxi. 23 ; lxxxvi. 6) are the dwellers in a barren land. Assuming this, then the desolation perceived by travellers on the mountain would be as truly countenanced by the name in the case of mount Gerizim, as in that of Ebal.

Ver. 31. Altar of unhewn stones over which no man had lifted up any iron. So the law required in general (Ex. xx. 25) ; so it had been specially ordained for this case (Deut. xxvii. 5, 6).

Ver. 32. Stones. Not the stones of the altar (Jos. Syr.) but the great stones whitewashed with lime, spoken of in Deut. xxvii. 2-4, 8. For this reason the article also stands here, הָאֵבֶן. The unhewn, rough stones of the altar moreover would have been poorly adapted to this use.

A copy of the Law of Moses (מִשְׁנַחֲתוֹ) properly, doubling of the law of Moses. So Gen. xliii. 15 they say מִ' הַדִּבְרֹת = doubling of the money. By this doubling of the law is naturally to be understood a copy of the law, in the same sense here as in Deut. xvii. 18, as we also speak of the duplicate of a document. What now was written on the stones ? Different answers are given to this, ranged according to the interpretations of Deut. xxvii. 3. (a.) The whole law (several Rabbins, Mich., Baumg.) and, according to the Talmudists in Tract. Sota, ch. vii., in seventy languages, that all the peoples of the earth might read it ; therefore the whole Thorah with all its narratives, genealogies, legal prescriptions, etc. Improbable.

(b.) Particular parts of the law; (a.) the Decalogue (Grotius, Kennicott, Hasse). (β.) Deuteronomy (Gerhardt, Osiander, Geddes, Vater, Hengstenberg). (γ.) The blessings and cursings (Masius, Maurer, Rosenmüller) — against the words of Deut. xxvii. 3. (c.) Everything in the books of Moses which is law, every לְכָל דְּבַר (Deut. xxvii. 1), which is given in them, all the words of the law (Deut. xxvii. 3). So formerly Michaelis (Laws of Moses ii. § 60), rightly, and now Knobel on Deut. xxvii. 1: "The language reaches to the law in general (Mischna Sota 7, 5), to the Mosaic law (Josh. viii. 32). The author thinks, however, only of the commandments proper, six hundred and thirteen in number, according to the Jewish reckoning, not of all the narratives also and warnings, admonitions, discourses, reasons, and the like. So also ch. vi. 9." The inscription itself may probably have been effected not till after the ceremony was completed, being reported here by anticipation.

Vers. 33-35. Proclamation of the Blessing and Curse. We must imagine the position of the people to have been such that the priests with the ark of the covenant stood in the midst of the valley, between Ebal lying on the north and Gerizim lying on the south, but the people, one half over against Gerizim (therefore on Ebal), and the other half over against Ebal (therefore on Gerizim). After this had been arranged Joshua himself read (Luther; incorrectly: "caused to be read") all the words of the law, the blessing, and the cursing. A discrepancy which Knobel thinks he finds between this report and the directions Deut. xxvii. 9 ff. we cannot admit, because by the expression "all the words of the law" which is afterwards defined by the addition, "the blessing and the curse," nothing more is probably to be understood than in the formulas given Deut. xxvii. 14 ff. The curses are exactly twelve, according to the number of the tribes; the blessings, see Deut. xxviii. 1-14.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. It is consistent with the divine economy of salvation in the time of the old covenant, that on the entrance of the chosen people into the promised land, not merely blessing but also curse was held up before them. A people standing so low in morality as the Israelites then did needed stern discipline, and not only might be allured by promises but must be alarmed by threats. This was a very wholesome pedagogy, which is even yet quite in place in the education of particular individuals as well as of whole nationalities, under certain circumstances. Think, for instance, of the neglected children as they are delivered to our reformatory institutions, or of rough heathen nations among whom the Christian missionaries labor. Only we must consider one thing, namely this, that the day of salvation, in which we live, must never be lost sight of, that Moses may not be again put in the place of Christ by whom grace and truth have been brought to us (John i. 17), nor the servile spirit in place of the filial (Rom. viii. 15). Unfortunately, a certain legal tendency has shown a great inclination that way, even in the evangelical church, to say nothing of Rome, whose curses, far removed from the royal power of those imprecations of the O. T. are a kind of invectives about which no one cares. The curse, to have any power, must be uttered in the name of God against unquestionable transgressions of the divine command, as conversely, the blessing only takes effect when it is bestowed upon acts well pleasing to God. According to this canonical law the curia has seldom proceeded, but often exactly in the opposite way.

2. More closely considered, the twelve curses are directed against idolatry (Deut. xxvii. 15), contempt of parents (ver. 16), removing a neighbor's land-mark (ver. 17), inhumanity toward the blind, strangers, orphans, widows (vers. 18, 19), incest and sodomy (vers. 20-23), murder (vers. 24, 25), and finally in general against the transgression of the law in any manner (ver. 26). Blessings are promised in the city and on the field (ch. xxviii. 3), on all births (xxviii. 4), on the basket and the kneading-trough (xxviii. 5; Ex. vii. 28, xi. 36), on going out and coming in (Deut. xxviii. 6); a blessing in particular on their arms in contest with their enemies (xxviii. 7), a blessing on the position of Israel among the nations (xxviii. 9-14). The N. T. recognizes still an entirely different blessing, the εὐλογία πνευματικὴ in heavenly goods (ἐν τοῖς ἐπουρανίοις) in Christ (Eph. i. 3), the imperishable, and undefiled, and unfading inheritance which is reserved in heaven (1 Pet. i. 3). This blessing makes rich, in the highest sense, without trouble added (Prov. x. 22).

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

The solemn gathering of the people on Ebal, (1) Sacrifice, (2) inscription of the law, (3) blessing and curse. — The consecrated altar. — Not only on the stones but rather on the heart should the law of God be written, Jer. xxxi. 31-34. — On the import of blessing and cursing. — Rather bless than curse, yet bless not under all circumstances. — Curse may become blessing, blessing curse. — How is it with thee, Christian congregation! Standest thou under the blessing or deservest thou the curse of thy God? — Questions to be asked, perhaps, on days of penitence and prayer. — The whole congregation should hear the word.

STARKE: A Christian should not, after being delivered from need, forget gratitude also. — Not human nonsense but the holy word of God alone must be taught and preached. — My God, give us also readiness and desire to make known thy commandments, to all, friends and foes, old and young.

B. CONTESTS AGAINST THE ALLIED KINGS OF THE CANAANITES.

CHAPTERS IX.-XI.

1. The first League of Canaanite Kings against Israel.

CHAPTER IX. 1-2.

- 1 And it came to pass, when all the kings which were on this side [on the other side of the] Jordan, in the hills [on the mountain], and in the valleys [the low land], and in all the coasts [on all the coast] of the great sea over against Lebanon, the Hittite, and the Amorite, the Canaanite, the Perizzite, the Hivite, and the Jebusite, 2 heard thereof; That they gathered themselves together to fight with Joshua and with Israel, with one accord.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

While Joshua had hitherto contended against separate cities, namely, Jericho and Ai, there now follows an account of the struggles with the allied kings of the Canaanites, of whose first league we are informed in ch. ix. 1-2, of their second in ch. xi. 1-3. They are defeated in two great battles, at Gibeon (ch. x. 1 ff.), and at the sea of Merom (ch. xi. 4-9). Following upon that first triumph, southern Palestine west of the Jordan is subjugated (ch. x. 28-43), and upon the second, the northern part (ch. xi. 10-23). Only the Gibeonites were shrewd enough, as is related in ix. 3-27, to save themselves by a stratagem from the edge of the sword.

Ver. 1. On the other side (Eng. vers. on this side), as in ch. v. 1, where the country west of the Jordan is intended. "This land, Canaan proper, is, from its conspicuously diverse features, divided into the mountain, הַר, the plain or lowland, הַשְׁפֵּל, and the sea coast, חֹמֶת הַיָּם, toward Lebanon" (Keil). The mountain, הַר, is the Mount Ephraim and mount (or mountain of) Judah; the lowland is the region from Akko to Gaza lying west of the mountain; the sea coast is the coast of north Galilee and Phœnicia. — חֹמֶת elsewhere in poetical passages as Gen. xlix. 18; Judg. v. 17; Jer. xlvii. 7; Ezek. xxv. 16. — יָמָּה prop. with one month, unanimously. Ex. xxiv. 3; 1 K. xxii. 13.

2. The Craft of the Gibeonites.

CHAPTER IX. 3-27.

a. Coming of the Gibeonites to Joshua and his League with them.

CHAPTER IX. 3-15.

- 3 And when the inhabitants of Gibeon heard what Joshua had done unto Jericho 4 and to Ai, they [also] did work wilily, and went and made as if they had been ambassadors [went, and set out, or, went and<sup>1</sup> provided themselves with victuals], and took old [prop. decayed] sacks upon their asses, and wine-bottles [wine-skins], 5 old [decayed], and rent, and bound up: And old [decayed] shoes and clouted [patched] upon their feet, and old [decayed] garments upon them; and all the 6 bread of their provision was dry and mouldy. And they went to Joshua unto the camp at Gilgal, and said unto him, and to the men of Israel, We be [are] come from 7 a far country: now therefore [and now] make ye a league [covenant] with us. And the men of Israel said unto the Hivites, Peradventure ye dwell among us;<sup>2</sup> 8 and how shall we make a league [covenant] with you? And they said unto 9 Joshua, We are thy servants. And Joshua said unto them, Who are ye? and from whence come ye? And they said unto him, From a very far country thy servants are come, because of the name of the Lord [Jehovah] thy God: for we have heard 10 the fame of him, and all that he did in Egypt, and all that he did to the two kings of the Amorites, that were beyond the Jordan, to Sihon king of 11 Heshbon, and to Og king of Bashan, which [who] was at Ashtaroth. Wherefore [And] our elders, and all the inhabitants of our country spake to us, saying, Take victuals with you for the journey, and go to meet them, and say unto them, We are your servants: therefore [and] now make ye a league [covenant] with us. 12 This our bread we took hot for our provision out of our houses on the day we came

- 13 forth to go unto you; but now, behold, it is dry, and it is [has become] mouldy: And these bottles of wine [wine-skins] which we filled were new, and behold they be [are] rent: and these our garments and our shoes are become old [are decayed] by reason of the very long journey. And the men took of their victuals, and asked not counsel at [omit: counsel at] the mouth of the Lord [Jehovah]. And Joshua made peace with them, and made a league [covenant] with them, to let them live: and the princes of the congregation sware unto them.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 4. — The verb יָצְאוּ from יָצָא, not elsewhere found in Hebrew, should from the signification of its derivatives, and from the analogy of the Arab., mean to go, to set out on a journey. "But since no other trace of this form or signification exists in Heb. or in Aramaean, it is better to read with six MSS. יָצְאוּ, they provided themselves with food for the journey, as in ver. 12; which is also expressed by the ancient versions," Gesen. With this agree Knobel and Fay. But De Wette, and Kell adhere to the root-meaning "set out on a journey," and there is a reasonable probability that the change suggested by a few MSS., and the anc. vers. was owing simply to the strangeness of the word which originally stood here. The meaning "to act as ambassadors" appears to have been derived from the analogy of יָצָא "a messenger," and is retained by Zuns: Stellten sich als Boten. — Tr.]

[2 Ver. 7. — The Hebrew uses the sing. "in the midst of me, and how shall I." — Tr.]

b. Discovery and Punishment of the Fraud.

CHAPTER IX. 16-27.

- 16 And it came to pass at the end of three days after they had made a league with them, that they heard that they were their neighbors, and that they dwelt among them. And the children of Israel journeyed [broke up], and came unto their cities on the third day. Now [And] their cities were Gibeon, and Chephirah, and Beeroth, and Kirjathjearim. And the children of Israel smote them not, because the princes of the congregation had sworn unto them by the Lord [Jehovah] God of Israel. And all the congregation murmured against the princes. But all the princes said unto all the congregation, We have sworn unto them by the Lord [Jehovah] God of Israel: now therefore we may not touch them. This we will do to them; we will even let them live,<sup>1</sup> lest wrath be upon us, because of the oath which we sware unto them. And the princes said unto them, Let them live; but let them be [and they became] hewers of wood [wood-choppers], and drawers of water unto all the congregation; as the princes had promised [spoken to] them.
- 22 And Joshua called for them, and he spake unto them, saying, Wherefore have ye beguiled us, saying, We are very far from you, when ye dwell among us? Now therefore ye are cursed, and there shall none of you be freed from being [there shall not fail to be from among you] bond-men, and hewers of wood and drawers of water for the house of my God. And they answered Joshua, and said, Because<sup>2</sup> it was certainly told thy servants how that the Lord [Jehovah] thy God commanded his servant Moses to give you all the land, and to destroy all the inhabitants of the land from before you, therefore we were sore afraid of our lives because of you, and have done this thing.
- 25 And now, behold, we are in thy hand: as it seemeth good and right unto thee to do unto us, do. And so did he unto them, and delivered them out of the hand of the children of Israel, that they slew them not. And Joshua made them that day hewers of wood and drawers of water for the congregation, and for the altar of the Lord [Jehovah], even unto this day, in the place which he should choose.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 20. — De Wette, Fay, and others translate this and the following verse accurately: This [sc. what we have sworn] will we do to them, and let them live, lest wrath be upon us, because of the oath which we have sworn to them. And the princes said to them, Let them live. And they became wood-choppers and water-carriers (or drawers of water) etc. — Tr.]

[2 Ver. 24. — וְעַתָּה is better regarded as merely introducing the words quoted: It was told . . . and we were afraid, etc. — Tr.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Gibeon would appear to have been a sort of independent republic, since we hear of elders there

(ix. 11), but not of a king; and of their city it is said (x. 2) that it was a great city like a royal city. The inhabitants, having heard of the deeds of Joshua, hit upon a different plan of resistance from that adopted by the kings before named, — the plan of negotiation, but with wiles. They pretend to have come from a very far country (ix. 9) to form an alliance with Joshua; and to confirm their declaration they point to their mouldy bread, their torn wine-skins, and their worn-out clothing (ix. 12, 13). Joshua suffers himself to be deceived, and makes a treaty with them which is ratified with an oath (ix. 15).

The deception, however, is discovered. After not more than three days the Israelites hear that the Gibeonites dwell in their very neighborhood (ix. 16). They break up, go thither themselves, and spare them because of the oath which the chiefs had sworn to them (ix. 18). When discontent arises in the camp on this account, Joshua consults with the chiefs, but they appeal to their oath, and decide in favor of letting them live. To this resolution they adhere, but the Gibeonites, as a penalty for their falsehood, are made wood-choppers and water-carriers for the congregation and the altar of Jehovah (ix. 21-27).

a. Arrival of the Gibeonites and Joshua's league with them, vers. 3-15. Gibeon, ch. xviii. 25. They also did work wilyly. They had heard what Joshua had done in the case of Jericho and Ai, and they also (בָּנִי) did something, and that with craft. וְשָׁרְפוּ, ver. 3, and וְשָׁרְפוּ, ver. 4, are relative to each other, so that the בָּנִי refers not to what the Canaanite kings had done, but to Joshua's deeds. These would they emulate, only not by warlike exploits, but by a finely contrived trick. So also the LXX.: καὶ ἐβόησαν καὶ ἔαυτον ἀπαρῶσαντο. Joshua's stratagem against Ai (ch. 8) is to be remembered. Maurer thinks also of Jericho; but that is less apposite.

Provided themselves with victuals. The Hebrew וְשָׁרְפוּ, "is nowhere else met with, and instead of it we should read with all the ancient translations and many MSS., וְשָׁרְפוּ, which also occurs in ver. 12" (Knobel). Keil adheres unqualifiedly to the textus receptus, and, connecting וְשָׁרְפוּ with נָדָו, nuncius, translates: "they went and journeyed as ambassadors," or "set out as ambassadors" [thus bringing out the sense of the English version]. But was it necessary to state this particularly? Is not that evident of itself, that if the Gibeonites went they went as ambassadors, since ver. 3 leaves us to suppose a previous consultation?

Ver. 6. Gilgal. In the Jordan Valley, as Ewald also assumes, and not, as Keil supposes, the Gilgal on the mountain near Bethel, "often mentioned in the Book of Judges and in First Samuel." But something would surely have been said of it if Joshua had moved the camp from Gilgal in the Jordan Valley to Gilgal near Bethel; and as this is not the case, we have no ground for thinking here of another Gilgal. Joshua had rather returned from his successful expedition against Ai to his well situated headquarters in the Jordan Valley, in order to undertake from thence fresh enterprises. Comp. the preliminary remarks to ch. viii. 30-35.

Ver. 7. וְיָתִיב. This Kethib is to be retained after the analogy of Judg. viii. 22, xx. 36; 1 Sam. xiv. 22. The Israelites are not clear in this matter. The thing looks suspicious to them, hence the question: "Perhaps thou dwellest in the midst of us (me), how then can I make a covenant with thee?"

Ver. 8. To this entangling question the Gibeonites return no answer at all, but say, with true oriental adroitness, apparently submissive and humble: "We are thy servants." This was no sincere declaration of submission (Serar., C. A. Lap., Rosenm., Knobel), but simply a form of courtesy, as Gen. i. 18, xxxii. 4, which was, however, very well designed and cunningly addressed. Nevertheless, Joshua shows himself not satisfied with it, and asks again, more definitely than others had done before: Who are ye and whence come ye? The imperfect וְיָתִיב, is worthy of notice as indicating the still incomplete action, comp. Judg. xvii. 9, xix. 17; 2 Sam. i. 3; Jonah i. 8; Ewald, Lehrgeb. § 136, 1, a.

Ver. 9. So pressed, the Gibeonites are compelled to answer Joshua, and first repeat what they have said before (ver. 6), but add that they have come on account of the name of Jehovah, whose fame (שְׁמֵהּ) they have heard. In the more detailed specification which follows of what they had heard they say nothing of Jericho and Ai (to have heard of which might indicate that they lived not very far off), but cunningly confine themselves to what God has done to the Amorite kings beyond the Jordan, therefore at a distance, nay even in Egypt (ver. 10).

They then recall the commission given them by their elders (ver. 11), and refer in conclusion to their mouldy bread, etc., as a proof of the truth of their story. The Gibeonites must have played their part admirably; for all the scruples which had been expressed are now silent.

Ver. 14. And the men took of their victuals. "The men," as we learn from vers. 18, 21, are the princes, i. e., heads of the tribes. The taking of their food is a sign of friendship, of inclination to make a league with the Gibeonites, Gen. xxxi. 46; Lev. ii. 13; 2 Chron. xiii. 5. Keil will not allow this, but adopts the explanation of Masius, approved also by J. H. Michaelis and Rosenmüller. He says: "Est enim veluti oppositio quedam inter illa; sumere panem Gibeonitarum in manus, suisque oculis satis fidere et os oraculum Domini interrogare." This opposition is not to be denied, but would it not be much stronger, if it related not merely to a testing of the bread whether it was so old, but to an eating of it with a symbolical import, which implied readiness to make a league with the Gibeonites?

And the mouth of the Lord they asked not. That was a transgression of the explicit command, Num. xxvii. 21, that the priest Eleazar should seek counsel for Joshua, and that וְיִשְׁאָל בְּיְהוָה, i. e., through the judgment or right of Urim (and Thummim).<sup>1</sup> The priest by that becomes the mouth of Jehovah, since he announces God's answer in His name, just the same as the prophet who (Is. xxx. 2; Jer. xv. 19; Ex. iv. 16) is so called.

Ver. 15. And Joshua made peace with them. He assured them of peace and so of preservation from the edge of the sword.

b. Discovery and Punishment of the Deceit. Vers. 16-27. Ver. 16. At the end of three days, as in ch. iii. 2.

Ver. 17. And came to their cities on the third day. It took them so long, namely, to come from Gilgal lying in the Jordan valley to Gibeon. They might have accomplished the journey in much less time, as appears from ch. x. 9, but here there was no forced march commanded as in that passage. They could therefore take their time. But it would have been an unreasonably slow march, if, as Keil supposes, Joshua's headquarters had now been at Gilgal near Bethel, and he had taken more than two days for a distance of seven or eight hours. Chephirah, ch. xviii. 26. Beeroth, xviii. 25. Kirjath-jearim, xv. 60.

<sup>1</sup> See the Art. "Urim and Thummim" in the Dict. of the Bible. — Tr.]

Vers. 18, 19. The question whether the princes were really bound to keep the oath which they had sworn to the Gibeonites, after it appeared that the condition on which it had been given did not hold good, has been much discussed by the interpreters, and decided rightly by most of them in the negative. The contrary is maintained by Osiander, Ising (p. 208), Corn. a Lapide, and Clericus. The last named expresses that opinion the most decidedly: "Non videntur Hebraeorum proceres in tabulis fœderis hoc adscripsisse, se ea lege fœdus cum iis facere, si modo remotam oram habuerant, quod nisi esset, fœdus hoc foret irritum. Simplices iuraverunt, se Galahonitis vitam non erepturos idque invocato nomine Dei Israelis. Quam ob rem suum hoc iusjurandum revocare amplius non potuerunt."

Upon this Keil, from whom we borrow this extract, justly remarks: "Although the Israelite princes did not verbally make the truth of the declaration of the Gibeonites a condition of the validity of their oath, and add it to the league, expressis verbis, still it lay at the bottom of their oath, as the Gibeonites very well knew; and hence they so carefully represented themselves as having come from a very far country. The Israelites had not, therefore, so wholly simpliciter, as Clericus assumes, sworn to preserve their lives, and were not bound to spare them after the discovery of their trick." That the princes nevertheless felt themselves bound in conscience is sufficiently explained, psychologically, by their reverence for the oath in itself, Lev. xix. 12. Although the congregation murmur, the princes abide by their conviction that the Gibeonites must be spared on account of the oath. This murmuring was directed once against Moses also, Ex. xv. 24; xvi. 2; xviii. 3; Num. xiv. 2; xxvii. 36. Murmuring against God is mentioned, Judg. viii. 21. Lam. iii. 39, is a classic passage. In the N. T., μαρτυροῦντες, μαρτυρούμενοι, Mark xiv. 5; Luke v. 30; John vi. 41, 51.

Ver. 20. They would therefore let the Gibeonites live. On וַיַּחְיֶינָם, comp. Ewald, Lehrg. § 280, a. [Ges. § 131, 2.]. By the inf. abs., much the same as by the Lat. gerund in -ndo, or by our part. pres. act., is more definitely expressed what they would do; Lev. iii. 5; 1 Sam. iii. 12.

Ver. 21. "The princes repeat with emphasis that they shall live. Hence the Gibeonites then became wood-choppers and drawers of water for the congregation, as the princes had spoken to them. That is, the princes had made this proposition together, with their וְיָחִי [ver. 20]. The author had omitted it there because it is manifest from the historical statement in the second member of this verse. So ch. iii. 8" (Knobel).

Vers. 22, 23. Joshua communicates to the Gibeonites what has been decided upon. There shall not fall from among you servants and wood-choppers and water-carriers, i. e., such slaves [explicative] as are wood-choppers and water-carriers, and are, therefore, reckoned among the lowest class of the people (Deut. xxix. 10, 11). Together with captives taken in war and devoted for like purposes to the sanctuary, they bore, at a later period, the name נֶתִינִים [Dict. of Bible, art. Nethinim], Deo dati, donati, 1 Chron. ix. 2; Ez. ii. 43, 70; viii. 20; Neh. vii. 43, 46. Saul was disposed to exterminate them, as is implied in 2 Sam. xxi. 1, 2, and David sought to propitiate them again by granting their blood-thirsty request (2 Sam. xxi. 6).

Vers. 24, 25. The Gibeonites plead as an apology the fear which they felt towards the Israelites, and leave their fate entirely in the hand of Joshua.

Vers. 26, 27. Joshua does as he had informed them, according to verse 23. And delivered them out of the hand of the sons of Israel. These would certainly, in their warlike zeal, as we may infer from their murmuring, have been glad to destroy the Gibeonites. Superior to the people stands the leader here, who proceeds in the spirit of humanity, and, in full harmony with the princes, gives no heed to the murmuring of the people.

Ver. 27. For the congregation and for the altar. The worshipping congregation is meant, the קָהָל, as appears plain, partly from the word

עֲדָה (עֲדָה, Num. xxvii. 17), partly from the additional qualification, "and for the altar." For profane service the Gibeonites could not be employed. They were temple slaves.

In the place which He (Jehovah) should choose, Keil infers from these words that the author of our book wrote before the building of Solomon's temple, because in his time God could not yet have chosen a fixed and permanent place for his sanctuary. Knobel regards them as "an addition by the careless Deuteronomist," who alone in all the Pentateuch had used this expression (Deut. xii. 5). But in Ex. xx. 24, which passage, even according to Knobel, certainly does not belong to the Deuteronomist, we meet with a related expression so that we are not compelled to think of "an addition by the careless Deuteronomist." Just as little necessary is it to suppose that the whole arrangement by which the Gibeonites were obliged to serve as wood-choppers and drawers of water for the congregation was first made in later times by Solomon. Reasons: (1) The Gibeonites are not expressly mentioned, 1 K. ix. 20; (2) 1 K. ix.

21, has reference to tributary work (פֶּסֶל לְבָד), and that, as the context shows, for architectural purposes, but not to servants for the purposes of worship. To such tributary services did Solomon appoint (עָלָם) the rest of the population (עַם)

(וְיִזְרְיֵל) of the Amorites, Hittites, Perizzites, Hivites, and Jebusites; but the Israelites he made soldiers (ver. 22). Our view is, accordingly, that Joshua did certainly appoint the Gibeonites at once to the lowest service at the sanctuary, "for congregation and altar," as the text says, especially as this service might already be performed about the tabernacle, as soon as this had an assigned place.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The question how far a promissory oath is binding on him who has given it, depends very much on our determination of the conditions under which one is at liberty to swear at all. On this Jer. iv. 2 is rightly regarded as a locus classicus. According to this passage an oath may be given:

(1) בְּאֵמֶת, (2) בְּמִשְׁפָּט, (3) בְּצֶדֶק. These three conditions, truth, right, and justice, are that which being presupposed an oath may be taken.

They are, as Jerome long ago called them, and as the canonical law recognizes them, the comites juramenti, namely, veritas in mente, judicium in jurante, justitia in objecto. If then, as in the case with the Gibeonites, the justitia in objecto is absent, the oath need not be observed; and so in all cases, when "the thorough knowledge of the subject" is wanting to the swearer without his fault. Completely so when this subject matter of the promissory oath is something directly unallowable, in clear opposition to the law of God, which, nevertheless, one has hastily, without rightly understanding it, sworn to do, as was true of Jephtha (Judg. x. 30, 31) and Herod (Matt. xiv. 9). Only, in that case, some expiation must be made, according to the principle laid down, Lev. v. 4-6, which, if a man, e. g. has taken an oath of office, and this office he cannot discharge, might consist in his resignation of the office, and in the case of a king, in his abdication. Christian ethics, especially that of the evangelical church, cannot be too earnest on this doctrine of the obligation of an oath, since mental reservations are so easily allowed which threaten truth, right, and justice. Very beautifully, on this point, Nitzsch says (System of Christian Doctrine, § 207): "Better, indeed, if the Christian state had done away with the word oath, ὅρκος, and the like, together with the whole train of heathen-religious presuppositions which are connected with them. We might and should speak of God's witness, appeal to God, worship in court, duty to God, etc. The form of the oath of this kind would have far less difficulty. Much more would depend on performing the whole service in a truly religious way, according to place and time, and on limiting, in conformity with this, the requisition and permission, and on giving due heed to what Christian morals and policy might have to advise further."

On the conditions of a right, that is, Christianly-pious offering and performance of an oath, Harless observes (Christian Ethics, § 39, b): "The first condition is, that the oath should be rendered only by virtue of a right demand for it. . . . The second condition is, that the swearer be in truth a confessor, i. e. that his oath be the expression of a believing hope truly dwelling in him. The third condition is, that the engagement into which he enters under his professing oath should be such that the God Himself whom the swearer acknowledges may acknowledge it. For the oath's sake to fulfill engagements displeasing to God is wickedly to carry to completion that which has been wickedly begun, to add a second sin to the first. Not to fulfill what has been sworn in in such cases, not the violation of an oath pleasing to God, but the penitent recall of a God-offending oath." Worthy of consideration further are the richly instructive articles in Herzog's Realencycl. (iii. 713 ff.) on "the Oath among the Hebrews" by Ruetschi, and on "the Oath" by C. F. Göschel.

2. The sanctity of the oath stood very high with the ancient Israelites, so that, as this narrative shows, they would rather, in dubio, hold fast to their oath even when they might justly have released themselves from it. As the name of God was to them thrice holy (Is. vi. 3; Ps. cxi. 9), so also was the solemn appeal to this name whether in a promise or an assertion. With this is connected the fact that the administration of oaths before the court was restricted to a few cases (Ex. xxii. 6 ff. 11; Lev. v. 23, 25; Num. v. 19 ff.) For that state of things ought modern legislation also to strive, and upon that ought Christian ethics to insist. Yet in North America, otherwise so puritanically disposed, what sport is made with the oath, while in the territory of the Zwinglian church in Switzerland, the oath scarcely occurs any more before the courts.

3. Priests and prophets are called the mouth of Jehovah, and rightly, because he speaks through them when they have been enlightened by Him. This illumination, however, ought not to be thought of as in any way a mechanical process, but is rather to be regarded always as in the closest connection with the entire personal life, and official position of the individual bearer of the divine revelation. Even in the handling of the Urim and Thummim, this also must be taken into account.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

As once the Canaanites against Israel, so still and ever the foes of God gather themselves together to fight against Him and his church. — The trick of the Gibeonites (1) shrewdly thought out, (2) cunningly carried out, but (3) detected and punished. — There is no thread so finely spun, but comes at last before the sun. — Lying and deceit bring no blessing. — Humble words alone do not accomplish it, they must also be true. — The glory of God among the heathen. — Do nothing without asking God. — If we ask the Lord, He gives us also an answer; if we neglect it we have to bear the hurt ourselves. — How necessary it is for us to ascertain accurately the state of the case before we bind ourselves by an oath, lest we afterwards be troubled in conscience — shown in the case of the princes of Israel. — The firmness of the princes against the murmuring of the congregation. — The judgment upon the Gibeonites: (1) the hearing; (2) the sentence. — Man fears for nothing more than his life, and yet this life is only a temporal good. — Joshua's beautiful humaneness. — Better to be wood-choppers and water-carriers for the altar of the Lord than to have no part therein, as the Gibeonites had well deserved by their treacherous scheme.

STARKE: It is no new thing for the mighty of the world to bid themselves together against God and his gospel, Ps. ii. 2. But rage ye peoples, and be confounded; and give ear all ye of far countries; arm yourselves and be confounded; take counsel together and it shall come to nought; speak a word and it shall not stand, for God is with us, Is. vii. 9, 10. — No man should lie; straightforward truth gives the best security, Eph. iv. 25. — God's wonders and works are not hidden even from the heathen; how then shall they excuse themselves in that day? Rom. i. 19, 20. — For the preservation of mortal life men may well give themselves a deal of trouble, but where lies the care for the soul's welfare? Matt. xvi. 25, 26. — He who always takes counsel of God in prayer will not easily be deceived. — It is a bad case when one, on account of lying and deceit, must blush and turn pale; let every man, therefore, strive after uprightness and honesty.

CRAMER: God must have wood-choppers also and water-carriers in his congregation, and He gives to every one gifts according to his portion, 1 Cor. xii. 27.

HEDINGER: It is thoughtless stupidity in a man, if he will not take warning but runs also into the judgment where he sees that others have gone to ruin. — Credulity brings us into trouble.

GERLACH: This history warns the congregation of God at all times of the craft and disguises of the world, which often, when it would be an advantage to it, seeks recognition and admission into the kingdom of God.

3. The great Victory at Gibeon over the five allied Canaanite Kings.

CHAPTER X. 1-27.

a. Investment of Gibeon by the five allied Kings.

CHAPTER X. 1-5.

- 1 Now [And] it came to pass, when Adoni-zedek king of Jerusalem had [omit: had] heard how Joshua had taken Ai, and had utterly destroyed [devoted] it; as he had done to Jericho and her king, so had he done to Ai and her king; and how the 2 inhabitants of Gibeon had made peace with Israel, and were among them; that they feared greatly, because Gibeon was a great city, as one of the royal cities [prop. one of the cities of the kingdom], and because it was greater than Ai, and all the
 3 men thereof were mighty. Wherefore [And] Adoni-zedek king of Jerusalem sent unto Hoham king of Hebron, and unto Piram king of Jarmuth, and unto Japhia
 4 king of Lachish, and unto Debir king of Eglon, saying, Come up unto me, and help me, that we may smite Gibeon: for it hath made peace with Joshua and with 5 the children of Israel. Therefore, [And] the [omit: the] five kings of the Amorites, the king of Jerusalem, the king of Hebron, the king of Jarmuth, the king of Lachish, the king of Eglon, gathered themselves together and went up, they and all their hosts [camps], and encamped before Gibeon, and made war against it.

b. Slaughter at Gibeon.

CHAPTER X. 6-15.

- 6 And the men of Gibeon sent unto Joshua to the camp to Gilgal, saying, Slack not thy hand [hands] from thy servants; come up to us quickly, and save us, and help us: for all the kings of the Amorites that dwell in the mountains are gathered together against us. So [And] Joshua ascended from Gilgal, he and all the people of 7 war with him, and all the mighty men of valour [strong heroes]. And the Lord [Jehovah] said unto Joshua, Fear them not: for I have delivered [given] them into thine
 8 hand; there shall not a man of them stand before thee. Joshua therefore [And]
 10 Joshua] came upon them suddenly, [:] and went [he went up] from Gilgal all night. And the Lord [Jehovah] discomfited [Bunsen: brought into confusion; Knobel: scattered; Fay, De Wette, Zunz: confused] them before Israel, and slew them with a great slaughter [De Wette: effected a great overthrow among them; Fay, literally: smote them with a great stroke] at Gibeon, and chased them along the way that goeth up to [the way of the ascent of] Beth-horon,<sup>1</sup> and smote them to Azekah, and 11 unto Makkedah. And it came to pass, as they fled from before Israel, and were in the going down to [on the descent from] Beth-horon, that the Lord [Jehovah] cast down great stones from heaven upon them unto Azekah, and they died: they were more which died with [the] hail-stones than they whom the children of Israel slew with the sword.
 12 Then spake Joshua to the Lord [Jehovah] in the day when the Lord [Jehovah] delivered up the Amorites before the children [sons] of Israel, and he said in the sight of Israel:

- Sun, stand thou [omit: thou] still on Gibeon,
 And thou [omit: thou], Moon, in the valley of Ajalon!
 13 And the sun stood still,
 And the moon stayed,
 Until the people [nation] had avenged themselves upon their enemies.

- Is* not this written in the book of Jasher [Fay: the upright (Rechtschaffenen); Luther: pious; De Wette: just (Redlichen)]? So [And] the sun stood still in the 14 midst of heaven, and hastened not to go down about a whole day. And there was no day like that before it or [and] after it, that the Lord [Jehovah] hearkened unto 15 the voice of a man; for the Lord [Jehovah] fought for Israel. And Joshua returned, and all Israel with him, unto the camp to Gilgal.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[ Ver. 11. — This sentence is properly parenthetical : As they fled before Israel (they were on the descent from Beth-horon) that Jehovah, etc. — Tr.]

c. Flight and Destruction of the five Kings.

CHAPTER X. 16-27.

16 But [And] these five kings fled and hid themselves in a [the] cave at Makke-17 dah. And it was told Joshua, saying: The five kings are found hid in a [the] cave 18 at Makkedah. And Joshua said, Roll great stones upon the mouth of the cave, 19 and set men by it for [omit: for] to keep them: And stay ye not, but [omit: but] pursue after your enemies, and smite the hindmost of them; suffer them not to enter into their cities; for the Lord [Jehovah] your God hath delivered [given] them into your hand.

20 And it came to pass, when Joshua and the children of Israel had made an end of slaying [smiting] them with a very great slaughter [stroke], till they were consumed, that the rest which remained of them entered [Fay: but those that re-21 mained of them escaped and came] into [the] fenced [fortified] cities. [,] And [that<sup>1</sup>] all the people returned to the camp to Joshua at Makkedah in peace: none moved 22 [Fay, properly: pointed] his tongue against any of the children of Israel. Then said Joshua, Open the mouth of the cave, and bring out those five kings unto me 23 out of the cave. And they did so, and brought forth those five kings unto him out of the cave, the king of Jerusalem, the king of Hebron, the king of Jarmuth, the 24 king of Lachish, and [omit: and] the king of Eglon. And it came to pass, when they brought out those kings unto Joshua, that Joshua called for all the men of Israel, and said unto the captains [לְיָדָיו, leaders] of the men of war which went with him, Come near, put your feet upon the necks of these kings. And they 25 came near and put their feet upon the necks of them. And Joshua said to them, Fear not, nor be dismayed, be strong, and of good courage [firm, ch. i. 6], for thus 26 shall the Lord [Jehovah] do to all your enemies against whom ye fight. And afterward Joshua smote them, and slew them, and hanged them on five trees: and they 27 were hanging upon the trees until the evening. And it came to pass at the time of the going down of the sun, that Joshua commanded, and they took them down off the trees, and cast them into the cave wherein they had been hid, and laid great stones in the cave's mouth, which remain [omit: which remain] until this very day.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[ Verses 20 and 21 might well be translated and connected thus: And it came to pass when . . . till they were consumed, and those that had escaped of them had fled, and were come into the fortified cities, that all the people returned, etc. — Tr.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The abandonment by Gibeon of the common cause leads Adoni-zedek, king of Jerusalem, beyond doubt the most powerful of the Canaanite kings in Southern Palestine, to call upon the kings of Hebron, Lachish, Jarmuth, and Eglon, to chastise the apostate city. With this demand the princes named yielded compliance (ver. 1-5). But Joshua, being summoned by the Gibeonites to their assistance, hastens to aid his threatened allies, defeats the Canaanite kings in the famous battle at Gibeon, ever memorable on account of the much disputed standing still of the sun (vers. 6-15), and pursues and slays the confederates (vers. 16-27).

a. Investment of Gibeon by the five allied Kings (vers. 1-5).— ver. 1. מֶלֶךְ יִשְׁרָאֵל = Lord of righteousness. Better known than this Adoni-zedek is מֶלֶךְ צִדְקָה = King of righteousness (Gen. xiv. 18; Ps. cx. 4; Heb. v. 6-10; vi. 20; vii. 1, 10 and often), who was likewise king of Salem (Jerusalem).

יְהוֹשֻׁעַ also יְהוֹשֻׁעַ (the latter form here and there in Chronicles, e. g., 1 Chron. iii. 5, also on the coins of the Maccabean age, while others have also the defective form, Gesen.), abbreviated, שָׁלֹם (Gen. xiv. 18; Ps. lxxvi. 3), from which it is evident that the proper pointing is יְהוֹשֻׁעַ, as further, the Aram. יְהוֹשֻׁעַ, Ezra iv. 20, 24; v. 1, and יְהוֹשֻׁעַ, Ezra v. 14; vi. 9, go to show. The Keri perpetuum —, which is a dual form, is explained (Fürst) as having arisen with reference to the double city (upper and lower), or, without respect to that, from the fact that the later Hebrews understood יְהוֹשֻׁעַ to be an old dual form (still appearing in שְׁתֵּי יָמִים, שְׁתֵּי יָמִים and the nom. prop. שְׁתֵּי יָמִים), and had substituted for it the customary יְהוֹשֻׁעַ.

The etymology is doubtful. Gesenius maintains the interpretation, supported by the translation of Saadjas: dwelling of peace. On this view, יְרֵד would be from יָרַד = dwelling or foundation, and שָׁלֹם = שְׁלֹמָה, which is favored by the Greek mode of writing Σολομα (Josephus, Ant. i. 10, 12; Paus. 8, 16, 3) and the Latin, Solyma (Mart. 10, 65, 5). Ewald holds the first part of the word to be an abbreviation of יְרֵד = possession, and explains, possession of Shalem.<sup>1</sup> Hitzig (on Is. p. 1, ff.) goes back to יְרֵדָה = possession, district, "district or possession of Salem." More recently he holds, on Ps. lxxvi. 3, that יְרֵדָה should properly have been written יְרֵדָה שָׁלֹם, which he translates (History of the People of Israel, i. 140) by: "Fear ye God undividedly." Here it is to be further observed that according to Hitzig's views שָׁלֹם, in the southern Arabic = a stone, was, with the Amorites יְבִיס, the old Canaanite name of the city [Jerusalem], which David changed into Jerusalem, while Hitzig adds that the city was earlier called Salem (?).

Fürst decides for the old etymology, appealing also to Saadjas on Is. xlv. 28; li. 17; lx. 1; lxii. 1, 6, taking שָׁלֹם, however, = שְׁלֹמָה, as an epithet of the most high God, as in יְהוֹשֻׁעַ שְׁלֹמָה. Thus יְרֵדָה would be equal to יְרֵדָה שְׁלֹמָה, 2 Chr. xx. 16, meaning "foundation (or place, dwelling) of El," and that as the Peaceful. It is striking that Fürst interprets שָׁלֹם, Gen. xiv. 18; Ps. lxxvi. 3, where it stands alone, without יְרֵד by "hilly place, summit," from a supposed stem שָׁלַם, to be high. But it would be more obvious to explain it, in accordance with the meaning given to שָׁלֹם in יְרֵדָה שְׁלֹמָה, as "place of the Peaceful," that is, of God.

"The later Arabic name of Jerusalem, el-Kuds or Beit el-Mukaddas, is only a circumlocution like עִיר הַקֹּדֶשׁ in the Hebrew (Neh. xi. 18)." Fürst. On the topography of Jerusalem and its neighborhood, comp. Dr. E. G. Schultz, Jerusalem; W. Krafft, The Topography of Jerusalem; Tobler, Memoirs of Jerusalem, and, Topography of Jerusalem and its Vicinity, as also Menke's Bible Atlas, map v., where on very carefully drawn side-maps the views of Tobler, Kiepert, Ferguson, Robinson, Krafft, and Sepp, concerning the plan of the city, are delineated.<sup>1</sup>

Ver. 2. It is emphatically mentioned concerning Gibeon that it was a great city, "like one of the cities of the kingdom," that is, perhaps, like a city in which a king dwelt, like a "royal city."

Ver. 3. Hebron, chaps. x. 36; xv. 54, Jarmuth, ch. xv. 35, Laishah and Eglon, ch. xv. 39, lie in southern Canaan.

Ver. 4. The enterprise is not directly against Joshua, but against Gibeon, because Gibeon has made peace with Joshua and the children of Israel.

Ver. 5. The four kings hear the summons, and encamp around Gibeon. The names of the kings are not given here a second time; but the names of the cities over which they ruled, and in the same order as in ver. 3. The former names, however, are significant throughout, for Hoham is probably "whom Jehovah drives," Piram "the wild ass" (similar designations among the aborigines of N. A.), Japhia "splendid," Debir "the writer," on which the Lexicons may be consulted.

b. Battle of Gibeon, vers. 6-15. — Ver. 6. The Gibeonites send to Joshua at Gilgal and implore help, and indeed, as the form of their expression indicates, immediate help. Observe the climax; slacken not thy hands (2 Sam. xxiv. 16) — come up to us quickly — and save us — and help us. A very similar tone is adopted by the persecuted Christian congregation, Acts iv. 24-30, especially vers. 27-29.

Kings of the Amorites — a common designation of the five princes.

Ver. 7. Joshua responds to the appeal and hastens marching all night long to reach them (ver. 9), and that with a select portion of the army — גִּבּוֹרֵי הַחַיִּל, ch. i. 14. The י is to be taken as explicative, as Gen. iii. 16; comp. also Josh. xiv. 6.

Ver. 8. An encouraging address from Jehovah.

Ver. 9. A more particular statement of what has been told (ver. 7). — Suddenly comes he upon them because he has marched the whole night. In the morning he stands before them, when they believe him to be yet at his head-quarters on the Jordan. These rapid marches illustrate the true energy and efficiency of great military commanders. This is perceived also in modern and even the most recent history.<sup>2</sup>

Ver. 10. "Jehovah scattered (יִחַדֵּם) the enemy before Israel. The latter smote them in a great defeat at Gibeon and pursued them northward on the way to the ascent (מַעְלָה ב') of Beth-horon. So likewise he followed them in a southwesterly direction and smote them even unto Azekah and Makkedah." So Knobel. According to his view, therefore, the whole pursuit occurred simultaneously, towards the northwest and the southwest. But that is not the sense of vers. 10 and 11. Rather all Israel pursued the enemy in a northwesterly direction towards the pass of Beth-horon, and from thence through the pass down into the plain, where probably Azekah and Makkedah lay. By what means Jehovah discomfited the enemy, or "scattered" them, as Knobel translates, is not told; for the hail comes later. So Jehovah once discomfited the Egyptians, also, Ex. xiv. 24; and xxiii. 27 the promise is given that God will always do so with the foes of Israel. In 1 Sam. vii. 10 we are told of a tempest which Jehovah brought up when, at Samuel's prayer, he caused it to thunder against the Philistines, and then it is said: יִחַדֵּם — the same word which is used here. Probably also the storm came on during the battle. It thundered and lightened. Jehovah fought for his people out of the clouds. The enemy trembled and lost heart. They fled. During their flight the storm broke upon them in full fury; hailstones fell on them and of such size that more died from these than were slain by the sword (ver. 11).

<sup>1</sup> [A particularly valuable article on Jerusalem will be found in Smith's Dictionary of the Bible. On the topography the additions to the Am. ed. are indispensable. The Recovery of Jerusalem (see Intr. p. 87) is now reprinted in N. Y. — Tr.]

<sup>2</sup> [If Sadowa and the other events of the Austrian campaign were so commemorated by the author, what would he have said of the progress from Weissenberg to Sedan, and Paris, and — in 1870. — Tr.]

By a very similar mischance the Austrians were overtaken in 1859 at the battle of Solferino. — We have translated אֲשַׁר in ver. 10 "ascent" and in ver. 11, "descent."<sup>1</sup> It means both alike, as in 1 Macc. iii. 16, 24, both stand together in reference to this place: ἀνδραῖς καὶ καρδαιῖς βαθύνουσιν. If "pass" were not so modern it would best express the meaning of this word. This Pass of Beth-horon is still very rocky and rough (Robinson, iii. 59-63), and leads from the mountain down into the western plain, whither Joshua pursued the enemy even to the places lying there, Asekah (ch. xv. 35) and Makkedah (ch. xv. 41).

Ver. 11. That by the great stones, not stones literally as rained down (Grotius, Calmet, Ilgen), but hail-stones are to be understood, appears from the second half of the verse, "A hail-storm is meant, in relation to which הָאֵשׁ occurs also Is. xxx. 30; comp. Ez. xiii. 11, 13. Jehovah in contending with his enemies employs the hail also (Job xxxviii. 23; Is. xxxii. 19) as he did e. g. in Egypt, Ex. ix. 19, 25" (Knobel).

The verses which now follow, 12-15, deserve a particularly careful examination, and that (1) in reference to the criticism of the text; (2) as regards their contents. As to the former it is obvious that the whole passage, ver. 12-15, might be removed from the context entirely, without in the least mutilating the narrative; rather, ver. 16 connects itself with ver. 11 as its proper continuation. It is further manifest that ver. 13 itself refers to another writing as its source, and that the same author cannot possibly have written ver. 15 and ver. 43. For, according to ver. 15 Joshua had returned immediately after the battle at Gibeon into the camp at Gilgal, while in ver. 43 this return takes place only after the completed conquest of southern Canaan.

We have therefore to consider here an inserted passage. Knobel calls it "a fragment from the first document of the Jehovist." This first document of the Jehovist is, as may have been already perceived from the Intro. (§ 2), according to Knobel's view, the סֵפֶר הַיְשָׁר here cited — the "Law-book" as he calls it, — composed in the Northern kingdom. From this first document the whole episode here is taken, as he supposes, except the words, "is it not written in the Sepher Jaschar?" which he explains as an addition of the Jehovist, "who in a thing so unheard of and in credible thought himself bound to quote his authority expressly." As we have not been able to assent to this view, but are rather obliged, with the whole body of critics, to regard this סֵפֶר הַיְשָׁר, mentioned only here and 2 Sam. i. 18, as a poetical book, we cannot by any means refer the whole passage to the "Book of the Upright," but only a part as is afterwards shown. In this assumption that the whole passage, with the exception of the formula of quotations, is taken from the "Book of the Upright," there agree with Knobel: Hengstenberg in the Evang. Kirchen-Zeitung, 1832, No. 88, ibid. 1868, No. 48; Hävernick, Einh. ii. 1, p. 50, Keil, Comm. p. 255 ff. [Bibl. Comm. ii. 1, 76 ff.]. The latter remarks, at the end of his exposition: "The only plausible consideration which can be brought against this view, and which has been adduced with great emphasis by two anonymous writers in the Evang. Kirchen-Zeitung, 1833, No. 17, p. 135 f., and No. 25 f. p. 197 f. and 211 f., consists in this, that the formula of citation, 'Is not this written in the Book of the Upright?' stands in the middle of the passage quoted, while elsewhere this and similar formulas stand either at the beginning of the quotation, as Deut. xxi. 14-27, or at the end of it, as generally in the books of Kings and Chronicles. But from both cases it does not follow that this is a rule without exceptions." Keil labors to prove this, quite fruitlessly, in our opinion; Hengstenberg also, in his second essay, seeks to obviate the striking fact that the citation occurs in the midst of the passage, by assuming that the author has communicated, out of the Book of the Upright, two lyrical fragments, which he separates from each other by the intervening phrase of quotation (ubi sup. p. 580). But, granting that ver. 13-15, together with the very prosaic conclusion, "and Joshua returned and all Israel with him, unto the camp to Gilgal," must be a lyrical fragment, would it not then have been more natural for the writer to repeat the formula somewhat in this manner: Is not this also written in the Book of the Upright? — Bleek has left the question unsettled, saying, "How far the quotation here extends, and where the historian resumes, is not quite clear" (Intro. to the O. T. p. 349). Kamphausen on the contrary (Stud. und Kritiken, 1863, p. 866), assumes that the author of ver. 12-15 was a historian who names expressly the source from which he draws, and plainly distinguishes, the lines which he extracts therefrom from his own prosaic narrative. To the same result must we also come, and for the following reasons: (1.) The fact that the formula of citation here occurs in the midst of the passage, constitutes for us an insuperable objection to referring the whole to the Book of the Upright, since everywhere else, such formula comes in either at the beginning or end of the words cited. (2.) The exclamation which is put in the mouth of Joshua, breathes in every aspect the spirit of Hebrew poetry. It is sublime in its import, rhythmical, and strictly observing the parallelism in its form, in its choice of words also poetical (notice דָּוִם, יָרֵם<sup>2</sup>); while afterwards the discretion of the historian manifestly comes into play, since he mentions only the sun; lets it stand in the midst of heaven, then continues with the observation that it hasted not to go down almost a whole day; in ver. 14 expounds verbally the poetical language, and concludes, finally, with a wholly prosaic notice.

Verses 13-15, accordingly, do not belong to the Book of the Upright.<sup>3</sup> But how with verse 12 a?

with all the facts. We think the poetic spirit resounds through the whole of vers. 13 and 14, to say nothing of the more satisfactory dogmatic bearing of Hengstenberg's view, to be noticed hereafter.

Stanley, in his very interesting presentation of the great battle of Gibeon (Jewish Church, 1st series, lect. xi.), gives this whole section poetically arranged, as follows. It will be seen that here again he blends the LXX. and the Hebrew text too much as if they were of like authority: —

"Then spake Joshua unto JEHOVAH,
In the day 'that God gave up the Amorite

<sup>1</sup> [The remark which follows is true and appropriate concerning אֲשַׁר, which, however, is not repeated in ver. 11. מוֹרָד is used there. — Tr.]

<sup>2</sup> [Might we not add also וַי ver. 18, which is unusual for וַי in reference to the Hebrews? — Tr.]

<sup>3</sup> [The unhesitating confidence of our author in this conclusion seems hardly borne out by his reasons. The cautious judgment of Bleek, above quoted, seems more consistent

It is possible that these words may have formed the historical introduction in that Book of Heroes, to Joshua's exclamation, as Ex. xv. 1, "Then sang Moses," etc., but it is also possible that they belong to the same author as vers. 13 b-15, from whom other sections likewise wrought into the body of the history may have been derived. On this see the Introduction.

Having dealt with the criticism of the text, we proceed (2) to a consideration of the meaning of the passage, which especially needs to be exegetically settled. Ver. 12, וַיִּשְׁתָּקֵט, pointedly "at that time," as Gen. xii. 6, Josh. xiv. 11, in contrast with וַיִּשְׁתָּקֵט; LXX. τότε, Vulg. tunc. This וַיִּשְׁתָּקֵט is more closely defined by וַיִּיָּהוּהוּ יָתַד וְנָתַן, "in the day when Jehovah delivered up," etc. The battle at Gibeon is intended. The promise, Deut. i. 7, 8, is to be remembered. On this day, Joshua spake to Jehovah, . . . and he said in the sight of Israel. We should have expected rather, "in the ears of Israel." The same kind of expression is used in Num. xx. 8, in a passage which probably has the same author as ours, and in Deut. xxxi. 7. Quite correctly לְעֵינֵי is used, Gen. xxiii. 11, 18; Ex. iv. 30. Here it is to be taken = coram, as the Vulgate translates, correctly as to the sense. Then follows what Joshua said. וַיִּשְׁתָּקֵט, as also וַיִּיָּהוּהוּ, is without the article, according to the usage of poetry, as Job xvi. 18, וְעָרְבָה (O earth), while in prose the article in this case is more common to distinguish the noun in some manner (Ewald, Lehrg. § 327). וַיִּשְׁתָּקֵט, Imp. Kal from שָׁקַט, prop., to be dumb with astonishment, then to be silent, then to rest, to be quiet, to keep still, as one who is silent does. So Ps. iv. 5; 1 Sam. xiv. 9; Job xxxi. 34; Lam. ii. 18; Job xxx. 27. Knobel remarks also that וַיִּיָּהוּהוּ, Gen. xxxiv. 5; Ex. xiv. 14, is used in the same way of rest, inactivity. "Sun, stand still on Gibeon," is accordingly, = keep thyself quiet and inactive, stand still. Keil indeed will not grant this, but translates וַיִּשְׁתָּקֵט here and 1 Sam. xiv. 9, by "wait." But both here and there וַיִּשְׁתָּקֵט stands immediately parallel to וַיִּשְׁתָּקֵט, and עָמַד means unquestionably to stand, stand still, remain standing, for which 1 Sam. xx. 38 may be superfluously compared. Besides, how can the sun wait, without standing still. It is better, therefore, to translate poetically, with force and boldness, "stand still," than tamely "Sun, wait at Gibeon and moon in the Valley of Ajalon." So also the LXX., ἡ ἡλιος κατὰ Γαβέων, καὶ ἡ σελήνη κατὰ φάραγγα Ἀϊλὼν; and the Vulgate: "Sol contra Gabaon ne movearis et luna contra vallem Ajalon!" Quite erroneous is the attempt of Dr. Barzilai in the brochure, Un Errore di Trente Secoli (Trieste, 1868), to translate the וַיִּשְׁתָּקֵט by "Sun, be silent, cease to shine!" by which an eclipse of the sun

Into the hand of Israel, (LXX.)

When he discomfited them in Gibeon,

'And they were discomfited before the face of Israel,' (LXX.)

And Joshua said:—

"Be thou still, O sun, upon Gibeon,
And thou moon upon the Valley of Ajalon.
And the sun was still,
And the moon stood,

would be made out of his standing still. Zöckler, in a treatise (Beweis des Glaubens, iv. p. 250), remarks on this: "The untenableness of this explanation appears not only from the fact that וַיִּשְׁתָּקֵט, 'to be silent' (as well as its synonym וַיִּיָּהוּהוּ, in Gen. xxxiv. 5; Ex. xiv. 14), according to 1 Sam. xiv. 9, may very well signify in general, the holding in, or ceasing from any activity, and particularly resting from any movement, the holding still or standing of a moving body (comp. also Ps. iv. 5; Job xxxi. 34; Lam. ii. 18), while its application to the self-concealment of a luminous body, can be supported by no example,—but furthermore also from the connection with what follows. This, as definitely as is possible, presents the actual standing still of the sun, as the result of the mighty injunction of Joshua, the believing warrior."

The Valley of Ajalon lies to the west of Gibeon. Knobel says on this, at ch. xix. 42: "Ajalon, in whose vale Joshua bade the moon stand still (x. 12), allotted to the Levites (xxi. 24; 1 Chron. vi. 54), often mentioned in the wars with the Philistines (1 Sam. xiv. 31; 1 Chron. viii. 13), fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chron. xi. 10), taken from Ahaz by the Philistines (2 Chron. xxviii. 18), lying, according to the Onom., s. v. "Ajalon," two miles east of Nicopolis; at the present day, a village Jalu, Jalo, in a fertile region on the north side of a mountain ridge, from which one overlooks the beautiful and wide basin Merdj Ibn Omer stretching away to the north. Rob. iii. 63, 64; Later Bibl. Res. 145, Tobler, Dritte Wanderung, p. 188 f." To this position of Ajalon, westward from Gibeon, where Joshua joined battle with the Amorites, the place of the moon suits well. It stood in the west, near its setting, over Ajalon, and was still visible although the sun was shining. Let the two heavenly bodies stand where they stood and there would continue to be day; and if there continued to be day there would still be a possibility of completely destroying the foe. And that was precisely Joshua's wish, that they might stand where they stood in order that he might annihilate the enemy. Hengstenberg (ubi sup. p. 558) will not allow this, but explains that the "simultaneous appearance of the sun and moon" was "something entirely unusual, which ought not to be so readily taken for natural." This joint apparition, however, is not very unusual; on the contrary it may be witnessed in a clear sky at any time, during the moon's first quarter, in the afternoon, and during the last quarter, in the forenoon: and indeed, from what is kindly communicated to me by the astronomer Mädler, it may be seen, in the much clearer southern heavens, early in the afternoon, during the moon's first quarter, and until late in the forenoon during her third.

Knobel, for his part, supposes that "the separate mention of the sun and moon on Gibeon and Ajalon has, in the poetical parallelism, as e. g. in Hos. v. 8; Am. i. 5; Mich. iii. 12; Zech. ix. 10, 17, no significance." That, however, is questionable, in view of the fact that the assignment of the two heavenly bodies to their respective positions suits Until 'the nation' (or, LXX., until God) had avenged them upon their enemies.

And the sun stood in 'the very midst' of the heavens,
And hastened not to go down for a whole day,
And there was no day like that before it or after it,
That JEHOVAH heard the voice of a man,
For JEHOVAH fought for Israel.
And Joshua returned, and all Israel with him, unto the camp in Gilgal."—Ta.]

so perfectly to the place of Joshua, and the more so because it is to us very doubtful whether the names in Hos. v. 8, Am. i. 5, Zech. ix. 10, are connected merely for the sake of the parallelism, which we admit only as to Mic. iii. 12. But if the sun and moon simultaneously stood still in the heavens, and so that the sun rested over Gibeon east of the field of battle, and the moon over Ajalon in the west, the battle must have been going on in the morning, and Joshua have uttered his invocation at this time, perhaps toward midday. So it is understood also by Keil, Knobel, and Zöckler, who writes (ubi sup.): "The mention of the moon with the sun in ver. 13 is to be explained simply from the circumstance that it also was yet visible in the sky, and that the prayer, directed toward a prolongation of the day, could only be fully expressed, positively as well as negatively, if it at the same time called for the delay of the night, or, which is the same thing, a standing still of the planet which governed the night (Gen. i. 16)."

Gibeon and Ajalon are named as stations of the sun and moon, because Joshua when he engaged in the battle was probably west of Gibeon, in a place from which he saw the sun shining in the east over that city, and the moon in the far west over Ajalon.

As the probable hour of the conflict we may infer, partly from this situation and partly from the sun standing still "in the midst of the heaven" (ver. 13), that it was in the middle part of the day, and probably still in the forenoon, hardly the late afternoon as Corn. a Lapide, Clericus, J. D. Mich. et al. have supposed. Hitzig also decides in favor of the forenoon: "As Saul upon the king of Ammon, Joshua fell on the Amorites early in the morning. When, soon after, the battle took a favorable turn, the sun had already risen and stood over Gibeon behind the combatants, while in the far west, the moon had not yet gone down" (ubi sup. p. 102). Most recently of all A. Hengstenberg, in Bochum has also published a contribution (Beweis des Glaubens, vol. v pp. 287, 288) toward the explanation of our passage, in which he agrees with Zöckler in regard to the question at what time of day the battle was fought and Joshua uttered his call to the sun. Ewald, on the contrary (Gesch. d. v. Israel, 2, p. 325, 326), thinks of the afternoon. In regard, further, to the relation between the hail-storm mentioned ver. 11 and Joshua's exclamation, we must remember that the author of the "Book of the Upright," knew nothing of this hail-storm,<sup>1</sup> but the writer who gave the Book of Joshua its present form, inserted not only the supposed citation (ver. 12 and 13 a.) but the whole passage (vers. 12-15) into the midst of the history of the pursuit, so that he appears certainly to have conceived of the hail-storm as a preceding event.

Ver. 13. And the sun stood still, and the moon stayed until the nation had avenged themselves on their enemies. Joshua's wish is fulfilled. The heavenly bodies pause in their course and stand still. When once we remember that the poet says this, the same poet who has previously put in Joshua's mouth this grand, poetical exclamation, reminding us of Agamemnon's wish (Il. 2, 413 ff.), we have found the key to ver. 13, the most striking parallel to which is Judg. vi. 20. When it is there said that the stars out of their courses (מסלוליהם) fought against Sisera, no one, so far as we know, has ever supposed that this poetical trope was to be literally understood. Rather it is there, as here, the heavenly powers, nay Jehovah himself (ver. 14) who fights for Israel. It is not "an unheard of, astronomico-mechanical miracle" with which we here have to do, but "the most glorious typical occurrence, which illustrates how all nature, heaven and earth, is in league with the people of God, and helps them to victory in their battles of the kingdom" (Lange, Com. on Gen. pp. 86, 87).

The standing still of the sun and moon is no more to be understood literally than that fighting of the stars down out of their courses, or the melting down of the mountains (Is. xxxiv. 3: Amos ix. 13; Mic. i. 3), the rending of the heavens (Ps. xviii. 10), or the skipping of Lebanon (Ps. xxix. 6), the clapping of hands by the trees in the field (Is. lv. 12), the leaping of the mountains and hills (Ps. cxiv. 46), the bowing of the heavens (Ps. xviii. 10). It is the language of poetry which we have here to interpret, and poetry, too, of the most figurative, vehement kind, which honors and celebrates Joshua's confidence in God in the midst of the strife; that "unique assurance of victory on the part of Joshua" (Lange, ubi sup.) which the Lord would not suffer to be put to shame. In this the most positive interpreters (Keil, Kurtz, both Hengstenbergs), however they may differ as to the particulars, and to textual criticism, are perfectly at one, against a literal apprehension of the passage. Nor can Hab. iii. 11, be adduced in favor of a literal interpretation of the passage. For if it is said, Hab. iii. 11, "Sun, moon, יָרֵחַ וְשֶׁמֶשׁ," this is not to be translated as Hengstenberg (ubi sup.) and Keil, on the one side, and Hitzig (Kl. Propheten), on the other have shown, "The sun, and moon remain in their habitation," but rather: "The sun, the moon enter into a habitation," i. e. as we should say: "into the shade," namely, "behind the stratum of clouds" or, "they are darkened." "The friendly lights grow pale, while on the other hand, there shines for the enemies of God and his people, another, an ungenial light, which brings destruction, the lightning, God's spears and arrows" (Hengstenberg). This passage has therefore nothing at all to do with the one before us. And when Jesus Sirach in his enumeration of the exploits of Joshua, asks (xlv. 4), Ὁὐχὶ ἐν χειρὶ αὐτοῦ ἀνεπέδισεν ὁ ἥλιος καὶ μὴ ἡμέρα ἐγενήθη πρὸς δύο; he makes out of the standing still of the sun, a going back, something like Is. xxxviii. 8, and speaks at the same time of lengthening one day into two. He is not therefore correct in his representation of the occurrence. The same is true of Josephus (Ant. v. 1, 17), when he speaks only of an increase, i. e. lengthening in general of the day.

Is not this written in the Book of the Upright? i. e. "Lo, this stands written in that book and may there be read expressly. On יָרֵחַ וְשֶׁמֶשׁ comp. Num. xxii. 37; Deut. xi. 30. So very often in citations; 1 K. xi. 41; xiv. 29; xv. 7, 23, 31; xvi. 3, 20, 27 and often" (Knobel).

And the sun stood still in the midst of heaven, and hastened not to go down about a whole day.

יָרֵחַ וְשֶׁמֶשׁ here used of place, in Judg. xvi. 3 of time; in the middle, a more precise designation of the sun's standing, which is omitted in the poetical part of this episode.

And hastened not to go down. The verb יָרַח is used once besides in our book (ch. xvii. 15), and in the sense "to be narrow," and again in Ex. v. 13, where the Egyptian task-masters are spoken of, in the sense of "to oppress." It is not employed in poetry alone, as Zöckler (ubi sup.) maintains, in order to support his view that these verses also, at least to the close of ver. 14, breathe "a poetically exalted" strain. Or should Ex. v. 13 also be regarded as a poetical passage? A certain elevation is, indeed, not to be denied to the narrative here, but that we find also in places, like ch. viii., which yet is unquestionably prose.

<sup>1</sup> [That is, strictly, gives no indication of such knowledge in this passage. — Tr.]

About a whole day. יוֹם תָּמִיד, elsewhere commonly of moral integrity, is used in the original sense, "complete," "entire," in Lev. iii. 9; xxv. 30, in the latter passage of time, namely, of the year יוֹם תָּמִיד, as here of the day שְׁנֵה תָּמִיד. Plainly, the author of this verse understands the poetical citation from the Book of the Upright, literally, which does not hinder us from going back to the original sense, as we have done above. That he, like all the Scripture writers, thought of an "anti-Copernican" system, as Zöckler expresses it, or as we might more correctly say, that he spoke of what was immediately perceptible, is evident without discussion. We think with Zöckler (p. 250) "it is lost labor to put upon the expressions of holy Scripture concerning the magnitudes and movements of the heavenly bodies, a heliocentric sense, by allegorical artifices, since the childish simple view of the universe, which perceives in the earth the fixed centre, must necessarily have possessed the Biblical writers also as children of their time."

Ver. 14. And there was no day like that before it and after it (לִפְנֵי וְאַחֲרָיו) that Jehovah hearkened (שָׁמַע) unto the voice of a man; for Jehovah fought for Israel. The war was not merely a war of men, Jehovah himself rather was its leader, as was promised the Israelites, Ex. xiv. 14, by Moses. Comp. Deut. i. 29, 30; iii. 22, xx. 1, 3, 4, xxxi. 6. Hence Jehovah is called precisely מֶלֶךְ הַמִּלְחָמָה, "man of war" (Luther: der rechte Kriegsmann), Ex. xv. 3. He has heard the call of Joshua and held the sun still in his course (of the moon nothing more is said), and so, according to the view of the author of 13 b-15, has performed an objetive astronomical miracle, of which the poet from whom the quotation is made, had no thought, and of which we, following him (the poet) have no thought.<sup>1</sup>

Ver. 15 b. Hengstenberg would refer this prosaic statement still entirely to the poetry (which Zöckler does not do), and quotes in support of this (Ex. xv. 19) the close of Moses' song of triumph, which is also found Ex. xiv. 22. It is not found, however, in precisely the same words (in the latter passage בָּב, in the former the more graphic דָּוָל), nor with the same arrangement of the words, which in Ex. xv. 19 has the rhythmical cadence. We cannot, therefore, allow force to this example, but believe, rather, that to this, certainly if to any of the vers. (13 b-15) the "words of Maurer apply: Quæ ante formulam citandi b. guntur, sunt poesis; quæ post pura puta prosa."

<sup>1</sup> [Without dwelling on the palpable difficulty, not to say impossibility, of reconciling such a judgment with any satisfactory conception of the inspiration of the writer of our book, is not that judgment inconsistent with the natural probabilities concerning the authorship? That is, would not the reviser or compiler of the Book of Joshua know, as well as we, that he was introducing in verses 12, 13, a

KEIL'S VIEW OF VERS. 12-15, ADDED BY THE TRANSLATOR.

[As representing a somewhat different theological position, the following comments of Keil on this passage, may, as well as from their character in other respects, be profitably cited here.

"This wonderful victory was celebrated by Israel in a war-song which was preserved in the Book of the Pious. Out of this book the author of the Book of Joshua inserted here the passage which commemorated the wonderful work of Jehovah toward Israel and toward his enemies, the Amorites, for the glorification of his own name. For, that we have in vers. 12-15 a poetical extract from the סֵפֶר הַיִּשָּׁר is universally acknowledged. This insertion and the reference to this writing is analogous to the quotation from the Book of the Wars of the Lord (Num. xxi. 14), and the lyrical strophes woven into the historical narrative. The object is not to confirm the historical report by reference to an older authority, but only to render more vivid to future generations the striking impression which those wonders of the Lord had made upon the congregation."

Keil's account of the Book of the Pious is the same as that of Fay and most others. He distinctly assumes, however, what doubtless should be understood by all, that this progressively accumulated anthology of pious hymns in praise of the covenant God was interspersed with explanatory historical notices. Thus there is no difficulty in supposing ver. 15 also to have been copied from this poetical book. Keil then proceeds: "The citation from it proves itself at once to have been taken from a song, by the poetical form of the language and by the parallelism of the members.

The quotation begins, however, not with וַיִּשָּׁא, ver. 12 b, but with בָּיִת הָיָה, ver. 12 a, and to it belong also vers. 13 and 14, so that the reference to the source of the quotation is inserted in the middle of it. Such formulas are generally met with, indeed, elsewhere either at the beginning of the passage adduced, as Num. xxi. 14, 27; 2 Sam. i. 18, or at the close of it, as generally in the books of Kings and Chronicles. But it does not follow that such position was a rule without exceptions, especially since the reference to sources in the books of Kings has a quite different sense, the citations being not documentary proofs of the occurrences before reported, but references to writings in which more complete accounts might be found concerning fragmentarily communicated facts. In ver. 13 also the poetical form of the discourse leaves no doubt that vers. 13 and 14 still contain words of the ancient poet, not a prosaic comment of the historian on the poetic expressions which he had quoted. Only ver. 15 presents a pure historical statement which is repeated (ver. 43) at the end of the narrative of this victory and war. And this literal repetition of ver. 15 in ver. 43, and still more the fact that the statement that Joshua returned with all the people into the camp to Gilgal anticipates the historical order of events, and that in a very striking manner, renders it highly probably impassioned and hyperbolic passage of poetry? If so how could he, more than we, go on to interpret it as prosaic history? We think this indicates at once that the interpretation is not his, is nobody's cool interpretation, but only a continuation of the lyrical strain. Not all the grammatical objections of our author to this view combined can stand against this one consideration. — Tr.]

able, if not altogether certain, that ver. 15 also is taken from the Book of the Pious."

Keil's conception of the circumstances and progress of the battle, and of the position of the parties in reference to the standing still of the sun and moon, agrees in every important point with that of Fav.

"How then shall we make real to ourselves this wonderful occurrence? An actual standing still of the sun at some place in the heavens, about the zenith, is not clearly expressed. If one were disposed to insist on the וַיַּעַמְד, "the sun stood (held his position) in the midst of the heavens," which is added as if in explanation of וַיִּדְרוּ in such a way that it must express a miraculous obstruction of the course of the sun, this would hardly be consistent with the phrase לֹא אָזַן לְבָרָא, "it hastened not to go down," for this strictly taken, means only, as several of the Rabbins long ago remarked, a more tardy progress of the sun. Plainly intimated in vers. 12 and 13 is so much only, that at Joshua's word the sun remained standing almost a day longer in the heavens. To this is added (ver. 14), "That there was no such day before and afterward, that Jehovah hearkened to the voice of a man; for Jehovah fought for Israel." This expression, again, should not be too hardly pressed, as the analogous utterances, "there was none like him," etc. 2 K. xviii. 5; xxiii. 25, show. They convey only the thought, a day like this which God so marvelously lengthened has not been before nor since. So much therefore lies unambiguously in the words, that the singer of the ancient song, and after him also the author of our Book of Joshua, who inserted these words into his narrative, was convinced<sup>1</sup> of a wonderful prolongation of that day. Here, however, it is carefully to be observed that it is not said, that God did at Joshua's request increase the length of that day by about a whole day, or cause the sun to stand still for nearly a whole day, but only that God hearkened to the voice of Joshua, i. e. did not let the sun go down until Israel had avenged themselves upon their enemies. The difference is not unimportant. For a marvelous prolongation of that day took place not only if, through the exertion of God's Almighty power, the course of the sun or his going down was delayed for many hours, or the day lengthened from say twelve to eighteen or twenty hours, but also on the supposition that the day appeared to Joshua and to Israel wonderfully lengthened, the work accomplished on that day being so great that it would without supernatural help have required two days.

To decide between these two views is not easy, nay, if we go to the bottom of the matter, is impossible. [And no more necessary, it might be added, viewing the account as poetry, than to try to discover the exact proportion between David's glorious hyperboles in Psalm xviii. and the actual events of the deliverance which he there celebrates. — Tr.] When we cannot measure the length of the day by the clock, we may, especially in the crowd of business or work, with extraordinary facility be deceived in regard to its length. But the Israelites had neither sun-dials nor any clocks, and amid the tumult of the conflict hardly would Joshua, or any other one engaged in the strife, have repeatedly noticed the shadow of the sun, and inquired after its changes in reference to a tree, for example, or other such object, so as to perceive from its possibly remaining stationary and unaltered, for some hours, that the sun had actually stood still. Under these circumstances it was quite impossible for the Israelites to decide whether that day was really, or only in their conception, longer than other days.

Besides this we must take into account the poetical character of our passage. When David praises the wondrous deliverance which he had experienced at the hand of the Lord, in the words: "In my distress I called upon the Lord . . . and he heard my voice out of his heaven, . . . and he bowed the heaven and came down, . . . he stretched his hand out of the height, took me and drew me out of many waters" (Ps. xviii. 7-17), who imagines that these words are to be understood literally, of an actual descent of God out of heaven and stretching out of his hand to draw David out of the water? Or who will take the words of Deborah: "Out of heaven was the battle waged, the stars out of their courses fought against Sisera," in a literal sense? The truth of such expressions lies in the subjective field of the religious intuition, not in the rigorous interpretation of the words. In a similar way may the verses before us be understood without prejudice thereby to their real import, if that day had been merely subjectively prolonged to the religious apprehension of Israel.

But if the words had expressed even an objectively real and miraculous extension of that day, we should still have had no valid ground for doubting the truth of this statement of facts. All objections which have been raised against the fact or the possibility of such a miracle, appear, on a closer examination of the matter, nugatory. Thus, that the annals of the other peoples of the earth give no report at all of a miracle which must have extended over the whole earth, loses all importance when we perceive that no annals at all of other nations of that period are extant, and that it is extremely doubtful whether the miracle would have extended far beyond the bounds of Palestine [!]<sup>2</sup> Again, the appeal to the unchangeableness of the movement of the heavenly bodies fixed by eternally unalterable laws, is not suited to show the impossibility of such a miracle. The eternal laws of nature are nothing more than modes of manifestation, or phenomena, of God's creative power, the proper nature of which no mortal has yet found out. May not then the Almighty Creator and Preserver of nature and all her powers, be able also so to direct and control the powers of nature according to his own will that they should contribute to the realization of his ends in salvation? Finally, the objection also that the sudden arrest of the revolution of the earth upon its axis, must have demolished all the work of human hands

"And he (Joshua) believed God's particular favor to Israel above all people under the sun; else he could not have expected, that, to favor them upon an emergency with a double day, he should (which must follow of course) amuse and terrify so great a part of the terrestrial globe with a double night at the same time; it is true he causeth the sun to shine upon the just and upon the unjust, but this once the unjust shall wait for it beyond the usual time, while, in favor to righteous Israel, it stands still." — Tr.]

<sup>1</sup> [Considering what is afterward truly said of the fervid poetical character of this whole passage, this statement appears quite unwarranted. Unless David and Deborah and Habakkuk were convinced of the actual reality of what they assert in the form of fact, there seems no reason at all for assuming that either the original composer of the song or he who inserted it in the Book of the Upright or he who copied it into the Book of Joshua, believed there had been an actual extension of that day. — Tr.]

<sup>2</sup> [Compare Matt. Henry's (from this point of view) more rational representation: —

upon its surface, and hurled from its orbit the earth itself and her attendant the moon, proves nothing, since it is forgotten in all this, that the almighty hand of God which not only created the stars but also lent to them and to all worlds the power to run their course with regularity, so long as this world stands, that that hand which bears, upholds, controls all things in heaven and on earth, is not too short, to guard against such ruinous consequences.

To this may still be added that even the most rigorous apprehension of the words does not compel us, with the fathers and older theologians, to suppose a miraculous obstruction of the sun in his course, but only an optical pause of the sun, i. e. a miraculous arrest of the revolution of the earth on its axis, which would have appeared to the observer as a standing still of the sun. Knobel is entirely wrong when he pronounces this view of the fact contrary to the text. For the Scriptures speak of things of the visible world according to their appearance, as we also still speak of the rising and setting of the sun, although we have no doubt of the revolution of the earth about the sun. Such an optical stand-still of the sun, however, or rather merely a longer standing and visibility of the sun in the horizon, might be effected through God's omnipotence in an astronomical phenomenon unknown to us and wholly incomprehensible by natural philosophy, without interfering with the general laws of the rotation of the heavenly bodies. Only we must not, surely, reduce this exertion of the divine power to a mere unusual refraction of the light, or a storm of lightning lasting through the whole night, as has been variously attempted." Bild. Com. ii. 1, p. 76-81.]

Having thus treated of this difficult passage in reference to the criticism of the text, and also to the purport of it, it remains for us still to glance at the history of its interpretation.

Although Jesus Sirach and Josephus had, even in their day, betrayed a disposition in the passages above cited, to change the phraseology of our verse, in the sense of a not entirely literal conception of it, still the overwhelming majority of ancient Jewish and Christian interpreters understand here an objective, astronomical miracle, an actual standing still of the sun. So Justin Martyr in Dial. cum Tryph.; Ephraem Syr.; Tertullian, De Jejuni. i. 10; Jerome c. Jovin. i. 11; Chrysost. Hom. 27 in Epist. ad Hebr.; Augustine, De Civit. Dei, xvi. 8; Theodoret, the Rabbins, Serarius, Masius, C. a Lapide, Calvin, Osiander, et mult. al. Exceptions are (the Ev. Kirchen-Zeitung, ubi sup. p. 555), Maimonides and Rabbi Levi ben Gersom, who advocate the non-literal view. "The wish of Joshua," explains the latter, "aims only at this, that that one day and night might be long enough for the overthrow of the so numerous forces of the enemy. It was the same as if he had said: Grant, Almighty Father, that before sun and moon go down, thy people may take vengeance on this multitude of thy foes. The miracle of that day was, that at the prayer of a man God effected so great a defeat in so short a time." How tenaciously the Roman curia, on the contrary, in their Jesuitically inspired proceedings against Galileo (1633), held fast to the opposite view, is well known.

1 [The note of the learned Whiston, translator of Josephus, is curiously accommodating: "Whether this lengthening of the day, by the standing still of the sun and moon, were physical and real, by the miraculous stoppage of the diurnal motion of the earth for about half a revolution, or whether only apparent, by aerial phosphori imitating the sun and moon as stationary so long, while clouds and the night

As however the Copernican system nevertheless found adherents, and indeed, even among orthodox Protestant theologians out of opposition to Rome, these thought to help themselves by the assumption of an optical pause of the sun (statio optica), that is, they assumed that the earth was hindered by God in its revolution on its axis, by which a lengthening of the day was produced. So Lilienthal, Gute Sache, v. p. 167 ff.; Mosheim apud Calmet, p. 45 ff.; Bastholm, Jüdische Geschichte, ii. p. 31 ff.; Zimmermann, Scriptura Copernizans, i. 1, p. 228. In recent times this view is maintained by Baumgarten (Herzog's Realencyk. vii. 40) According to this writer, Joshua, in the full confidence of being the dispenser of divine vengeance against the corrupt Canaanites, called, as night threatened to overtake them, to the heavenly luminaries, and the day was by nearly its full length, "prolonged through the apparent pause of the heavenly bodies which govern day and night, but through the actual pause of the globe in its diurnal revolution." Such an exorbitant miracle came to pass because "the destination of Israel was something infinitely transcending, in its dignity and significance, the entire natural order of things." This relation between Israel and the "system of the universe" Joshua apprehended in a "moment of daring faith," "assumed the immediate realization of the same," and Jehovah "sealed this venture of faith by his work and word;" and it is for us "simply to believe, that this was done."

The editor of the Encyclopædie has made on this representation the very apposite remark, "That, however, theologians of a strictly positive tendency are of a different view in this respect is well known."

Grotius and Clericus are to be regarded as precursors of the rationalizing interpretation. They imagined extraordinary refractions of the light of the sun already set; for, as Grotius supposes, it was not impossible for God solis cursum morari, aut etiam post solis occasum ejus speciem in nube supra horizontem extantem per repercussum ostendere. Spinoza, also (Tract. Theol. Polit. ii. pp. 22 and 6, p. 78 ed. Hamb. 1670), adopted substantially this opinion. J. D. Michaelis and Schultz resort to the supposition of lightning that lasted through the whole night; Hess combined lightning with the light of the sun and moon, so that there was no night, so to speak, between this and the following day (F. F. Hess, Geschichte Josua, i. p. 140 f.). Others otherwise; but truly laughable is the attempt of Ritter (in Henke's Magazin, vi. 1), to make the expression "sun" and "moon" represent the signals or standards which Joshua had ordered to remain there where they chanced to stand in Gibeon and Ajalon. This insipidity reminds one, as Zöckler has rightly observed, of the famous Tavern for the Whale, and similar absurdities of a spiritless, jejune exegesis.<sup>1</sup>

In recent times the more advanced study of textual criticism has led to the poetical understanding of the passage—in our view the only correct one, which is favored not only in general by Maurer, Ewald (Gesch. ii. p. 326), Hitzig and von Lengerke, but also as has been shown above by theologians of quite positive principles, the two Hengstenbergs, Keil, Kurtz, and others. Not less decidedly have hid the real one, and this parhelion, or mock sun, affording sufficient light for Joshua's pursuit and complete victory (which aerial phosphori in other shapes have been unusually common of late years), cannot now be determined; philosophers and astronomers will naturally incline to this latter hypothesis," etc. Ad. Ant. v. 1, 16.]

Lange and Zöckler adopted this view. How far we differ from one and another of these, specially in regard to the criticism of the text, will appear from the foregoing explanation. But that men like Knak, Frantz, and Straube have again brought prominently forward as a "matter of faith," the assumption of an actual standing still of the sun, which, under the universal prevalence of the Ptolemaic astronomy was a quite natural view, although by no means required by the text in vers. 12 and 13; that they believe themselves called to defend this against the "pseudodoxy of the natural sciences," we regard as indicating a lamentable confusion of ideas, resting on a total want of scientific sense, and under the injurious influence of which the true "matter of faith" is likely to suffer much.

As a curiosity we may refer in conclusion to the notion of Jean d'Espagne, a French theologian, mentioned by Starke, who makes out that this miracle took place in the year 2555 from the creation of the world. But that is the year  $7 \times 365$ . "Now a year has 365 days, and the number seven has in God's Word much mystery. Thus the number of the year 2555 makes 365 week-years, [Wochenjahre, years each of which contains a week of years]. So also year-weeks [Yahrwochen, weeks whose days are years] are to be understood (Dan. ix. 24). Thus the sun after completing 355 year-weeks in his course here kept miraculously a day of rest. This time of 365 days when it has passed 365 times gives us a year of years" etc.

c. Flight and Destruction of the Five Kings. (Vers. 16-27). Vers. 16 ff. contain the continuation of vers. 1-11. The hail-storm had inflicted terrible injury on the Amorites. Many died from the hail, more than were slain by the sword of the Israelites. But the five kings sought to secure their own persons, and hid themselves in the cave at Makedah. When Joshua heard of this, he caused a stone to be rolled before the mouth of the cave and set a guard over it, but he himself drives forward to effect a complete discomfiture of the enemy, and in this succeeds. Not until this is done does he have the five kings brought forward, and, after a ceremony expressive of their total subjection, hung on trees, and their corpses thrown into the cave.

Ver. 16. Hid themselves in the cave at Makedah. Many such caves were found in the lime and chalk rocks of Palestine. In David's history the cave of Adullam is often mentioned (1 Sam. xxii. 1 ff.; 2 Sam. xxiii. 13; 1 Chron. xi. 15). In the history of the crusades also (W. Tyrius, De Bello Sacro, 15, 6; 18, 19; 11, et seq.), caves are mentioned. Judg. xx. 47, the cave at Rimmon is spoken of, which could contain 600 men in its spacious recess. These caves are large and dry, and branch out also into chambers (Robinson ii. 175, 352 ff., 395-398. Von Schubert, iii. 30). They were thus admirably fitted for places of refuge, in times of danger, as in the case before us. [See Dict. of the Bible, art. Caves].

Ver. 17. for נִקְרָאִים לְהָרֹגָם from a sing. נִקְרָא after the manner of verbs לָה. Gesen. § 75, Rem. 21, (a) (Knobel).

Ver. 19. Smite the hindmost of them (their rear). וְנִקְרָאִים from נִקְרָא (נִקְרָא), prop. "to hurt the tail," figuratively, to disturb the rear-guard of the enemy (Deut. xxv. 18). In Greek also οὐρά, οὐραρία is = rear-guard.

Vers. 20, 21. Most of the enemy were left on the field; only a few escaped into the fortified towns, where they were concealed only for a short time, as we learn from vers. 27-43. Those that remained נִשְׁרִידִים, elsewhere נִשְׁלִיט ch. viii. 22; Gen. xiv. 13; Jer. xlv. 28; Ezek. vi. 8. The apodosis begins not with וְנִשְׁרִידִים, but with וְנִשְׁכַּח ver. 21, as Maurer correctly shows. How Keil could imagine that it begins not until ver. 23, it is difficult to perceive. For the rest cf. ch. iii. 15 and 16, where the construction is altogether the same, and ch. ii. 5 where it is similar. — בְּשָׁלוֹם, LXX. by εις, Vulg.: Sani et integro numero, in good condition.

None pointed against the children of Israel, against one of them his tongue. The whole proverbial expression we read Ex. xi. 7: "against any of the children of Israel shall not a dog move (point) his tongue, against man or beast," where dog is given as the subject. Here the subject is wanting unless we suppose with Maurer that the ל in לֹא־יִשָּׁא is an error in copying, from the preceding יִשְׂרָאֵל, and to be rejected, which would then leave יִשָּׁא as the subject. We think it more simple to supply the subject in an indefinite, euphemistic sense, and take לֹא־יִשָּׁא as a more precise limitation of לִבְנֵי, which is favored by the specification in Ex. xi. 7, לִבְנֵי בְּהֵמָה. Wholly false is the LXX. καὶ οὐκ ἔγρυψε τῶν υἱῶν Ι. (!) οὐδεὶς τῇ γλώσσῃ αὐτῶν, while the Vulg. rightly hits the sense: nullusque contra filios Israel mutire ausus est. The meaning is, no one ventured to do any harm to any of the children of Israel, comp. Judith xi. 13.

Vers. 22, 23. At Joshua's command the cave is now opened, and the kings brought before him.

Ver. 24. Come near, put your feet on the necks of these kings. This demand for a contemptuous humiliation of the conquered leaders of the enemy is addressed by Joshua to the leaders of the men of war, to his field officers, who also respond thereto. The ceremony indicates "entire subjugation," and was practiced, according to Knobel, by the Greek emperors also. Constant. Porphyrog. De Ceremoniis Aulæ Byzant. 2, 19; Bynæns, De Calceis Helv. p. 318). We may compare Ps. lx. 10. וְנִשְׁרִידִים לְהָרֹגָם, comp. Is. xxviii. 12 on the form of the verb; Ges. § 109; Ewald, § 331 b. on the use of the art. for pron. rel.

Ver. 25. Here Joshua says the same to his warriors which the Lord had said to him (ch. i. 7, 9).

Ver. 26. Joshua kills the kings, doubtless with the sword, and then hangs up their bodies in contempt on five trees, cf. Deut. xxi. 22; Num. xxv. 4; 2 Sam. iv. 12. The one suspended, was as is known, considered accursed, and might not remain hanging over night, Deut. xxi. 23; Gal. iii. 13; John xix. 31. In like manner Joshua had done to the king of Ai, ch. viii. 29. "The hanging of a living man is a Persian punishment (Ezr. vi. 11). Under the Herods this mode of execution occurs among the Jews also, Josephus, Ant. xvi. 11, 6 (unless strangling is here intended), as well as in Egypt during the Roman age, Philo ii. 529. See Winer, ii. 11 s. v. Lebensstrafen.

DOGMATICAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The Biblical view of the universe is like that of all antiquity, the geocentric; the earth stands still, the sun moves. So it appears according to natural, unaided observation, and we have only come to a different apprehension as the result of modern scientific researches. This result we cheerfully accept without forfeiture of our faith, for the only dogmatical question is whether God made the world or not (Heb. xi. 3), but not at all whether the earth revolves about the sun or the sun about the earth. In that question, whether God made the world, and in particular, whether He created it out of nothing, a religious interest is involved, that the origin of the cosmos should not be referred to blind chance but to an intelligent Creator of heaven and earth (Gen. i. 1). But how, on the supposition that God has created all things, the universe is constituted, whether so that the earth moves about the sun or the sun about the earth, this question is of no religious moment to us, but is relegated rather to the science of astronomy, which has finally answered it in the sense of Copernicus and Galileo. Comp. on this the instructive article of Dr. F. Pfaff on the Copernican system and its opponents, Beweis d. Glaube, vol. v. pp. 278-287). [Whewell's History of the Inductive Sciences, book v. ch. 3, sect. 4: The Copernican System opposed on Theological grounds. — Tr.).

2. With this foundation principle clear in mind, it is self-evident that those render poor service to the "cause of faith" who feel themselves obliged to uphold as a matter of faith what has nothing to do with faith, but is a matter of science. Conversely, however, it needs to be said also that the Bible as a book of religion, cannot reasonably be thought less of because it favors the geocentric scheme. So does Homer also, e. g. whom, nevertheless, in his poetic worth no one has ever thought of disparaging on that account, while it has always belonged to the tactics of those who opposed the Bible to assail it first on the side of the natural sciences, that they might next impugn its religious authority.

3. On the very recent strife in the Berlin Church, in the course of which our passage ch. x. 12-15 has been much ventilated, it belongs not to our design to speak.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Joshua's fidelity to his covenant with the oppressed Gibeonites crowned with a glorious victory: (1) Picture of the oppression of Gibeon by the five Canaanite kings. (2) How Joshua goes up at the call of the Gibeonites and smites the enemy. (3) How he pursues them and holds judgment upon them. — Gibeon's need, Joshua's faithfulness, God's help. — If men come to us for help in time of need God gives the courage to render aid. — True courage comes alone from God. — As God once fought for Israel so He still fights for his own. "Sun, stand still on Gibeon, and moon in the valley of Ajalon!" A believing word of Joshua, God's contending hero: (1) Spoken under what circumstances? (2) How intended? (3) How answered? — The Lord hears when we call upon Him in faith. — The great day at Gibeon. — It was great, (1) through the mighty strife of the combatants; (2) through the courageous faith of the general; (3) through the victory which God gave. — How the memory of Joshua lived still in song, and through song was glorified. — The cowardice of the Canaanite kings contrasted with the boldness of Joshua. — He that has no good conscience hides himself. — The judgment of Joshua upon the five kings (1) destructive to them; (2) encouraging to Israel.

STARKE: Whoever, in spiritual conflicts, will have the true Joshua for a helper, must not trust to his own powers but to the power of Christ, and freely come before him, Phil. iv. 13. — He who would do his neighbor a favor, should not delay it long, but act quickly, for the speediness of a gift doubles its value [bis dat qui cito dat], while a benefit delayed loses its thanks and becomes useless, 2 Cor. ix. 7. — On the successful progress of a cause, one ought not to give glory to himself but to God, for He is the workman, we only the tools. — From God's power no man can either climb too high or creep too low; He knows easily how to find us, Amos ix. 2, Ps. cxxxix. 7. — Pious Christian, God will one day for thee also lay thy enemies at thy feet; therefore, up; contend, conquer! Rev. ii. 26, 27; iii. 9, 12; Rom. xvi. 20.

CRAMER: It is strange to the world that we will not keep with them: therefore those who turn to God must be attacked and suffer persecution. 1 Pet. iv. 4; Matt. x. 36; 2 Tim. iii. 12. — God has various artillery with which He contends for his people against their enemies, Judg. v. 20. Let no one faint, therefore, with God's help. . . . The tyrants who were so wild, fierce, and unrestrainable, God can presently tame.

HEDINGER: The iniquity of the ungodly of itself hastens to its punishment, and there is no rod so good for a wicked man as his own. — It is well to be concerned lest one make God angry, but when one has made Him angry it is useless care to try to escape his judgment. Even if we should run out of the world we should only find his wrath so much the greater.

LANGÉ: If a man has once gained a real victory over his spiritual foes he must boldly follow it up without indolent delay, and faithfully reap the fruits of the success given him.

GERLACH: Holy Scripture speaks, in regard to things of the visible world, and which concern not the affairs of God's kingdom, according to natural appearances, precisely as we speak of the sun rising and setting, although we have no doubt of the revolution of the earth.

4. The Conquest of Southern Palestine.

CHAPTER X. 28-43.

28 And that day Joshua took Makkedah, and smote it with the edge of the sword, and the king thereof he utterly destroyed [devoted], them and all the souls that were therein ; he let none remain [left none remaining, as in vers. 33, 37, 39, ch. xi. 8, etc.] : and he did to the king of Makkedah as he did [had done] unto the king of Jericho.

29 Then [And] Joshua passed from Makkedah, and all Israel with him, unto Libnah, 30 and fought against Libnah : and the Lord [Jehovah] delivered it also, and the king thereof, into the hand of Israel ; and he smote it with the edge of the sword, and all the souls that were therein ; he let [left] none remain [remaining] in it ; but [and, comp. ver. 28] did unto the king thereof as he did [had done] unto the king of Jericho.

31 And Joshua passed from Libnah, and all Israel with him, unto Lachish, and 32 camped against it, and fought against it : And the Lord [Jehovah] delivered Lachish into the hand of Israel, which [who] took it, on the second day, and smote it with the edge of the sword, and all the souls that were therein, according to all that he had done to Libnah.

33 Then [At that time] Horam king of Gezer came up to help Lachish ; and Joshua smote him and his people, until he had [omit : had] left him none remaining.

34 And from Lachish Joshua passed unto Eglon, and all Israel with him : and they 35 encamped against it, and fought against it. And they took it on that day, and smote it with the edge of the sword, and all the souls that were therein he utterly destroyed [devoted] that day, according to all that he had done to Lachish.

36 And Joshua went up from Eglon, and all Israel with him, unto Hebron ; and 37 they fought against it : And they took it, and smote it with the edge of the sword, and the king thereof, and all the cities thereof, and all the souls that were therein ; he left none remaining, according to all that he had done to Eglon, but [and] destroyed it utterly [devoted it], and all the souls that were therein.

38 And Joshua returned, and all Israel with him, to Debir ; and fought against it : 39 And he took it and the king thereof, and all the cities thereof, and they smote them with the edge of the sword, and utterly destroyed [devoted] all the souls that were therein : he left none remaining : as he had done to Hebron so he did to Debir, and to the king thereof, [and] as he had done also [omit : also] to Libnah, and to her king.

40 So [And] Joshua smote all the country of the hills, and of the south, and of the vale, and of the springs,<sup>1</sup> and all their kings : he left none remaining, but [and] utterly destroyed [devoted] all that breathed, as the Lord [Jehovah] God of Israel 41 commanded. And Joshua smote them from Kadesh-barnea even unto Gaza, and all 42 the country of Goshen, even unto Gibeon. And all these kings and their land did 43 Joshua take at one time ; because the Lord [Jehovah] God of Israel fought for Israel. And Joshua returned, and all Israel with him, unto the camp to Gilgal.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

<sup>1</sup> [Ver. 40. — The geographical definiteness of this statement might be indicated thus : And Joshua smote all the land : the mountain, and the south-country (the Negeb), and the low-land (the Sheph'ah), and the foot-hills, etc. See Exegetical note. — Th.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

After the brilliant victory at Gibeon, Joshua, without special difficulty, conquered the whole of southern Palestine west of the Jordan. Particularly named are the cities Makkedah (ver. 28), Libnah (ver. 29), Lachish (ver. 31), Eglon (ver. 34), Hebron (ver. 36), and Debir (vers. 38, 39). With ver. 40 the special enumeration of conquered cities ceases. We are then summarily informed that Joshua smote the whole land, the mountains, the south-land, the lowlands, and the foot-hills, from Kadesh-barnea to Gaza, and the whole land of Goshen unto Gibeon (vers. 40, 41). This success attended him because God fought for Israel (ver. 42). After completing the campaign Joshua returned to the camp at Gilgal on the Jordan (ver. 43). At this point, perhaps, we may most conveniently remark that when Hitzig (ubi sup. p.

103) holds all Joshua's professed activity, after Gibeon, to be mere romance and no history, we, for reasons developed in the Introd. § 3, must decidedly differ with him.

Ver. 28. Capture of Makkedah (vers. 10, 16, 21 ; ch. xv. 41). Instead of מַכְּדָה, according to many Codd. and various editions, as well as the analogy of ver. 37, אֵי should be read.

He smote them with the edge of the sword, as previously Ai (ch. viii. 24), as afterwards the other cities. This phrase occurs in the present section four times (vers. 28, 30, 32, 35).

He left none remaining, likewise used four times (vers. 28, 30, 33, 40). A complete destruction was effected, for Joshua devoted all that had breath (ver. 40).

Vers. 29-32. Joshua turned from Makkedah,

(which is possibly to be sought for in the region of the present Terkumia (Triconias)), westward toward Libnah, and then from there southwardly toward Lachish, both which places are found, though with the mark of interrogation, on Kiepert's map, but not on that of Van de Velde. [On Menke's Map (III.) Lachish is placed slightly N. of W. from Libna. — Tr.]

Ver. 33. According to the previous agreement (ch. ix. 2) the king of Gezer, later Γαζα (2 Macc. x. 32, Joseph. Ant. viii. 6, 1,) and Γαζα (Joseph. Ant. v. 1, 22; xii. 7, 4) and Γαζα (Strabo, 16, p. 759), now goes up to help Lachish. The city has not yet been discovered. Kiepert suspects that it lay northwest of Beth-horon, and so likewise Knobel on ch. xvi. 3; Van de Velde has no statement. This king too is destroyed.

Ver. 34. Joshua now marches westward [eastward?] from Lachish to Eglon (Αγλα), now Adjlan, on the road from Jerusalem to Gaza; invests, takes, and destroys Eglon with all its inhabitants, like Lachish, Libnah, and Makkedah.

Vers. 36–39. Eglon [Lachish?] was the westernmost point of which the bold leader of Israel obtained possession. In a tolerably direct line he marched next upon Hebron, the seat of the patriarchs, familiar in the history of Abraham, and which still lies in a charming region. This city also he captures like the rest. The fate of Hebron is the same as that of the other Canaanite cities.

Ver. 38. וישוב Joshua now turned, as Ex. v. 22; Num. xviii. 9. He turns towards Debir (ch. xv. 15, 49). This Debir, earlier called Kirjath-sepher (ch. xv. 15; Judg. i. 11) or Kirjath-sanno (ch. xv. 49), is either, as Rosen supposes (Zeitschrift der D. M. G. xi. p. 50 ff.), followed by von Raumer (p. 184), the same as Idwirban, or Dewirban, three-fourths of an hour west of Hebron, or, according to the view of Knobel (p. 435), Thaharjeh, or Dhoherjeh, as Kiepert and Van de Velde write it, an important place, inhabited down even to the present time, the first on the mountain of Judah as one goes toward Hebron from the south, and distant from the latter about five hours, — or, according to Van de Velde (Mem. p. 307), with whom Keil agrees = Dilbeh, on the top of a hill north of the Wady Dilbeh, about two hours south-west of Hebron. It is in favor of one of the two last conjectures that all the cities mentioned ch. xv. 48, 49, among which Debir also stands, lie entirely in the south, while Idwirban or Dewirban is west of Hebron and quite too far north for that group of cities to which it belongs. If we follow

Rosen's opinion as Bunsen has done, וישוב must be translated "returned," as it is by Bunsen. On the position of Thaharjeh, particularly, cf. Rob. i. 311, 12 (edh Dhoherjeh), Ritter, Erdkunde, xvi. [Gage's Trans. iii. 193, 288, 289, 202, and ch. xv. 15.] To this we shall recur in connection with the conquests which are referred to Caleb, ch. xiv. 6 ff.; xv. 14 ff. According to Judg. i. 10 ff. the city of Hebron and even Debir was captured not until a later period.

Vers. 40–43. No further statement of special conquests is made; there follows rather a comprehensive survey of Joshua's successes at that time. Joshua smote the whole land. This is then more definitely specialized: (1) הרי, the mountain, i. e. the mountain of Judah, which extends southward from Jerusalem. It consists of calcareous limestone, and forms the watershed between the Mediterranean and Dead Seas, rising to the height of three thousand feet; in general an uneven and rocky district, especially in the southern portion, yet not without fruitful and inviting spots. (2.) הַרְבֵּי, the land of the south, prop., from נָבֵב, which in the Syr., Chald., and Sam. signifies to be dry, the dry, parched land, where the mountain brooks fail in the summer, so that in Ps. cxxvi. 4, God is invoked to let them return again (vide Hitzig on this passage). It is the steppe which forms the southern portion of Judaea, a land "intermediate between wilderness and cultivated land," precisely as the steppes of southern Russia, or the heath-land of North Germany. Because this steppe, this parched and sun-burnt land, lay in the south of Palestine (cf. ch. xv. 2–4, 21), נָבֵב comes to mean generally, south, and נָבֵבָה southward, Num. xxxv. 5; Ex. xl. 24; Josh. xvii. 9, 10. (3.)

The low-lands הַשְּׁפֵלָה (xi. 16; xv. 33) from שָׁפַל to be low, the strip of land in southern Palestine accurately indicated on Kiepert's map as stretching along the sea from Joppa to Gaza (Jer. xxxii. 44; xxxiii. 13). Much more populous, fertile, and beautiful than the Negeb. (4.) The declivities הַרְבֵּי, out of which the LXX. and Vulg. make a proper name: 'Ασδοθ, Asedoth. Luther translates, "on the brooks," [Eng. vers. "the springs"], in accordance with Num. xxi. 15, where he renders הַרְבֵּי הַנָּחַל "source of the brooks." The explanation is this: הַרְבֵּי like הַנָּחַל is to be derived from נָחַל, according to the Syriac, to pour, to rush down, = (1.) outpouring; (2.) place upon which something pours out, e. g. הַרְבֵּי הַפְּסָגָה (Deut. iii. 17; iv. 49), the place whither the brooks of Mount Pisgah issue, the declivities of Pisgah.<sup>1</sup> In our passage the declivities or "foot-hills" are those of the mountain of Judah, which slopes off gradually to the low-land: — the land of Goshen (ver. 41). This is to be carefully distinguished from Goshen in the land of Egypt (Gen. xlv. 10; xlv. 28 and often). Again ch. xi. 16; xv. 51, a city of the same name is mentioned, perhaps the chief city of this region. Knobel derives the name from the Arabic, making it = pectus, lorica. Calmet maintains that the land of Goshen here mentioned is the same as the Egyptian. This needs no refutation.

Ver. 41. From Kadesh-barnes unto Gaza, i. e. from the wilderness in which Kadesh-barnes lay (Num. xiii. 3, 26, xx. 1, xxvii. 14, and often) to Gaza in the Shephelah, which is only about one hour from the Mediterranean Sea, — and the whole land of Goshen unto Gibeon, i. e. all the country between Gaza and Gibeon which lay on a line directly northeast from Gaza. Thus Joshua had become master of all southern Palestine between the Jordan valley and the Mediterranean Sea in one direction, and between the heights of Gibeon and the wilderness in the other. Jericho, Ai, Makkedah, Libnah, Lachish, Eglon, Hebron, Debir, had one after the other fallen and been destroyed, and whole districts, like Goshen, had submitted themselves. With the ruins of broken cities, and the bodies of their inhabitants, the land was covered on the mountains, as well as on the slopes, in the lowland, in the desert, on the border of the wilderness as well as on the banks of the Jordan. A divine judgment had fallen on the Canaanites. Jehovah, God of Israel, had Himself fought for his chosen people (vers. 42, 14). And Joshua marches back, to find rest after such mighty exploits, in the camp at Gilgal (ver. 43).

<sup>1</sup> [We have proposed in the amended translation of this verse to render הַרְבֵּי, by "foot-hills" which, although not suggested by the etymology of the Hebrew word, seems to convey nearly the intended signification. — Tr.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

Of the extermination of the Canaanites, as well as of the idea of the devotement (דְּבָרָה), we have already treated, and do not, therefore, here enter again on the subject. Cf. the Exegetical and Critical on ch. ii. 11, and vi. 17; also the Doctrinal and Ethical on ch. vi. 15-27 [Intro. § 5, p. 21].

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

The section before us being no more than several of the following (chaps. xii., xiii., xv., etc.), suited for texts of sermons, while for Bible-classes the exegetical notes will furnish the necessary explanations, we remark here once for all, that on this description of passages in our Book, the Homiletical and Practical comments will be omitted.

5. The Victory over the Northern Canaanites. Capture of their Land. General Retrospect of the Conquest of the Country West of the Jordan.

CHAPTER XI.

a. The Second League of Canaanite Kings.

CHAPTER XI. 1-6.

1 And it came to pass, when Jabin king of Hazor had [omit: had] heard those things, that he sent to Jobab king of Madon, and to the king of Shimron, and to the king of Achshaph, And to the kings that were on [in] the north of [on] the mountains, and of the plains [and in the Jordan valley] south of Cinneroth, and in the valley [the low-land], and in the borders [heights] of Dor on the west, And to the Canaanite on the east and on the west, and to the Amorite, and the Hittite, and the Perizzite, and the Jebusite in the mountains, and to the Hivite under Hermon in the land of Mizpeh. And they went out, they and all their hosts [camps] with them, much people, even [omit: even] as the sand that is upon the sea-shore in multitude, with [and] horses and chariots very many. And when all these kings were met together, they came and pitched [encamped] together at the waters of Merom, to fight against Israel. And the Lord [Jehovah] said unto Joshua, Be not afraid because of them: for to-morrow about this time will I deliver them all up [give them all] slain before Israel: thou shalt hough their horses, and burn their chariots with fire.

b. The great Victory at the Waters of Merom.

CHAPTER XI. 7-9.

7 So [And] Joshua came, and all the people of war with him, against them by the waters of Merom suddenly, and they fell upon them. And the Lord [Jehovah] delivered them into the hand of Israel, who smote them, and chased them unto great Zidon, and unto Misrephoth-maim, and unto the valley of Mizpeh eastward; 9 and they smote them, until they left them none remaining. And Joshua did unto them as the Lord [Jehovah] bade [had said unto] him: he houghed their horses, and burnt their chariots with fire.

c. The Capture of the remaining Portions of Northern Palestine.

CHAPTER XI. 10-25.

10 And Joshua at that time turned back, and took Hazor, and smote the king thereof with the sword: for Hazor beforetime was the head of all those kingdoms. 11 And they smote all the souls that were therein with the edge of the sword, utterly destroying [devoting] them: there was not any left to breathe: and he burnt

- 12 Hazor with fire. And all the cities of those kings, and all the kings of them, did Joshua take, and smote them with the edge of the sword, and [omit: and] he utterly destroyed [devoted] them, as Moses the servant of the Lord commanded.
- 13 But as for<sup>1</sup> the cities that stood still in their strength [on their hill], Israel burned
- 14 none of them, save Hazor only; that did Joshua burn. And all the spoil of these cities, and the cattle, the children of Israel took for a prey unto themselves: but every man they smote with the edge of the sword, until they had destroyed them,
- 15 neither left they any to breathe. As the Lord [Jehovah] commanded Moses his servant, so did Moses command Joshua, and so did Joshua: he left nothing undone of all that the Lord [Jehovah] commanded Moses.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[<sup>1</sup> Ver. 13. Literally: "Only all the cities which stood on their hill (הַר) Israel did not burn them." In English phrase: "Only [or, yet] Israel burned none of the cities which stood on their hill; except that Hazor alone Joshua burned." וְהָעָרִים אֲשֶׁר עָמְדוּ עַל הַר אִשְׂרָאֵל לֹא שָׂרַף אֶת אֶחָדָם seems quite as truly to stand for "except that" here as in the one instance mentioned by Gesenius s. v., in 1 K. iii. 18. — Ta.]

d. General Retrospect of the Conquest of West Palestine.

CHAPTER XI. 16-23.

- 16 So [And] Joshua took all that land, the hills [mountain], and all the south country, and all the land of Goshen, and the valley [the low-land], and the plain [the Arabah or Jordan-valley], and the mountain of Israel, and the valley [low-land] of the same; Even from the mount Halak [the bald mountain], that goeth up to Seir, even unto Baal-gad, in the valley of Lebanon, under mount Hermon: and
- 18 all their kings he took, and smote them, and slew them. Joshua made war a
- 19 long time [Fay, exactly: many days] with all those kings. There was not a city which made peace with [Fay, De Wette: peacefully submitted to] the children [sons] of Israel, save the Hivites the inhabitants of Gibeon: all other [omit:
- 20 other] they took in battle. For it was of the Lord [Jehovah] to harden [prop. strengthen, LXX.: κατασχῶσαι] their hearts, that they should come against Israel in battle [LXX.: συναντᾶν εἰς πόλεμον], that he might destroy them utterly [devote them], and that they might have no favour, but that he might destroy them, as the Lord [Jehovah] commanded Moses.
- 21 And at that time came Joshua and cut off the Anakims from the mountains, from Hebron, from Debir, from Anab, and from all the mountains of Judah, and from all the mountains of Israel: Joshua destroyed them utterly [devoted
- 22 them] with their cities. There was none of the Anakims left in the land of the children [sons] of Israel: only in Gaza, in Gath, and in Ashdod, there remained.
- 23 So [And] Joshua took the whole land, according to all that the Lord [Jehovah] said unto Moses, and Joshua gave it for an inheritance [possession] unto Israel, according to their divisions by their tribes. And the land rested from war.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

With this chapter we enter upon a new theatre of the conquests of Joshua, the northern part of West Palestine. Just as before Adoni-Zedek, the king of Jerusalem (ch. x. 1 ff.), had summoned the five kings of the south to resist Joshua, so now Jabin, the king of Hazor, who occupied a prominent position, since his city is designated as the chief city of all the northern kingdoms (ch. xi. 10), collects the military forces of this portion of the country against the conqueror at Gibeon. But the Lord encourages his servant, and now again, as before, exhorts him not to fear them, although they had encamped by the water of Merom, like the sand of the sea for multitude (vers. 1-6). Joshua falls upon them suddenly, before they had fully got together, smites them utterly, pursues them to the seacoast, in the region of Sidon, lames their horses, and burns their chariots with fire. The account which we have in vers. 7-9 is brief but all the more vividly impressive. Next follows a history of the capture of the remaining parts of western Palestine, in the style of the chronicler, as in ch. x. 28-43. To all this is appended, finally, a general review of the conquest of all Palestine, with a special notice of the extirpation of the Anakim.

a. The Second League of Canaanite Kings, vers. 1-6. — Jabin king of Hazor. Hazor (ch. xii. 19; xix. 36) was an important royal seat of the Canaanites, which Joshua destroyed, according to the statement in this chapter (ver. 13), but which was afterwards rebuilt, and became again a kingly capital (Judg. iv. 2, 17; 1 Sam. xii. 9). Here dwelt, in the time of the Judges, another Jabin whose general was Sisera. Solomon fortified the place (1 K. ix. 15), the population of which was carried away by the Assyrians under Tiglath-pileser (2 K. xv. 29). According to Josephus (Antiq. v. 5, 1), ὑπέρκειται τῆς Σαμαρυτίδος λίμνης, Hazor lay on the range of hills which stretches itself on the west of the sea of Merom, now the Jebel Safed. Porter (i. 304) found here a place Hafur; Robinson, on the same ridge an hour south of Kedesh, with which Hazor is mentioned both in our Book ch. xix. 36, and in 2 K. xv. 29, found a hill Tel-Khureibeh, which he would identify with Hazor. Knobel seeks for it on a hill north of Ramah, south-west of Safed, where a collection of ruins, Huzzur or Hazireh, occurs. This suits his view of the "water of Merom;" see below. But as we cannot share in this, for reasons to be given, we accept the statement of Josephus, which seems to us sufficiently supported by the researches of Porter and Robinson. Such a point was well adapted to the residence of a prominent monarch.

Madon, ch. xii. 19. A city not yet discovered, perhaps to be sought in southern Galilee, more probably, however, like the other cities west of the sea of Merom (Knob.).

Shimron is called, ch. xii. 20, Shimron-Meron, therefore Shimron in the vicinity of Meron = Maron, southwest of Kedesh.

Achahaph (ch. xii. 20) a border city of Asher (ch. xix. 25). According to Robinson (Later Bibl. Res. p. 55), perhaps the present Kesâf, about midway between Tyre and Banias; almost certainly not Akko, as Knobel on ch. xix. 25 conjectures.

Ver. 2. On the mountain. The mountain of Naphthali (ch. xix. 32) is meant.

In the plain, south of Cinneroth, i. e., the Ghor of the Jordan, south of the sea of Genesareth.

In the lowland; here probably the strip bordering the sea between Akko and Sidon, to which the following, Naphoth-Dor on the sea, directs us (ch. xii. 23). This Dor (ch. xvii. 11, Joseph. Ant. v. 1, 22) belonged later to Manasseh (ch. xvii. 11), by which tribe its Canaanite inhabitants were not driven out (Judg. i. 27). From 1 Chron. viii. 29, we learn that children of Joseph dwelt in it. The population was accordingly a mixed one. Under Solomon it was the chief place of a revenue district (1 K. iv. 11); now called Tortura, also Tanura, with forty or fifty dwellings, five hundred Mohammedan inhabitants, and ruins of a Frank castle (von Raumer). נְּפֹת דּוֹר or נְּפֹת דּוֹר (ch. xii. 23; 1 K. iv. 11) = heights of Dor. The place was so called because it lay on an elevation, where Van de Velde found the ruins (Mem. p. 307), nine miles north of Cæsarea towards Tyre.

Ver. 3. Jabin sent, accordingly, to the Canaanites in the east and west, and to the other tribes, e. g. to the Hivites dwelling in the land of Mizpeh. This region lay, according to the present passage, under Hermon, and was, from ver. 8, a plain, perhaps the level strip south of Hasbeiya, and to the west of Tel el-Kadi. There, on a hill, from which one has a glorious view of the great basin of Huleh, lies the place Mutelleh or Metelleh (Robinson, iii. 347, and Later Bibl. Res. 372 f., Van de Velde, Narrative, ii. p. 428). The name signifies "outlook," and corresponds to the Heb. מִצְפֶּה (Knobel).

The name Mizpeh occurs in two other places, in Judah (von Raumer, p. 213), and probably twice also in Gilead (von Raumer, p. 265), as a designation of localities; very naturally, since the country abounded in positions affording beautiful and extensive prospects. Compare the similar names to be met with in our mountain regions: Lookout, Fairview, etc.

Ver. 4. The Canaanite princes and their tribes obey and march out, much people even as the sand that is on the sea-shore in multitude, with horses and chariots very many. The comparison with the sand by the sea is very often met with in the Book of Genesis, xxxii. 13, 31; xli. 49, as an emblem of multitude; as an emblem of weight again, Job vi. 3: Prov. xxvii. 3. The horses were particularly formidable to the Israelites, who had none. The chariots likewise, of which it is said, ch. xvii. 18, that they were iron chariots, i. e. had wheels with iron tires. Comp. Bertheau [and Cassel] on Judg. i. 19: "The scythe-chariots were first introduced by Cyrus," (Xen. Cyrop. iv. 1, 27, 30), Keil.

Ver. 5. And when all these kings were met together they came and pitched together at the waters of Merom, to fight against Israel. This water of Merom, מַי מְרֹם = highest, upper, water is, according to the traditional explanation, the ἡμῶν Σεμυχωνίτις of Josephus (Ant. v. 5, 1; Bell. Jud. iii. 9, 7; iv. 1, 1); now called by the Arabs Bahr el-Huleh, or el-Khait. "The sea is two and a half hours long, one hour wide [about three miles in each direction, Grove, Dict. of Bibl. p. 1898], muddy, abounding in fish, its surface forty feet [Van de Velde: 140] above the level of the sea; in summer mostly dried up, full of reeds, in which wild boars and serpents dwell, only its eastern shore is inhabited" (von Raumer). It is mentioned nowhere else in the Bible. The allied kings, judging from ver. 7, had, probably, pitched their camp in a strong position, covered by Hazor and other cities as, e. g. Kedesh, on the Jebel Safed. From thence they might launch forth with their horses and chariots against Joshua, who would be likely to come up through the Jordan valley. But if this were their plan it was frustrated by the truly strategic promptness of the Hebrew commander. Knobel, followed lately by Keil (Bibl. Com. ii. 1, in h. l.) seeks this water of Merom in a little brook flowing in the valley below Safed, and which has its source in the mountain lying two hours northwest of Safed. There lies a place called Meirum or Merun (Rob. iii. 333 f.). A glance at the map shows that this valley was ill suited to be the camp of the multitudinous Canaanites. And when Knobel, to support his peculiar opinion, brings up the circumstance, that "there is no proof that the Bahr el-Huleh was ever called by the ancients the "water of Merom," we reply, that the Bahr el-Huleh is mentioned at all only in this single passage, so that the only question is, How did the ancients understand this passage? What did they think of the מַי מְרֹם? Answer: According to Josephus they thought it to be the Sea Semechonitis, or Samochonitis, the present Bahr el-Huleh, near which the battle was fought. To this traditional view, Hitzig also holds. He briefly remarks (Hist. of People of Isr. i. p. 103): "He (Joshua) conquered, it is said, at the water of Merom (i. e. El Huleh) King Jabin."

Ver. 6. Encouraging appeal of God to Joshua, as ch. x. 8 and often. We have to conceive of Joshua as already on the march, when this word was addressed to him, since the distance from Gilgal to the sea of Merom was too great for him to reach the latter between one day and the next ("tomorrow about this time").

Thou shalt hough their horses and burn their chariots with fire. So David does with the horses of Hadad-ezer, king of Zoba (2 Sam. viii. 4; 1 Chron. xviii. 4. מַחֲרֵם = νευρονόμιον). The tendons of the hind legs were severed (they were hamstringing), and thus they were rendered completely useless. —

The burning of the chariots is mentioned also, Ps. xli. 10; they were therefore certainly of wood.

b. The great Victory at the Sea of Merom, vers. 7-9. — Ver. 7. Suddenly, פָּתַעַם פָּתַחַם from פָּתַחַע with the adverbial ending ם, as in שָׁלַחַם, and metathesis of נ and פ. They said also פָּתַחַם, 2 Chr. xxix. 36, or פָּתַחַע פָּתַחַם, Num. vi. 9, or פָּתַחַע פָּתַחַם, Is. xxix. 5, or פָּתַחַע פָּתַחַם, Is. xxx. 13. Joshua proves himself by his rapidity a true general, as ch. x. 9.

Ver. 8. Pursued them unto great Zidon and unto Misrephoth-maim, and unto the valley of Mizpeh eastward. Joshua followed the enemy partly in a northwestern direction (toward Sidon), and westward (Misrephoth-m.), partly towards the northeast (valley of Mizpeh). Sidon is here as ch. xix. 28, the great (רַבָּה), i. e. the populous (רַבָּה not רַבָּה), and thus is designated as the capital of the land of the Sidonians (Phœnicians). It was older than Tyre, and allotted to the tribe of Asher (ch. xix. 28), but not conquered by it (Judg. i. 31). Sidon is repeatedly mentioned by Homer (Il. vi. 289; xxiii. 743; Od. xv. 425). The city, once so powerful, has now not more than 5,000 inhabitants (Rob. iii. 417 ff.). In his prophecy against Tyrus, Isaiah remembers Sidon also (Is. xxiii. 2, 4, 12). Jeremiah comprehends Sidon with Tyre (Jer. xlvii. 4, compared with ch. xxvii. 3), which is very often done in the N. T. (Matt. xi. 21, 22; Mark vii. 24-31; Matt. xv. 21; Luke x. 13; Mark iii. 8). A charming description of Sidon is given by Furrer, Wanderungen d. Palest. p. 351. —

Misrephoth-maim. Luther: "warm water"; Gesen.: "perhaps lime-kilns or smelting-furnaces (from מִשְׁרָף) situated near water;" Knobel, from the Arab.: "water-heights," among which should be understood the promontories Ras en-Nakura and Ras el-Aibab (Scala Tyriorum). Not both promontories, however, but only one, and not the sea but a spring, is meant, we believe, namely, the southern Ras en-Nakura, which, from a spring lying at the southern foot of the mountain, and a place called Muschairifeh (plainly, as even Knobel admits, the same name as Misrephoth), is called also Ras el-Muschairifeh (Ritter, xvi. 807). Here once stood perhaps furnaces (glass furnaces?) in the vicinity of the spring, and from these it received its name. This view suits excellently with ch. xiii. 6, where Misrephoth-maim is mentioned as a known boundary point. Joshua, therefore, cast the Canaanites over the mountain, here precipitously steep, down into the plain by the sea, by which, certainly, thousands were destroyed. But while two divisions of the army thus followed the enemy toward the southwest [N. W. ?] and west, another moves at the same time toward the northeast, and chases them into the valley of Mizpeh, called above in ver. 3, Mizpah.

Ver. 9. Finally, Joshua does as Jehovah had bidden, houghs the horses, and burns the chariots.

c. The Capture of what remained of Northern Palestine (vers. 10-15). Vers. 10, 11. First, Hazor, the chief city of these petty northern kingdoms, is taken, and, because of its prominence, more hardly dealt with than the rest. For Joshua burned Hazor with fire (vers. 11, 13). — On the inf.

חָרַם, comp. Dent. iii. 6, and חָרַם ch. iii. 17.

Vers. 12, 13. Fate of the other cities. The sense of the two verses is that the cities in the plain were totally burned and devoted, while those, on the contrary, which stood on their hill, i. e. the fortified mountain cities, with the sole exception of Hazor, were not burned. The Israelites were content to sack them (ver. 12).

Ver. 14. The spoils were not devoted but divided, as at Ai, ch. viii. 2, 27. The men, all that had breath (comp. ver. 11), were destroyed.

Ver. 15. This command of God to Moses is found before in Ex. xxxiv. 11-16; and again Num. xxxiii. 51-56, strengthened by threatenings; finally, also, Deut. xx. 16, where it is said, "Thou shalt save alive nothing that breathes," as Joshua here actually does. For the transfer of this command to Joshua, compare in general the often-cited passage, Num. xxvii. 18-23, and particularly Deut. iii. 21. The author states emphatically, to show the conscientiousness of Joshua: he left nothing undone of all that Jehovah had commanded Moses, comp. vers. 12, as well as ch. i. 7, 8.

d. General Retrospect of the Conquest of Western Palestine (ver. 16-23). — "Joshua captured the whole land of Canaan, namely, in the south, the portions mentioned ch. x. 40 ff., together with the Arabah (ver. 2), the mountain of Israel, i. e. Ephraim (ch. xvii. 15), and its lowland on the west (ch. xvi. 1), and so the land from the Bald Mountain in the south to Baal-gad in the north; the kings he took captive, smote and slew" (Knobel).

Ver. 17. From the Mount Halak (smooth, or bald mountain), that goes up to Seir (ch. xii. 7). This smooth mountain can hardly be Mount Madurah, as Knobel thinks (he writes Madarn), and hence translates חָרַם הָלָק by "smooth mountain" (mentioned by Robinson, ii. 589); because this mountain does not go up to Mount Seir, but rather lies on the west side of the Wady el-Fikreh. It is more probably identical with the "ascent of Akrabim," mentioned ch. xv. 3, and Num. xxiv. 4, which Robinson believes he has discovered in the remarkable line of cliffs that run across the entire Ghor, a few miles south of the Dead Sea (ii. 489, 490). This divides the great valley into two parts, both physically and in respect to its names down even to the present day, the northern portion from hence to the sea of Tiberias being called el-Ghor (formerly, the Arabah), the southern, even to Akabah, being called el-Araba (Rob. l. c.). This ridge, consisting of whitish cliffs (Rob. l. c.) goes up in fact to Seir, i. e. towards the mountains of Edom which constitute the eastern boundary of the Arabah, now Jebel (Gebalene), and lies exactly opposite to Baal-gad which is named as the northern limit. So Keil in l. accepts it. On the map accompanying the last edition of von Raumer's Palästina, from Stieler's Hand Atlas (No. 42 b), the points in question are very clearly marked.

Even unto Baal-gad in the valley of Lebanon under Mount Hermon. Not Baalbec (Knobel), which lies much too far north, but the later Casarea-Philippi, earlier Panias, now Banias, comp. ch. xii. 7, xiii. 5; Judg. iii. 3; von Raumer, Paläst. p. 245, Gesen. Lexicon. The city was called Baal-gad, because Baal, according to Is. lxxv. 11, was worshipped as Baal-Gad (גַּד, fortune) = the God of fortune. In Judg. iii. 3 it is called Baal-hermon. According to Jerome (Onom. s. v. Aeron), a temple of Baal must have stood on Mount Hermon.

Ver. 18. Joshua made war with those kings a long time. From ch. xiv. 7, 10, at least five years. For Caleb was forty years old when Moses sent him out of Kadesh-barnea as a spy; eighty-five years old was he when, immediately after the conquest of the land, he received his possession from Joshua. Since the former date, accordingly, forty-five years have past, as Caleb also himself says, forty of which belong to the pilgrimage in the Arabah, leaving five for the subjugation of the land; not too long certainly, and yet long enough to be called a long time. Heb.: "many days." So also Joseph. Ant. v. 1, 19. Comp. Introd. § 4.

Ver. 19. Gibeon's peaceful surrender is mentioned again, ch. ix. 7, 15; x. 1, 6. The others had all to be taken in battle.

Ver. 20. For it was of Jehovah to harden their hearts, that they should come against Israel in battle, that he might devote them, and that they might have no favor, but that he might destroy them, as Jehovah had commanded Moses. God dealt with them as He had done with Pharaoh, Ex. iv. 21; vii. 3; xiv. 4; Rom. ix. 17; Calvin: In hunc finem illos Deus obdurat, ut a se misericordiam avertant; unde et durities ista vocatur eius opus, quia effectum consilii ejus stabilit." See Doctrinal and Ethical below.

Verses 21-23 contain in part a supplementary notice of the extirpation of the Anakim, in the cities of Hebron and Debir, the destruction of which has already (ch. x. 36 ff.) been reported, and in part a general conclusion substantially as given before in ver. 16. We may observe, however, that here, (1) the division of the land is expressly mentioned, and (2) it is added that the land had rest from war.

Ver. 21. Cut off the Anakim. See the Introd. p. 30. Hebron and Debir were mentioned in ch. x. 36 ff. but not Anab which, and also Eshtemo, is joined with Debir in ch. xv. 50. Robinson found both as neighboring places south of Hebron (ii. 194, 195). Anab wears its ancient name even to the present day; Eshtemo is now called Semua.

Ver. 22. Gaza, ch. x. 41; xiii. 3; xv. 47, the well-known city of the Philistines, first mentioned Gen. x. 19, familiar from the history of Samson, Judg. xvi., the utterances of the prophets (Jer. xxv. 20; xlvii. 5; Amos i. 6, 7; Zeph. ii. 4; Zech. ix. 5), the eunuch from Ethiopia (Acts viii. 26). It stands in a fertile region; and is even now an important town with fifteen thousand inhabitants. These derive great profit from the caravans.

Gath, now lost without a trace discoverable, another city of the Philistines, the home of Goliath and other giants (1 Sam. xvii. 4; 1 Chr. xxi. 5-8; 2 Sam. xxi. 19-22) who were not exterminated here; familiar from the history of David (1 Sam. xxi. 10; xxvii. 2-4; Ps. lvi.; 2 Sam. i. 20, and often). Already in the time of the prophet Amos, the greatness of Gath had shrunk (Amos vi. 2). Robinson (ii. 420 ff.) sought in vain for its site.

Ashdod, now Esdud, between two and three hours from Ashkelon, with 100 or 150 miserable hovels, mentioned in our book ch. xiii. 3; xv. 46, 47; the city of Dagon, 1 Sam. v. 1-7, against which, as against Gaza, the prophets often direct their denunciations (Jer. xxv. 20; Amos i. 8; ii. 9; Zeph. ii. 4; Zech. ix. 6). To this place was Philip the Evangelist snatched away, Acts viii. 40. The city is said to have been very strong (Herod. ii. 157).

Ver. 23. According to their divisions, לְכָל־עַמָּם, elsewhere used principally of the divisions of the priests and Levites into twenty-four classes (ἐφημερίαι, κλήροι) 1 Chr. xxvii. 1 ff.; 2 Chr. viii. 14; xxxi. 2; xxxv. 4; here, as in ch.

xii. 7; xviii. 10, of the division of the people into tribes.

And the land had rest from war, i. e. "there were no more warlike disturbances in it (ch. xiv. 15; Judg. iii. 11, 30; v. 31; viii. 28)," Knobel.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. Conscientiousness in carrying out the divine commands and in fulfilling God's will, is a prominent characteristic of the holy men in both the old and the new Testaments. Thus Moses is praised because he in all his house was faithful to him that made him (Heb. iii. 2, 5). Faithfulness, however, exists only where conscientiousness exists, for the faithless man is always void of conscience also. And so Joshua was faithful, as is intimated in ver. 15 of the chapter before us, since he left nothing undone of all which God had commanded Moses. The highest conscientiousness, which is at the same time perfect fidelity, is found in Jesus Christ, whose meat and drink it is to do the will of Him that sent him, and to finish his work (John iv. 34); who seeks to do not his own will but the Father's will (John v. 30); who therefore loses nothing of all which the father has given him (John vi. 38, 39); and who could, on the cross, exclaim with satisfaction, "It is finished" (John xix. 30).

2. When the hostility of the Canaanites is ascribed to the hardening of their hearts by God (ver. 20), here, as everywhere in Scripture, when such hardening is spoken of, it is carefully to be borne in mind, that this is always inflicted as a judgment on those who have previously, somehow, acted contrary to his will. This is true of Pharaoh (Ex. iv. 21; vii. 13; x. 20; xi. 10; xiv. 4; Rom. ix. 17), of the people of Israel (Is. vi. 10; Matt. xiii. 12-14), and here of the Canaanites. They have all transgressed grievously in some way against God: Pharaoh through the oppression of Israel; Israel through impiety; the Canaanites through idolatry; and are therefore now hardened by God, i. e. their understanding is infatuated, their will audacious, so that they blindly run into destruction. That this ruin on their part, again, serves to glorify God's power (Rom. ix. 17), is self-evident; only the matter should not be so understood as it is by Calvin, who, while not denying indeed the guilt of the Canaanites, still leaves in the background the judicial providence of God revealing itself in their hardness of heart, and speaks only of God's having made a way for his decree by hardening the ungodly (ubi reprobus obduravit). The absolute divine decree stands here also, with Calvin, high above all else. He does not indeed, here or ever, deny the guilt of men, but this guilt itself is not a free act of men, but is rather jointly included in the decree of God, as follows from the close of his explanation of vers. 19, 20: "Nunc si rem adeo dilucidam suis nebulis obscurare conentur, qui Deum e celo speculari fingunt, quid hominibus libeat, nec hominum corda arcano ejus instinctu frenari sustinent: quid aliud quam suam impudentiam prodent? Deo tantum concedunt ut permittat: hoc autem modo suspendunt ejus consilium ab hominum placito. Quid autem Spiritus? a Deo esse obdurationem ut precipitet quos vult perdere." The final words in particular are intelligible enough, and remind of the verses of an anonymous Greek Tragic Poet, quoted in a scholium on Sophocles' "Antigone" ver. 6, 20:—

"Ὅταν δ' ὁ δαίμων ἀνδρὶ πορσίγη κακὰ τὸν νοῦν ἐβλάψῃ πρῶτον, ὃ βουλεύεται; or of the Latin maxim, probably originating in what has just been quoted, Quos Deus perdere vult de- menat prius (comp. Büchmann, p. 117, Geflügelte Wörter).

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Although the Lord's enemies may be like sand by the sea, yet we need not be disheartened, for He gives us confidence, courage, and victory, as He did once to Joshua. As Joshua always followed up his victory, so must we follow up every success on the field of our inner life, to its full results, that we be not cheated of the fruits. — The extirpation of the Canaanites, (1) due to their idolatry and immorality; (2) executed through a divine command; (3) set as a warning example for all times. — They left nothing remaining which had breath! So when a whole people have sinned, the less guilty and the guilty fall together. — Joshua's conscientiousness. — Moses and Joshua, God's faithful servants. — Men of God act not according to their own pleasure, but to the command of God. — A glance at Canaan. — A long time fought Joshua with the kings of the Canaanites, ever must we fight with sin, the flesh, the world. — The obduracy of the Canaanites regarded as a divine judgment upon them. — All obduracy is God's judgment on men, who are sunk in sin and have forfeited their freedom. — Ah, if grace no more "prevented" men, how terrible! — The land ceased from war (sermon on the celebration of peace).

STARKE: When it goes against the children of God, the ungodly blow the horn, join forces, and use all their might, Ps. ii. 2; iii. 1. — Whom God deserts with his grace that man runs into his own misfortune and destruction, Rom. ii. 5; Ex. xiv. 27; Is. vi. 11.

CRAMER: The perverseness of the ungodly! when they hear of God's wonderful deeds, and should justly be led to repentance thereby, they take the course of crabs, and become only the more obdurate and wicked, until they bring upon themselves utter ruin, Ps. lxxviii. 31, 32. — If not to-day, it may be better to-morrow, only wait the little while (ver. 6). — When enemies study and contrive how they may destroy the people of God, then God studies and contrives how they may be restrained and even entirely rooted out. — God's word and promise cannot delay, and they remain unbound. — God's hand has a twofold operation, by one He strikes his foes, and by the other He gives his people victory, power, and strength; and this hand is not yet shortened, Is. lix. 1. — When men become hardened through the instigation of the devil, God draws back his hand and smites them with the most serious penalty of obduracy, appoints this as a punishment of sin and a warning to his elect, and yet becomes not a cause of sin, Ps. v. 5. — Against God no giant even has any strength; Ps. xxxiii. 16; Is. xlix. 25.

BIBL. TUB.: In war all depends not on the strength and multitude of the people, but on God, who gives the victory, Ps. xlii. 10.

OSIANDER: Those who continue ever in their ungodly life, and think not at all with earnestness of true heart-conversion, those become finally so blinded by God, and are so entirely given up to a perverse heart that, like madmen, they run to meet their own destruction, until they are plunged at length into everlasting hell-fire. — God gives sometimes even to his Church on earth temporal peace, but they must not abuse this to temporal security.

GERLACH: Obduracy of the heart happens here also as a punishment, after grace has been previously offered, Ex. iv. 21. This offer of grace lay in the Lord's great miracles in Egypt, which these people had heard of with astonishment before the coming of the Israelites.

[MATT. HENRY: Several nations joined in this confederacy . . . of different constitutions, and divided interests among themselves, and yet they here unite against Israel as against a common enemy. Thus are the children of this world more unanimous, and therein wiser than the children of light. The oneness of the Church's enemies should shame the Church's friends out of their discords and divisions, and engage them to be one. — Never let the sons of Anak be a terror to the Israel of God, for even their day will come, to fall. — NOTE: God sometimes reserves the sharpest trials of his people by affliction and temptation for the latter end of their days. Therefore let not him that girds on the harness boast as he that puts it off. Death, that tremendous son of Anak, is the last enemy that is to be encountered, but it is to be destroyed, 1 Cor. xv. 28. Thanks be to God who will give us the victory. — TR.]

SECTION THIRD.

CATALOGUE OF ALL THE KINGS CONQUERED UNDER THE COMMAND OF MOSES AND JOSHUA IN EAST AND WEST PALESTINE.

CHAPTER XII.

1. Catalogue of the Kings Conquered in East Palestine.

CHAPTER XII. 1-6.

- 1 Now<sup>1</sup> these are the kings of the land, which the children of Israel smote, and possessed their land on the other side [of the] Jordan toward the rising of the sun, from
- 2 the river<sup>2</sup> Arnon, unto Mount Hermon, and all the plain on the east: Sihon, king of the Amorites, who dwelt in Heshbon, and ruled from Aroer, which is upon the

- bank of the river Arnon and from the middle of the river, and from half Gilead, even unto the river Jabbok which is the border of the children of Ammon, and from the plain to the Sea of Cinneroth on the east, and unto the sea of the plain, even the Salt Sea on the east, the way to Beth-jeshimoth [LXX: ὁδὸν τὴν κατὰ Ἀσσιμῶθ; Vulg.: per viam quæ ducit Bethsimoth]; and from the south, under Ashdoth-pisgah.
- 4 And the coast [border] of Og, king of Bashan, which [who] was of the remnant of the giants, that dwelt at Ashtaroth and at Edrei, And reigned in Mount Hermon, and in Salcah, and in all Bashan, unto the border of the Geshurites, and the Maachathites, and half Gilead, [where] the border [was] of Sihon king of Heshbon.
- 6 Them did [omit: them did] Moses the servant of the Lord [Jehovah], and the children [sons] of Israel smite [smote them]: and Moses the servant of the Lord [Jehovah] gave it for a possession unto the Reubenites, and [to] the Gadites, and [to] the half tribe of Manasseh.

2. Catalogue of the Kings Conquered in West Palestine.

CHAPTER XII. 7-24.

- 7 And these are the kings of the country [land] which [whom] Joshua and the children of Israel smote on this [the other] side of [the] Jordan on the west, from Baal-Gad in the valley of Lebanon, even unto the Mount Halak [Bald-mountain] that goeth up to Seir; which Joshua gave [Fay, correctly: and Joshua gave it] unto the tribes of Israel for a possession according to their divisions: In the mountains [on the mountain], and in the valleys, and in the plains [the lowland], and in the springs [on the foot-hills], and in the wilderness, and in the south-country; the Hittites, the Amorites, and the Canaanites, the Perizzites, the Hivites, and the Jebusites:
- 9 The king of Jericho, one;
The king of Ai, which is beside Beth-el, one;
- 10 The king of Jerusalem, one;
The king of Hebron, one;
- 11 The king of Jarmuth, one;
The king of Lachish, one;
- 12 The king of Eglon, one;
The king of Gezer, one;
- 13 The king of Debir, one;
The king of Geder, one;
- 14 The king of Hormah, one;
The king of Arad, one;
- 15 The king of Libnah, one;
The king of Adullam, one;
- 16 The king of Makkedah, one;
The king of Beth-el, one;
- 17 The king of Tappuah, one;
The king of Hephher, one;
- 18 The king of Aphek, one;
The king of Lasharon, one;
- 19 The king of Madon, one;
The king of Hazor, one;
- 20 The king of Shimron-meron, one;
The king of Achshaph, one;
- 21 The king of Taanach, one;
The king of Megiddo, one;
- 22 The king of Kedesh, one;
The king of Jokneam of Carmel, one;
- 23 The king of Dor in the coasts of [Naphoth] Dor, one;
The king of the nations of Gilgal, one;
- 24 The king of Tirzah, one;
All the kings thirty and one.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

1 [1 Ver. 1. — Instead of interpolating the numerous corrections required in the common version in the first three verses here, we recast separately, in much the same way as De Wette and Fay: And these are the kings of the land, whom the sons of Israel smote, and possessed their land, on the other side of the Jordan, toward the rising of the sun, from the water-course of Arnon unto Mount Hermon, and all the Arabah on the east: Sihon king of the Amorites, who dwelt in Heshbon, ruling from Arzer which is on the bank of the water-course of Arnon and in the middle of the water-course, and [over] half of Gilead even to Jabbok the water-course [which is] the border of the sons of Ammon, and [over] the Arabah unto the sea of Cinneroth, on the east, and unto the sea of the Arabah, the Salt-Sea, on the east, the way to Beth-jeshimoth; and in the south under the foot-hills of Pisgah.

[2 Ver. 1. A word that should denote indifferently our conception of a rapid brook and of the bed in which it flows, with the whole inclusive valley, and of the latter equally when the water is absent, is wanting in English to represent adequately the Heb. נַחַל. Stanley's account of this word well presents the case (Sin. and Pal. App. p. 496): "Nachal, נַחַל, a 'torrent-bed,' or water-course; from חָלַל, to perforate [so Flüß, cf. Gesen.]. The word corresponds with the Arabic Wādī, the Greek χειμάρρος, the Indian Nullah, the Italian 'stumara' [in some of its applications approaching the Spanish-American cañon] and signifies the hollow, or valley, of a mountain torrent, which, while in rainy seasons it may fill the whole width of the depression, in summer is reduced to a mere brook, or thread of water, and is often entirely dry. [In the greater number, perhaps, of the Wadies, the running water is quite an exceptional phenomenon.] Such streams are graphically described in Job xi. 16, 17. Nachal, therefore, is sometimes used for the valley (Num. xxi. 12; Judg. xvi. 4 [and in the second instance in ver. 2 of our passage]), and sometimes for the torrent which flows through the valley. The double application of the word is well seen in 1 K. xvii. 2, where Elijah is commanded to hide himself 'in' not 'by' the 'Wady Cherith,' and to 'drink of the brook' — Nachal being used in both cases. No English word is exactly equivalent, but perhaps 'torrent-bed' most nearly expresses it." — This last opinion is probably correct, in reference to many readers, but for the purposes of a translation we have ventured to adopt the other term proposed by him, "water-course." — Tr.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

This twelfth chapter forms a separate section, the third of the first part of our book, and contains a list of all the kings conquered by Moses and Joshua in East and West Palestine: It falls into two subdivisions: (1) a catalogue of the kings conquered east of the Jordan (vers. 1-6); (2) a catalogue of the kings conquered in Palestine proper (vers. 7-24).

1. Catalogue of those Conquered East of the Jordan (vers. 1-6). From the water-course of Arnon unto Mount Hermon, and all the plain [Arabah or Jordan valley] on the East. The Arnon (אֲרָנוֹן for רָנוֹן the rushing), Num. ii. 13; Deut. iii. 8, 12, 16; iv. 48; Is. xvi. 2; Jer. xlviii. 20, now the Wady Modscheh, formed the southern boundary of the territory governed by Sihon the king of the Amorites, afterwards the southern boundary of Reuben, as of all Eastern Palestine, against Moab. It flows, in part, through a deep rocky bed, into the Dead Sea. Its source, at least that of the main branch of the Arnon, the Wady el-Safijeh, lies near Kutranah (Katrane) on the route of the pilgrims from Mecca to Damascus.

To Mount Hermon. According to the Arab. הַרְמֹן means a prominent mountain ridge, "perhaps prop. nose" (Gesen.). According to Deut. iii. 9, it was called by the Amorites שִׁנְיָר, by the Sidonians, שְׂרִיין (but comp. 1 Chron. v. 23), and according to Deut. iv. 48, it was also the same as שִׁינָן. Plur. הַרְמֹנִים. Ps. xlii. 7, because it consists of several mountains. In the Psalm referred to, we have a vivid description of the mountain landscape on Hermon; but "the land of splendor, of heaven-towering mountains, and of glorious streams, offers no compensation to the heart of the Psalmist, for the humbler hills of Zion where his God abides" (Hitzig, Ps. lxxviii. 17). At the present time the mountain is called Jebel es-Scheikh. Its height reaches over 9,000 feet. The summit is covered with eternal snow (von Raumer p. 33; Robinson, iii. 344, 357),<sup>1</sup> carefully to be distinguished from this Hermon proper, is the "little Hermon," so called, which is not mentioned in the Bible. The name originated with Jerome, who misunderstood the plural הַרְמֹנִים, in Ps. xlii. 7. He gave that name to the Jebel ed-Dahy (Robinson u. s. 171, 172).

All the plain (הַעֲרָבָה) on the East. By the Arabah (Deut. i. 1; ii. 8; 2 Sam. iv. 7; 2 K. xxv. 4,) where it has the article, as in these passages, is meant not, in general, a dry steppe, a wilderness, as in Is. xxxiii. 9; Jer. i. 12; ii. 43, but, as Robinson (ii. 599, 600) has shown, the whole of the great valley from the sea of Galilee to the Ælantic Gulf. It is now (see above on ch. xi. 17) called the Ghor, northward from the "bald mountain," and el-Arabah only from that mountain to its southern extremity. This great valley has again different parts which are designated as עֲרָבוֹת, e. g. in our book, ch. v. 10 the עֲרָבוֹת of Jericho; 2 K. xxv.

5, the עֲרָבוֹת of Moab. Here also we have to do with a portion of the Arabah, the portion namely "on the east," that is on the eastern bank of the Jordan. In general, this valley is a "solitary desert" (Rob. ii. 265), particularly horrid, south of the Dead Sea. The only exceptions are the small places in the northern part, "over which the Jordan and occasional springs spread an extraordinary fertility" (Rob. ii. 265, 266).

Ver. 2. Sihon, king of the Amorites, stands first on the list of Canaanite princes subjugated by Moses and Joshua (see above ch. ii. 10). He dwelt at Heshbon, ch. xiii. 26; xxi. 39; Num. xxi. 26 ff., which name properly signifies prudence (Eccl. xii. 25, 27; ix. 10); now Hesban or Hüsbän. The ruins of the old city lie on a hill having a magnificent prospect, towards the Dead Sea, and over toward Bethlehem;<sup>2</sup> toward the south and east with no limit but the horizon. Heshbon belonged originally to the Moabites (Num. xxi. 26), then to the Amorites, as is evident from our book, and other places, and was allotted to the trans-Jordanic tribes (see below on ch. xiii. 17; xxi. 39 comp. w. 1 Chr. vii. 81). In the days of Isaiah and Jeremiah, Heshbon belonged again to the Moabites (Is. xv. 4; xvi. 9; Jer. xlviii. 2, 45-49). At a later period, according to Josephus (Ant. xiii. 13, 4), the Jews once more possessed it. Heshbon appears to have had a very strong position, to which the expressions Jer. xlviii. 45-49 refer. The ruins have a compass, according to von Raumer's authority, of more than a mile.

1 [Tristram's account of Hermon, its scenery, its natural history, and the magnificent view which it offers of all Palestine, is particularly interesting, p. 607 ff. — Tr.]

2 [Tristram visited the spot. See his description, p. 548. — Tr.]

Ver. 2. The territory of Sihon is now described in full accordance with Num. xxi. 24, as extending from the Arnon to the Jabbok. Here again Aroer is particularly mentioned, which [lies] upon the bank of the brook Arnon, and in the middle of the brook, עֲרֹוֹר and עֲרֹוֹר, from עָר (to be bare, naked), lies on the north side of the Arnon, and like Heshbon is indicated by Jeremiah (xlviii. 19) as a Moabite city. It was allotted to Reuben, ch. xiii. 9, 16. The city lay, as our passage shows, partly on and partly in the Arnon, i. e. on an island, now Araayr. Carefully to be distinguished from another city Aroer, ch. xiii. 25, and from a third city Aroer (1 Sam. xxx. 26, 28), in the tribe of Judah (Rob. ii. 618), to which David sent presents after the recovery of the booty taken at Ziklag.

Half Gilead. מִן הַגִּלְעָד according to Gen. xxxi.

48 = מִן הַגִּלְעָד, hill of testimony, perhaps rather an appellative for hard, rough region, as Gesenius thinks, which however does not suit with Num. xxxii. 1; Jer. viii. 22; xlv. 11; 1. 19; Cant. iv. 1; vi. 4. Properly the word denotes a mountain on the south bank of the Jabbok (Gen. xxxi. 21-48; Cant. iv. 1), with a city of the same name, now Jebel Dschelaad, then the immediate vicinity of this mountain (Num. xxxii. 1; Deut. ii. 37), and finally, the whole mountain region between the Arnon and the Jabbok, now called Belka. It was bounded on the north by Bashan, on the south by Moab. The designation "land of Gilead" is used inexactly. Deut. xxxiv. 1, where it includes also Bashan, likewise in 2 K. x. 33; 1 K. iv. 19, and often. In such cases, by Gilead is meant the whole land east of the Jordan, so far as it was possessed by the Israelites, ch. xxii. 9, 13, 15; Judg. v. 17 (von Raumer, p. 229 ff.). See Intro. p. 25.

Even unto the brook Jabbok, now Wady Lerka, then בְּנֵי, from בָּנָה, to pour out, gush forth, = gushing-brook. The word is, according to Simonis, to whom Gesenius assents, the Chald. form for בְּנֵי. In Gen. xxxii. 2 there is a play upon the word בְּנֵי, to wrestle. The Jabbok is here to be viewed as a twofold boundary, (1) in its lower course, a boundary toward the north, (2) in its upper course (Nahr Ammon) as a boundary toward the east against the children of Ammon. A glance at the map will at once show the actual relations.

Ver. 3. Over the plain (the Arabah) to the sea of Cinneroth on the east, i. e. over the eastern part of the Jordan valley, as far as the sea of Cinneroth. Here עֲרֹוֹר, elsewhere also עֲרֹוֹר, or עֲרֹוֹר (perhaps equivalent to עֲרֹוֹר, cithera), so called after the city of this name (ch. xi. 2; xix. 33); in the N.T., the sea of Galilee (Matt. iv. 18; xv. 29; Mark i. 16; vii. 31), sea of Gennesareth (Lu. v. 1, derived from Kinnereth or Kinnaroth); in John, sea of Tiberias (vi. 1, xxi. 1), from the city of Tiberias; now Bahr Taberieh. The sea is "about thirteen geographical miles long and six broad." The climate is tropical, since the level is from six hundred and twenty-five to seven hundred [Robinson, seven hundred] feet below that of the Mediterranean (Ruesegger, iii. 213; Robinson, iii. 264, 313 ff). Its beauty is well known (Seetzen, p. 348), and has been described by Renan, in his "Life of Jesus," in the most glowing colors. Robinson expresses himself more moderately (iii. 255): "The lake presents, indeed, a beautiful sheet of limpid water, in a deep, depressed basin. . . . The hills are rounded and tame, with little of the picturesque in their form. . . . Whoever looks here for the magnificence of the Swiss lakes, or the softer beauty of those of England and the United States, will be disappointed." In the O. T. it is mentioned, besides this passage, only Num. xxxiv. 11; Deut. iii. 17. [Add Smith's Bible Dict., art. "Gennesaret, Lake of."]

And unto the sea of the plain (Arabah), the salt sea on the east, the way to Beth-jeshimoth. While this eastern part of the Jordan valley is bounded on the north by the lake of Gennesaret, it is in like manner bounded on the south by the Salt Sea, i. e. the Dead Sea, near which (Num. xxxiii. 48) Beth-jeshimoth lay. To that point the Israelite camp reached from Shittim. It belonged to Reuben (ch. xiii. 20), later to Moab again, Ezek. xxv. 9.

And in the south under the foot-hills of Pisgah. On מִן הַגִּלְעָד comp. ch. x. 40. Mount Pisgah, "a part of the mountain of Abarim," lies, to one looking from Jericho, beyond Beth-jeshimoth, in a southeasterly direction, at the northern end of the Dead Sea. Its highest point is Nebo, which is sometimes called "Mount Abarim" (Deut. xxxii. 49), as though its summit, and again, "the top of Pisgah" (Deut. iii. 27, 34), comp. Knobel on Num. xxi. 11. The relation between Abarim, Pisgah, and Nebo is, with Knobel, to be conceived of as if Abarim were the whole mountain range lying east of the Dead Sea, Pisgah a part of it, namely, the northeastern, and Nebo the highest point of Pisgah. This seems to me more simple than with von Raumer (p. 72), to separate Abarim and Pisgah, and then assume that Nebo belonged to Abarim as its (north) western portion, and to Mount Pisgah as its eastern highest extremity.<sup>1</sup> The region which sloped along the foot of Mount Pisgah formed the southern boundary of the kingdom of Sihon.

Vers. 4-6, follow the borders of the kingdom of Og, king of Bashan. Ashtaroth, and Ashtaroth-karnaim (קַרְנַיִם), Gen. xiv. 5, where were giants; according to ch. ix. 10, the residence of Og; now Tel Ashtareh. The hill (Tel) rises, according to von Raumer (p. 243), to a height of from fifty to a hundred feet above the plain, in which ruins lie scattered. At the foot of the hill are ancient wall-foundations and copious springs.

Edrei. Here Og was slain, Num. xxi. 33-35; Deut. iii. 1-3. By the Greeks it was called Adraa; by the Crusaders, Adratum, also Civitas Bernardi de Stampis; by Abulfeda, Adraat; now Draa, a desert basalt city without inhabitants, on a height (von Raumer, p. 247).

Ver. 5. Salcah, conquered by the Israelites, Deut. iii. 10. Now Salath, with eight hundred houses and a castle on basalt rocks, on the southern border of Hauran; uninhabited, like Edrei. Porter saw from the castle of Salcha fourteen ["upwards of thirty," Giant Cit. of Bash. p. 76] villages, in part appearing to be newly built, but entirely deserted (ii. 183, op. von Raumer).

<sup>1</sup> [Tristram's glowing account of the magnificent, almost boundless view from one of the heights of Abarim, which may have been the ancient Nebo, is excellent, p. 540 ff.]

Over all Bashan unto the border of the Geshurites and the Maachathites. The Maachathites dwelt on the southwest slope of Hermon, at the sources of the Jordan. "Maachati urbs Amor-rhaorum super Jordanem (עַמְרֹת הַיַּרְדֵּן לְעַמְּתֵי אֲמֹרִי, Euseb.) juxta montem Hermon." The Geshurites also are to be sought on Mount Hermon, near the present Jedur, on the eastern fall of the mountain. See von Raumer, p. 227, and Menke's Bibelatlas, plate 3. Here was the north boundary of Bashan. The east border is denoted (see above) by Salcha, the south by the half Gilead, where the border (was) of Sihon king of Heshbon, i. e. by the Jabbok (ver. 2). Toward the west it extended to the sea of Tiberias; see von Raumer, p. 226 ff. Bashan and Batanea are by no means identical, as von Raumer has shown (ubi sup.). Bashan was famous for its oak forests (Is. ii. 13; Ezek. xxvii. 6), and fat cattle; hence the bullocks, the rams of Bashan (Deut. xxxii. 14; Am. iv. 1; Ps. xxii. 13). The waters descending from the Hauran fertilize the level land in its northeastern part, which was afterwards inhabited by the tribe of Manasseh.

Ver. 6. Comp. Num. xxxii.

2. Catalogue of the Kings vanquished in the Country West of the Jordan (vers. 7-24). Verses 7 and 8, coinciding with ch. xi. 16 and x. 40-42, introduce the narrative. The Plain (עֲרֵב) is the western part of the Ghor (Gen. xiii. 10); the wilderness (מִדְבָּר) lies in the province of Judah, and Benjamin (ch. xv. 61; xviii. 11; Matt. iii. 3; iv. 1; xi. 7; Mark i. 3; Ln. iii. 4.)

Ver. 9. The kings are enumerated generally in the order in which they were conquered. First, accordingly, the kings of Jericho, Ai, Jerusalem, Hebron, Jarmuth, Lachish, Egion, and Gezer, in regard to which ch. vi. 2 ff.; viii. 29; x. 1-5, 33 may be compared. Then follows ver. 13, the king of Debir, ch. x. 39, after him still in the same verse the king of Geder. גִּדְרָא is called also גִּדְרָא, and belonged to the lowland of Judah. Not hitherto recognized.

Ver. 14. Hormah, earlier Zephath (Judg. i. 17). Robinson (ii. 616, N.) seeks the city near the pass es-Sufek, W. S. W. of the Dead Sea, where the Israelites were defeated by the Canaanites (Num. xiv. 44, 45; Deut. i. 44), and subsequently the Canaanites by the Israelites (Num. xxi. 1-3; Judg. i. 17). Perhaps it stood, as von Raumer suspects, on the adjacent Mount Madurah, of which the saying goes, that a city stood upon it at which God became angry so that He destroyed it. To this it suits that the city of Zephath was later called Hormah (חֹרְמָה, i. e. devoted to destruction, cognate with חֹרֵם).

Arad, named also Num. xxi. 1-3, and Judg. i. 16, 17, near the wilderness of Kadesh, twenty Roman miles south of Hebron. Robinson (ii. 473) saw from a distance the hill Arad. He also rightly refers ch. x. 41 to the subjugation of Arad, whose inhabitants had previously (Num. xxi. 1-3), like those of Hormah, driven back the Israelites.

Ver. 15. Libnah, ch. x. 29, 30; xv. 42. Adullam, ch. xv. 35, fortified by Rehoboam (2 Ch. xi. 7); famous for its cave, David's refuge (1 Sam. xxii. 1; 2 Sam. xxiii. 13; 1 Chr. xii. 15). In A. D. 1138, the inhabitants of Tekoah took refuge there from the Saracens, Will. Tyr. xv. 6 (von Raumer, p. 169).

Ver. 16. Makkedah, ch. x. 10, 16, 17, 21. Bethel, earlier Luz (בֵּיתֶל), sufficiently known; to the right of the road from Jerusalem to Shechem; the place where Jacob saw in his dream the ladder from earth to heaven (Gen. xxviii. 11-19; xxxi. 13; Hos. xii. 5); rendered infamous subsequently by the worship of the calves (1 K. xii. 28, 33; xiii. 1), hence called Beth-aven (different from Beth-aven in ch. vii. 2; xviii. 12), by the prophets (Am. v. 5; Hos. iv. 15, and often). The missionary Nicolayson discovered Bethel, 1836. According to Robinson (ii. 127) it is now called Beitin, three and three-quarter hours from Jerusalem. See more in Robinson ubi sup., von Raumer, pp. 178, 179 [Tristram, Stanley].

Ver. 17. Tappuah, comp. ch. xv. 34, 53; xvii. 7. Hepher, in the plain of Jezreel in Issachar, xix. 19 (Knobel).

Ver. 18. Aphek, ch. xiii. 4. Issaron, mentioned only in this place. The site has not been discovered.

Ver. 19. Madon, ch. xi. 1. Hazor, ch. xi. 1-10; xix. 37.

Ver. 20. Shimron-meron, ch. xi. 1; xix. 37. Achahaph, ch. xi. 1; xix. 25.

Ver. 21. Taanach in Samaria, within the circuit of Issachar, but belonging to Manasseh (ch. xvii. 11), although not conquered by him (Judg. i. 27). A city of the Levites, ch. xxi. 25. Here Barak conquered (Judg. v. 19). Robinson (ii. 156, 157), and Schubert (iii. 164), saw Taanach (now Ta'annûk) from the neighborhood of Jennin (Ginnâa), von Raumer, p. 165.

Megiddo, likewise in Samaria, belonging to Manasseh but beyond his border (ch. xvii. 11), and likewise unconquered by that tribe (Judg. i. 27). Here Ahaziah died in his flight from Jehu (2 K. ix. 27), and here Josiah was fatally wounded in the battle against Necho king of Egypt (2 Chron. xxxv. 20, 25; xxiii. 29, 30).

Ver. 22. Kedesh on the mountain of Naphtali (Jebel el-Safed), ch. xix. 37, in Galilee. A city of refuge, ch. xx. 7, of the Levites, ch. xxi. 32. Birth-place of Barak (Judg. iv. 6), discovered by Smith on a hill, in a well-watered region (Notes on Bibl. Geog. in Biblioth. Sac., May, 1849, p. 374, ap. von Raumer, p. 132); by Robinson on his second journey, not "visited" indeed, as von Raumer states, but yet seen from a short distance and described (Later Bibl. Res. p. 366 ff.).

Jokneam on Carmel. Belonging to Zebulun, ch. xix. 11. A city of the Levites, ch. xxi. 34. Perhaps, Tel Kaimôn (Robinson, Later Bibl. Res. p. 115). The place is called, in 1 K. iv. 12, כַּרְמֵל, out of which Kaimôn appears to have sprung (comp. Robinson, ubi sup.). Carmel appears elsewhere in our book only ch. xix. 26, to mark the south border of the tribe of Asher. Rightly does the mountain bear its name "orchard" (comp. Is. x. 8; xvi. 10 and often), being covered below with laurels and olive-trees, above with pines and oaks (hence the comparison Cant. vii. 6), and full of the most beautiful flowers. These are the glory of Carmel which shall be given to the wilderness (Is. xxxv. 2). The view over the sea as well as of the coast is magnificent. Compare the different descriptions of travellers, von Raumer, p.

43 ff.<sup>1</sup> Since 1180 there has stood on Carmel, although only at a height of 578 feet, and therefore far below the summit, a cloister to commemorate Elijah (1 K. xviii. 17-39; 42-45) and bearing his name; rebuilt in 1833. The mountain reaches an altitude of 1700 feet.

Vers. 23. Naphoth-dor, ch. xi. 2; xvii 11. The king of the nations of Gilgal, as Gen. xiv. 1, Tidal king of the nations. Similarly, Gen. x. 5, גִּלְגַּל. Gilgal, not on the Jordan, but, according to Robinson iii. 47, in the plain along the Mediterranean sea, now Jiljuleh, corresponding to the old

<sup>1</sup> [In particular also, Stanley, S. & P. p. 244 ff., Tristram, p. 20 ff.]

Galgala, which Eusebius and Jerome place six Roman miles north of Antipatris. Probably the Gilgal of Neh. xii. 29 and 1 Macc. ix. 2 was, as he supposes, the same. With this falls in the proximity of Naphoth-dor.

Ver. 24. Tirzah in Samaria, three miles from the city of Samaria, on the east. Here at a later period the kings of Israel dwelt; Jeroboam I., Baasha, Elah, and Shimri, and here the last-named burned himself in his palace, 1 K. xiv. 17; xv. 33; xvi. 8-18. Robinson (Later Bibl. Res. p. 302, ff.) takes Tulluzah for Tirzah, being beautifully situated like the ancient city (Cant. vi. 4). The name signifies delight, from תִּרְצָה.

PART SECOND.

The Division of the Land of Canaan.

CHAPTERS XIII.-XXIV.

SECTION FIRST.

GOD'S COMMAND TO JOSHUA TO DISTRIBUTE THE LAND IN WEST PALESTINE. RETROSPECTIVE GLANCE AT THE TERRITORY ALREADY ASSIGNED TO THE TWO AND A HALF TRIBES
EAST OF THE JORDAN. BEGINNING OF THE DIVISION. CALEB'S PORTION.

CHAPTERS XIII., XIV.

1. God's Command to Joshua to distribute the Land.

CHAPTER XIII. 1-7.

1 Now [And] Joshua was old and stricken in years [far gone in years; Fay: come into the days; De Wette: come into the years]; and the Lord [Jehovah] said unto him, Thou art old and stricken [far-gone] in years, and there remaineth 2 yet very much land to be possessed. This is the land that yet remaineth: all the 3 borders [circles] of the Philistines, and all Geshuri, From Sihor, which is before Egypt, even unto the borders of Ekron, northward, which is [shall it be] counted to the Canaanite: five lords of the Philistines, the Gazathites,<sup>1</sup> and the Ashdothites, the Eshkalonites, the Gittites [Gathite], and the Ekronites; [,] also [and] the Avites; 4 [,] From [in] the south [:] all the land of the Canaanites, and Mearah that is beside [which belongs to] the Sidonians, unto Aphek, to the borders [border] of the Amorites; And the land of the Giblites, and all Lebanon, toward the sunrising, from 5 Baal-gad under mount Hermon unto the entering into Hamath. All the inhabitants of the hill country [the mountain] from Lebanon unto Misrephoth-maim, and all the Sidonians, them will I drive out from before the children [sons] of Israel: only divide thou it by lot unto the Israelites for an inheritance [for a possession], as I have 6 commanded thee. Now therefore [And now] divide this land for an inheritance [a possession] unto the nine tribes, and the half-tribe of Manasseh.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 8. This and the following Gentile nouns in the verse are all singular in the Hebrew and might better be so understood for the English. — Tr.]

2. The Territory of the Two and a Half Tribes East of the Jordan, as already granted to them by Moses.

CHAPTER XIII. 8-33.

a. Its Boundaries. The Tribe of Levi.

CHAPTER XIII. 8-14.

- 8 With whom [him] the Reubenites and the Gadites have received their inheritance [possession], which Moses gave them, beyond [the] Jordan eastward, even 9 as Moses the servant of the Lord [Jehovah] gave them; From Aroer that is upon the bank of the river [water-course] Arnon, and the city that is in the midst of the river
 10 [water-course], and all the plain [table-land] of Medeba unto Dibon; And all the cities of Sihon king of the Amorites, which [who] reigned in Heshbon, unto the 11 border of the children of Ammon; and Gilead, and the border of the Geshurites
 12 and Maachathites, and all mount Hermon, and all Bashan unto Salcah; All<sup>1</sup> the kingdom of Og in Bashan, which [who] reigned in Ashtaroth and Edrei, which remained of the remnant of the giants. For these did Moses smite and cast them
 13 out. Nevertheless the children [sons] of Israel expelled not the Geshurites, nor the Maachathites; but the Geshurites and the Maachathites dwell among the Israelites until this day.
 14 Only unto the tribe of Levi he gave none inheritance [no possession]; the sacrifices of the Lord [Jehovah] God of Israel made by fire [Fay and De Wette: offering of Jehovah; Bunsen, after the Berleburg Bibel: fire-offerings] are their inheritance, as he said unto them.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

- [<sup>1</sup> In vers. 12, 13, read: All the kingdom of Og in Bashan, who ruled in Ashtaroth, and in Edrei: he was left of the remnant of the giants, and Moses smote them, and drove them out. And the sons of Israel drove not out the Geshurites, and the Maachathites; and Geshur and Maachath dwell in the midst of Israel to this day.]

b. The Possession of the Tribe of Reuben.

CHAPTER XIII. 15-23.

- 15 And Moses gave unto the tribe of the children [sons] of Reuben inheritance
 16 [omit: inheritance] according to their families. And their coast [border] was from Aroer that is on the bank of the river [water-course of] Arnon, and the city that is in the midst of the river [water-course] and all the plain [table-land] by Medeba;
 17 [:] Heshbon, and all her cities that are in the plain [table-land], Dibon, and Bamoth-18 19 baal, and Beth-baal-meon, And Jahaza, and Kedemoth, and Mephaath, And 20 Kirjathaim, and Sibmah, and Zareth-shahar in the mount of the valley, And Beth-peor, and Ashdoth-pisgah [the foot-hills of Pisgah], and Beth-jeshimoth, And all the cities of the plain [table-land], and all the kingdom of Sihon king of the Amorites which [who] reigned in Heshbon, whom Moses smote with the princes of Midian, Evi, and Rekem, and Zur, and Hur, and Reba, which were dukes [Fay: the anointed]
 22 of Sihon, dwelling in the country. Balaam also [and Balaam] the son of Beor, the soothsayer, did the children [sons] of Israel slay with the sword, among them that 23 were slain by them [in addition to their slain]. And the border of the children [sons] of Reuben was [the] Jordan, and the border thereof [De Wette, Fay: and that which bordered it; Bunsen: that is, its margin]. This was the inheritance [possession] of the children [sons] of Reuben, after their families, the cities and the villages<sup>1</sup> thereof.

<sup>1</sup> Some Codd. read here as in ver. 20, בְּיָרְדֵּן, doubtless to make ver. 23 conformable with ver. 23. We abide by the reading בְּיָרְדֵּן.

c. The Possession of the Tribe of Gad.

CHAPTER XIII. 24-28.

- 24 And Moses gave inheritance [omit: inheritance] unto the tribe of Gad, even 25 [omit: even] unto the children [sons] of Gad according to their families. And their coast [border] was Jazer, and all the cities of Gilead, and half the land of the 26 children of Ammon, unto Aroer that is before Rabbah; and from Heshbon unto Ramath-Mizpeh, and Betonim; and from Mahanaim unto the border of Debir; 27 And in the valley, Beth-aram, and Beth-nimrah, and Succoth, and Zaphon, the rest of the kingdom of Sihon king of Heshbon, [the] Jordan and his [its] border, even unto the edge of the sea of Cinnereth, on the other side [of the] Jordan eastward.
 28 This is the inheritance [possession] of the children [sons] of Gad after their families, the cities, and their villages.

d. The Possession of the Half Tribe of Manasseh. A Word concerning the Tribe of Levi.

CHAPTER XIII. 29-33.

- 29 And Moses gave inheritance [omit: inheritance] unto the half-tribe of Manasseh:
 and this was the possession of the half-tribe [properly: and it was for the half-30 tribe] of the children [sons] of Manasseh by their families. And their coast [border] was from Mahanaim, all Bashan, all the kingdom of Og king of Bashan, 31 and all the towns [villages] of Jair, which are in Bashan, threescore cities. And half Gilead, and Ashtaroth, and Edrei, cities [De Wette, Fay: the cities] of the kingdom of Og in Bashan, were pertaining unto the children of Machir the son of 32 Manasseh, even to the one half of the children of Machir by their families. These are the countries which [are what] Moses did distribute for inheritance [possession] in the plains of Moab, on the other side [of the] Jordan by Jericho eastward.
 33 But unto the tribe of Levi Moses gave not any inheritance [possession]: the Lord [Jehovah] God of Israel was [is] their inheritance, as he said unto them.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

With the thirteenth chapter begins Part Second of the book. This describes the division of the land, and rests no doubt on definite records which lay before the author. Such records must have been prepared on taking possession of the land, and such are in fact referred to, ch. xviii. 8, 9. "Without them a single Hebrew writer would hardly have had so accurate a knowledge of the land as this author displays, especially in regard to the boundaries" (Knobel). When these registers were established, whether already in Joshua's time,<sup>1</sup> or, as Knobel, from certain circumstances feels obliged to infer, "at a somewhat later period," cannot be made out with certainty. We have, at all events, to deal here, for the most part, with very ancient writings, reminding us of Ex. xx., Num. xxxiii.

1. Jehovah's Command to Joshua to divide the Land, ch. xiii. 1-7. Joshua has become old, much land is yet to be conquered, and no prospect of his completing the conquest of it; therefore God gives him the command to wait no longer, but to undertake the division. What yet remains is accurately mentioned, vers. 2-6, and in ver. 7 it is said, that it shall be given to the nine and a half tribes.

Ver. 1. Well-stricken [far gone] in years, as ch. xxiii. 1, 2; Gen. xxiv. 1; xviii. 11.

Ver. 2-6. The land that remains to be occupied.

It lies part in the south (ver. 3, 4), and part in the north (ver. 5, 6).

Ver. 2. All the circles of the Philistines, and all Geshuri. כָּל-קְרִיּוֹת, LXX. rightly: δρια, Vulg.: Galilæa, and hence Luther: Galilee of the Philistines. Geshuri is not to be confounded with the country of the Geshurites on Lebanon, mentioned ch. xii. 5; xiii. 13, but is to be looked for in the south of Palestine near Philistia.

Ver. 3. From Sihor. שִׁיחֹר from שִׁיחָר, to be black, properly, black stream; but not here, as in Is. xxiii. 3; Jer. ii. 18, the Nile, which De Wette judges it to be, but, according to the convincing analogy of 1 Chron. xiii. 5, the מִצְרַיִם, the brook of Egypt, Rhinokolura, or Rhinokorura, which actually flows before, i. e. eastwardly (more accurately northeastwardly) from Egypt, while the Nile takes its course through the middle of that country. Von Raumer well remarks in his excursus on this passage (p. 53): "That under the name Shihor the Nile was by no means alone intended, is evident from the single fact that Josh. xix. 26 refers to a border stream of Asher of the same name. If the Nile was called Shihor, niger, quia nigrum lutum devehit, why should not other streams receive the same name for the same reason. Have we not in Germany and

<sup>1</sup> [The clear and positive statements made in ch. xviii. 4-9 would seem to leave little room for doubt on this point, to one who admits the historical credibility of the book. — Tr.]

America streams which are called Schwartzbach, Black Creek, Black River, Green River, etc.?" It may be added that many names of streams and streamlets may be met with bearing the same or closely related names, from the repetition of the same features in different places.

Even unto the border of Ekron. Ekron, 'Ašdod, 'Ašdod in the LXX., between Ashdod and Jamnia, one of the five cities of the Philistines, mentioned elsewhere in the Book of Joshua several times, ch. xv. 11, 45, 46; xix. 43; according to Judg. i. 18 conquered by Judah, afterward lost again, then again conquered, under Samuel (1 Sam. vii. 14). It was the city of the fly-Baal, Baal-zebub, whose protégés are still to be found there in great numbers. At least Van de Velde complains (ii. 173 apud von Raumer, p. 185) very bitterly of them. Jeremiah (xxv. 20); Amos (i. 8); Zephaniah (ii. 4); Zechariah (ix. 5, 7) prophesied against Ekron. Robinson (iii. 23-25) thinks he discovered it in Ahir, pronounced Aghrum, according to Furrer, p. 135, a small village built of unburnt bricks or clay. "The radical letters of the Arabic name are the same as those of the Hebrew, and the position too corresponds with all we know of Ekron," that is, with the statement of Eusebius and Jerome, that it should be between Ashdod and Jamnia; for "such is the actual position of Akir relative to Esdud and Gebna at the present day."

Shall it be counted to the Canaanites. This land shall be regarded as Canaanitish, and so subject to conquest, although the Philistines were not Canaanites, but according to Gen. x. 13 sprang from Mizraim. So also Knobel: "The country from the brook of Egypt, northward, is reckoned to the Canaanite, i. e. to Canaan, and was therefore to be taken into account also, since Israel was to receive the whole of Canaan."

Five lords of the Philistines: the Gazathite (Gazite), the Ashdodite, the Ashkelonite, the Gittite (Gathite) and the Ekronite. The lords or chiefs are named instead of the cities. The Gazite, ruler of Gaza, גָּזִית, Rd(a, first mentioned, Gen. x. 19, as a border town of the Canaanite peoples; in our book, x. 41; xi. 22; xv. 47, conquered by Judah, Judg. i. 18, afterward lost again, Judg. iii. 3. Samson carried the gates of Gaza to a hill (Judg. xvi. 21-30) which is now shown one half hour from the city. As against Ekron, the prophets prophesied also against Gaza, Jeremiah (xxv. 20; xlvii. 5), Amos (i. 6, 7) Zephaniah (ii. 4), Zechariah (ix. 5). On the road from Jerusalem to Gaza, Philip baptized the eunuch (Acts viii. 30). It lies in a fruitful region, rich in palms and olive-trees, on a small hill about an hour from the sea; is at present larger than Jerusalem (Robinson, ii. 372), a chief emporium between Egypt and Syria, lying on the great caravan route, and distinguished by good springs. The population may be about fifteen or sixteen thousand. Robinson (ubi sup.) gives a very instructive sketch of the history of the city, which has suffered much in the military campaigns of thousands of years. A very pleasant description is found in Furrer (p. 119-122). The Ashdodite.

Ashdod, אֲשְׁדּוֹד, 'Ašdod, ch. xi. 22; xv. 46, 47. Here Dagon fell before the ark of God (1 Sam. v. 1-7; vi. 17); and this city also shared in the maledictions of the prophets mentioned above, in the same passages which were there quoted. It likewise is named in the account of the eunuch from Ethiopia (Acts viii. 40). It is now called Esdud, a village of a hundred or a hundred and fifty miserable hovels, lying on a "low round eminence," and surrounded by an extensive grove of olive trees (Furrer, p. 133, Robinson, ii. 368). Of antiquities Furrer found in the village, not a single one. "Of the ancient city of the Philistines which once stood here," he says, "that Ashdod about which the Assyrian (Is. xx. 1) and Egyptian armies often encamped, everything but the name has utterly vanished." The Ashkelonite. Ashkelon

(and Askelon), אֲשְׁקֶלֶן, mentioned nowhere else in our book, conquered by Judah (Judg. i. 18), but not named among the cities of Judah (Josh. xv. 45-47),—a circumstance which favors the opinion that the list was composed in the time of Joshua, and not later—was, next to Gaza, probably the most important city of the Philistines, at whose gates David would not have the tidings of the death of Saul and Jonathan proclaimed (2 Sam. i. 20), lest the daughters of the Philistines should rejoice. Like the other Philistine cities, Ashkelon was threatened by the prophets with divine punishment. Samson slew here thirty Philistines. Jonathan the Maccabæan conquered the city twice (1 Mac. x. 86; xi. 60). Herod the Great was born here, according to Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. i. 6), was called Ascalonita, and adorned the place with baths and fountains. It was distinguished originally for hatred against the Jews, later for enmity toward the Christians. During the Crusades many conflicts took place here. Its destruction by Saladin (1191) terminated its splendor forever; and Lady Hester Stanhope, as Ritter relates at large, (xvi. 70 ff. [Gage's Transl. iii. 213 ff.]), caused its ruins to be explored without finding silver or gold. The ruins are of vast proportions. The village of New Ashkelon lying near the sea is surrounded with green. "Thus Ashkelon, with the adjacent village, formed an extremely fertile oasis in the midst of a perfectly desert region; although, through the numerous gaps and rents in the gigantic stone wall, the wind has at certain points swept the sand of the desert into the very site of the city" (Furrer, p. 128). The Gittite (Gathite), Gath, mentioned already, ch. xi. 22; גִּתְיָה, Githra, (Joseph.), גֶּת (LXX.), was the home of Goliath (1 Sam. xvii. 4); connected with Ashkelon in David's lamentation (2 Sam. i. 20), conquered by David (1 Chron. xix. 1). Micha (i. 10) and Amos (vi. 2) make mention of this city, whose ruins Robinson (ii. 220) sought for in vain. On Menke's atlas, map iii., its name is brought in without the sign of a town, on the border of the second group of low land cities belonging to the tribe of Judah. Knobel (p. 433), after the example of Hitzig (Urgeschichte der Philister, p. 154), conjectures that Bastoydissa in Ptolem. 5, 16, 6, Betogabri in Tab. Peut. ix. 6, Eleutheropolis of the Fathers, the present Beit Jibrin, is the same as Gath.—The Ekronite, see above ver. 3.—The Avites, "south of Gaza," Deut. ii. 23.

Ver. 4. In the South. The Masoretic division of the verse we must here give up, as Hävernick, Keil, and Knobel have done, since the specification — מִתֵּיכֵן, standing unquestionably in contrast with אֲשְׁקֶלֶן (ver. 3), suits very well with the preceding, but not at all with what follows. Rather the author turns here, ver. 4, to an enumeration of the portions of the country lying in the north which require yet to be fully subjugated.

All the land of the Canaanites. Phœnicia is intended, and in particular, the low-land there as well as the "mountain country from Mearah even to the border of the Amorites" (Knobel).

Mearah. Since מערה properly signified a cave, the conjecture proposed by Rosenmüller (Bibl. Geog. ii. 1, pp. 39, 40), although Robinson (iii. 412) regards it "as of very questionable value," may safely be approved, with Ritter (xvii. 99) and Knobel, namely, that we here have a reference to the cavea de Tyro mentioned by Will. Tyr. (xix. 11), which he describes as a spelunca inexplugnabilis, an old burial-place of the Sidonians; at present, Mughr Jezzín, i. e. Cave of Jezzín, on Lebanon, east of Sidon. Ritter, ubi sup.

Aphek, now Afka (Robinson, Later Bibl. Res. p. 603 ff.), northeast of Beirut; not to be confounded with the better known Aphek, in the tribe of Issachar, where the camp of the Philistines was pitched before their victory over Saul (1 Sam. xxix. 1-31), and where Benhadad was subsequently captured (1 K. xx. 26-30). The Aphek before us, called by the Greeks Ἀφακα, noted for the temple of Venus, destroyed by Constantine the Great, belonged, as we see from ch. xix. 30, to Asher. A third Aphek (von Raum. p. 242), now Feik, a village of 200 families, lies on the east side of the sea of Tiberias, on the road from Hauran to the Jordan. This place is indicated in the Onom. as a castellum grande. There was also a fourth place of the name (ch. xv. 53) on the mountain of Judah.

To the borders of the Amorites, i. e. to the land once inhabited by the Amorites, which belonged to Og, king of Bashan (Mich., Dereser, Rosenmüller, Keil).

Ver. 5. The land of the Gíblites. The land of Gíbli, i. e. of the race of Gebal (1 K. v. 32 (18); Ez. xxvii. 9), a district north of Berytus, on the sea, still called Jobail, by the Arabs, but in the classics "Byblus" (Knobel). Byblus itself lay on the sea (Ez. xxvii. 9), was a seat of the Adonis-worship (Winer, i. 206), "home of the Phœnician artisans called by Solomon to the building of the temple (1 K. v. 32 (18)). The country belonging to it probably lay east of the city" (von Raum. p. 26, 28).

All Lebanon towards the sun-rising, i. e. the Anti-Lebanon.

Baal-Gad, not Baalbec, as Knobel here again maintains, but, as was shown on ch. xi. 17, Cæsarea Philippi. So also Menke on Map iii., who strangely writes Baal-Gath instead of Baal-Gad — perhaps a mere oversight.

Hamath. A northern boundary point of Palestine, mentioned Num. xxxiv. 8, in our book here and in ch. xix. 33, and many times throughout the O. T., particularly during the period of greatest renown of the Jewish dominion under David and Solomon. Then the kingdom actually extended to that point (see the side-map to Map iii. in Menke's Atlas), 2 Sam. viii. 3-12; 1 Chron. xviii. 3-11; 1 Chron. xiii. 5; 1 K. viii. 65; 2 Chron. vii. 8; 2 K. xiv. 25-28. So far had the spies originally penetrated (Num. xiii. 21). According to the Onom. Hamath = Epiphania on the Orontes, at the present time, Hamah, seat of a Greek bishop (Robinson, iii. 456 [see also Later Bibl. Res. p. 568]). Yet Jacobites also dwell there subject to the Jacobite patriarch who resides in Mesopotamia (Robinson, iii. 461). The city is very large, and numbers 100,000 inhabitants (Winer, i. 458).

Ver. 6. There remain besides, and are to be conquered, all the inhabitants of the mountains from Lebanon unto Misrephoth-maim, all the Sidonians, i. e. all the heathen tribes dwelling south of the Lebanon as far as to the present promontory Ras en-Nakura (see on ch. xi. 8). Knobel here explains Misrephoth-maim simply as "promontory of Nakura," while, according to the comments on ch. xi. 8, his opinion, there controverted by us, appears to include under the name the other promontory also, Ras el-Abiad.

Only divide thou it by lot unto Israel for a possession. These words connect themselves with ver. 1, and particularly the conclusion of that verse, as Keil has well observed. As I have commanded thee, comp. ch. i. 6.

Ver. 7. More definite statement as to whom the land should be divided among. According to ch. xiv. 1, Joshua did not perform this service alone, but in connection with the high-priest Eleazer, and the elders of the people.

2. The Territory of the Two and a Half Tribes East of the Jordan, as Moses had already bestowed it upon them, vers. 8-33. — a. Its Borders, vers. 8-13. To that is added a notice of the failure of the tribe of Levi to receive a possession, vers. 14.

Ver. 8. With him, i. e. Manasseh, but the other half of Manasseh.

Vers. 9-12. These statements are, with slight variation, the same as ch. xii. 1-6. Thus instead of the half Gilead in xii. 2, we have here All the table-land of Medeba unto Dibon. Of Medeba we shall speak on ver. 16, of Dibon, on ver. 17.

In ver. 13 it is significantly stated that the Geshurites and Machathites were not driven out. Similar remarks occur ch. xv. 63; xvi. 10; xvii. 12 ff.

Ver. 14 is repeated in ver. 33, yet not in precisely the same expression. Thus, while it is said here that "יְהוָה, i. e. the offerings of Jehovah, should be the portion of the tribe of Levi, Jehovah Himself is there called their possession. It is the same in sense; without earthly inheritance Jehovah and his worship should be the only possession of the tribe of Levi. The directions of the law Num. xviii., may be compared with this, from which it appears in what manner, through the divine worship itself, the bodily subsistence of the priests and their attendants was provided for.

b. The Possession of the Tribe of Reuben, vers. 15-23. There follow, now evidently on the ground of old registers, the several boundaries of the tribes east of the Jordan; of which Reuben comes first. They are found in shorter compass, Num. xxxii. 34-42.

Ver. 16. Medeba, now Medaba, mentioned in a song of triumph, Num. xxi. 30; according to ver. 9, and this passage, belonging to Reuben; later to Moab, Is. xv. 2. The ruins, on a hill, have a compass of half an hour, about two hours from Heshbon.

The plain (מִדְבָּרָא) by Medeba. The plateau east of Abarim or mount Pisgah is meant (comp. ch. xii. 3), comp. also Knobel on Num. xxi. 10, 11.<sup>1</sup>

Ver. 17. Heshbon, also, lies, like Medeba, on this table-land, comp. xii. 2. — Dibon, mentioned Num. xxi. 30, like Medeba; now Diban [the site of the recently discovered monumental stone (Moabite stone) containing a valuable inscription of great antiquity. — Tr.], an hour north of the Arnon. There were not two Dibons, as the Onom. assumes, but the one Dibon is ascribed, Num. xxxii. 3, 34, to Gad, here to Reuben, comp. also, ver. 9.

<sup>1</sup> [Among recent travellers, the account given by Triethm in his Land of Israel, will be found graphic and instructive. — Tr.]

Bamoth-Baal, Num. xxiv. 20, a stopping-place of the Israelites.

Beth-baal-meon, called also, briefly Baal-meon (Num. xxxii. 38), now Ma'in, at the foot of the Attarus, which raises itself "to the east of the northern end of the Dead Sea" (von Raum. p. 71, 72).

Ver. 18. Jahaza. Here Sihon was slain, Num. xxi. 23; Deut. ii. 32; Judg. xi. 20. According to ch. xxi. 36, a Levitical city, cf. also 1 Chron. vii. 28. It was later retaken by Moab, Is. xv. 4, Jer. xlviii. 21. Not given on Menke's map, on von Raumer's accompanied with an interrogation point.

Kedemoth, another city of the Levites, ch. xxi. 37; 1 Chron. vi. 79.

Mephathth, also a Levite city, ch. xxi. 37; 1 Chron. vi. 79, later of the Moabites. In Jerome's time here was a Roman garrison for a protection against the dwellers in the wilderness (von Raum. p. 265).

Ver. 19. Kirjathaim. It is related, Gen. xiv. 5, that Chedorlaomer here smote the Emim. From the present passage, and Num. xxxii. 37, it belonged to Reuben; later to Moab, Jer. xlviii. 1, 23; Ez. xxv. 9. In the time of Jerome very many Christians lived here (von Raumer, p. 263).

Sibmah, very near Heshbon.

Zareth-shahar on the mount of the valley. The name signifies "splendor of the dawn," (זָרֶתֶשׁאָר according to Gesenius perhaps = זָרֶתֶשׁאָר, 1 Chron. iv. 7). Von Raumer makes no mention of it. Winer and Keil conjecture that Zareth-shahar, which is nowhere else named (nomen loci forsitan in aprico colle sili, cujus nusquam alias fit mentio, Rosenm. on this place), may have lain near Nebo or Pishgah, "not far from Heshbon on the west," (Keil). Menke has introduced the name west of Mount Pishgah, toward the Dead Sea, and somewhat south of Zerka-maim, perhaps because Zareth-shahar is indicated as situated on a mountain of the valley.

Ver. 20. Beth-peor, probably not far from the mountain of Peor; opposite Jericho, according to the Onom.

The foot-hills of Pishgah, and Beth-jeshimoth, ch. xii. 3.

Ver. 21. All the cities of the table-land and all the kingdom of Sihon king, etc. Meaning: "all the other cities of the level (the plain) and the whole kingdom of Sihon, as far as it extended on the plain." So Keil, rightly taking into account the statement of ver. 27. The victory of Moses over Sihon is here related more fully than in ver. 12. There are beside himself five Midianite princes named, Evi, Rekem, Zur, Hur, and Reba, and in the same order as Num. xxxi. 8, where, however, they are called מְלִכֵי, while here they are styled מְשִׁיכֵי, just as in Gen. xvii. 20 the princes of the Ishmaelites, and in Num. iv. 34 as well as ch. ix. 18 of our book, the princes of the congregation of Israel, מְשִׁיכֵי הַיִּשְׂרָאֵל, the princes of their tribes are mentioned (Num. vii. 11 ff.; xxxiv. 18, and often). They are at the same time designated as the anointed of Sihon (מְשִׁיכֵי סִיחֹן), i. e. his vassals. In this sense of anointed, prince = מְשִׁיכֵי, "the word stands only in the plural, and always, as would seem, of native, although dependent and, as in Josh. xiii. 21, subjugated, princes, and not of installed, ordinary officials" (Gesen.). Keil would, with Hengstenberg

(on Ps. ii. 6), translate מְשִׁיכֵי by "poured out" [founded or cast], because he thinks מְשִׁיכֵי cannot be proved to have been used in the sense of "to anoint." Hitzig likewise contends that מְשִׁיכֵי cannot mean "anoint," for which rather מְשִׁיכֵי stands, Ps. ii. 6, but will hear nothing of "poured out." He reaches back after an Arabic root which should signify purify, refine, consecrate to God, so that in the passage above מְשִׁיכֵי would be about the same as מְשִׁיכֵי. In this view מְשִׁיכֵי would properly mean "consecrated" (to God); comp. Hitzig, Psalms i. p. 9.

Ver. 22. Balaam, Num. xxii. 5 ff., is here characterized as מְשִׁיכֵי, soothsayer, like the prophets of the Philistines, 1 Sam. vi. 2, and the necromancers 1 Sam. xxviii. 8, different from the מְשִׁיכֵי, the true prophet, who is also called מְשִׁיכֵי (1 Sam. ix. 9), or מְשִׁיכֵי (1 Chron. xxi. 9; xxv. 5; xxix. 29). The מְשִׁיכֵי divines properly through inscribed lots (βελομαγντία).

Ver. 23. And the border . . . was the Jordan and the border. Houbigant and Clericus, because the passage is obscure, would mend the text here and Num. xxxiv. 6; Deut. iii. 16, also Josh. xiii. 27; xv. 12, 47. Gesenius (Thes. i. 394 ff.) takes } = simul, etiam, thus: Jordanes qui simul terminus erat. Knobel (on Num. xxxiv. 6) and Keil (at this place) explain: "The sea (Num. xxxiv. 6), the Jordan, with its territory, with its banks, shall be the boundary." This sense is indicated by De Wette also in his translation, which we have adopted [der Jordan und das Angrenzende, the Jordan and what borders it]. Bunsen appears to take } as epexegetical, translating: "that is, its margin," coming close therefore to Gesenius.

Their villages, comp. ver. 28, xv. 32, 36, 41, 47, 48, and often, מְשִׁיכֵי, a farm, village, εἰσῶλις (LXX κῶμος), which was not inclosed, like a city, with walls," (Keil.) By the Caucasians such a village is called an Aul, reminding us of εἰσῶλις [and αὐλή].

c. Ver. 24-28. The Possession of the Tribe of Gad.

Ver. 25. Jazer, snatched from the Amorites, Num. xxi. 32, belonging to Gad, Num. xxxii. 35, as here, a Levite city, ch. xxi. 39; 1 Chron. vii. 81. Later, like many other of the cities already mentioned, it belonged again to the Moabites (Is. xvi. 8, 9; Jer. xlviii. 32); conquered by Judas Maccabæus, 1 Mac. v. 8. Burckhardt (p. 609) held the present Ain Hazir to be Jazer (apud von Raumer, p. 262), and with this von Raumer agrees. Seetzen conjectured that Szyr or Seir was to be regarded as this place, with whom, beside Keil, Van de Velde, and Menke (Map iii. compared with Map viii.) coincide.

All the cities of Gilead, i. e. of the southern part of Gilead, to the Jabbok, for the other half which belonged not to the kingdom of Sihon, but to that of Og king of Bashan, fell, as we learn from ver. 31, to the half tribe of Manasseh. For the rest comp. on ch. xii. 2.

The half of the land of the sons of Ammon unto Aroer that is before Rabbah. This Aroer is not to be confounded with Aroer of Reuben on the northern bank of the Arnon, ch. xii. 2; xiii. 9, 16. It is Aroer of Gad, which is before Rabbah, that is Rabba or Rabbath of the Ammonites (Deut. iii. 11), which, again, is different from Rabba of the Moabites (von Raumer, p. 271). Aroer of Gad, from Num. xxxii. 34, was built by the Gadites. From hence to Abel-keramim, Jephtha smote the Ammonites (Judg. xi. 33) in that victory so portentous to the life of his daughter. There Joab encamped on the occasion of that census of the people so portentous to David (2 Sam. xxiv. 5). "Probably Ayra, southwest of es-Salt" (von Raumer, p. 259). "For 'before,' cannot here," as von Raumer correctly says, "possibly signify 'to the east of' Rabbah, since Aroer, as a city of the tribe of Gad, must have lain west of Rabbah. 'Before' signifies, probably, that if one goes from the Jordan toward Rabbah, Aroer lies before Rabbah." So likewise Burckhardt (p. 609).

Ver. 26. From Heshbon to Ramothmizpeh and Betonim. Thus the extension northward of the territory of the tribe is expressed. From Heshbon. We need not suppose with Keil that Heshbon, belonging to Itteben (ver. 17), lay exactly on the border between Reuben and Gad, but "from Heshbon" = "from the region of Heshbon." To Ramath-mizpeh and Betonim. Again, also, "into the region of" these cities. Ramath-mizpeh, i. e. Height of the Watch, as von Raumer translates. We have already, ch. xi. 8, met with a valley of Mizpeh, concerning which see the explanation there. This Ramath-mizpeh is called also רַמַּת מִצְפֶּה רַמַּת מִצְפֶּה, ch. xx. 8; a city of the Levites, ch. xxi. 38; 1 Chron. vi. 80; a city of refuge, according to ch. xx. 8, and Deut. iv. 43; in Solomon's time the residence of one of his prefects (1 K. iv. 13 (see the side map of Menkes' Map iii.)). Here Ahab was mortally wounded, as Micha had prophesied to him (1 K. xxii. 1-37; 2 Chron. xviii.), his son Joram slain by Hazael king of the Syrians, (2 K. viii. 28), and Jehu anointed (2 K. ix. 1-6). Probably it was the present Salt on the road from Jericho to Damascus. The road from Nablus (Shechem) also here joins the former, as Van de Velde's map distinctly shows. Without doubt this has been so for thousands of years, and hence the repeated collision of Israelitish and Syrian armies at this point was very natural. — Betonim. It still existed in Jerome's time (Onom. s. v. "Bothnia"), yet he can say nothing of its site.

From Mahanaim unto the border of Debir. In this language the extension of the country of Gad from east to west is indicated. Mahanaim, i. e. double camp, or double army (of the angels), most familiar both from the narrative of Jacob's return homeward (Gen. xxxii. 2), and from the history of David who fled thither from Absalom (2 Sam. xvii. 24, 27; 1 K. ii. 8). Here also Ishbosheth was summoned by Abner to be king. A Levitical city, ch. xxi. 39; 1 Chron. vii. 80; the residence of a prefect in Solomon's time (1 K. iv. 16). The site cannot be accurately given. Von Raumer looks for it in the Jordan meadow (p. 253), because it lay north of the Jabbok, and yet belonged to Gad. But north of the Jabbok Gad's border (p. 231) only took in the Jordan meadow, as he thinks. To this assumption Keil rightly replies: "But, since Mahanaim, according to ver. 30, lay on the border of Manasseh, and already belonged to Bashan, it may also have lain on the plateau north of the Jabbok, perhaps near a ford of that stream (Gen. xxxii. 22), since nowhere in the O. T. is the Jabbok spoken of as the northern border of the territory of Gad." This view is adopted also by Menke in his Atlas.

Unto the border of Debir (לְבִיר). Since לְ as a sign of the Stat. constr. occurs nowhere else in our book, J. D. Michaelis, appealing to 2 Sam. ix. 4 and xvii. 27, proposed to read לְבִיר דְּבִיר, which is favored by the circumstance that in 2 Sam. xvii. 27, לְבִיר דְּבִיר occurs in connection with Mahanaim. Hitzig (Begr. d. Krit. p. 137, apud Keil, p. 341) conjectures that the לְ was only an error in copying, from the repetition of the לְ in בְּבִיר. Keil thinks it possible that the לְ may have belonged to the name, which would then be sounded Lidhbir. Since the LXX. read Δεβίρ, we decide for the view of Hitzig, rejecting the suppositions of Michaelis and Keil. Where this Debir lay (the third, for there were two in Judæa, von Raumer, p. 184) is not made out. Even Eusebius could say nothing of it except that it was πολις τῶν Ἀμορραίων. Perhaps, on the heights which border the Jordan, and hence named as their western boundary point?

Ver. 27. In the valley. The Jordan valley is meant, as in ch. xvii. 16, elsewhere called הַעֲרֵבָה.

Betharam, already Num. xxxii. 36 belonging to Gad, at the foot of Mount Peor, afterward called Julius or Livias, but not to be identified with the Gaulanitic Julias (von Raumer, p. 260). Beth-nimra, also Num. xxxii. 36, referred to Gad; now the ruins of Remrîm.

Succoth and Zaphon, likewise in the Jordan valley. In regard to Succoth, cf. especially Robinson (Later Bibl. Res., pp. 311, 312) and von Raumer (p. 256, Remark 347). Even unto the end of the sea of Cinnereth, cf. ch. xii. 3.

Ver. 28. Thus the country of the sons of Reuben and Gad together covers the kingdom of Sihon. Cf. ch. xii. 2, 3.

d. The Possession of the Half Tribe of Manasseh, ver. 29-32. This embraces the kingdom of Og, ch. xii. 4, 5. From Mahanaim. To be understood as was "from Heshbon," ver. 26.

Villages of Jair. יַיִר = יִירָא life, the name of the first woman as the mother of all living, Gen. iii. 20; iv. 1; here as Num. xxxii. 41; Deut. iii. 14 = camp, tent-village. "The name יַיִר occurs only of the villages of Jair, and probably denotes a particular kind of towns; but it is yet obscure" (Knobel). Keil translates the name Jair-life [Jairleben], thinking probably of names of towns among us, like Eisleben, Aschersleben. Knobel says further, on Num. xxxii. 41, concerning these villages of Jair: "The division of Jair conquered the cities of the Amorites and named them after themselves. These Jair-towns, sometimes given as 23, sometimes 30, and again as 60 in number, as the Manassite occupation of the country changed in the course of time, were given up, together with Kenath and "her daughters," to the Aramæans and Geshurites (1 Chron. ii. 23). They lay in Bashan (Josh. xiii. 30) or in Argob, reaching as far as the border of Maacha and Geshur (Deut. iii. 14); hence in the plain of Jaulan and Hauran, but are also placed in the land of Gilead (Judg. x. 4; 1 Chron. ii. 22), and are mentioned with Argob in Bashan (1 K. iv. 13). This may be explained in this way. The southern part of Hauran lies east of northern Gilead, then follows, from about Remtha, the district ez-Zeit on as far as the Zerka (Jabbok, which goes up far to the east of Gilead), and is for the most part, a flat country with many uninhabited places (Burek. Syria, pp. 395, 397, 453 ff., Seetzen, i. p. 383). It belonged jointly to Manasseh. According to Arabian authorities there must lie in each of the three districts Zueit, Jaulan, and Ledja, 366 ruined towns and villages (Buckingham, Syria, ii. pp. 118, 142, 434); and Dhaheri speaks of it as a common opinion that in Hauran there are more than a thousand places (Rosenmuller, Analecta Arabica, iii. 22)."

Ver. 31, comp. ch. xii. 4. "This northern Gilead belonged to half of the children of Machir (1 Chr. v. 24). The others received their portion west of the Jordan, ch. xvii. 2 ff.

Ver. 32. A repetition of the statement that Moses had already ordered this division of the trans-Jordanic country.

Ver. 33, comp. v. 14. — On von Raumer's hypothesis concerning the Jair-towns, see the explanation of ch. xix. 34, [comp. also, Stanley, Sin. & Pal. App. § 86; Grove, in Dict. of the Bibl., art. "Jair." — Tr.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

[MATT. HENRY: Note, it is good for those who are old and stricken in years, to be put in remembrance of their being so. Some have gray hairs here and there upon them and perceive it not. Hos. vii. 9; they do not care to think of it, and therefore need to be told of it, that they may be quickened to do the work of life, and make preparation for death which is coming on them apace. — All people, but especially old people, should set themselves to do quickly that which must be done before they die, lest death prevent them.

THE SAME, on Deut. xviii. 2: Care is taken that the priests entangle not themselves with the affairs of this life, nor enrich themselves with the wealth of this world; they have better things to mind, — Note, those that have God for their inheritance, according to the new covenant, should not be greedy of great things in the world, neither gripe what they have, nor grasp at more, but look upon all things present with the indifference which becomes those that believe God to be all-sufficient. — Care is likewise taken that they want not any of the comforts and conveniences of this life. Though God, who is a Spirit, is their inheritance, it does not therefore follow that they must live on the air. — Tr.]

3. Beginning of the Distribution.

CHAPTER XIV. 1-5.

- 1 And these are the countries which the children of Israel inherited in the land of Canaan,<sup>1</sup> which Eleazar the priest, and Joshua the son of Nun, and the heads of the fathers of the tribes of the children [sons] of Israel distributed for inheritance [a
- 2 possession] to them. [,] By lot was their inheritance [by the lot of their possession], as the Lord [Jehovah] commanded by the hand of Moses, for the nine tribes,
- 3 and for the half-tribe. For Moses had given the inheritance [possession] of [the] two tribes and an half-tribe on the other side [of the] Jordan: but unto the Levites
- 4 he gave none [no] inheritance among them. For the children [sons] of Joseph were two tribes, Manasseh and Ephraim: therefore [and] they gave no part unto the Levites in the land, save cities to dwell in, with [and] their suburbs [pasture-
- 5 grounds] for their cattle, and for their substance. As the Lord [Jehovah] commanded Moses, so the children of Israel did, and they divided the land.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 1. — And these are what the sons of Israel received as a possession in the land of Canaan, what Eleazar the priest, etc. — Tr.]

4. The Possession of Caleb.

CHAPTER XIV. 6-15.

- 6 Then [And] the children [sons] of Judah came unto Joshua in Gilgal: and Caleb the son of Jephunneh the Kenazite, said unto him, Thou knowest the thing [word] that the Lord [Jehovah] said unto Moses the man of God concerning me
- 7 and thee in Kadesh-barnea. Forty years old was I when Moses the servant of the Lord [Jehovah] sent me from Kadesh-barnea to spy out the land; and I brought
- 8 him word again as it was in my heart. Nevertheless [And] my brethren that went up with me made the heart of the people melt; but I wholly followed the Lord

- 9 [Jehovah] my God. And Moses swore on that day, saying: Surely the land whereon thy feet have [thy foot hath] trodden shall be thine inheritance [thy possession], and thy children's for ever; because thou hast wholly followed the Lord
- 10 [Jehovah] my God. And now, behold, the Lord [Jehovah] hath kept me alive, as he said, these forty and five years, even [omit: even] since the Lord [Jehovah] spake this word unto Moses, while the children of [omit: the children of] Israel wandered [walked] in the wilderness; and now, lo [behold], I am this day fourscore
- 11 and five years old. As yet I am as strong this day, as I was in the day that Moses sent me; as my strength was then, even [omit: even] so is my strength now, for
- 12 war, both [and] to go out, and to come in. Now therefore [and now] give me this mountain, whereof the Lord [Jehovah] spake in that day; for thou heardest in that day how the Anakims were there, and that the cities were great and fenced [and great and fortified cities]: if so be [perhaps] the Lord [Jehovah] will be with me, then I shall be able to drive them out, as the Lord [Jehovah] said.
- 13 And Joshua blessed him, and gave unto Caleb the son of Jephunneh, Hebron
- 14 for an inheritance [a possession]. Hebron therefore became the inheritance [possession] of Caleb the son of Jephunneh the Kenezite unto this day; because that
- 15 he wholly followed the Lord [Jehovah] God of Israel. And the name of Hebron before was Kirjath-arba: which Arba was a great man among the Anakims. And the land had rest from war.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The chapter contains, partly, vers. 1-5, the introduction to the division of the country west of the Jordan among the nine and a half remaining tribes, and partly an episode breaking the connection between ch. xiv. 1-5 and xv. 1 ff., concerning the possession of Caleb. With this, ch. xv. 13-19 and Judg. i. 10-15, which agree with each other, are to be compared.

a. (3) Ver. 1-5. Introduction to the Division of the Land West of the Jordan. Ver. 1. As distributors Eleazar and Joshua are named here, as in Num. xxxiv. 17, while in ch. xiii. 6, 7; xviii. 6, 8, 10, Joshua alone casts the lot or grants the land as in vers. 13; xvii. 15, 18. Eleazar, אֵלֶּעָזָר (whom God helps, Gotthilf), "was Aaron's third son and successor in the high-priesthood, Ex. vi. 23, 25; Num. iii. 2. After the death of his father he followed him in the dignity of the high-priesthood; Num. xx. 25 ff; Dent. x. 6, and was associated thus for a time with Moses, and with Joshua, ch. xiv. 1; xvii. 4 ff. His death is related ch. xxiv. 33" (Winer, i. 314).

Ver. 2. Eleazar and Joshua distributed the land through the lot of their possession; i. e. through the lot by which the part of the land was to be determined according to Num. xxvi. 55, whether in the north or in the south, whether in the east or in the west, whereas the magnitude of the portion was to be fixed (Num. xxvi. 56) according to the population of the tribe, by Moses or his successor. "Whether also the provinces of the several families of the tribes were assigned by lot, or whether this was left to the heads of the tribes, respectively, is not to be discovered" (Knobel).

The distribution by lot of conquered countries appears also in other histories. Thus it was "a standing custom with the Athenians, to divide the land of conquered enemies to colonists by lot, (Diod. xv. 23, 29). They proceeded in this manner in Eubœa (Herod. v. 77; 6, 100), and in Lesbos (Thuc. iii. 50). Among the Romans, also we read of sorte agros legionibus assignare (Cic. Epp. add. Divv., xi. 20, comp. Appian, Bell. Civ., v. 74)" (Knobel).

How the lot was taken we are not informed. Most probably, as the Rabbins have conjectured, there were two urns. In one had been placed little tablets (Keil: tickets) with the names of the tribe, and in the other similar tablets with the names of the districts; and one of each was drawn at the same time. If we reject the supposition of two urns, we may think of one containing the tablets designating the portions of country, which the heads of the several tribes may have drawn, As Jehovah had commanded by Moses, Num. xxvi. 52 ff.

Ver. 4. The appointment concerning the Levitical cities is found Num. xxxv. 1 ff. where it is stated also how large their pasture-grounds should be. שָׂדֵה פָּדוּתָם from שָׂדֵה to drive, drive forth signifies a place whither cattle are driven (Germ. Trieb, Trift, [comp. Eng.: drove, "a road for driving cattle," Webster]), and denotes here the space around the city which should serve for the driving of herds" (Knobel on Num. xxxv. 2). A diagram by which the dimensions in Num. xxxv. 5 may be clearly apprehended is given in Keil on this passage.<sup>1</sup> These pasture-grounds (Bunsen: Commons); in Switzerland called Allmenden, are repeatedly mentioned ch. xx. Luther [the Eng. version also] translates, incorrectly: suburbs, led evidently by the Vulg., which renders שָׂדֵה suburbana.

b. (4) Vers. 6-15. Caleb's Possession. Caleb, the patriarch of the sons of Judah (Num. xxxiv. 19), accompanied by the men of his tribe (ver. 6), approaches Joshua, and desires, with an appeal to the promise of Moses (ver. 9), and with a declaration of his still unbroken capacity for war (ver. 11), that the mountain of Hebron may be given to him, out of which he purposes to extirpate the

<sup>1</sup> [This is Keil's figure: — Tn.]

Anakites (ver. 12). Joshua promptly and gladly grants the request of the respected, proved, and brave old man, who had once with himself spied out the land from Kadesh-barnea (Num. xiii. 7-9; xiv. 6). The place of the transaction is Gilgal, and that, as has before been shown, in the Jordan-valley. Later, ch. xviii. 1, we find the camp moved to Shiloh.

Ver. 6. Caleb, the son of Jephunneh, the Kenezite. Caleb, קָלֵב (perhaps, seizing vehemently, from קָלַב, Gesen.<sup>1</sup>), son of one Jephunneh, of the tribe of Judah (Num. xiii. 6), one of the spies (Num. xiii. 7), had in vain encouraged the Israelites to venture an attack and take possession of the promised land (Num. xiii. 31). Pained at the cowardice of the people, he and Joshua rent their garments and still urged the people to a bold and resolute deed, which so enraged the latter that they were ready to stone them both (Num. xiv. 10). On account of their fidelity, Caleb and Joshua alone were deemed worthy to enter into the land of Canaan (xiv. 24, 30, 38; xxvi. 65; 1 Macc. ii. 56; Sirach xvi. 11, 12). He is here, as in ver. 14 and also in Num. xxxii. 12, called קִנְזִי, i. e. a descendant of Kenaz, which name occurs yet again, as Judg. i. 12, in the family of Caleb. We agree with Winer (i. 654) in thinking it quite unlikely that there is here any connection with the Kenizzites mentioned Gen. xv. 19, as Bertheau and Ewald suppose. [But see Smith's Dict. of the Bible, articles "Caleb" and "Kenezites"].

We next have the speech of Caleb, whose main thought has been already given above. He first calls to mind the word which Jehovah in Kadesh-barnea spoke to Moses, the man of God, concerning him and Joshua. It is found in Num. xiv. 24, 30, but purports only, as Keil aptly remarks, that the Lord will bring Caleb into the land whither he had gone, and give it to his seed for a possession. Kadesh-barnea we have already found mentioned in ch. x. 41, and shall find it again ch. xv. 3, 23.

The name sounds either as here, or merely קָלֵב (Gen. xiv. 7; xvi. 14; Num. xx. 16), or קָלָב (ch. xv. 23). It lay at the foot of the mountain of the Amorites (Deut. i. 19-21), was reached by the Israelites in eleven days from Horeb, and was the principal scene of their stubbornness and insubordination (Num. xiv.; xx. 1-13), and where they decided their fate for the long period of forty years. Robinson, whom Hitzig (Gesch. d. v. Israels, i. 89) unhesitatingly follows, regards as Kadesh, Ain el-Weibeh, which lies northwest of Petra, and almost south of the Dead Sea. Von Raumer fixes upon the more northerly Ain Hasb (p. 209, as with special particularity, p. 483 ff.), lying, as well as the former place, in the Arabah. Menke has followed on his map the opinion of Rowland, controverted by both Robinson and Raumer, according to which Kadesh must be sought far west of the Arabah. Thither Menke transfers Mount Seir, also, and the wilderness of Zin. But how then should Num. xxi. 4 be understood in comparison with Deut. ii. 12?<sup>2</sup>

Ver. 7. At the time when he was sent forth from Kadesh-barnea Caleb was forty years old. He brought back a report, and as he expresses it, so as it was in [lit. with] my heart. Hebr. כַּלְבִּי עַל־לִבִּי. Luther translates לבב here as in Job xxvii. 6, by "conscience." We are not to think of conscience, however, but rather of the bold confident spirit of Caleb, which he spoke out just as he felt it. He was a spirited man and not discouraged like the rest. On the variant reading of the LXX. (αβραύ) which presupposes לבבו, as one codex of Kennicott has it, see Keil, in loc.

Ver. 8. Not so were his brethren who went up with him; they rather discouraged (הִמְצִיחַ) for הִמְצִיחַ, Ewald, Lehrg. § 142, a; Gesen. § 75. Rem. 17) the heart of the people; prop. they made the heart of the people to melt, as in Eng. vers. Comp. ch. ii. 11; v. 1, but especially vii. 5. By that Caleb was not troubled, but wholly followed (comp. Num. xiv. 24) Jehovah, i. e. completely fulfilled (מִלְאָתִי) what Jehovah required,—rendered him unconditional, cheerful obedience.

Ver. 9. In consequence of this Moses swore to give him the land on which his foot had trod. We find no difficulty in meeting with this oath in Deut. i. 34 ff. where ver. 36 agrees, in part literally, with the verse before us. And although it is there said that God swore, here that Moses did, we see, ceteris paribus, no irreconcilable discrepancy. Moses, the man of God (ver. 6), swears in the name and at the command of God. Knobel's observation: "moreover we read, in what the Jehovahist has given of the report of the author, of an oath of Jehovah, Num. xiv. 21, 24," needs correction, since the oath in question, which is identical with that in Deut. i. 34, is the one mentioned Num. xiv. 21, 24.

[Jehovah my God. It is less easy to reconcile this expression with any form of the oath as taken by Jehovah. May we not assume that Caleb quotes some expression of Moses not elsewhere preserved to us, but familiar then to Joshua?—Tr.]

Ver. 10. God has fulfilled his promise and kept him alive, as he spoke, and that for these forty and five years . . . while Israel walked in the wilderness. אֵלֶּיךָ has here the signification "in which" (time), "while," Ewald, Lehrg. § 321, c. Concerning the forty-five years see the Introd. § 4.

Ver. 11. The might of the hero is still unbroken although he is now eighty-five years old. A similar statement is made of Moses, Deut. xxxiv. 7.

Ver. 12. On the ground of all these facts Caleb now asks for mount Hebron, although he had, according to Num. xiii. 21, gone much further into the country, even into the north of Palestine, while certainly, according to Num. xiii. 22, 23, he had spied out the land only into the region of Hebron. As there vers. 22, 23 are inserted into the context so is it here with this whole passage, vers. 6-15, which probably comes from the same hand. It is remarkable also, that Caleb here says to Joshua: thou hearest in that day, how the Anakim were there, since Joshua (Num. xiii. 8) also was one of the spies; cf. besides Knobel on this passage, also Bleek, Introduction, i. p. 316. As Anakim were mentioned, Num. xiii. 22; Judg. i. 10, and in this book, ch. xv. 14, Sheshai, Ahiman, and Talmi.

<sup>1</sup> [Gesenius: "perhaps, dog, for קָלָב" from קָלָב "to bark, to yelp." But Fürst and Dietrich (in his edition of

Gesenius) give the above explanation. See Smith's Dict. art. "Caleb," Am. Edition. — Tr.]

<sup>2</sup> [The site of Kadesh is fully discussed in the Dict. of the Bible, s. v.]

Perhaps Jehovah will be with me that I may drive them out, as Jehovah said. According to ch. xi. 21, Joshua had already driven them out, (יִנְקֶדָה). — יִנְקֶדָה for יִנְקֶדָה Gesen. § 103, 1, Rem. Ewald, Lehrg. § 264, a.

Ver. 13. Joshua cheerfully granted the request of Caleb. He blessed him, i. e. "joined with his gratitude for the courageous declaration, an expression of his good wishes and prayer for the success of his undertaking; comp. Gen. xiv. 19; xxvii. 23; Ex. xxxix. 43; 2 Sam. xiv. 22" (Knobel). Joshua himself, as in ch. xvii. 14 ff., bestows on him the land.

Ver. 14. Thus Hebron passes over into the hands of Caleb. According to ch. xxi. 11, he must have yielded the city to the Levites, while he held the land for himself.

Ver. 15. A notice that in earlier times (קִרְיָת) Hebron had been called "city of Arba," who was a great man among the Anakim. The same remark is repeated ch. xv. 13; xxi. 11, and had already occurred Gen. xxiii. 2. Another piece of information see Num. xiii. 22.

And the land had rest from war; repeated here from ch. xi. 23.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The manner of employing the lot here is different from its use in ch. vii. 14, inasmuch as we here have to deal, not with a criminal process, but only with the fairest possible performance of an administrative transaction, namely, with the division of the land. In this case also God himself should give the decision, and therefore resort is had to the lot. So again after the return from the exile the resettlement of the capital was effected by casting lots (Neh. xi. 1), comp. Winer, ii. 31.

2. That the Levites received no province as a tribe, but rather cities for their habitation, and pastures for their herds, just so much, therefore, as, joined to the portion of the offerings mentioned Num. xviii., was necessary for their subsistence, this was altogether suited to keep them in lively remembrance that Jehovah was their inheritance. Christ expresses the same principle in regard to his disciples, Matt. x. 9, 10; Mark vi. 8, 9; Luke ix. 3; x. 4, 7. Paul appeals directly to the O. T. arrangement, 1 Cor. ix. 13, although for himself he makes no claim to this right, 1 Cor. ix. 18. Now also these principles ought to give the standard to congregations and church authorities in fixing the salaries of spiritual offices. Fat benefices with large landed possessions or extravagant revenues of money are wrong; but equally wrong is it when care for subsistence daily oppresses the preacher and robs him of the joy of his calling. In this matter there is still much room for improvement. Rightly, therefore, does Starke say: "The Levites were by this wise arrangement so much the more assured of their earthly support, and could so much the more diligently and without embarrassment perform their duty. They are a pattern for all Christians, who ought to regard all which they have as a gift of God."

3. The youthful freshness with which Caleb comes forward, has in it something uncommonly cheering, and shows how a pious walk joined with an efficient accomplishment of the business of life, keeps a man even physically sound and vigorous up to advanced age. It was so also with Moses, and even in our time there were and are men who have shared the same beautiful lot. Of one at least let us here make mention, the recently departed Nitzsch. Compare also in Schleiermacher's Monologen the discourse concerning "Youth and Age."

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Caleb's demand. (1) On his part well grounded, therefore: (2) gladly granted by Joshua. — What is right and just one may well demand. — How God sustains those who are his even to old age, and until they are gray (Is. xlv. 4), shown in the case of Caleb. — The blessing of a faithful fulfillment of the commands of God. — The land had ceased from war (Peace Sermon).

STARKE: Only he who is a child of God and belongs to the peculiar people of God, can partake of the heavenly inheritance, Gal. iv. 7; iii. 29; Rom. viii. 17. — In the reception of earthly good we must refer everything to the divine blessing. — O, how profitable is godliness! It is profitable unto all things and has the promise of the life which now is and of that which is to come, 1 Tim. iv. 8; Matt. vi. 33. Although God does good to his children and blesses them, yet with the sweet He always shows them the rod also, Mal. iii. 16–18. — In the world is war and strife, but in heaven, peace, rest, and blessedness, Job vii. 1.

CRAMER: Dividing an inheritance and all business transactions and dealings are matters of conscience, 1 Thes. iv. 6. — No one can of himself take for himself anything of the kingdom of heaven, and of eternal life, except it be given to him from above, John iii. 27. — That to which a man has a right he may even demand of the magistrate, for to this end are judges appointed, Deut. xvii. 18. — Our glory and boast should be the testimony of a good conscience, 2 Cor. i. 12, Acts xxiv. 16. — Godliness is rewarded also with long life and health, Ps. xci. 16; Prov. iii. 2.

OSIANDER: Although we certainly cannot attain blessedness through our own works and merits, still God of his great goodness is wont to reward what we do from the spirit of submissive obedience with temporal and spiritual benefits.

SECTION SECOND.

DIVISION OF WEST PALESTINE AMONG THE NINE AND A HALF TRIBES REMAINING. APPOINTMENT OF THE CITIES OF REFUGE, AND THE CITIES OF THE LEVITES.

CHAPTER XV.—XXI.

1. Territory of the Tribe of Judah.

CHAPTER XV.

a. Its Boundaries.

CHAPTER XV. 1–12.

- 1 THIS then was the lot of the tribe of the children of Judah by their families ; even to the border of Edom, the wilderness of Zin southward was the uttermost
- 2 part of the south coast. And their south border was from the shore [end] of the
- 3 salt sea, from the bay [Heb. tongue] that looketh southward : And it went out to the south side to [of] Maaleh [the ascent of] Acrabbim, and passed along to Zin, and ascended up on the south side unto [of] Kadesh-barnea, and passed along to
- 4 Hezron, and went up to Adar, and fetched a compass to Karkaa : From thence it [and] passed toward Azmon, and went out unto the river [water-course] of Egypt ; and the goings out of that [the] coast [border] were * at the sea ; this shall be your south coast [border].
- 5 And the east border was the salt sea, even unto the end of the Jordan : and their [the] border in the north quarter was from the bay [tongue] of the sea, at the utter-
- 6 most part [the end] of the Jordan : And the border went up to Beth-hogla, and passed along by the north of Beth-arabah ; and the border went up to the stone of
- 7 Bohan the son of Reuben : And the border went up toward Debir from the valley of Achor, and so northward looking [and turned northward] toward Gilgal, that is before the going up to Adummim, which is on the south side of the river [water-course] : and the border passed toward the waters of En-shemesh [Sun-spring], and
- 8 the goings out thereof were at En-rogel [Fullers-spring] : And the border went up by [into] the valley of the son of Hinnom, unto the south side of the Jebusite ; the same is Jerusalem : and the border went up to the top of the mountain that lieth before the valley of Hinnom westward, which is at the end of the valley of the
- 9 giants [Rephaim] northward : And the border was drawn <sup>2</sup> from the top of the hill [mountain] unto the fountain of the water of Nephtoah, and went out to the cities of mount Ephron ; and the border was drawn to Baalah, which is Kirjath-jearim :
- 10 And the border compassed [took a compass] from Baalah westward unto mount Seir, and passed along unto the side of mount Jearim (which is Chesalon) on the north side [Fay, more exactly : to the side northward of Har-jearim, that is Ches-
- 11 alon], and went down to Beth-shemesh, and passed on to Timnah : And the border went out unto the side of Ekron northward : and the border was drawn to Shicron, and passed along to mount Baalah, and went out unto Jabneel ; and the goings out of the border were at the sea.
- 12 And the west [prop. sea] border was to [or at] the great sea, and the coast thereof. This is the coast [border] of the children of Judah round about, according to their families.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 1.—This verse would read more exactly as follows : And there was the lot for the tribe of the sons of Judah, according to their families : toward the border of Edom, the wilderness of Zin southward, in the extreme south. — Ta.]

[2 Ver. 9.—Gesenius inclines to the meaning "stretched" "extended," for כָּתַב in the Kal and Piel ; and so De Wette, Fay, and others translate ; but as Fürst and Winer (Simonis) approve in these conjugations the definition "mark off," definitur, which all admit to be the sense of the Piel, there seems to be no necessity for changing the English version. — Ta.]

* The Kethib כָּתַב, although we cannot allowably ex- | the text rather than the needless Keri כָּתַב. Comp. ch. press it as a sing. in the translation, is to be retained in | xi. 2. Ewald's Lehrg. § 806, a.

b. Caleb's Possession. His Daughter Achsah. Conclusion to vers. 1-12.

CHAPTER XV. 13-20. Comp. ch. xiv. 6-15; Judg. i. 10-15.

13 And unto Caleb the son of Jephunneh he gave a part among the children of Judah, according to the commandment of the Lord [Jehovah] to Joshua, even the city 14 of Arba [Kirjath-arba, ch. xiv. 15] the father of Anak, which city is Hebron. And Caleb drove thence the three sons of Anak, Sheshai, and Ahiman, and Talmi, the 15 children [sons] of Anak. And he went up thence to the inhabitants of Debir: and 16 the name of Debir before was Kirjath-sepher [Book-city, comp. ver. 49]. And Caleb said, He that smiteth Kirjath-sepher, and taketh it, to him will I give Achsah 17 my daughter to wife. And Othniel, the son of Kenaz, the brother of Caleb, took 18 it: and he gave him Achsah his daughter to wife. And it came to pass, as she came 19 unto him [came in], that she moved him to ask of her father a field: and she lighted 20 off her [the] ass; and Caleb said unto her, What wouldest thou? Who answered
[And she said], Give me a blessing; for thou hast given me <sup>1</sup> a south land [prop. a land of the south-country]; give me also springs of water: and he gave her the upper springs, and the nether springs. This is the inheritance [possession] of the tribe of the children [sons] of Judah according to their families.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 19.—<sup>1</sup>כִּנְיָה. Since the suff. ך cannot well be taken as a dat. but only as an acc., many have understood <sup>1</sup>כִּנְיָה adverbially, "into a land," etc. So Fay, following Knobel: Nach dem Mittagslande hast du mich gegeben. So also the LXX: δὲν εἰς γῆν Νάγες δέδωκας με; but the Vulgate more simply regards this as a case where the verb of giving governs two accusatives; terram australem et torrentem dedisti mihi. Gesen. Lex. s. v. <sup>1</sup>כִּנְיָ p. 708, 1. With this agree De Wette, Maurer, Kell, Zuns. — Ta.]

c. Catalogue of the Cities of the Tribe of Judah.

CHAPTER XV. 21-63.

a. Cities in the South.

CHAPTER XV. 21-32.

21 And the uttermost cities<sup>1</sup> of the tribe of the children [sons] of Judah toward 22 the coast [border] of Edom southward were Kabzeel, and Eder, and Jagur, And 23 24 Kinah, and Dimonah, and Adadah, And Kedesh, and Hazor, and Ithnan, Ziph, 25 and Telem, and Bealoth, And Hazor, Hadattah [Hazor-hadattah], and Kerioth, 26 27 and Hezron [Kerioth-hezron] which is Hazor, Amam, and Shema, and Moladah, 28 And Hazar-gaddah, and Heshmon, and Beth-palet, And Hazar-shual, and Beer-
29 30 sheba, and Bizjoth-jah, Baalah, and Iim, and Azem, And Eltolad, and Chesil, 31 32 and Hormah, And Ziklag, and Madmannah, and Sansannah, And Lebaoth, and Shilhim, and Ain, and Rimmon: all the cities are twenty and nine, with [and] their villages.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver 21.—And the cities were, in [or from] the extremity of the tribe of the sons of Judah, toward the border of Edom, in the south-country: Kabzeel, etc. — Ta.]

β. Cities in the Lowland.

CHAPTER XV. 33-47.

33 34 And in the valley [lowland], Eshtaol, and Zoreah, and Ashnah, And Zanoah, 35 and En-gannim, Tappuah, and Enam, Jarmuth, and Adullam, Socoh, and Azekah, 36 And Sharaim, Adithaim, and Gederah, and Gederothaim; fourteen cities with [and] their villages:
37 38 Zenan, and Hadashah, and Migdalgad, And Dilean, and Mizpeh, and Jok-39 40 theel, Lachish, and Bozkath, and Eglon, And Cabbon, and Lahmam,<sup>a</sup> and Kith-

<sup>a</sup> Numerous Codd. and Editions read לַחֲמַס (Lahmas) instead of לַחֲמֵה.

- 41 lish, And Gederoth, Beth-dagon, and Naamah, and Makkedah; sixteen cities with [and] their villages:
- 42 43 44 Libnah, and Ether, and Ashan, And Jiphtah, and Ashnah, and Nezib, And Keilah, and Achzib, and Mareshah; nine cities with [and] their villages:
- 45 46 Ekron, with [and] her towns [Heb. daughters], and her villages: From Ekron even unto the sea [or, and westward], all that lay near [by the side of]
- 47 Ashdod, with [and] their villages: Ashdod with [omit: with] her towns and her villages; Gaza, with her towns [daughters] and her villages, unto the river [water-course] of Egypt, and the great sea <sup>a</sup> and the border thereof.

γ. Cities on the Mountain.

CHAPTER XV. 48-60.

- 48 And in the mountains [prop. on the mountain], Shamir, and Jattir, and Socoh,
- 49 50 And Dannah, and Kirjath-sannah, which is Debir, And Anab, and Eshtemoh,
- 51 and Anim, And Goshen, and Holon, and Giloh; eleven cities with [and] their villages:
- 52 53 Arab, and Dumah, and Eshean, And Janum,<sup>b</sup> and Beth-tappuah, and Aphe-
- 54 kah, And Humtah, and Kirjath-arba (which is Hebron) and Zior; nine cities with [and] their villages:
- 55 56 Maon. Carmel, and Ziph, and Juttah, And Jezreel, and Jokdeam, and Zanoah,
- 57 Cain, Gibeah, and Timnah; ten cities with [and] their villages.
- 58 59 Halhul, Beth-zur, and Gedor, And Maarath, and Beth-anoth, and Eltekon: six cities with [and] their villages:<sup>c</sup>
- 60 Kirjath-baal (which is Kirjath-jearim) and Rabbah; two cities with [and] their villages.

δ. Cities in the Wilderness.

CHAPTER XV. 61-63.

- 61 62 In the wilderness, Beth-arabah, Middin, and Secacah, And Nibshan, and the city of Salt, and En-gedi; six cities with [and] their villages.
- 63 As for the Jebusites the inhabitants of Jerusalem, the children [sons] of Judah could not drive them out; but the Jebusites dwell with the children [sons] of Judah at Jerusalem unto this day.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The beginning of the account concerning the division of Palestine having been given in vers. 1-6 of the preceding chapter, we find the continuation of it in ch. xv. 1 and onward. The enumeration of names which now follows, embracing five chapters in all, with only three interruptions (chaps. xv. 3-19; xvii. 3-18; xviii. 1-10) and those instructive, is extremely valuable for the geography of Palestine. It suggests a comparison with Homer's catalogue of ships, Il. ii. 484 ff. For the cartographic presentation of the places named the maps of Kiepert, Van de Velde, and Menke may be consulted. [Osborne's Wall-map, also, and the maps accompanying Robinson's Researches]. In ch. xv. we have given us the province of the tribe of Judah, (a) its bounds (vers. 1-12); (b) Caleb's possession (vers. 13-19); (c) a list of the cities (vers. 20-63).

a. Ver. 1-12. Its Boundaries, ver. 1. And there was the lot of the tribe of the sons of Judah, according to their families: toward (עַל not לְ) the border of Edom, (toward) the wilderness of Zin, southward, in (בְּ) as Gen. ii. 8; xi. 2) the extreme south; i. e. the territory of the tribe of Judah embraced the most southern part of the land, so that, as Keil rightly supposes, it touched Edom in the east and in the south had the wilderness of Zin as its border. The position of this wilderness is determined, from Num. xx. 1; xxvii. 14; xxxiii. 36, by that of Kadesh-barnea concerning which we have already spoken, on ch. xiv. 6.

<sup>a</sup> So according to the Keri הַיַּרְדֵּן, while the Kethib would have it written הַיַּבְדֵּן. On the reading of the Kethib, comp. ver. 12.

<sup>b</sup> So the Keri יַנְנוּם; the Kethib reads יַנִּים, hence Bunsen: Janim. We stand by the reading of the Masoretes with the LXX. (Janum), Vulg. (Janum), Luther, and De Wette.

<sup>c</sup> Between verses 59 and 60 the LXX. have (A B E X) the addition: Θεράν καὶ Ἐφρατά (αὐτῇ ἰστί Βεθλεέμ) καὶ Φαζάκ, καὶ Ἀντάμ (Αἰράν in Cod. Vat.) καὶ Κουάδ καὶ Ταραμί (Τεράμ in cod. Vat.) καὶ Σαφής (Θαβής in Cod. Vat.) καὶ Καρίμ καὶ Γαλλίμ καὶ Βαζάκ (Θαβή in Cod. Vat.) καὶ Μαροχά· πόλεις Ἰούδα καὶ αἰ κώμαι αὐτῶν.) See further on this in the Exegetical notes.

According to this view, the wilderness of Zin also must be sought in the Arabah, and according to Num. xiii. 26 should have formed the northern part of the wilderness of Paran. Cf. the Articles Zin and Paran in Winer, ii. 135 and 192 [and in the Dict. of the Bible]. — The general account of the position of the land of Judah is followed (vers. 2–12) by the more particular description of the boundaries; and first, the south border is drawn (vers. 2–4) so as to coincide in general with Num. xxxiv. 3–5.

Ver. 2. Its starting-point is the end of the Salt sea, more exactly still, the tongue which turns southward. "This tongue is the south (more accurately southernmost) part of the Dead Sea, below the promontory which stretches far into the sea west of Kerah (Robinson, ii. 231–234), and extending quite to the southern point at the so-called salt-mountain, and salt-marass from which the border of Judah began" (Keil). The Salt-mountain (Kaschm Usdum), and salt-swamp are accurately given on Kiepert's Map.

From this point the border runs in a tolerably direct course toward the south, as we learn from ver. 3 which says: It went out toward the south side of the ascent of Acrabbim. On Acrabbim comp. ch. xi. 17. If the mountain Acrabbim is the same as the Bald mountain, mentioned ch. xi. 17; xii. 7, as a south boundary, this height (Knobel: ascent) of Acrabbim would be a pass in this Bald mountain. Knobel who rejects the identity of the Bald and Acrabbim mountains, believes that the latter was the steep pass es-Sufah, S. W. of the Dead Sea, which view is indicated by Menke on his map, while Kiepert's sketch supports our opinion. From this south-side of the hill of Acrabbim, the border goes over toward Zin, i. e. perhaps a definite place (Keil) or mountain (Knobel) in the wilderness of Zin and deriving its name therefrom. Thence it went up to the side of Kadesh-barnea, and passed along to Hebron, . . . and went out at the water-course of Egypt, and the goings out of the border were at the sea. In other words: The border went constantly southward to Kadesh-barnea (Num. xxxiv. 3). South of Kadesh it turned toward the west, since it came out finally at the torrent of Egypt (comp. ch. xiii. 3) and at the sea. Hebron (ver. 25 with the addition "that is Hazor") Adar, Karkaa, Azmon, are to us unknown places. The torrent of Egypt was spoken of ch. xiii. 3. The sea is evidently the Mediterranean sea. Ruins of considerable cities are still met with in these regions then allotted to the tribe of Judah (Robinson, i. 290, 318; ii. 591 f.).

Ver. 4. This shall be your south border. The jussive is to be explained, as Masius and Keil observe, by reference to Num. xxxii. 2.

Next, in ver. 5 a, the east border is given: the salt sea in all its extent from south to north, to the end of the Jordan, i. e. to its embouchure at the Dead Sea.

Ver. 5 b–11. North Border. This went forth from the northern tongue of the sea at the mouth of the Jordan, and is given a second time, ch. xviii. 15–19, as the south line of Benjamin.

Ver. 6. It went up toward Beth-hogla, a boundary point between Judah and Benjamin, belonging to the latter, perhaps the same as the threshing floor of Atad and Abel-mizraim (mourning of the Egyptians) Gen. i. 10, between Jericho and the Jordan, discovered again by Robinson, ii. 268 in Ain Hadschia, (cf. von Raumer, p. 177). From Beth-Hogla it passed on northwardly to Beth-Arabah, which is ascribed now to Judah (ver. 61), now to Benjamin (ch. xviii. 22), and lay

(ver. 61) in the wilderness at the north end of the Dead Sea; and went up to the stone of Bohan, the son of Reuben. This stone of Bohan "must from the עֲלֵה and בֵּר, ch. xviii. 17, have lain nearer the mountain, that is, more to the west or southwest" (Knobel). Keil seeks it on the same grounds "nearer the mountain," and declines any more exact determination. Further conjectures see in Knobel, p. 415.

Ver. 7. From the stone of Bohan it went up toward Debir which lay in the vicinity of Gilgal, to be distinguished evidently from the Canaanitish royal city conquered by Joshua near Hebron (ch. x. 29, 38; xii. 13; xv. 15, 49; xxi. 5; 1 Chron. vii. 58), — from the valley of Achor, ch. vii. 26. Now it turned northward toward Gilgal, that is before the going up to Adummim, which is on the south side of the water-course. Keil supposes this Gilgal not to be the place of encampment mentioned ch. iv. 19, because here "its position is determined with reference to another place than Jericho." This reason would have force only if "the other place," the ascent of Adummim, could not be shown to have been in the same region. But so long ago as the time of Jerome, he observes that the ascent of Adummim (now Galaat el Demm) (Ritter, xv. 493 [Gage's transl. iii. 10], Tobler, Denkwürdigkeiten, p. 698), lay on the road from Jerusalem: "est autem confinium tribus Judae et Benjamin, descendunt ab Ælia ubi et castellum militum situm est, ob auxilia viatorum." He has in mind, as we may suppose, since from the context Luke x. 30 flits before him, the road from Jerusalem to Jericho. But Gilgal lay near Jericho, according to ch. iv. 19 being itself not a city but a larger circuit, whence, ch. xviii. 17, we read of גִּלְגָּל. The watercourse is the Wady Kelt, south of Riha. Further particulars see in Knobel, pp. 416, 417. With this view von Raumer also agrees, comp. pp. 198 with 169.

The border now goes to the Sun-spring as in ch. xviii. 17. "That is the present Ain el-Hodh, or Apostles' Spring, three-quarters of an hour north-east of Jerusalem, the only spring on the road to Jericho. Seetzen, ii. p. 273, Tobler, Topographie, etc., ii. p. 398 ff." (Knobel). From the Sun-spring it went (see the side map to Map iii. in Menke) in a southwest direction (conversely ch. xviii. 7) to the Fullers' Spring (עֵינֵי רַבֵּל, Spies' Spring would be עֵינֵי מַרְגֵּל, cf. Gen. xlii. 9 ff.; Josh. vi. 22).

This spring is mentioned again, 2 Sam. xvii. 17; 1 K. i. 9. It is the present deep and copious Well of Job (von Raumer, p. 307), or of Nehemiah, on the south side of Jerusalem, where the valleys of Kidron and Hinnom unite (Robinson, i. 354–491; Tobler, ii. p. 50 ff.) (Knobel). Furrer (p. 57) says concerning it: "Somewhat south of the gardens (p. 56) which spread themselves in the moderately broad valley formed by the junction of the ravines of Hinnom and Kidron together with the Tyropæon, we come to an old well, called En Rogel in the O. T., at the present time, Job's Well. Although it is more than one hundred feet deep [Robinson, one hundred and fifty feet], it overflows, upon a long continuance of rainy weather, which is regarded in Jerusalem as a joyful occurrence, indicating a good year. The overflow meanwhile lasts but a short time. I struck the water at a depth of twenty-eight feet. . . . The scenery about the fountain is very attractive. The hills rise high on the east and west. To the north one sees the spurs of Zion and Moriah, but little of the city walls. Southward the eye follows the course of the valley to its turn toward the southeast. There a declivity of the mountain with its olive trees and beautiful green fields formed a very pleasing back-ground.<sup>1</sup>

Ver. 8. From En-rogel the border went up into the valley of the son of Hinnom, on the south side of the Jebusite, that is Jerusalem. The direction accordingly runs southwest on the south side of Jerusalem, where the valley mentioned lies. It is noted also, ch. xviii. 16; Neh. xi. 30, as a border between Judah and Benjamin. It was the place where, after Ahaz, the horrible sacrifice of children was offered (2 K. xxiii. 10; 2 Chron. xxviii. 3; xxxiii. 6; Jer. vii. 31; xix. 2, 6; xxxii. 35). The man from whom it derived its name is as little known as Bohan the son of Reuben (ver. 6). On account of the offerings to Moloch, the valley became "a symbol of Hell, the name of which, yeénva (Chald. יְהִינְוָה, in which יְהִי is perceptibly audible) is thence derived, cf. Matt. v. 22, eis tñ yeénva tou pyró. Hitzig and Böttcher (apud Winer, i. 492) dispute the common view that the valley was named after a person, Hinnom, and take הַלֹּם as an appellative = moaning, wailing; certainly a very appropriate designation of the scene of the sacrifice of so many innocent victims. This hypothesis falls in well with Kethib, 2 K. xxiii. 10, יְהִינְוָה — "for the complete expression עֵיר הַיְהִינְוָה, Judg. xix. 11. Jerusalem is in the same connection, called also יְהִינְוָה, Judg. xix. 11; 1 Chron. xi. 4" (Knobel). All in the time before David. So Bethel was earlier called Luz (Gen. xxviii. 19). Bethlehem Ephrath, Gen. xxxv. 16; Mich. v. 1. Out of the valley of Hinnom the border now ascended to the top of the mountain that lieth before the valley of Hinnom westward, which is at the end of the valley of giants northward. The mountain on which the border went up lies according to this statement west of the vale of Hinnom and at the north end of the vale of Rephaim. This vale of Rephaim is one which extends in a southwest direction from Jerusalem to Mar Elias, one hour long, a half hour wide, fertile (Is. xvii. 5), and still well cultivated, a valley-plain (עֲמָקָה) not properly a vale (עֵי, בְּהָרָה) "spacious enough to serve as a camp for an army (2 Sam. v. 18, 22; xxiii. 13; 1 Chron. xi. 5)," named after the old gigantic race of Canaanites, the Rephaim, from whom sprang Og king of Bashan (ch. xii. 4). "It is bounded on the north by a slight rock-ridge, which constitutes the border of the valley of Hinnom, Winer, ii. 332; Robinson, i. 324; Tobler, ii. 401 ff.) That is the mountain which is here meant.

Ver. 9. From the summit of this mountain, the line was drawn (הָיָר, related to הָיָר, to go around, from which הָיָר, outline, form, shape of the body, 1 Sam. xxviii. 14) to the fountain of the water of Nephtoah. This fountain of the water of Nephtoah, i. e. Liftah, one hour northwest of Jerusalem, irrigates a strip of smiling gardens, and its excellent water is carried also to Jerusalem (Dieterici, Reisebilder, ii. p. 221 f.; Tobler, ii. 258 ff. apud Knobel) Valentiner, p. 95, observes: "Liftah numbers its fighting men by hundreds, and provides Jerusalem, among other things, with water from its copious fountain. From its position it is doubtless to be regarded as the fountain of Nephtoah, from which the dividing line between Judah and Benjamin ran on to the cities of Mount Ephron. This latter must not be confounded with Ephraim, which lay further north, Josh. xv. 9; xviii. 15." From this fountain it ran as Valentiner, with reference to our passage, correctly states, up to the cities of Mount Ephron, and was drawn to Baalah, which is Kirjath-jearim. This mount Ephron is not elsewhere mentioned. It was certainly between Liftah and Kureyet el-Enab, therefore probably the prominent ridge, on which stand the places Soba, Kartal, Kulonieli, etc., and near which the road from Jerusalem to Joppa runs, Robinson, ii. 328 ff." (Knobel). Baala, that is, Kirjath-jearim, one of the cities marked in ch. ix. 17; xviii. 25, 26; Ezr. ii. 25; Neh. vii. 29, as belonging to Gibeon, "now Kureyet el-Enab, three hours northwest of Jerusalem, see ver. 60," (Knobel). The border still followed constantly a northwest course.

Ver. 10. Now, however, it took a compass (bent around, סָבַב) from Baala westward unto mount Seir. This mount Seir must not be mistaken for the Edomite mountain (Gen. xxxii. 3; Num. xxiv. 18; Deut. ii. 4, 5, 29; Josh. xxiv. 4); rather the mountain range is intended which runs in a southwest direction as far as the Wady Surar. The name has perhaps been preserved in Sairah, Robinson, ii. 363" (Winer, ii. 443). Cf. also Robinson, Later Bibl. Res., p. 155, who gives the height of the ridge as one thousand five hundred feet above the level of the sea.

Passed along to the side of mount Jearim (which is Chesalon) towards the north. Chesalon, probably, now Kesla (Robinson, ii. 363, more definitely, Later Bibl. Res. p. 154), was called also Har-jearim = mountain of forests, as Baala or Kirjath-jearim, = city of forests, or forest-town. The region appears therefore to have been earlier thickly covered with woods. Thence the border went down to Beth-shemesh, and passed on to Timnah. Beth-shemesh = house of the sun, here under this name as a border town of Judah; ch. xix. 41, called Ir-shemesh and counted as a border town of Dan; according to ch. xxi. 9, 16; 1 Chron. vii. 59, a city of the priests, known especially from the narrative concerning the ark of the covenant, 1 Sam. vi. 9-20. Robinson (iii. 17-20) found, "to the west of the village Ain Schems, on the plateau of a low swell or mound, between the Surar on the north and a smaller Wady on the south, the manifest traces of an ancient site. Here are the vestiges of a former extensive city consisting of many foundations, and the remains of ancient walls of hewn stone. . . . Both the name and the position of this spot seem to indicate the site of the ancient Beth-shemesh of the Old Testament," comp. Later Bibl. Res., p. 153; also, Furrer, p. 187-211, especially 198-201. Timnah, or Timnatha (ch. xix. 43) belonging to Dan, now Tibneh, west of Beth-shemesh (Furrer, p. 200), the home of Samson (Judg. xiv. 1-4). In the vineyards of Timnah, without anything in his hand he killed the lion (Judg. xiv. 5-6).

Ver. 11. Now the boundary, following a north-west course, went out unto the side of Ekron northward, i. e. to a point lying in the vicinity of

<sup>1</sup> [A full account of this spring (called there "Well of the Messengers") is given in Gage's Ritter, iv. 145-148. — Th.]

Ekron north of this Philistine city. Then it was drawn to Shicron (Socreir, Sugheir; Knobel, p. 419), and passed along to mount Baala. This mount Baala is probably, as Keil and Knobel also suppose, "the short line of hills running almost parallel with the coast, which Robinson observed west of Ekron (Akir), iii. 22, 23. From this mount Baala the border went out unto Jabneel, and then to the sea, where its goings out were.

Jabneel or Jabneh (2 Chron. xxvi. 6, יַבְנֵיֶל), destroyed by Uzziah, the Jamnia so often mentioned in the books of Maccabees (1 Macc. iv. 15; v. 58; x. 69; xv. 40; 2 Macc. xii. 9). After the destruction of Jerusalem, there was here a high school of the Jews and a Sanhedrim (Reland, p. 823, after the Talmud; apud von Raumer, p. 234). It is now Jebna, "a large village on an insignificant hill west of Akir (Knobel, after Tobler, Dritte Wanderrung, p. 20 f.; Wittmann's Reisen, ii. p. 7). Another Jabneel, which is mentioned ch. xix. 33, lay on Lebanon.

Ver. 12. Gives the West Border. The great sea, i. e., the Mediterranean. The borders thereof (הַגְּבולֹתָיו), is to be explained as in ch. xiii. 23, 27, cf. also Num. xxxiv. 6.

b. Vers. 13-20 (comp. ch. xiv. 6-15; Judg. i. 10-15). Caleb's Possession. His daughter Achsah. Conclusion to a. Nothing is said here as in the episode, ch. xiv. 6-15, of any demand of Caleb, but simply ver. 13 that Joshua gave Hebron to Caleb, according to the command of God. On the other hand we have here, in almost literal agreement with the account in Judg. i. 10-15, the story of Achsah, whom Caleb gave as a reward for the conquest of Debir, which is not alluded to in ch. xiv.

Ver. 13. It is stated that Joshua, according to the command of Jehovah (וַיִּשְׁמַע יְהוָה, here and ch. xvii. 3, with which Gesenius compares Ps. v. 1; lxxx. 1, אֱלֹהֵינוּ יִשְׁמָע, and also 1 Sam. xxvi. 4, אֱלֹהֵינוּ יִשְׁמָע), gave Caleb his portion (חֶסֶת) among the children of Judah. This command must have been communicated to Joshua then, as they were dividing the land (Knobel). A complete account of the facts is wanting, for ch. xiv. 9, which Keil would apply here, speaks not of a command of God to Joshua but of an oath of Moses to Caleb, cf. further the explanation of ch. xiv. 9. Hebron is here called Kirjath-arba as in ver. 54; xx. 7; xxi. 11; Gen. xxiii. 2; xxxv. 27 (Knobel).

Ver. 14-19. The history of Achsah, the daughter of Caleb, is introduced with the remark that Caleb drove out of Hebron the three sons of Anak, Sheshai, Ahiman, and Talmi, descendants (אֲנָכִים) of Anak.

Ver. 15. Thence he proceeded against the inhabitants of Debir. According to ch. xi. 21, Joshua had conquered and devoted Debir. On the position of this city see on ch. xi. 21. Debir before was Kirjath-sepher. Ver. 49, the same city is called קִרְיַת־סֵפֶר. On this diversity of names cf. Keil on ch. x. 38. The there quoted explanation of Bochart (Can. ii. 17) on סֵפֶר: "Id Phœnicibus idem fuit quod Arabibus Sunna, lex, doctrina, jus canonicum," suits better to קִרְיַת־סֵפֶר than if, as Gesenius supposes, סֵפֶר = סֵפֶר־רָמֶס, ramus palmæ, and קִרְיַת־סֵפֶר therefore = palm city.

Ver. 16. Caleb, like Saul, 1 Sam. xvii. 25, promises his daughter Achsah as a wife to whomsoever would conquer the city, which was found difficult to take. עָלָם־עַכְשָׁה signifies properly foot-chains, cf. Is. iii. 18.

Ver. 17. And Othniel, son of Kenaz, the brother of Caleb, took it. So we translate,<sup>1</sup> according to the view of the Masoretes, with Keil, Bunsen, and Winer (ii. 185) who appeal to Judg. i. 13; iii. 9. Omitting the comma after Kenaz, and making "the brother" in apposition with Kenaz (Kenaz the brother) is grammatically allowable, but is not the most obvious, cf. Judg. i. 13 (Bunsen). Vulg. frater; LXX. ἀδελφός. Othniel (אֹתְנִיֵּל = lion of God) was, according to Judg. iii. 9, the first Judge of Israel, who delivered his people from the tyranny of the Mesopotamian King, Chushan-rishathaim. On the allowableness of his marriage, see Michaelis, Ehegesetz Moses, § 82, Laws of Moses, § 117.

Ver. 18. Achsah had not gone with the rest into the war, but had remained with her father probably in Hebron. As now she came to Debir to become Othniel's wife, She moved him (וַתַּחֲנִיחֵהוּ) from סֵפֶר or סִיר not used in Kal, perhaps "to be excited," then in Hiphil, "to incite;" so here and Judg. i. 14; 2 Chron. xviii. 2; in particular, "to tempt to something wrong," Deut. xiii. 7; Is. xxxvi. 8; Jer. xxxviii. 22, and often) to ask of her father a field (Judg. i. 14 more definitely the field which belonged to Debir), and lighted off (וַתִּצְתֵּן) from the rare צָתָה cognate with צָנַע, Judg. i. 14; iv. 21 = to sink down, to go under; LXX. καὶ ἐβόηεν ἐκ τοῦ θυροῦ; Vulg.: "suppiravitque ut sedebat in casino." This translation of the LXX. followed by the Vulg., raises the conjecture that the LXX., instead of the unusual וַתִּצְתֵּן, read וַתִּצְעַק from the ass. "Whether Othniel followed her is not said. She herself proceeded further, and on approaching her father she sprang from the ass and humbled herself before him" (Knobel). So did Rebecca also at her first meeting with Isaac (Gen. xxiv. 64). Caleb perceived that she had something unusual to present to him, and asked: What is to thee? What wouldest thou? or what dost thou wish?

Ver. 19. And she said: Give me a blessing, בְּרָכָה, i. e., as in Gen. xxxiii. 11, a gift, a present, as Gen. xxxiii. 10, מְנַחָה used instead of it. This gift should consist in springs of water, since Caleb had given her toward the south country (נֶגֶב, comp. x. 40). It is to be noted, first, that here Debir is reckoned as belonging to the Negeb, while the city in ver. 49 is counted to the mountain; probably, as Knobel suggests, because the region was like the Negeb. Besides, the Negeb begins, at least, in that section. Secondly, בְּרָכָה occurs only here and Judg. i. 15, and is explained either "water springs" (Bunsen: Wasserstrudel, whirlpool or eddy), as Gesenius and Keil in apposition with Othniel, thus making the latter Caleb's brother. — Ta.]

<sup>1</sup> [Punctuation in English can but imperfectly serve the purpose here of the nominative ending as distinct from that of the genitive, in German, to indicate that brother is

prefer, or, according to Bertheau and Knobel, who quote Zach. iv. 2, 3; Ecc. xii. 6; 1 K. vii. 41, "water-holders," inclosed fountains, which בְּאֵר, Cant. iv. 12, should also mean. We venture not to decide, but certainly hold the translation "water springs" in a poetically colored passage, to be finer than the transfer of "water-holders." Neither can we exactly approve Bunsen's "Wasserstrudel." Thirdly, we notice that Achsah names the springs instead of the fields which were watered by them, in order doubtless "to express the direct antithesis to the בְּרָכָה:" perhaps also from feminine shrewdness and cunning, that she might not directly bring out her proper wish. That gardens and fields in Palestine are even to the present day watered from springs and cisterns is well known, cf. what was said above on ver. 7, also Cant. ii. 6; Robinson, i. 541; ii. 285; iii. 95.

And he gave her the upper springs and the lower springs. Caleb responds to the wish of his daughter, and gives her higher and lower springs, that is, higher and lower fields watered by springs. How large this possession was cannot be determined. Finally let us remark, in passing, that Handel, in his Oratorio of Joshua, brings forward Othniel and Achsah as chief personages.

Ver. 20 Belongs as a conclusion to vers. 1-12. Its position shows that vers. 13-19 were inserted. So also Keil: "the 20th verse contains the subscription or conclusion to the first division of our chapter, with which the description of the bounds of the inheritance of Judah closes."

c. List of the Cities of the Tribe of Judah. From ver. 21 on follow the names of the cities of the tribe of Judah, and a. the cities in the south country (vers. 21-32); β. the cities in the lowland (vers. 33-47); γ. the cities on the mountain (vers. 48-60); δ. the cities in the wilderness (vers. 61, 62). The whole is concluded with a notice (ver. 63) concerning the Jebusites.

a. Vers. 21-32. Cities in the South Country. Ver. 21, בְּרָכָה, at the extremity or end; בְּרָכָה, as in ver. 1.

In the south-country, בְּרָכָה; cf. ch. x. 40. The enumeration begins within the Negeb at the east, as ver. 2 ff. in giving the boundaries. First we have nine cities named and connected by the copula, which Luther in his translation omits, while the LXX. and Vulg. have it. Kabzeel or Jekabzeel (יְקָבְזֵאֵל) Neh. xi. 25 = which God gathers) was the birth-place of Benaiah one of David's heroes, 2 Sam. xxiii. 30. Eder, Jagur, not to be made out.

Ver. 22. Kinah, "Perhaps the place of the Kenites who settled in the territory of Arad, Num. x. 32" (Knobel).

Dimona = Dibon, Neh. xi. 25. "Probably the ruins ed-Dheib, northeast of Arad (Van de Velde, Mem. 252)," Knobel.

Adah = Sudeid (Rob. ii. 474). The country here is hilly and cut up by small ravines, but without steep declivities, and sparsely covered with a thin and now dried up growth of grass. (Rob. l. c.)

Ver. 23. Kedesh, Hazor, Kadesh-barnes and Hebron (ver. 3), Ithnan — unknown.

Ver. 24. A second group of five cities follows, a pentapolis. Ziph, perhaps = Kuseifeh (Rob. ii. 191, 195), southwest of Arad. Another Ziph lies on the mountain, ver. 55. — Telem we, after the example of Kimchi, with von Raumer (p. 222) and Knobel, regard = אֶמְלֵךְ, where Saul mustered his army before he moved against the Amalekites (1 Sam. xv. 4). The position, in the Negeb, suits this view. When Keil (Com. on Josh. in h. l.) objects to this assumption that the words אֶמְלֵךְ (oppression) and אֶמְלֵךְ (young lambs), came from two quite different roots; it is a sufficient answer to say, with Gesenius, that one of the names may be altered (perhaps by corrupt pronunciation), which is easily possible with names of places. Supposing this, it is more probable that אֶמְלֵךְ is derived from the longer אֶמְלֵךְ than the reverse.

Bealoth = Bealoth-beer, Ramath-negeb, Ramoth-negeb (xix. 8), on the road toward Hebron, marked on Menke's map.

Ver. 25. Hasor-hadata, חָדָתָה = New Hazor, since חָדָתָה = חדש. Perhaps Hudhairah (Rob. App. p. 114).

Kerioth-bezon, which is Hasor. Against the Masoretes, but with the LXX. and Syr., we join חָדָתָה and חָדָתָה in one name, as Reland, Maurer, Keil, and Knobel have done. In favor of this the analogy of Kirjath-arba (ver. 13) and Kirjath-jearim (ver. 9) adduced by Maurer, is of decisive weight. "Possibly the place Kuryatein north of Arad (Rob. ii. 472)," (Knobel).

Ver. 26. Third group, consisting again, like the first, of nine cities, — Amam, unknown.

Shema, a place of the Simeonites; ch. xix. 2 associated with Beer-shaba and Moladah; שֵׁמָע, probably the same name, as ש and מ are often interchanged.

Moladah, according to ch. xix. 2 likewise a place belonging to Simeon, now Milh (Rob. ii. pp. 619, 621). "Moladah was at a later period inhabited by the sons of Judah who returned from the exile (Neh. xi. 25, 26). Probably identical with Malatha, an Idumean fortress (Joseph. Ant. xviii. 6, 2); often named in the Onom." (von Raumer, p. 214). It lies on the road to Hebron, northwest of Baalath-beer. Robinson found here two wells about forty feet in depth, and walled around with good mason-work, one of them seven and a half feet, and the other five feet in diameter. The water appeared to be not good, but the Arabs of the Tiyahah watered their animals here as did the Kudeirat at Beer-sheba (Rob. l. c. note). On the plain lying near the wells to the south, the stones of a ruined town, or large village, are scattered over a space of nearly half a mile square, all unhewn. These wells and ruins in all probability mark the site of Moladah of the O. T., the Malatha of the Greeks and Romans (Rob. ubi sup.). On the etymological difficulty in deriving Milh from Moladah or Malatha, cf. the foot-note, p. 621.

Ver. 27. Hasor-gadah, Heshmon, Beth-palut, unknown.

Ver. 28. Hasor-ahual (אֶחָזֵל) = Fox-yard; [Gesen. village of Jackals], cf. the Lex. under אֶחָזֵר for other like compounds), a place of the Simeonites, ch. xix. 3; 1 Chr. iv. 28, inhabited, like Moladah and Shema, after the exile, by men of Judah, Neh. xi. 27. Possibly Th'aly (Rob. iii. App. 114).

Beer-sheba, שֵׁבַע בְּאֵר, i. e. "well of seven, meaning the seven lambs which Abraham sacrificed when he made a covenant with Abimelech (Gen. xxi. 28-32)." So von Raumer, p. 176. Others, e. g. Ges., explain, with reference to Gen.

xxvi. 30, by pateus jurisjurandi, well of the oath, making שֶׁבַע = שְׁבַע. Hitzig again (ubi sup. p. 26) in another way; "if the wilderness between Pelusium and Gaza extends for the distance of seven days' journey, Beersheba (properly, Bir sib) signifies "well of the seven day camel" (which has borne the seven days' thirst)—in the Arabic; and Arabs carry (Gen. xxxvii. 25) into Egypt, on the backs of camels, the costly productions of Gilead." Lange (Com. on Gen. xxi. 28 ff.) would not press the antithesis between "seven-well" and "oath-well." "The form designates it as the seven wells, but the seven designates it as in fact the well of the oath." In this view שֶׁבַע is taken as = seven, but at the same time it commemorates that שֶׁבַע, to swear, means primarily to "seven one's self" "to confirm by seven." Cf. Herod. iii. 8, according to whom seven things were chosen among the Arabians for the confirmation of an oath. Beer-sheba is very often mentioned in the history of the patriarchs (Gen. xxi. 14, 28-33; xxii. 19; xxvi. 23; xxviii. 10; xli. 1). According to the passage before us it belonged to Judah; from ch. xix. 2, 1 Chr. iv. 28, it was ascribed also to Simeon. It is often named in the formula "from Dan to Beersheba" (Judg. xx. 1; 2 Sam. xvii. 11; 2 Chr. xxx. 5). At present it is called Bir es-seba, on the north side of the Wady es-Seba, close on its banks, where two wells now bear this name (Robinson, i. 300-303). These two wells lie at some distance from each other, are round and walled up in a very firm and permanent manner, and furnish clear and excellent water in great abundance. The ruins on some low hills north of the well probably indicate the existence there formerly of a small and straggling city (Robinson, ubi sup.). Euseb.: ἀστυ μείστηρ. Hieron.: vicus grandis.

Birjotah — undeterminable.

Ver. 29. The names of 13 places are added, which lay to the west and southwest. Baala = Deir el-Belah (Robinson, iii. App. p. 118), some hours southwest of Gaza on the north border of the Negeb with a great forest of palm trees, and remnants of marble pillars (Ritter, xvi. 41, 42 [Gage's Trans. i. 30, 31]). The considerable plantation of date-palms at this place is remarkable from the fact that here alone in Palestine the dates still ripen; here, therefore, we pass the north limit of date culture (Ritter l. c.).

Jim, "or יֵיִם, as we may judge from Avelu in the LXX. Cod. Alex., is passed over in the enumeration of Simeonite cities ch. xix. 1 ff. and may have been not of much importance" (Knobel). The site cannot now be determined.

Exem also belonging, like Baala, to the Simeonites (ch. xix. 3) = Abdeh, a place of very considerable ruins on a ridge of rocks, and once strong, עֲצָם = firmness, strength (Knobel).

Ver. 30. Elitolad, later given likewise to Simeon, ch. xix. 4. In 1 Chr. iv. 29 it is called merely Tholad (Keil). This also remains undiscovered.

Cheail, עֵשֶׂל. According to Job ix. 9; xxxviii. 31; Amos v. 8, עֵשֶׂל is a constellation in the heavens, probably Orion. Since the place is named ch. xix. 4; 1 Chr. iv. 30; עֵשֶׂל and עֵשֶׂל, since further 1 Sam. xxx. 27, "the same place is manifestly" called עֵשֶׂל, it must have been the seat of a sanctuary as Knobel rightly con-jectures. May not, as the name indicates, that very constellation of Orion (Chesil) have been worshipped here, especially as Jerome reports (Vit. Hilar., ep. 25, ap. Robinson, i. p. 298) that the inhabitants had worshipped Venus and the Morning Star? True, the morning star is mentioned and not Orion, but Jerome hardly had so exact information. At all events, worship of the stars then existed, and that is the main thing. Probably Chesil = Elusa, where in pre-Islamite times a sanctuary of Arabic tribes existed (comp. Tuch, Zeitschrift der deutsch-morgenl. Ges., iii. p. 194 f. ap. Knobel). Elusa lies five and a half hours south of Beer-sheba (comp. Robinson, i. pp. 296-298). Horma "or Zephath, now Sepata, two and a half hours southwest of Chalaza; see Num. xiv. 45" (Knobel).

Ver. 31. Ziklag, later belonging to Simeon, ch. xix. 5; 1 Chr. v. 30. Familiar from the history of David (1 Sam. xxvii. 6; xxx. 1; 2 Sam. i. 1; iv. 10; 1 Chr. xiii. 1). Perhaps Tel el-Hasy, northeast of Gaza (von Raumer, p. 225), from which one has an extensive view, westward to the sea, in the east toward the mountains of Hebron, northward to mount Ephraim, and southward to the plains of Egypt (Ritter, xvi. 133 [Gage, iii. 246, 247]). Knobel seeks Ziklag to the southwest of Milh, where a place, Gasludh, lies on the road to Abdeh (Robinson, ii. 621), some hours east of Sepata. The etymology of Ziklag (צִיקְלָג, צִיקְלָג) is doubtful; perhaps, as Gezen. supposes, from צִיקְלָג, wilderness of destruction.

Madmanna = Minyay or Minnieh, south of Gaza (Robinson, iii. 287 f.), on the route of the pilgrims during the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries.

Sansanna — unknown. The name signifies "palm-branch." Instead of Madmanna and Sansanna, elsewhere Beth-markaboth ("Wagon-house," Knobel, Keil) and Hazar-suz or Susim ("Horse-yard," Knobel; "Horse-village," Keil) are mentioned (ix. 3) as cities of the Simeonites. Are they possibly stations of wagons and horses, as Knobel conjectures?

Ver. 32. Lebaath or Beth-lebaath, belonging to the Simeonites, ch. xix. 6; in 1 Chr. iv. 31, the name of the place is Beth Birei. Perhaps Lehem, eight hours south of Gaza.

Shilhim, called, ch. xix. 6, Saruben (שָׂרֻבֵּן), a place of the Simeonites, 1 Chron. iv. 31 = el-Scheriat, about midway between Gaza and Beer-sheba; a scene of ruins (Van de Velde, Narrative, ii. p. 144, and Mem. p. 113, apud Knobel).

Ain, Rimmon, in ch. xix. 7; 1 Chron. iv. 32; Neh. xi. 29, treated as one place. Rimmon is discovered in the ruins Um er-Rumamin, about three hours north of Beer-sheba. Only about thirty minutes south of it is the well el-Khulweilfeh, with remains of buildings (Robinson, iii. 8), on the road from Hebron to Gaza. Compare, further, Knobel on this verse.

All the cities twenty-nine and their villages. There are not twenty-nine but thirty-six, namely, (1) group first, 9; (2) group second, 5; (3) group third, 9; (4) group fourth, 13 = 36. So indeed the Syriac reads. Since, however, all the other ancient versions have twenty-nine, the Syriac probably gives a "critical correction." The matter is capable of the simple explanation that the original list had only twenty-nine cities, but later, as even Keil concedes, "a supplementary hand added still others without altering the sum total to correspond."

β. Ver. 33-47. Cities in the Lowland. Ver. 33. In the lowland. See ch. x. 40. It only needs to be remarked here that the foot-hills (אֲדָמֹת) mentioned ch. x. 40; xi. 16 are here reckoned in with the lowland. They are designated also as the land of Goshen, as was explained, ch. x. 40, (xi. 16), and form the east border of the Shephelah of Judah. The places mentioned by the author are arranged in three groups. The first of these (ver. 33-36) lies in the northeast part of the lowland.

Eshtaol and Zorea mentioned in reverse order, ch. xix. 41; Judg. xiii. 25; xvi. 31. Here ascribed to Judah, there to Dan. Eshtaol is the present Um-Eschteiyeh (Robinson, ii. 342). Zorea was Samson's home (Judg. xiii. 2), visited in modern times by Robinson (Later Bibl. Res. p. 153), Tobler (Dritte Wanderung, p. 150) and Furrer (p. 200). The prospect from the summit of Zorea is, according to Robinson's statement, beautiful and very extensive, especially toward Beth-shemesh. The well, the fields, the mountains, the women who bore water, all transported the travellers back into the earliest times, when in all probability the mother of Samson in the same manner came to the well, and laboriously carried her water-jar home. Between Zorea and Eshtaol Samson was buried in his father Manoah's tomb (Judg. xvi. 31.).

Ashna, unknown. Knobel would read אֲשָׁנָה after Asna of the LXX. Cod. Vat.

Ver. 34. Sanoah, now Sanna, not far from Zorea (Robinson, ii. 343) to the southeast. "The other, Zanoah, on the mountain, ver. 56, has not yet been discovered by modern explorers" (Keil).

En-gannim, Tappuah, unknown. Enam, mentioned Gen. xxxviii. 14, 21; perhaps Beth-anan, Tobler, p. 137 (Knobel).

Ver. 35. Jarmuth, a Canaanitish capital (ch. xii. 11, comp. x. 3-27). Since יַרְמֹת, as Knobel observes = יַרְמֹת, יַרְמֹת, ch. xix. 21, and therefore, judging from the meaning of these words, lay upon a height, the modern Jarmuk (Robinson, ii. 344), which stands on a hill, and exhibits cisterns and remains of buildings of high antiquity, may be regarded as ancient Jarmuth.

Adullam. Probably Deir Dubban, two hours north of Beit Jibrin, where are great and remarkable caves, fully described by Robinson (ii. 353 f.). He does not decide whether they are natural or artificial. The circumstance that they are very regularly hewn out leads us to conclude that they are of artificial origin, which, however, may well have been in part natural, since the mountain of Judah is cavernous. [Robinson seems to indicate no doubt at all of the purely artificial character of the caves, only questioning whether the "pits" through which they are entered "are natural or artificial." Their object also was to him quite a puzzle. — Tr.]

Socho, and Azeka, lay near Ephes-dammim (Damun), 1 Sam. xvii. 1. Azeka has been already mentioned (ch. x. 10 f.). Goliath's battle with David took place between Azeka and Socho (1 Sam. xvii. 1 ff.). Socho, now Shuweikeh, but not to be confounded with Socho on the mountain (ver. 48), which is also called Shuweikeh, lies about seventeen miles southwest of Jerusalem on the Wady Sumt, whose beautiful vale Robinson (ii. 349 f.) regards as the terebinth-valle ("valley of Elah"), celebrated for the combat between David and the giant (von Raumer, p. 222).

Ver. 36. Sharaim, "according to 1 Sam. xvii. 52, westward of Socho and Azeka = Tel Sakarieh and Kefr Sakarieh" (Knobel). The dual form of the name indicates two villages out of which the ancient Sharaim may have already grown, and properly signifies "two doors." Adithaim, unknown; a dual form again.

Gedera, גִּדְרָה with the article, properly, "the wall." In ch. xii. 13 the king of גִּדְרָה (walled place) is mentioned. Probably the same place. Whether Gederoth also (ver. 41) is the same, as Knobel would have it, is to me doubtful. Different towns might naturally be called simply walled places. We may compare frequent elements of modern names, Burg, Ville, House, etc.

Another related name is גִּדְרָה, ver. 58.

Gederothaim is omitted by the LXX. If we follow them, as Winer (ii. 471) and Knobel do, we make out only fourteen cities according to the sum total given, otherwise fifteen, as above thirty-six instead of twenty-nine.

Ver. 37-41. Second Group. It includes sixteen cities, lying "south" and "west" of the first, ver. 37. Zenan, probably identical with Zaanana (Mich. i. 11); perhaps Chirbet es-Senat.

Hadashah. "The smallest place in Judah, with only fifty dwellings (Misch. Erubin, pp. 5, 6") (Knobel). Not identical with Adasa, north of Jerusalem. Von Raumer has entirely omitted the little place.

Migdal-gad = Tel Iedeideh, after which the Wady Iedeideh is named (Tobler, p. 124 f.).

Ver. 38. Dilean, perhaps Beit Dula (Tobler, p. 150). Mizpeh. We have already found a land of Mizpeh on Hermon, ch. xi. 3-8, where the name was explained and its frequent occurrence noticed. The most celebrated place of the name is yet to be mentioned, ch. xviii. 26. The one before us is possibly the present Tel es-Safieh (Robinson, ii. 363) on a low hill, "but lying sufficiently above the surrounding country to be seen at the distance of some hours in every direction;" called in the Middle Ages Alba specula or Alba custodia (Blanchegarde), a castle, in the vicinity of which some romantic adventures of Richard Cœur de Lion are reported to have taken place. These are enumerated by Robinson (ubi sup. p. 366).

Joktheel, perhaps Keitulanah (Robinson, iii. App. 126), where are ruins.

Ver. 39. Lachish, according to x. 3 ff.; xii. 11, a Canaanitish capital, later, like many of these cities, fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chr. xi. 9). Here Amaziah died (2 K. xiv. 19). Sennacherib besieged Lachish, and moved from hence to Libnah (Is. xxxvi. 2; xxxvii. 8). Nebuchadnezzar also contended against the royal city of chariots (Mich. i. 13), which had become a beginning of sin to the daughter of Zion, doubtless through temptation to idolatry (Jer. xxxiv. 7). The position is questionable. Robinson (ii. p. 388) decided against Um Lakis, which suits as far as the name is concerned, partly because the trifling remains give no indication of a once fortified and strong city, and partly because the position does not agree with what is known of the ancient city. He is followed by Knobel, who thinks he has recognized Lachish in Zukkarijeh, two and a half hours southwest of Beit Jibrin. On the other hand von Raumer, Keil, and Van de Velde on his map, unite upon Um Lakis as the ancient city, mainly on the ground that Eglon, mentioned here in the same verse, and confidently recognized by Robinson (ii. 392) in Ajalan, was again, according to his own statement (ubi sup. 389) only three quarters of an hour distant from Um Lakis. We likewise adopt this latter view. Eglon has been already named ch. x. 1 ff. 36; xii. 32. — Bozath, perhaps Tubukah (Robinson, ii. pp. 388, 648), spelled Tubaka by Van de Velde and Knobel

Ver. 40. Cabbon = Kubeibeh, two and a-half hours east of Ajlon (Egion), upon a stony barren height. So Knobel supposes, and the name certainly sounds like; but Robinson observes very moderately that "there seemed to be nothing to mark it particularly as an ancient site" (p. 394).

Lechmas, LXX.: Aquás; Vulg.: Lehman; hence Luther: Lehman. The LXX. support the reading

לֶחְמָס, the Vulg. goes back to the other reading,

לֶחְמָס. The correctness of the latter is favored by the circumstance that Tobler (Dritte Wanderung, p. 129) has actually found south of Beit Jibrin, a place of ruins, el-Lahem.

Kithlish, undetermined. To compare: Tell Kilkis or Kithlis, not far from Kubeiboh, as Knobel does, would be somewhat rash, since in this case (1) a transposition of the ל, (2) a change of מ into כ must be assumed, which is not so easy to suppose as the more frequent interchange of ב and מ.

Ver. 41. Gederoth, comp. ver. 36. — Beth-dagon and Naamah and Makkedah, — a tripolis. Beth-dagon to be distinguished from the border-town of Asher mentioned ch. xix. 27, now Beth-dejan between Joppa (Jaffa) and Lydda (Lod, Ludd), on a knoll to the left of the road (Furrer, p. 10), but according to Tobler (Nazareth nebst Anhang der vierten Wanderung, p. 306), on the right. The name indicates the Philistine worship of Dagon. Naamah cannot be made out. Makkedah, already spoken of more than once (ch. x. 10, 16 ff.) in the account of the battle of Gibeon, also ch. xii. 16, was a royal city of the Canaanites, according to the Onom., three hours east of Eleutheropolis (assuming that this statement of the Onom. does not rest, as Keil, on ch. x. 10, supposes, on an error, and mean west instead of east). This would be, and so Knobel takes it, about the region of Terkumieh, or, if east be understood as = southeast, of Morak. Both places lie at the foot of the mountain of Judah. — Sixteen cities and their villages. In this instance there are actually sixteen.

Vers. 42–44. Third Group, "further south, embracing nine places." Libnah, conquered by Joshua (x. 29, 30), a Canaanite capital (ch. xii. 15), later a city of the Levites (xxi. 13; 1 Chr. vi. 57), according to the Onom., Libna in regione Eleuthero-polyana. Robinson (ii. p. 389) could find no trace of it. Knobel conjectures that it may be the ruins Hora-Hawara (Robinson, iii. App. 115), discovered by Setzen (iii. 31), because the Arab. hawara, like הַר לָבָן, signifies "white," and therefore this is the Arab. translation of the Hebrew name (comp. similar examples, vers. 28–36). But we cannot accept this acute hypothesis. For, although in the Negeb, where Tel Hora stands on Van de Velde's Map, on the road leading north from Beer-sheba, "the Arabic designation of the cities may have been introduced early" (p. 425), so that the names were formally translated, still we have not yet, at least among the cities of Judah, found a single example of this kind. Nay, what specially concerns the case before us, the Arabic geographers in the Middle Ages, as Knobel himself informs us, are still acquainted with a Libna [spelled Lobna] in Palestine, e. g. Marasid, iii. p. 5, Jakut, Mosch, p. 379, Ether and Ashan; afterwards belonging to Simeon, xix. 7; 1 Chr. iv. 32. Probably to be sought in the south, toward the Negeb.

Ver. 43. Jiphta and Ashnah and Nesib, undeterminable.

Ver. 44. Kegila, according to the Onom., eight miles from Eleutheropolis toward Hebron; rescued by David from the hand of the Philistines (1 Sam. xxiii. 5), but ungratefully treacherous toward him (1 Sam. xxiii. 12). On Kiepert's Map, Jedna [Rob., iii. App. 117] or Idhna, about southwest of Terkumieh, in accordance with the statement of the Onom. Knobel maintains, on the contrary, that Kesila, Cella, or Ἐξέλα of the Onom. now Kila (Tobler, p. 151), belongs here, and finds Kegila rather in the ruins called Khugaleh ([Jughaleh?]) Robinson, iii. App. 115), in the south of the Jebel el-Chalil (Robinson writes el-Khulil). The similarity of the name speaks for this position in the plain, which suits also with מְלָכִים, 1 Sam. xxiii. 4.

Achsib, or אֲחִישַׁי, is also mentioned Mic. i. 14; Gen. xxxviii. 5, in the plain. Perhaps Kesaba, Kussabeh (Robinson, ii. 391), a place with springs, and with ruins in the vicinity.

Maresha, likewise fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chr. xi. 8). The scene of Asa's victory (2 Chr. xiv. 9–13), home of another unknown prophet Eliezer (2 Chr. xx. 37), afterward Marissa (ἡ πόλις Μαρίας, Joseph. Ant. xiv. 5, 3; 13, 9), mentioned in the contests of the Maccabees (1 Macc. v. 65–68), restored by Gabinius, destroyed by the Parthians. Robinson supposes (ii. 4) that Eleutheropolis (Betogabris, Beit Jibrin), arose after this destruction of Maresha, and was built out of its materials. Its foundation walls he thinks he found one and a half hours south of Beit Jibrin. With this Tobler agrees (pp. 129, 142 f.), who mentions a place of ruins, Marasch, twenty-four minutes from Beit Jibrin, marked also on Van de Velde's Map as the ancient Maresha. Knobel seeks it four hours south of Beit Jibrin, where lies a place Mirsim (Robinson, iii. App. p. 117). Improbable. Maresha is, at all events, distinct from Moreseth-gath, the home of the prophet Micah (comp. von Raumer, p. 215, Rob. ii. 4). — Nine cities and their villages. The number is correct again, as at ver. 41.

Vers. 45–47. Fourth Group. This includes the Philistine cities, Ekron, which ch. xix. 40 is ascribed to Dan, Ashdod and Gaza, and their daughters, and their villages. But according to ver. 11 the border of Judah runs north of Ekron, toward the sea, and so includes the Philistine cities. Of "daughters" i. e. subject cities, no mention has been made in the preceding lists, while here the statement of number at the close of the several groups is wanting. The section is, accordingly, a manifest addition from some other source, as Ewald (Gesch. ii. p. 258), Bertheau (Komm. zum Buche d. Richt. p. 28), Knobel (p. 419), with perfect right maintain. Zealously to deny this, as Keil does (Com. on Josh. in loc.) we regard as perfectly unnecessary, especially as Keil himself (ver. 32) cannot help assuming a "supplementary hand." If a supplement is anywhere possible, then certainly also "a later addition," since both come substantially to the same result. Besides, it is also "very striking," as Keil himself says (l. c.), that Gath and Ashkelon are here wanting, whereas in ch. xiii. 3, they are mentioned, and that too, as cities which had their own princes, and so cannot be reckoned among the "daughters" of the rest. Verses 45–47, therefore, make the impression not only of an addition, but still more definitely that of a fragmentary addition. For the rest we refer to the explanation already given ch. xiii. 3 of the position of the several places, which, after wars renewed through centuries, were first conquered by the Israelites in the age of the Maccabees. Comp. Knobel's excursus [?] on this passage.

γ. vers. 48-60. Cities on the Mountain, vers. 48-51. First Group, wholly in the south, embracing eleven cities. — On the mountain. See ch. x. 40. — Shamir, perhaps Um Schaumereh (Robinson, iii. App. p. 115). — Jattir, a priests' city (ch. xxi. 14; 1 Chr. vi. 57), probably Attir (Rob. ii. 194, 625). — Socho, different from Socho in the lowland (ver. 35), but like that now called Suweikeh (Robinson, ii. 195), about ten miles S. S. W. from Hebron (von Raumer, p. 222).

Dannah, passed over by von Raumer. Perhaps, in Knobel's judgment, we are to read דַּנָּה = דַּנְתָּה = Zante, the last inhabited place on the southwest part of the mountain, five hours south of Hebron (Robinson [Zanuta], ii. 626, iii. App. 116). — Kirjath-Sannah, that is Debir. Concerning this, see on ch. x. 38, and also ver. 15 here.

Ver. 50. Anab, "a home of Anakim (xi. 21), still existing under the old name east of Thabarieh, (Seetzen, iii. 6, Robinson, ii. 195)" (Knobel). It has, according to Robinson, a small tower.

Eshtemoh, situated very high, according to Schubert, 2225 feet above the sea. A city of the priests, ch. xxi. 14; now Semua, a considerable village, which Robinson saw (ii. 196) from Thabarieh. Around it (ii. 626) are broad valleys, "not susceptible of much tillage, but full of flocks and herds all in fine order." The travellers halted among the olive trees in the moist southern valley. At several places in the village they saw remains of walls built of large stones, leveled around the edges, but left rough between, some of which were more than ten feet long. Eshtemoh, or Eshtemoa (עֶשְׁתֵּמוֹא), appears from the extent of these walls to have been, as Robinson judges, a spacious town. It once received from David a part (1 Sam. xxx. 28) of the booty from the Amalekites.

Anim, probably the present Ghuwein (von Raumer, p. 171, Knobel), south of Semua. So Wilson (i. 354 ap. von Raumer against Robinson, who regards Ghuwein as Ain, ver. 32).

Ver. 51. Goathen, not determined. — Holon, a priests' city (ch. xxi. 15; 1 Chr. vi. 58 [Hilen]), not yet discovered. — Giloh, birthplace of Ahithophel (2 Sam. xv. 12), where the traitor against David hanged himself (2 Sam. xvii. 23). — Eleven cities. The number is correct.

Ver. 52-54. Second Group, north of the first, west of the third group. See Menke's Map.

Ver. 52. Arab, omitted by von Raumer; perhaps, as Knobel thinks, Husn el Ghurab near Semua (Robinson, i. 312). This is very questionable, since Robinson only heard from the Arabs of a ruin el-Ghurab, but did not see it.

Dumah, דִּמְיָה, LXX.: Povud, stated in the Onom. to have been seventeen miles from Eleutheropolis (Beit Jibrin), now Daumeh, a ruined village, not far from Hebron in the Wady Dilbeh (Robinson, i. 314). In Is. xxi. 11 Dumah is the proper name of an Ishmaelite tribe in Arabia, with which comp. Gen. xxv. 14.

Eshcan (עֶשְׁכָּן), elsewhere not mentioned. Since the Cod. Vat. of the LXX. has Σουδ, we might read with Knobel, after 1 Chr. ii. 43 f., שֶׁכֶּמֶשׁ, and compare the place of ruins Simir (Robinson, iii. App. p. 114), south of Daumeh. Von Raumer has passed over this place also, as being unrecognizable. Keil likewise.

Ver. 53. Janum. On the reading comp. the foot-note on the text. Not discovered.

Beth-tappuah not to be confounded (a) with Tappuah in the lowland (ver. 34), (b) with the En Tappuah mentioned ch. xvii. 7, which was assigned to Manasseh. The name of both towns refers to fruit culture, since תַּפְּוּחַ (from תַּפַּח, to emit odors) signifies apple (Cant. vii. 9; Prov. xxv. 11), or apple-tree<sup>1</sup> (Cant. ii. 3; viii. 5). Robinson found apples and pears in the neighborhood of Gophna, now Jifna [Jufna], (Robinson, iii. 77-80), four and one half hours north of Jerusalem. Comp. also von Raumer, p. 100. Beth tappuah would thus be = apple-house. The name has been preserved in Taffuh, a place about two hours west of Hebron. It still lies (Robinson, ii. 428) "in the midst of olive-groves and vineyards with marks of industry on every side." This circumstance favors our interpretation of the name, since where olive trees and vines flourish apple trees can and could be produced. Knobel, on the contrary, explains תַּפְּוּחַ, from תַּפַּח and תַּפְּוּחַ, by "extent," "breadth," "surface," and adduces, in support of this interpretation of the name, the fact that both our Beth-tappuah and En-tappuah (ch. xvii. 7) lay in a plain. To sustain our view, which von Raumer also gives (p. 181), we may adduce the analogy of Bethphage בֵּית-פִּזָּה, Chald. for the Heb. בֵּית-פִּזָּה (Cant. ii. 13), = Fig-house.

Aphka not the same as Aphek (xii. 18; xiii. 4), which lay in the plain not far from Jezreel (1 Sam. xxix. 1; 1 K. xx. 26, 30), where Saul was slain by the Philistines, Benhadad the Syrian by the Israelites; but on Mount Judah, near Hebron, "probably between Hebron and Tuffah" (Keil). Against the opinion of von Raumer (p. 172) that the battle of 1 Sam. iv. 1 may have taken place here, comp. Thénius on that passage. Aphek on the mountain of Judah has not yet been discovered.

The frequent occurrence of the name אֶפֶק or אֶפְיָה (Judg. i. 31), or אֶפְיָה here, is explained, as in the case of גִּבְרָה, גִּבְרָה, גִּבְרָה, from the meaning of the word which signifies strength, and then Fort, Burg (see Gesen.). It is derived from אֶפֶק, to be strong.

Ver. 54. Humtah, not yet found. The name (חֻמְתָּה) appears to be related to חֻמָּט, Lev. xi. 30, LXX. ōupa, Vulg. lacerta, probably a species of lizard (Gesen.). Lizards are mentioned by Seetzen (pp. 446-448) ap. von Raumer (p. 105). There are such still in Palestine [Tristram, pp. 495, 536], and a place might be named after this creature just as well as after the fox or jackal (Hazor-shual, ver. 28). Kirjath Arba, that is, Hebron. See ver. 13. Comp. besides, the more particular account of this city on ch. x. 36.

Zior. The name is perhaps retained, as Knobel suggests, in that of the ridge Tughra near Hebron (see Rosenm. Zeitschr. der D. M. G. xi. p. 56). There are nine of the cities as stated.

<sup>1</sup> [Tristram (Land of Israel, p. 609 f.) strenuously maintains that the Aprioc is the apple of Scripture. — Tr.]

Ver. 55-57. Third Group. East and northeast of the first, (Knobel: northward; but see Menke's Map) and southeast (Knobel: east) of the second. Maon, now Main, "without doubt the Maon of Nabal (Robinson, ii. 194; 1 Sam. xxv. 2). It stood on the summit of a conical rock (Robinson, p. 193), which is crowned with ruins of no great extent. David kept himself in the wilderness of Maon (1 Sam. xxiii. 24 ff.; xxv. 2).

Carmel, a name familiar in the history of Saul (1 Sam. xv. 12), of David (1 Sam. xxv. 2, 5, 7, 40; xxvii. 3), of Uzziah (2 Chr. xxvi. 10); in Roman times a castle (Robinson, p. 198) with a garrison. It appears in the history of King Amalrich in the Middle Ages, A. D. 1172 (Robinson, p. 199). Now called Kurmul, with vast ruins from antiquity and the Middle Ages.

Ziph. When its inhabitants proved treacherous toward David (1 Sam. xxiii. 19; xxvi. 1; Ps. liv. 2), he removed (1 Sam. xxiii. 14, 15, 19 ff.) from the wilderness of this name to the wilderness of Maon. Rehoboam fortified the city, whose ruins, according to Robinson (ii. 191), "lie on a low hill or ridge between two small Wadies which commence here and run toward the Dead Sea." Now called Zif, about one and three fourth hours south-east of Hebron (von Raumer, p. 222). Not to be confounded with Ziph, ver. 24.

Juttah (יִטָּה), according to xxi. 16, a priest-city, now Jutta (Robinson, l. c.), "having the appearance of a large, modern Mohammedan town" (p. 628). It was, probably, according to the conjecture first proposed by Reland (Palest. p. 870), adopted by Bachiene, Rosenmüller (and also by Robinson), the abode of the priest Zachariah, the ῥάϊς Ἰωῆα (Luke i. 39). Reland supposes (Robinson, ii. 628, note) that ῥ. Ἰωῆα has been changed by error of the text, or softer pronunciation (comp. von Raumer, p. 208, Anm. p. 222).

Ver. 56. Jezreel (יִזְרְעֵל), "whom or what, God plants", different from the Jezreel in the plain of Esdraelon (xvii. 16), and mentioned elsewhere only as the home of Ahinoam, the second wife of David (not reckoning Michal whom Saul, 1 Sam. xxv. 44, gave to Shaltiel). Not to be identified. Jokdeam and Zanoah, likewise undiscovered, and not elsewhere named.

Ver. 57. Cain (קַיִן with the art. prop. "the lance"), perhaps Jukin (Robinson, ii. 190), as Knobel proposes (p. 437), "a Mohammedan Makāni (station, grave), where they say Lot stopped after his flight from Sodom" (Robinson, l. c.).

Gibeah (גִּבְעָה = hill), a very common name of place (ch. xviii. 28, Gibeah in the tribe of Benjamin, Gibeah of Saul, 1 Sam. xi. 4; xiii. 2; xv. 2, and often, besides Gibeah in the tribe of Ephraim, ch. xxiv. 33). It shares with the topographical names גִּבְעָה (xviii. 24; xxi. 17), and גִּבְעֵן (x. 2; xi. 19), and also that of the "judgment hall," Γασσάβη, John xix. 13, the derivation from the same root גָּבַהּ (to be high, to be arched) and signification. Robinson (ii. 14) believes that in the village of Jeba (Jebah) in the Wady el-Musurr, southwest of Bethlehem, he had "with little doubt" discovered again Gibeah of Benjamin. This Gibeah is also, in his view, probably the Gabatha of Eusebius and Jerome, twelve Roman miles from Eleutheropolis. Von Raumer agrees with him, while Keil and Knobel differ, on the grounds that this place lies without the district of this division of cities, and that the similarity of name proves nothing, since this, as just now shown, very often recurs elsewhere. Indeed, Robinson himself (iii. 151), as Keil points out, found another village, Jebak, north of Shechem! For these reasons we also side with the two latter interpreters. Perhaps our Gibeah is (although we cannot assert this, with the certainty which Knobel expresses), one of the viculi called Gabaa and Gabatha, contra orientalem plagam Daromae, in the Onom. s. v. Gabathon.

Timnah, to be carefully distinguished from Timnah between Beth-shemesh and Ekron (xv. 10; xix. 43; Judg. xiv.; xv. 1-6), but certainly identical (so von Raumer, p. 224, and Knobel, p. 437, against Keil, in loc.) with Timnah (Gen. xxxviii. 12-14), to which Judah went up to his sheep-shearers. Not yet discovered. On Mount Ephraim lay (חֶרֶם הַמִּנְחָה), ch. xix. 50; xxiv. 30. The name (from מִנְחָה) signifies "portion assigned," Gesen. There are ten cities as stated.

Vers. 58, 59. Fourth Group. This lies north of the second and third. Halhul, still called Halhul or Hulhul, in a well cultivated region, and chief city of a district. Beautiful fields and vineyards are seen there (Robinson, Later Bibl. Res., p. 281), and also many cows and goats. Noticeable is Robinson's remark: "The identity of no ancient site is more undisputed, though it seems not to have been recognized before our former journey" (l. c. comp. Bibl. Res. i. 319). The place lies north of Hebron on the way to Jerusalem (comp. also Valentiner, Das heilige Land, p. 38).

Beth-sur, now Beit-Sur (Robinson, Later Bibl. Res. p. 276 f.), whose principal relic is a ruined tower, of which only one side is left. The place appears to have been small but very strong, according to Josephus (Ant. xiii. 5, 6), the strongest fortress in all Judaea. It is frequently mentioned in the First Book of Maccabees (ch. iv. 29, 61; vi. 7, 26, 31 f., 49 f.; ix. 52, etc.), seldom in the O. T. (2 Chr. xi. 7; Neh. iii. 16). Here, according to an old tradition found in the Onom., Philip (Acts viii. 26-40) baptized the Eunuch (von Raumer, p. 182.)

Gedor, referred to, 1 Chron. xii. 7, as the home of Joelah and Zebadiah, two followers of David; now Jedur, "on the brow of a high mountain ridge" (Robinson, ii. 338), about northwest of the road between Hebron and Jerusalem; a small ruin marked by one tree (Robinson, Later Bibl. Res. p. 276 f.).

Verse 59. Maarath, unknown. Beth-anoth (בֵּית אֲנוֹת), house of answers, of Echo, Gesen.), distinct from בֵּית אֲנוֹת in the tribe of Naphtali, ch. xix. 38; Judg. i. 33, now Beit Ainun, with ruins which Wolcott visited in 1842. Robinson (Later Bibl. Res. p. 280 f.) saw it from Er Rameh. Elthehon not discovered.

Fifth Group. According to the addition of the LXX. which Jerome also has, on Mic. v. 2. "Certainly," says Knobel rightly, "this is no invention of the LXX. but a translation of the original text, which therefore lay more complete before them. Otherwise a large piece of the mountain of Judah with numerous places would be passed over, which, considering the completeness of the author elsewhere, has not the slightest probability. The gap in the Masoretic text originated with a transcriber who having read the לחציריהן, ver. 59, supposed he had read the וּלְחִצְיָתָא at the end of this division." To this view Keil also assents, while he refers to the naive opinion of Jerome, that the words had probably been rejected by the Jews from malice (malitia), "ne Christus de triū Juda ortus rideretur," against which Clericus, "quite rightly" objected, "Nam video cur a Judæis propterea erasa essent, cum sit alias in V. T. sat frequens mentio Bethlehemi Davidis patriæ." Menke also follows this view on his map, while Maurer on the other hand, and Bunsen, declare against the addition. The former — since the LXX. in this book have allowed themselves many additions as well as omissions and arbitrary changes — thinks most probably "eos totum hoc comma ex loco quocunque alio, proprio Marte huc transtulisse." The possibility of such a proceeding need not be denied; but here, as Keil and Knobel rightly urge, our Masoretic text presents a manifest hiatus which is excellently filled up by the addition of the LXX. Bunsen says: "The forms of many of these names are decidedly not Hebrew; besides, except Tecoa and Bethlehem, not one of the cities is elsewhere mentioned in the O. T. We have, therefore, here an old Aramaic gloss, which some MSS. afterwards received into the text." Reply: The first reason proposed by Bunsen is an assertion without proof; and the second has no weight, because very many of the cities mentioned in this chapter are named nowhere else in the O. T., e. g. ver. 56, Jokdean and Zanoah; ver. 54, Humtah; ver. 53, Jamun; ver. 43, Nezib, etc. We, therefore, regard the addition of the LXX. as a highly valuable complement to the Masoretic text, serving to fill up the catalogue of the cities. In an English translation it would read: Tekoa and Ephrata (that is Bethlehem), and Phagor and Aitam (Aitan), and Kulon and Tutami (Tutam), and Soresh (Tholsh), and Karem and Gallim, and Baither (Theiter), and Mancho; eleven cities and their villages.

Tekoa (תְּקוֹעַ), two hours south of Bethlehem, the home of the prophet Amos (i. 1), who is said to have been buried here; fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chr. xi. 6), and elsewhere mentioned in the O. T., e. g. 2 Sam. xiv. 2; Jer. vi. 1; Neh. iii. 5, 27; now Tekuah (Robinson, ii. 182–184 [Tristram, p. 406]), on a hill covered with ruins; which agrees with Jer. vi. 1. Concerning the neighboring Frankenberg (Frank Mountain), which the Franks are reported to have held for forty years after the loss of Jerusalem, comp. von Raumer's "Excursus," p. 223.

Ephratah (i. e. Bethlehem). Both names are applied, Ruth iv. 11; Mic. v. 1, unquestionably to the city now before us, Bethlehem-Judah (Judg. xvii. 7, 9; xix. 1, 2; 1 Sam. xvii. 12; Ruth i. 1, 2). It was different from the Bethlehem in the tribe of Zebulun (xix. 15); but whether this Bethlehem-Ephratah can be meant Gen. xxxv. 16, 19, is doubtful, comp. Lange's Com. on Gen. p. 569. The name בֵּית לֶחֶם = house of bread, bread-house (Winer, i. 172) is clear; אֶפְרַת also, or אֶפְרַתָּה, is without difficulty derived from פֶּרֶה, with which the related אֶפְרַיִם may be compared.

In this view ל would be = "the fruitful," "a name," as Lange remarks (ubi sup.), "which corresponds with the added name Bethlehem." Besides the place is, as may be seen from Ruth, ch. ii. and from the descriptions of modern travellers, really fruitful. Thus Furrer relates: "The nearer we approached Bethlehem, the better cultivated we found the fields. . . . But surprisingly lovely was to us the sight of the Wady Charubeh, the valley above which, high in the south, lies the little town of Bethlehem, two thousand seven hundred and four feet above the sea. There olive and fig trees were growing in rich abundance. Vineyards spread themselves out on the north-western slope, whose watch-towers gently reminded us of long past times." Bethlehem is now called Beit-Lahm, that is, house of flesh, and is inhabited, since 1834, almost exclusively by Christians, of whom Tobler thinks, there may be three thousand. The remaining three hundred inhabitants are Mohammedans. There are no Jews there. The historical importance of Bethlehem as David's city (Ruth iv. 11; 1 Sam. xvi. 4; xvii. 12, 15; xx. 6, 28; Mic. v. 1), and as the birthplace of Christ (Matt. ii. 1 ff.; Luke ii. 4, 15) is well known. Further particulars concerning the place see in Seetzen, ii. 37 ff.; Robinson, ii. 157–163; Tobler, Topographie von Jerusalem, ii. 464; and Bethlehem in Palästina, p. 2 ff.; Furrer, Wanderung en durch Palästina, p. 167 ff.; Valentiner, Das heil. Land, p. 28 ff.; von Raumer, p. 313 ff.; Ritter, Erdkunde, xvi. p. 284 ff. [Gage's transl. iii. 339–50].

Phagor, now Faghur between Hebron and Bethlehem, west of the road (Robinson, Later Bibl. Res. p. 275, Tobler, Dritte Wanderung, p. 91 ff.).

Aitam (אֵיטָם) mentioned 2 Chron. xi. 6, among the cities fortified by Rehoboam, immediately after Bethlehem. The name is still preserved in the Wady and Ain Attar between Bethlehem and Faghur, in Tobler, ubi sup. p. 88 ff. (Knobel). Once, in Solomon's time, a pleasant place with gardens, and perhaps also with a pleasure palace of the king (Furrer, p. 177, Ann. 1).

Kulon, now Kulonieh or Kalonieh, lying high above the pilgrim road to Jerusalem (Furrer, p. 141). The moderately extensive ruins of ancient Kulon which Hitzig, Sepp, Van Osterzee (Lange's Comm. on Luke, ch. xxiv. 13), Furrer, and apparently also Tobler (Nazareth in Paläst. u. s. w. p. 316, 319), understand to be the Emmaus of the N. T. "lie near the bottom of the valley whose loveliness is very beautifully described by Furrer. "A copious spring," he says, "concealed under an overarching rock, by a double outlet irrigated gardens, in which numerous almond trees with pink blossoms gleamed through the dark green foliage of the orange-trees. Up the surrounding slopes, vineyards and rows of olive trees rose by a succession of terraces. The prospect extends not far in any direction; but its seclusion heightens the charm of the happy, pleasant vale" (p. 142). The distance from Jerusalem is about one and a half hours.

Tutami, or Tutam, is not identified, nor Gallim; for the Gallim named, Is. x. 30; 1 Sam. xxv. 44, lay north of Jerusalem in Benjamin (Knobel).

Sores, now Saris, "on a proud hill" (Furrer, p. 139), up which terraces of olive-trees ascend, four hours west of Jerusalem (comp. also Robinson, Later Bibl. Res. p. 154 ff.).

Karem, now Ain Karem, three quarters of an hour west of Jerusalem (Furrer, p. 210), with a splendid cloister, whose garden walls are overhung by tall cypress-trees, in the midst of a landscape which surprises the traveller by its loveliness and beauty (Robinson, ii. 141–157, Later Bibl. Res. p. 271 f., Tobler, Topog. ii. 344 ff.).

Beüher, now Better, southwest of Jerusalem (Furrer, p. 191), situated high up on a mountain side above fine green terraces, surrounded with olive and fig trees; mentioned, Cant. ii. 17, where the בְּרֵרִים are best explained as mountains of Bethel. בְּרֵרִים signifies part, piece, Gen. xv. 10; Jer. xxxiv. 18, 19. Cognate is בְּרֵרִים, prob. mountain defile, 2 Sam. ii. 29. בְּרֵרִים is what we technically call terrain coupé (a country cut up, broken country). Of this character is the country about Bethel (Furrer, p. 192).

Muncho, according to Knobel's highly probable conjecture = מִנְחָה, 1 Chr. viii. 6, to which place Benjamites were carried from Geba.

Ver. 60. Sixth Group, northwest of the fifth, embracing only two cities. Kirjath-jearim, ver. 9. As was there remarked, this place was = to Kureyet-el-Enab, three hours northwest of Jerusalem. "The old 'city of the woods' has become in modern times the 'city of wine,'" as Robinson (ii. 335) interprets the ancient and the present name. People from Kirjath-jearim once brought up the ark from Beth-shemesh (1 Sam. vi. 21; vii. 1, 2). Of the vineyards some still exist, according to Valentiner, p. 19, on the east side of the place. Rabba, not to be identified.

8. Ver. 61, 62. Cities in the Wilderness. The wilderness of Judah bordered in the east on the Dead Sea, in the south on the Negeb, on the territory of the third, fourth, and fifth groups of cities (westward) on Mount Judah (see Menke's map, iii.), in the north on the border line of the tribe of Judah as given vers. 6, 7. This whole region is with good reason designated as a wilderness (בְּרֵרִים), since, with the exception of En-gedi and certain spots where springs occur, it is a wild, barren, "frightful" (Furrer, p. 149) solitude. Thus the neighborhood of the Cloister of Mar Saba, e. g. wears the appearance of terrible desolation and loneliness. "In vain the eye searches far and near for some green thing to cover the weather-worn chalk rock of the gullied mountain. In summer the intolerable heat blazes upon the naked rocks, and the winter rains rush down from the heights to no profit" (Furrer, p. 161). The roads through this wilderness, on which the starry heavens look down at night with wondrous beauty (Furrer, u. s.), lead frequently to steep precipices; sometimes so abruptly down the rocks that it needs all the sagacity and practice of the animals not to fall (Furrer, p. 149). In this solitude David once spent his time (1 Sam. xxiii. 24; Ps. lxxiii. 1; liv. 2), here John the Baptist preached (Matt. iii. 1), here Christ was tempted (Matt. iv. 1; Mark ii. 12, 13; Luke iv. 1). Comp. further, Knobel, p. 440; Robinson, ii. 187, 202 ff., 474 ff.; von Schubert, iii. pp. 94, 96, 102 ff.; Seetzen, ii. p. 220 ff.; von Raumer, p. 47.

Vers. 61, 62. Beth-arabah, ver. 6. Probably Kaffr Hajla (Knobel). Middin. Secacah, Nibshan, not mentioned elsewhere, unknown.

The city of Salt (Ir-hamelah, עִיר־הַמֶּלַח), LXX.: ἡ πόλις τῶν ἀλῶν. Vulg.: civitas salis. Luther: Salzstadt [Salt city]. Probably near the valley of Salt where the Edomites suffered several defeats (Knobel), and so, tolerably far south, comp. 2 Sam. viii. 13; Ps. lx. 2; 2 K. xiv. 7; 1 Chr. xviii. 12; 2 Chr. xxv. 11; and so Robinson, ii. 483.

En-gedi (עֵן־גִּדִּי, Goat-fountain), now Ain Jidy, on the west side of the Dead Sea, with a rich, warm (81° F., Robinson, ii. 210), sweet spring of water (Furrer, p. 159), which once refreshed palms and balsam-shrubs. "The Canticles sing (i. 14) of a 'cluster of the Hennah' from the vineyards of En-gedi. Here flourishes the giant Asclepias, which bears the fruit so famous under the name of Apples of Sodom" (Furrer, p. 159). The vegetation is tropical. By the fountain are the remains of various edifices apparently ancient, although the spot where the old city stood appears to have been further down (Robinson, ii. 216). Here David tarried, 1 Sam. xxiv. 2. Whether Hazezon-Tamar (Gen. xiv. 7; comp. 2 Chr. xx. 2) was the same place as En-gedi, is doubtful; von Raumer (p. 188) and Keil are in favor of the supposition, Knobel (on this verse) is against it.

Ver. 63. A passing statement that the children of Judah were not able to drive out the Jebusites. The same verse is repeated, Judg. i. 21, with the difference only that, instead of the children of Judah, the children of Benjamin are named, to whom, according to ch. xviii. 28, the place was allotted. See more on xviii. 28. On the importance of this verse for determining the date of the composition of our book, see the Introd. § 2.

1 [Dict. of the Bible, art. "Camphire."—Ta.]

2. The Territory of the Tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh.

CHAPTERS XVI., XVII.

a. Its Boundaries.

CHAPTER XVI. 1-4.

- 1 And the lot of [for] the children [sons] of Joseph fell [came out] from [the] Jordan by Jericho, unto [at] the water of Jericho, on the east, to the wilderness which
- 2 goeth up from Jericho throughout [on] Mount Beth-el, And goeth [and it went] out from Beth-el to Luz, and passeth [passed] along unto the border of Archi [the
- 3 Archite] to Ataroth, And goeth [went] down westward to the coast [border] of Japhleti [the Japhletite], unto the coast [border] of Beth-horon the nether, and to
- 4 Gezer: and the goings out thereof are [were] at the sea. So [And] the children [sons] of Joseph, Manasseh and Ephraim, took their inheritance [possession].

b. Portion of the Tribe of Ephraim.

CHAPTER XVI. 5-10.

- 5 And the border of the children [sons] of Ephraim [was] according to their families was thus [omit: was thus]: even [and] the border of their inheritance [possession] on the east side was Ataroth-addar, unto Beth-horon the upper; And the border went out toward the sea to Michmethah on the north side [so De Wette; Keil, and Fay: from Michmethah, northward]; and the border went about eastward unto Taanath-shiloh, and passed by it on the east [eastward] to Janohah.
- 7 And it went down from Janohah to Ataroth, and to Naarath, and came to [struck or touched] Jericho, and went out at [the] Jordan. The border went out [went] from Tappuah westward unto the river [water-course of] Kanah; and the goings out thereof were at the sea. This is the inheritance [possession] of the tribe
- 9 of the children [sons] of Ephraim by their families. And <sup>1</sup> the separate cities for the children [sons] of Ephraim were among the inheritance of the children
- 10 [sons] of Manasseh, all the cities with their villages. And they drave not out the Canaanites that dwelt in Gezer: but the Canaanites dwell among the Ephraimites unto this day, and serve under tribute [and they became tributary servants; LXX.: καὶ ἐγένοντο ὑπόφοροι δοῦλοι].

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[<sup>1</sup> Perhaps the connection of this verse, and its own meaning may best be represented thus: Ver. 8. This is the possession. . . . Ver. 9. And [also] the cities which were separated for the sons of Ephraim in the midst of the possession of the sons of Manasseh, etc. — Ta.]

c. Portion of the Tribe of Manasseh.

CHAPTER XVII. 1-13.

- 1 There was also a lot [And there was the lot] for the tribe of Manasseh; for he was the first-born of Joseph; to wit, for Machir the first-born of Manasseh, the father of Gilead: [,] because he was a man of war, [,] therefore [and] he had
- 2 Gilead and Bashan. There was also [And there was] a lot for the rest of the children [sons] of Manasseh by their families; for the children [sons] of Abiezer, and for the children [sons] of Helek, and for the children [sons] of Asriel, and for the children [sons] of Shechem, and for the children [sons] of Hepher, and for the children [sons] of Shemida: these were the male children of Manasseh the son
- 3 of Joseph by their families. But [And] Zelophehad, the son of Hepher, the son of Gilead, the son of Machir, the son of Manasseh, had no sons, but daughters: and these are the names of his daughters, Mahlah, and Noah, Hoglah, Milcah, and Tirzah.
- 4 And they came near before Eleazar the priest, and before Joshua the son of Nun, and before the princes, saying, The Lord [Jehovah] commanded Moses to give us an inheritance [a possession] among our brethren: therefore [and] according to the commandment of the Lord [Jehovah] he gave them an inheritance [a possession]
- 5 among the brethren of their father. And there fell ten portions to Manasseh, besides the land of Gilead and Bashan, which were on the other side [of the] Jordan; Because the daughters of Manasseh had an inheritance [possession] among his sons: and the rest of Manasseh's sons had the land of Gilead.
- 7 And the coast [border] of Manasseh was from Asher to Michmethah, that lieth before Shechem; and the border went along on the right hand [De Wette: towards the south] unto the inhabitants of En-tappuah. Now [omit: now] Manasseh had the land of Tappuah: but Tappuah on the border of Manasseh belonged to the children of Ephraim: And the border descended unto the river [water-course of] Kanah [reeds; hence = Reed-brook], southward of the river [water-course]. These cities <sup>1</sup> of Ephraim are among the cities of Manasseh: the coast [border] of
- 9 Manasseh also was on the north side of the river [water-course], and the out-goings
- 10 of it were at the sea: Southward it [the land] was Ephraim's, and northward it was Manasseh's, and the sea is [was] his border; and they met together in [touched, or struck upon] Asher on the north, and in [upon] Issachar on the east.

- 11 And Manasseh had in Issachar and in Asher, Beth-shean and her towns [daughters], and Ibleam and her towns [daughters], and the inhabitants of Dor and her towns [daughters], and the inhabitants of En-Dor and her towns [daughters], and the inhabitants of Taanach and her towns [daughters], and the inhabitants of Megiddo and her towns [daughters], even three countries [Gesen., Fay : the three heights, i. e. the three cities situated on heights. See the exegetical explanations. LXX. : kai to τρίτον τῆς Νοφθ. Vulg. : tertia pars. Luther : the third part of Napheth. De Wette : three portions of country (drei Landschaften) ; Bunsen : die Dreilandschaft]. Yet [And] the children of Manasseh could not drive out the inhabitants of [could not conquer] those cities ; but [and] the Canaanites would dwell in that land. Yet [And] it came to pass, when the children of Israel were waxen [became] strong, that they put the Canaanites to tribute [made the Canaanites tributary servants] ; but did not utterly drive them out, [De Wette, Fay : aber vertreiben thaten sie sie nicht ; nearly the same as "but drive them out they did not do ;" to express : וְהוֹרֵשׁ לֹא הוֹרֵשׁוּ].

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 9. These cities had Ephraim in the midst of the cities of Manasseh. And the border of Manasseh was on the north side of the water-course. — Ta.]

d. Complaint of the Sons of Joseph on Account of an insufficient Possession.

CHAPTER XVII. 14-18.

- 14 And the children [sons] of Joseph spake unto Joshua, saying, Why hast thou given me but one lot and one portion to inherit [as a possession], seeing I am a great people, forasmuch as [in so far as, כַּדְּרֵי־אֵשׁ] the Lord [Jehovah] hath blessed me hitherto ? And Joshua answered [said to] them, If thou be a great people, then [omit : then] get thee up to the wood-country [forest], and cut down for thyself there in the land of the Perizzites and of the giants [Rephaim], if mount Ephraim be too narrow for thee. And the children [sons] of Joseph said, The hill [mountain] is not enough for us : and all the Canaanites that dwell in the land of the valley have chariots of iron, both they who are of [in] Beth-shean and her towns [daughters], and they who are of [in] the valley of Jezreel. And Joshua spake unto the house of Joseph, even to Ephraim and to Manasseh, saying, Thou art a great people and hast great power, thou shalt not have one lot only : But the [a] mountain shall be thine ; for it is a wood [forest], and thou shalt cut it down : and the out-goings of it [its outrunners, spurs] shall be thine : for thou shalt [wilt] drive out the Canaanites, though [for] they have iron chariots, and though they be [for they are] strong.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The two chapters, sixteen and seventeen, belong together, since they contain the statements concerning the territory of the tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh, the sons of Joseph (Gen. xli. 50-52 ; xlii. 20 ; xlviii. 5 ff.). The united inheritance of the two tribes includes a fruitful, for the most part, and pleasant country lying in the midst of western Palestine. It extends from the Jordan, and the eastern declivities of mount Ephraim (which are much less rough than the land of Judah), across to the seashore which borders the beautiful plain of Sharon. Of this entire district Ephraim received the southern portion, Manasseh (strictly speaking only the half-tribe of Manasseh, comp. ch. xiii. 29 ff.) the northern. Ephraim only, and he for a narrow space, touched the Jordan. See the often mentioned and very clear Map iii. of Menke's Bibel

Atlas, and also Kiepert's Wall Map. On the quality of the land comp. Robinson, iii., lect. xiv. ; Ritter, xvi. 566 ff. [Gage's transl. iv. 293-332] ; von Raumer, pp. 42-45 ; Furrer, pp. 211-246 ; Robinson, Phys. Geog. pp. 34-42 [Stanley, Sin. and Pal. ch. v.].

a. Ch. xvi. 1-4. Boundaries of the Entire Province. Ver. 1. The lot came out, namely, from the urn. Bunsen rightly observes : "From the ambiguity of the word 'lot,' the passage might perhaps be paraphrased thus : 'The lot was drawn for the children of Joseph and to them fell,' " etc.

From the Jordan by Jericho,<sup>1</sup> at the water of Jericho on the east. The water of Jericho is the fountain of Elisha (2 K. ii. 19-22), now Ain es-Sultan, whose waters are diffused over the plain (Robinson, ii. 283 ff.). It gurgles forth beautifully from under the rocks, and forms, at the foot of the hill from which it comes, a beautiful basin

<sup>1</sup> [Mr. Grove, in the Dict. of the Bible (s. g. 1. 752 b, note c) repeatedly says that יְרִיחוֹ יְרִיחוֹ should be rendered simply "Jordan-Jericho," and that "by" or near, has no business there. This is strange, since the natural sense of the words in such connection is much rather "Jericho-

Jordan," the "Jordan of Jericho," i. e. that part of the Jordan which touches upon the territory of Jericho" (Knobel on Num. xxii. 1). Comp. Stanley (Sin. and Pal. p. 292, n. 6). This is most conveniently expressed as in the English Version. — Ta.]

of water densely surrounded by oleanders and reeds (Furrer, p. 150. [Stanley, Sin. and Pal. p. 300, et ibid. Van de Velde, in a note]). Somewhat to the north of this, the still larger fountain of Dūk is met with, the waters of which, led along in canals, formerly turned several mills in the vicinity (Robinson, Furrer, [Stanley]). The border began at the lower Jordan, and went thence to the fountain of Elisha. This, accordingly, the region of the Jordan opposite Jericho, is its eastern starting point or, more correctly, place. Hence it passed into the wilderness which goes up from Jericho on the mountain of Beth-el. The region intended here is what in ch. xviii. 12 is called the wilderness of Beth-aven, which city appears from ch. vii. 2 to have lain east of Beth-el. On the mountain of Beth-el. "בֶּהְרֵי" which the Masor-etes separate from בֵּית־אֵל is yet, and notwithstanding the LXX., Chald., and Arab. versions repeat this view, undoubtedly to be connected with בֵּית־אֵל, according to 1 Sam. xiii. 2, and to be pointed בֶּהְרֵי. So the Vulg.: ad montem Bethel, and Syriac" (Keil). The mountain about Bethel is meant.

Ver. 2. And it went out (the border) from Beth-el to Luz. Hebr. וַיֵּצֵא מִבֵּית־אֵל לִזְהָרָה. The words must either be translated, as we have done, with the LXX., Luther, De Wette, [Eng. vers.] Keil, Bunsen, in which case Beth-el stands, as Bunsen also supposes, for mountain of Beth-el; or, as Knobel among others prefers: "and it went out from Bethel-luzah." In this translation Knobel (1) follows in ver. 1, the Masoretic pointing בֶּהְרֵי, (2) assumes in ver. 2 a union of the old and new names, "quite contrary to the usage of our author, who, when a city had two names places one after the other connected by וְהָיָה, as he does e. g. (ch. xviii. 13) in the case even of Beth-el and Luz" (Keil). Other examples are ch. xv. 14, 49, 54 (ver. 59, LXX.), 60. See more concerning Beth-el and Luz on ch. xviii. 12, 13. From Luz, i. e. Beth-el (ch. xviii. 13), it went, and on the south side of this city (ch. xviii. 13), unto the border of the Archite to Ataroth. Hushai was an Archite (2 Sam. xv. 32; xvi. 16; 1 Chron. xxvii. 33). Where his possession lay is to be determined from Ataroth, concerning which see on xviii. 13.

Ver. 3. Thence it went down westward to the border of the Japhletite, unto the border of Beth-horon, the nether, and to Gezer; and the goings out thereof were at (or, toward) the sea. The border followed from Bethel toward Ataroth a northerly, then a southwestern, and finally a decidedly western course (see the map). The Japhletite (יַפְלֵטִי), only here as a patronymic; the prop. name יַפְלֵט (whom He, i. e. God saves, Gesen.), 1 Chron. vii. 32, 33. On Beth-horon comp. partly ch. x. 10, partly ch. xvii. 13. Gezer (גֶּזֶר), as the seat of a Canaanite king mentioned already ch. x. 33; xii. 12; according to ch. xxi. 21; 1 Chr. vi. 52, a city of the priests; not yet discovered by modern travellers. Knobel seeks the city northwest of Beth-horon, where Menke has introduced the name. Comp. also von Raumer, p. 191, and his map, where he also has placed it northwest of Beth-horon.

Ver. 4. "North of the line indicated Ephraim and Manasseh took their possession." It is therefore only the south line of both tribes, which is at the same time the north line of Benjamin, and as such is given in inverse order as before mentioned, in ch. xviii. 12, 13.

b. Ch. xvi. 5-10. The Province of the Tribe of Ephraim. Ver. 5. The south border is first given. Ataroth-addar appears as the starting-point, identical, according to xviii. 13, with our Ataroth, ver. 2. Assuming this, "the author notices only the western half of the south border, and omits the eastern half," for Beth-horon, whether the upper as here, to the lower as mentioned in ver. 2, lies west, or more accurately still, southwest of Ataroth-addar. We might, it is true, and Knobel proposes this as an alternative, read עֲמֶרֶת, and understand the Ataroth mentioned ver. 7, which would then make the eastern part of the south border to be drawn. But in that case, יִרְיָה or וְעֶבֶר would, it seems to us, be inserted between the two names. The first supposition therefore appears preferable, according to which we are to understand that the south border of Ephraim in its western half is specified from Ataroth-addar to Beth-horon. But even thus we have not, if we compare ver. 3, this western half of the line at all complete; for from ver. 3, the border proceeds still to Gezer, nay even to the sea. And the LXX. have here after Beth-horon καὶ ἰς θάλασσαν. Perhaps this, as well as what is mentioned besides, ver. 3, has here fallen out. At all events we have, as ver. 6 will show, to deal with a corrupt text, in which the first words of ver. 6 to and including הַיָּמָה might easily have formed the conclusion of ver. 5, to which they would admirably suit. [Verse 5 would thus end — Beth-horon, the upper; and the border went out to the sea]. Then the south border at least of Ephraim, from Ataroth-addar to the sea, would be completely given.

Ver. 6. Keil says, in reference to this verse: "With ver. 6 I know as little as my predecessors how to begin. It would appear that vers. 6-8 should give the northern boundary of the land of Ephraim, and that from a central point, in ver. 6 and 7 toward the east, then in ver. 8 toward the west," as analogous to which, Knobel, who shares this view, adduces the south boundary of Zebulun, ch. xix. 10-12, and the division of the places of Benjamin, ch. xviii. 21-28, as also the west border of Naphtali, ch. xix. 33 ff. "In this view, however," as Keil further remarks, "the first clause of ver. 6 is perfectly inexplicable, and must be corrupt." Perhaps there originally stood "on the north the border went out from Michmethah, for according to ch. xvii. 7, the border of Manasseh went 'from Asher to Michmethah.'" It seems to us still better to assume that it originally stood:

וַיֵּצֵא הַנָּבוֹל הַיָּמָה
מִמִּכְמֶתָהּ מִצִּפּוֹן.

If that were so it is obvious that the twice recurring וַיֵּצֵא הַנָּבוֹל הַיָּמָה (namely, at the end of ver. 5, and at the beginning of ver. 6), must have fallen away once. Let us now by this extension of Keil's very appropriate correction restore the text, and we gain a reading at least in some degree acceptable, by which (1) ver. 5 receives a good ending, and (2) ver. 6 an intelligible beginning, and the whole would mean thus: And the border went out seaward, i. e. toward the west, from Michmethah on the north side, i. e. north of Michmethah. Michmethah (LXX.: Maythab) lay according to ch. xvii. 7, east from Shechem. See further on xvii. 7. Thus we should have given the starting-point of the eastern half of the northern boundary of Ephraim, as lying north of Michmethah in the west of the land. But then, it proceeds, the border went about eastward unto Taanath-shiloh, and passed by it on the east to Janohah. Taanath-shiloh, now Tana, Ain Tana, a place of ruins, southeast of Nablus (Robinson, Later Bibl. Res. p. 295<sup>1</sup>). Janohah, "according to the Onom. s. v. Janá, Janon, twelve miles, i. e. near three hours east of Neapolis, now a ruin, Janun, somewhat over two hours southeast of Nablus, Robinson, Later Bibl. Res. p. 297" (Knobel). The border, accordingly, went from Michmethah to Janohah in a southeast direction, as Menke has indicated.

Ver. 7. From Janohah it went down to Ataroth, and to Naarath, and came to (struck) Jericho, and went out at the Jordan. Keil holds this Ataroth to be the same as Ataroth, ver. 2, Ataroth-addar (ver. 5 and xviii. 13), thus making it the Atara discovered by Robinson (iii. 80, not that mentioned ii. 315), one and a half hours southwest of Jiljilieh, as Robinson himself also believes. Knobel explains that our Ataroth here in ver. 7 cannot be identified, but must certainly, from יִרְיָ have lain nearer the Jordan, possibly one of the two Ataroths which the Onom., s. h. v., refers to in the district of Jerusalem. We shall come upon the question again, ch. xviii. 13. Naarath = Naaran, 1 Chr. vii. 28, in the east of Ephraim. Onom.: "Naorath villa, in quinto milliario Jerichus," i. e. two hours from Jericho (Keil, Knobel, von Raumer, p. 215). Struck Jericho, i. e. the territory of Jericho which city, according to xviii. 21, belonged to the tribe of Benjamin. The border of Ephraim thus touched the northern side of this territory, comp. xviii. 12.

Ver. 8. Now follow the western half of the north border of Ephraim, described as follows:

From Tappuah the border goes (לָךְ) westward to the water-course of Kana, and the goings out thereof were at [to] the sea. Tappuah, distinct from the Tappuah (xv. 34) and Beth-tappuah (xv. 53), in Judah, concerning the etymology of which we have already spoken; the residence of a Canaanite king (xii. 24). Its site is doubtful. Knobel: "Probably Kefr Kud with its important well, by which the great road from Beisan and Zerin passes toward Ramleh (Robinson, Later Bibl. Res. p. 121 ff.) as in the Roman times a military road passed from Caesarea to Scythopolis past Caperota (Tab. Peut. ix. f., in Menke, Map vi. where an extract from the Tab. Peut. is found"). The fact that the place is called (xvii.

7) יִצְרָת, while Kefr Kud has a valuable well, would seem to favor the identity of the two places; but it may be maintained on the other hand, (1) that Kefr Kud lies too far north on the border of Manasseh toward Issachar, while it should lie on the border of Manasseh toward Ephraim (see Menke's Map viii. compared with Map iii); (2) that the old name does not at all appear in the present name Kefr Kud. This is true rather of the present Belad (land) Tafua northeast of Shechem, toward which von Raumer, though not without hesitation, inclines. We hear of a land of Tappuah in ch. xvii. 8 as the district belonging to

En-tappuah. Van de Velde (Mem. p. 357) holds it to be Atuf, four hours E. N. E. of Shechem. Very improbable. Hence we decide for Belad Tafua, against which Keil brings the objection, that this opinion does not agree with the אֶל־תַּחֲמִין (ch. xvii. 7), and therefore he concludes that here also the text is corrupt. See further on ch. xvii. 7, where we must at all events return again to this passage. Water-course of Kana (Reed-brook), see ch. xvii. 9.

Ver. 9. To this province belong also the cities separated in the land of Manasseh for the children of Ephraim, of which, however, only Tappuah is mentioned ch. xvii. 8. Instead of the elsewhere "unheard of" מִבְּדָלוֹת, Knobel proposes to read נִבְדָּלוֹת: Gesen. מִבְּדָלוֹת. Maurer and Keil regard it as a substantive formed after the analogy of מִסְפָּחוֹת, מִדְּרָה, and other words. Maurer translates loca selecta. To me the change of Chireq into Kibbut, as proposed by Gesen., appears the most simple, and thus we have a part. Hophal.

Ver. 10. An addition similar to ch. xv. 63.

They became tributary servants (יִהְיֶיֶם) (עֲבָדִים).

In Gen. xlix. 15 the same expression is used concerning Issachar. According to 1 K. ix. 16, Pharaoh, in the beginning of the reign of Solomon, took Gezer, burned the city and drove out of it the Canaanites. Hence the LXX. add to our verse: "Ἐως ἀνέβη Φαραὸς βασιλεὺς Ἀιγύπτου καὶ ἔλαβεν αὐτὴν (AEX. τὴν πόλιν) καὶ ἀνέστησεν αὐτὴν ἐν πυρὶ, καὶ τοὺς θερε(α)ίους, καὶ τοὺς κατοικοῦντας ἐν τῇ ἐξέκέντησαν (AEX. ἐξεκέντησεν) καὶ ἔδωκεν ἐν φεργῇ τῇ θυγατρὶ αὐτοῦ. Manifestly transferred ad libitum from 1 K. ix. 16. Knobel, Gen. xlix.

15, translates עֲבָדִים, or ward zu Frohn des Arbeiters, i. e. he fell under tributary labor, as he himself further on explains. Lange, more poetically and more clearly: "He is become subject to tributary service." We render the phrase here in prose, with De Wette "subject to tributary service." The common rendering: "subject to tribute" which Bunsen still retains, gives the erroneous idea that the Canaanites had to pay a tribute in money, like the tributary states in the Turkish empire. The expression is used elsewhere, with the exception of Gen. xlix. 15, "of the Canaanites who became subject to the Hebrews (as ch. xvii. 13; 1 K. ix. 21; Judg. i. 28, 33), and of prisoners taken in war whom the Hebrews made slaves (Dent. xx. 11; Is. xxxi. 8)" (Knobel). Comp. also Keil on Kings, pp. 44 and 67 [Germ.].

c. Ch. xvii. 1-13. Portion of the Tribe of Manasseh. The description of this province by its boundaries, beginning ver. 7, is preceded by some genealogical notices concerning the families of the tribe. Of these that of Machir had already received its territory beyond the Jordan.

Ver. 1. And there was the lot for the tribe of Manasseh. After it had fallen to Ephraim, Manasseh's turn came. These introductory words refer only to the country allotted to this tribe west of the Jordan (vers. 7-13). This lay north of the possession of Ephraim in a fertile and beautiful region.

For he was the first-born of Joseph, Gen. xli. 51; xlviii. 14. Keil: "the יָדִיד is not to be pressed, and the whole remark is made only with reference to the following genealogical statements." Better Knobel: "Wherefore (because he was Joseph's first-born) he received yet a possession in Canaan also, the land of the fathers, God's land." לַמְּקִיר is placed first and is afterwards taken up by לוֹ after מִיָּד, thus: "To Machir . . . (and) to him fell Gilead and Bashan." Why is stated in the parenthetical clause, "because he was a man of war," Num. xxxii. 29 ff. This portion of the tribe, the author would have us understand, had nothing to receive west of the Jordan. They had their part already on the east side.

<sup>1</sup> (Robinson expressly denies the probability that Ain Tana is the ancient Taanath-shiloh).

Ver. 2. The other sons of Manasseh follow, to whom the lot fell in west Palestine. They are mentioned in Num. xxvi. 30-32, where instead of אֲבִיעֶזֶר stands אִיעֶזֶר. By an error of transcription, as Keil conjectures, the כ appears to have fallen out. Instead of זְקָרִים to read נִזְקָרִים, as Knobel proposes, is not justifiable; rather, since in genealogies קָנִי may indicate all (male and female) posterity, while here, in what follows, female descendants also are mentioned, the יִזְרִי is added for perspicuity" (Keil).

Ver. 3. It had been stated also in Num. xxvi. 33 that Zelophehad,<sup>1</sup> the son of Hephher, had no sons but only daughters. Zelophehad himself, according to Num. xxvii. 3, had died in the wilderness, but the daughters declare it an injustice (Num. xxvii. 4) that their father's name should perish, and that too when he had not been of those that rose up against the Lord in the company of Korah. Moses agrees with them, and at their request grants their wish, an inheritance among their brothers. By this the name of Zelophehad was preserved, which could not have been the case without the possession of an estate to which the name of the original proprietor attached. The law which governed the case is found in Num. xxvii. 8-11 (compared with Num. xxxvi. 6-10), occasioned by this occurrence. They were accordingly their daughters, comp. Knobel on Num. xxvii. 1 ff.

Ver. 4. Now, since the land was divided, they claim their right, appealing to the command of God through Moses. Eleazar and Joshua without objection immediately promise what they desire.

Vers. 5, 6. "According to this the inheritance coming to the Manassites had to be divided into ten parts, since the male posterity fell into five families, and so received five parts, while the sixth family, that of Hephher, was divided again into five families, through his grand-daughters, the five daughters of Zelophehad, who married men of the other families of their paternal tribe (Num. xxxvi. 1-10), and received each her special share of the land" (Keil). Because, therefore, the daughters, as heirs, obtained their possession among the male descendants of Manasseh, the inheritance in western Palestine must need be divided into ten parts, while the land of Gilead went to the remaining Manassites. The genealogy is for the rest by no means clear. Comp. Knobel on Num. xxvi. 29-34; Keil on ver. 1 of this chapter.

Vers. 7-13. Portion of the Western Branch of the Tribe of Manasseh. The author gives the boundary again from east to west, as in the case of Judah (ch. xv. 2 ff.), the sons of Joseph (xvi. 1 ff.) and Benjamin (ch. xviii. 12 ff.). So the author of the Apocalypse also names the gates of the New Jerusalem, beginning from the east (Rev. xxi. 13), and Ezekiel designates the several tribe divisions in like manner from east to west (ch. xlviii. 1 ff.).

<sup>1</sup> זֶלְפֶּחָד, hence properly to be written in Eng. Zelophehad, not Zelophehad.

And the border of Manasseh was from Asher to Michmethah, that lieth before Shechem; and the border went along on [toward] the right hand unto the inhabitants of En-tappuah. What border is meant, the north or south? Knobel thinks the former, Keil and Bunsen the south border. The starting-point lies unquestionably in the east. Asher (אָשֶׁר), fifteen Roman miles from Shechem toward Bethshean (Scythopolis), perhaps Teyasir (Robinson, Later Bibl. Res. p. 306 f.), or Jafr (Van de Velde, ii. 295, apud. von Raumer, p. 148). This however is not certain, but only so far sure that Asher is to be sought, according to the statement of the Onom., on the road from Shechem to Bethshean, hence in the eastern part of the territory of Manasseh.

Thence the border goes to Michmethah which we have already met with at ch. xvi. 5. This Michmethah (מִכְמֶתָח, perhaps "hiding-place," from מִכְתָּח, Gesen.) lay, as our passage would indicate, before, i. e. according to the customary use of עַל-יְמִינֵי, east or northeast of Shechem, unless, as Knobel assumes, עַל-יְמִינֵי is to be taken here in reference to a more remote distance = מֵרָחֵק, Deut. xi. 30. In this case, Kubatijeh (on Menke's Map viii. written Kabatijeh) or Kabaat (Buckingham, Syria, i. p. 453), Kabate in Seetzen (ii. p. 166), lying exactly north of Shechem, on the road from Shechem to Jenin would in his view offer itself for comparison. The etymological relationship of the two words is thus established by Knobel: "ב" doubtless is to be regarded, with the LXX. as the plural of a sing. מִכְמֶתָח, for which they may probably have used also מִכְמֶתָח (see on ch. xii. 18). Then, since m and b are frequently interchanged (see on ch. iii. 16), the present name of the place agrees, etc." Against this we would oppose the following considerations: (1) It appears to us that the operation by which the relationship between the names Michmethah and Kubatijeh, or Kabaat, or Kabate, is attempted to be proved, is an exceedingly violent one. (2) In Deut. xi. 30 מֵרָחֵק does indeed stand for a north-west direction, but it is precisely מֵרָחֵק that stands there, meaning, in a quite general way, over against, and not the more definite עַל-יְמִינֵי concerning which Knobel himself admits that in geographical statements it is "certainly for the most part to the east,"—precisely in the same way, Knobel might have added, as is the case with לְיָמֵי (Gen. xxiii. 17; xxv. 18; Deut. xxxii. 49). (3) If Michmethah is to be sought so far north, then ch. xvi. 6, where it is brought in to determine the north border of Ephraim which lies south of Manasseh, is inexplicable. Rather may it be said, that (a) the statement of this passage: אֲשֶׁר עַל-יְמִינֵי שֹׁכֵם and (b) the proximity indicated, ch. xvi. 6, of Taanath-shiloh, which is now recognized in Ain Tana [?], go to show that Michmethah is to be looked for east or northeast of Shechem, perhaps, also, on the road to Bethshean, where Kiepert, indeed (on the large map, 3d and most recent edition, 1866), although with a mark of interrogation, and Menke (Map iii.) have inserted the name. But if this is correct we have here not the north border of Manasseh, but the south, the same which is given, ch. xvi. 5 ff., as the north boundary of Ephraim; and there lies before us precisely the same case of the double registry of the same line as between our two tribes and Benjamin (ch. xvi. 1-4 compared with ch. xviii. 12, 13) on one side, and between Judah and Benjamin (ch. xv. 5 ff.; xviii. 15 ff.) on the other. But as regards the north border of Manasseh, it as well as the east border is given in common for both tribes in the second half of ver. 10.

Shechem, שֶׁכֶּם, now Nablus or Nabulus, having, like Jerusalem, Gibeon, and Jericho, had several names between the times of the patriarchs and of Christ (Gen. xii. 6; John iv. 5), lies on the watershed (שֶׁכֶּם = back) between the Mediterranean and the Jordan Valley (Furrer, pp. 237, 238), in a lovely, richly favored valley between Ebal and Gerizim, surrounded by gardens in which nature has prodigally scattered her richness (Furrer, p. 234). See the fresh and beautiful description in Furrer, p. 230 ff.; comp. further, von Raumer, p. 161 ff.; Rob. iii. p. 95 ff. [Tristram, 141 ff.; Stanley, S. & P., 229 ff.]. Shechem has at present about eight thousand inhabitants. From Michmethah the border went to the right

(אַל־יְמִינִי) unto the inhabitants of en-Tappuah. According to this, en-Tappuah or Tappuah (ch. xvi. 8) lay south of Michmethah, and hence also south or southwest of Shechem. But Balad Tafuah (comp. on ch. xvi. 8) lies rather northeast of Shechem. How then should the border go thence toward the right, i. e., southwardly? May not, perhaps, an escape be found from the obscurity (undeniably very great<sup>1</sup>) of this passage in the fact that it reads, not unto en-Tappuah, but only unto the inhabitants of Tappuah? Although then Tappuah itself had lain northeast of Shechem, we might still imagine that the territory of this royal city of the Canaanites (ch. xii. 17) had stretched toward the south or southwest. With Knobel, who everywhere here supposes that he has the north boundary line before him, it all goes beautifully. For him the line runs from Asher to Kubatijeh, from Kubatijeh to Jamun (יָמוֹן), in spite of the article, is taken as a proper name = Yamon, Rob. iii. pp. 161, 167), and from Jamun to Keft Kud. But we repeat, that we are not now concerned with the north limit of Manasseh, but its southern, toward Ephraim. [So Mr. Grove, also, Dict. of the Bible, art. "Manasseh," p. 1770 c. although he thinks it doubtful whether the portions of Ephraim and Manasseh were intended to be effectually separated, and that, if they were, no clear line of division can now be made out. — Tr.]

Ver. 8. Another notice of Tappuah, purporting that the land of Tappuah went to Manasseh, the city to Ephraim. The latter possessed, according to ch. xvi. 9, still other places in Manasseh. Kiepert has inserted Tappuah on the map northwest of Shechem and Michmethah, but with a mark of interrogation. Menke assigns it the same position, perhaps with reference to the brook of reeds mentioned (ch. xvi. 8), which we here find again in ver. 9.

Ver. 9. And the border descended unto the watercourse Kanah, southward of the watercourse. In ch. xvi. 8, it reads: From Tappuah the border goes westward toward the Reed-brook, and its out-goings were at the sea. Keil supposes this brook to be the Abu Zabura, which Knobel also mentions at first, although he immediately afterward refers to the Nahr el-Kassab. Von Raumer decides for the latter (p. 51) with greater positiveness, because the old name Reed-brook has been preserved in Nahr el-Kassab. But Nahr el-Kassab is the same stream which on Kiepert's wall-map appears as Nahr el-Falik (Van de Velde: Falaik), which Kiepert with von Raumer holds to be the Reed-brook (brook of Cana). The border extended south of the brook to the sea, i. e., the Mediterranean sea (יָם־סוּף, ch. xvi. 8), which Jerome strangely regards as being the mare salissimum!

These cities belonged to Ephraim among the cities of Manasseh. Thus ch. xvi. 9 is more exactly defined, "These cities." Which cities? It is indeed said further: "and the border of Manasseh was north of the brook," but the definition is made no clearer thereby. The sense can hardly be other than what Masius long ago expressed: "Funiculus, qui discernabat fratrum istorum possessiones, ambiebat ille quidem torrentem Cannosum (נַחַל קָנוֹס) a meridie atque eum attribuebat Manassensibus; verumtamen urbes, quæ illi torrenti ab austro adiacebant, etsi essent reipsa intra Manassensium posita terminos, nihilominus jure fuerunt Ephraimitarum; quæ vero a septentrione torrentis exstabant, eas obtinebant Manassenses." For in ver. 10 we read still more plainly: "Southward (from the brook it, the land, was) Ephraim's, and northward (of the same) it was Manasseh's; and the sea was his border (toward the west). Knobel would, according to ch. xvi. 9, read יָם־סוּף for יָם־סוּף; but this is not strictly necessary.

Ver. 10. South of the Reed-brook the land is here said to have belonged to Ephraim, north of it to Manasseh, a boundary line as simple as could be. Knobel here comes into perplexity, out of which he would escape by supposing that the north border of Manasseh cuts through the Reed-brook, while the north border of Ephraim comes to it, so that the territory of Manasseh there formed a point! — And the sea was his border. Both divisions had the sea on the west, one (Ephraim) south of the Reed-brook, the other (Manasseh) north of it. The account of the north boundary for both in common follows (comp. ch. xvi. 1 ff.).

They struck upon (יָפְקְעוּ) Asher on the north, i. e., on the north side (ch. xix. 26). The description of the province concludes with the eastern limit; on Issachar on the east (ch. xix. 17). The two tribes were bounded, therefore, (1) on the east by Issachar; (2) on the north by Asher; (3) on the west by the sea; (4) on the south by Benjamin and Dan. Between them they had a division line which is twice referred to, (a) ch. xvi. 6 ff., (b) in our chapter, ver. 7-10; but unfortunately in neither place with such clearness as marks the description e. g. of the boundary between Judah and Benjamin (ch. xv. 8 ff.). A separate border of Manasseh on the north, such as Knobel assumes, we cannot find given in the text.

Vers. 11-13. Six cities are enumerated which Manasseh received beyond his own country, in Issachar and Asher, without, however, being able to expel the Canaanites from them. At a later period having become stronger, they were content to make them tributary servants (ver. 13). The same report is found again (Judg. i. 27 ff.), where, however, Endor is omitted.

<sup>1</sup> [Cf. Grove in Dict. of Bible, art. "Michmethah."]

The word בְּנוֹת reminds us of ch. xv. 47. Knobel finds here the second document of the Jehovist.

Ver. 11. Beth-shean (בֵּית־שֵׁאן), i. e., house of rest, now Beisan, — "in an expansion of the Jordan Valley, which is bounded on the west by the low ridge of Mount Gilboa. At the present day ruins of an ancient Roman theatre are found here, but only about seventy or eighty miserable huts for the two hundred actual inhabitants. It stands about four hours from Tiberias, on the road from Jerusalem to Damascus" (von Raumer, p. 150; Rob. iii. 174 ff.). The Philistines hung on its walls the dead body of Saul (1 Sam. xxxi. 10). It was afterward called Scythopolis (see Herod. i. 104-106, in regard to the origin of the name). From the summit of Gilboa, two thousand two hundred feet high, Furrer (p. 260) saw a green plain lying at his feet on the east, out of which rose the black tents of the Bedouin camps, like dark patches, on the green. The plain extends downward to the Jordan, and he was able to follow its picturesque windings to a considerable distance. "There, not far from the river," Furrer proceeds, "Beisan must lie, although I could not discern it — the ancient Bethshean on whose walls the Philistines once hung the dead body of Saul." [Comp. Tristram's account of Beisan, p. 504 ff.]

Ibleam, where Ahaziah was mortally wounded (2 K. ix. 27), a Levitical city (ch. xxi. 25), perhaps, as Knobel supposes, Jelameh, Jelamah between Zerim and Jenin (Rob. iii. 161). The accusative (לְהוֹרִישׁוֹ) which follows is remarkable, since the sentence had begun with וַיְהִי. It is most simply explained by a change of construction, perhaps occasioned by the fact that לְהוֹרִישׁ, which governs the accusative, is used in verse 12; to which may be added that in Judg. i. 27, the whole statement begins with לְהוֹרִישׁ. Nor should it be overlooked, that instead of the cities the inhabitants whom Manasseh could not drive out are mentioned.

Dor, ch. xi. 2; xii. 23.

En-dor (עֵדֹר), four Roman miles south of Tabor, according to the Onom. (von Raumer, p. 125), near the northern slope of the Jebel Dachi (Duhy, little Hermon), which rises in "yellow nakedness" over against Tabor (Furrer, p. 308; Rob. p. 171 f.). Endor was the abode of the "woman with a familiar spirit," whom Saul consulted (1 Sam. xxviii. 9), but is also celebrated (Ps. lxxxiii. 11) as the scene of the victory in which the Midianites were destroyed. In the parallel passage (Judg. i. 27 ff.) Endor is not mentioned. Taanach, ch. xii. 21. Megiddo, ch. xii. 21.

The three heights (שְׁלֹשֶׁת בָּמֹת; LXX., τρεῖς τῆς Νόφθ; Vulg., tertia pars urbis Napht.). What is intended is the three cities lying on hills: Endor, Taanach, and Megiddo, a Tripolis of mountain cities in distinction from the places on the plain: Bethshean, Ibleam, and Dor. The author might have called the latter also a שְׁלֹשֶׁת, using שְׁלֹשֶׁת חֲשָׁאִים in the general sense of "plain," and not in the definite geographical signification which in this book it everywhere bears, as e. g., in ch. xv. 33.

Ver. 12. "The Manassites, however, were not in a condition to expel the population from the cities named, so that the Canaanites, according to their will and pleasure, dwelt in this district" (Knobel). The will and pleasure is right vividly expressed by the plastic וַיֵּשְׁבוּ (ch. vii. 7; Ex. ii. 21).

1 [Knobel's supposition is better, namely, that הָיָה לִי is here fit to be equivalent to receive, possess, have. — Tr.]

Ver. 13. But when the Israelites became strong (וַיִּהְיֶה) they made the Canaanites tributary servants (comp. ch. x. 10), but drive them out they did not. We allow ourselves this translation, after the example of De Wette, to indicate in English something of the effect of the emphatic וְהוֹרִישׁ לֹא הוֹרִישׁוּ.

d. Ver. 14-18. Complaint of the Children of Joseph that their Possession is insufficient. "An old, original fragment, and a beautiful, historical trait in the character of Joshua. The unselfish Joshua was himself of Ephraim, Num. xiii. 8, 16" (Bunsen). As the history of Achsah (ch. xv. 13-19), occurring in the midst of the boundary descriptions of Judah, and catalogues of its cities, makes a very refreshing impression on the laborious explorer of these records, so this narrative awakens similar emotions. The children of Joseph, i. e., probably the patriarchs of the tribe, came complaining before their fellow-tribesman Joshua, to whom they had trusted for a better guardianship of their interests. "Why," they ask, "hast thou given me but one lot and one portion, as a possession, when I am a great people, in so far as Jehovah hath blessed me hitherto." Joshua, by no means disposed to grant special favors to his own tribe, demands of them to use their strength, to go up into the forest, to clear it out, and establish for themselves new abodes there among the Perizzites and the Rephaim. When they (ver. 16) show little inclination to this course, and at the same time intimate that they cannot spread themselves further in the plain because of the formidableness of the Canaanites who dwell there, Joshua (ver. 17) still remains firm. In both his replies (vers. 15, 17) he betrays a touch of irony, as if he would say: Yes, it is true, thou art a numerous people, and hast great strength, and oughtest therefore to have more than one share. But seek to procure this second portion thyself! Rely on thy own power! Cut down the forest! Behold thou wilt drive out the Canaanites; it is precisely thy task to conquer those that have iron chariots and are mighty; no other tribe can do it." Of the manner in which Ewald (ii. 315-317, 2d [Germ.] ed.) treats this narrative, we shall have occasion to speak further on.

Ver. 14. As here, so also ch. xvi. 1 ff.; xvii. 10, the children of Joseph are taken together. They are regarded as one tribe, so to speak, the tribe of Joseph, as Rev. vii. 8. Comp. also passages like Am. vi. 6; Ps. lxxviii. 16; lxxviii. 67; lxxx. 2; lxxxi. 6; Ez. xxxvii. 16, 19.

One lot and one portion. חֵקֶל וְחֵצֶה and חֵקֶל וְחֵצֶה are synonymous and combined for greater emphasis. חֵקֶל is the lot which is cast; חֵצֶה the measuring line, then the measured inheritance" (Keil). Comp. also ver. 5.

So far as עַד־אִשֶּׁר; not as Gesenius would have it, עַל־אִשֶּׁר; de gradu, Maurer) Jehovah hath blessed me hitherto, עַד־כֹּה, de tempore, Maurer). A quite peculiar blessing had been promised to Joseph (Gen. xlix. 25, 26; Deut. xxxiii. 13-17).

Ver. 15. Joshua's answer. Get thee up into the forest. The forest of the mountain of Ephraim and of its out-goings (ver. 18) is meant. That Mount Ephraim (mountain of Israel, ch. xi. 16-21) was then covered with woods, is clear from 1 Sam. xiv. 25; 2 Sam. xviii. 6. Even the forest at Bethel, 2 K. ii. 23, 24, probably belonged (Winer, ii. 675) to the forest of Ephraim. And even at the present day, according to the uniform testimony of travellers, the heights of Mount Ephraim, forming the northern portion of the mountainous country between the plain of Jezreel and the wilderness of the south (von Raumer, p. 42), are more rich in vegetation than that part of the same mountain which belonged to Judah. Especially is this the case with its spurs toward the northwest and northeast. On the northwest a forest-covered hill joins itself to Mount Ephraim connecting the latter with Carmel, that most beautiful, and greenest of all the mountains of Canaan. On the northeast Mount Gilboa, where Saul and Jonathan fell in the contest with the Philistines (1 Sam. xxviii. 4; xxxi. 1-8; 2 Sam. i. 6-20), constitutes its off-shoot toward the Jordan. On the road from the hamlet of Jelbon, in which word the old name is preserved, Furrer (p. 260) ascended the mountain by a lofty slope which was in places clothed with a dense oak thicket. A small forest of low oak trees is mentioned by the same traveller as standing on the right of the road from Nazareth to Carmel (p. 290). Without doubt it is the same woods which Schultz describes (Reise in das gelobte Land, pp. 249, 250), since he also notices the "crisp eastern oaks." Robinson (iii. p. 189 f.) speaks of "a wide strip of low woody heights" by which Carmel is joined on the southwest with the mountains of Samaria. We find woods therefore partly on Mount Ephraim itself, partly on its off-shoots.

At the very foot of this forest, however, on the northwest spur of Mount Ephraim, the children of Joseph had had cities in the plain assigned to them, namely, Taanach, and Megiddo (Dor lay further west on the sea) in the plain of Jezreel (ver. 11). Ibleam and Bethshean also (ver. 11) lay west and east of Mount Gilboa, being spoken of again in ver. 16. Knobel (p. 450) says: "Whether the author thinks also of the Little Hermon lying further north, and so refers to Endor, is doubtful," and we not only share his doubt but go a step further and consider it quite improbable, since Robinson (iii. p. 171) speaks of that mountain as "a desert, shapeless mass," and Furrer (p. 308) notices the "yellow nakedness" of the Jebel Duhy, or Dachi.

Cut down for thyself there in the land of the Perizzites and of the Rephaim, if Mount Ephraim is too narrow (וְעַתָּה here in a different sense from ch. x. 13). Cornel. a Lapidé (in Keil, p. 411 f.) long ago hit upon the thought that here and in ver. 18, by the forest the Perizzites and the Rephaim were to be understood, thus assuming that there was a metaphor. He says: "Est metaphora, terram enim a Chananeis occupatam vocat sylvam, eo quod sicut sylva excindi debet, ut locus arari possit: sic excindendi erant Pherizaei, ut eorum terra occuparent Josephite."

Him Ewald follows, as Keil has pointed out, when he represents the import of ver. 15 in the following manner: "not at a loss for the answer, he (Joshua) replied: 'if they were so numerous (and Mount Ephraim as hitherto occupied by them too small) then they need only move into the forest (i. e. into the thickly settled and cultivated plain) and laboriously cut down for themselves

there the tall, profitable trees.' In other words they should enter the plain surrounding the mountain on which they dwell, where, however, the 'Perizzites and Rephaim' (that is, the enemy) still lay in dense masses, whom the tribe (instead of envying other tribes their inheritance), ought themselves long ago to have destroyed and so to have doubled their possession." A purely arbitrary explanation, which may be pardoned to old Cornelius a Lapidé, but so much the less readily to Ewald, as he arrogates too much to himself, when, with well-known dogmatism, he says (p. 315, note 2): "Already the LXX. failed to understand this ancient passage, hard to be comprehended by reason of its 'biting scorn' (sic!), and still less have the moderns understood it." Wherein the fault of the LXX. consists in this respect, we are unable, after repeated comparison of the original with their version, to discover, unless in the fact that the LXX. venture to render עַתָּה (quite properly in our humble opinion) by ἀρδην, while Ewald prefers to make of it march into the plain. Of the "biting scorn" of Joshua we will presently speak again.

Ver. 16. The sons of Joseph answer, that the mountain really will not suffice for them, while the Canaanites in the valley-land (וְהַכְּנָעֲנִים) have iron chariots. They appear as if they had not heard a syllable of going up into the forest.

Is not enough. Here אֵין is used as in Zech. x. 10; Num. xi. 22 (Knobel and Keil). LXX.: οὐκ ἀρκέσει, according to the correct text, instead of ἀπέσει. Comp. also LXX., Num. xi. 22. The iron chariots of the Canaanites were greatly feared by the Israelites, and were "the main reason why the Hebrews could not establish themselves in the plains (ch. xi. 4; Judg. i. 19; iv. 3; 1 Sam. xiii. 5). Israel adopted this species of weapons not until the time of David and Solomon (2 Sam. viii. 4; 1 K. v. 6; ix. 19; x. 26)" (Knobel). That the Canaanites had these iron chariots did not hinder the children of Joseph from "occupying the forest region" (Keil), but the plain, as Knobel rightly perceived, since the "chariot-cavalry" (Winer, ii. 671), very dangerous in the plains, could not well get on in the mountain, as the passage of Vegetius (Mil. iii. 24), cited by Winer, shows: "Quadrigae falcate ut primo magnum intulere terrorem, ita postmodum fuere desitui. Nam difficile currus falcatus planum semper invenit campum et levi impedimento detinetur, unoque afflicto aut vulnerato equo decipitur."

Ver. 17. Joshua does not allow them to slip out, but holds fast to his declaration already made, the sense of which has been exhibited above.

Ver. 18. Continuation. A mountain shall be thine, for it is a forest. The mountain of Ephraim is meant. This mountain should fall to the lot of the strong and able house of Joseph, because it was adapted to them as being woodland to be cleared up by them. As the result of this clearing the one lot should become two, as it were, to which Joshua plainly points, ver. 17.

Thou shalt cut it down, and the out-goings (וְהַצֵּיְתָיו) of it shall be thine. We cannot with Knobel understand the sense of these words so that according to ver. 15, the one of these out-goings or spurs, the northwestern one, toward Carmel, and according to this verse the other, northeastern, Gilboa, were to be granted in addition to what they had received; for in this case Joshua would have made a concession to his fellow tribesmen, and so broken the point of the whole transaction. Rather, the sons of Joseph have indeed Mount Ephraim proper, as they themselves say (ver. 16), already in possession, and, in the vicinity of those two spurs to the northwest and northeast, the cities mentioned in ver. 11 had been allotted. If now they have not room enough, they should, partly on Mount Ephraim, and partly on the heights which rose above those cities, in the territory of the Perizzites and Rephaim, cut down the woods and so make themselves new abodes, as, modest in his claims, Joshua himself did (ch. xix. 50). To convince and encourage them Joshua adds:—

For thou wilt drive out the Canaanites, for they have iron chariots, for they are strong. "Male Dathius, alii, quamvis currus ferreos habebunt et potentes sint."

יְיָ signifi- cat nam. Sensus: hanc ipsam ob causam, quod currus ferreos habent et potentes sunt, vos, Ephraimites et Manassites, eos aggre- diamini, quippe qui estis populus numerosus et potens" (ver. 17). So Maurer, and De Wette, Keil, Knobel likewise. When the LXX. render the last words: ἢ ἢ ἢ by οὐ γὰρ ὁρε- ροῦς αὐτοῦ, they either read: ἢ ἢ ἢ ἢ ἢ ἢ, or, which is to me more likely, allow themselves a variation. The Vulg. translates very freely: "Et poteris ultra procedere, cum subverteris Chananeum, quem dicis ferreos habere currus et esse fortissimum."

At this place we may appropriately return to Ewald's account of the transaction. He comments on vers. 16–18, thus: "but when to this sharp answer" (he means the decision of Joshua given in ver. 15), "they go on to reply that, 'that did not suit, that the mountain was enough for them, since the Canaanites living in the plain had the dangerous iron chariots.' Joshua carries still further the figure of forest and mountain, even to the uttermost, and, in order to finish the matter with one blow, turns off the importunate petitioners who desire much and yet, out of vain fear, will not exert themselves to obtain their wish, by the still more pointed insult (sic!) that 'they should by all means, since they were a very numerous and strong tribe, have not merely one lot! Rather should they, besides the mountain which they already possessed, and yet did not truly possess, have also another, namely, that forest, which they would have first with bitter toil to clear off and make useful, i. e. the Canaanites, whom to subdue in spite of, and indeed precisely on account of, their mighty armor, and to render serviceable was their second portion yet to be acquired; and in this, fear and trembling would be of no avail!' A biting sarcasm, worthy of a Samson! And so the most ancient legend, as it appears in this narrative, conceived of Joshua also as the hero who contended by his humiliating wit against the presumption of the men of his tribe, — a true man of the people, in the best sense of the word."

Against this, aside from what we have already said in opposition to the figurative interpretation of the forest and mountain, two remarks are appropriate: (1) ver. 16 is treated quite arbitrarily when Ewald, in his note, p. 316, writes: "In ver. 16, מְיָ is, against the Masora, to be separated as 'no!' and מְיָ to be written." Thus he would bring out exactly the opposite sense, namely, that the mountain was enough for them, although the sons of Joseph, in ver. 14, complain of that very thing, that their district was too small for so numerous a people; (2) the more "pointed insult," which Ewald, resting on ver. 17 and 18 puts into the mouth of Joshua, presupposes that his answer in ver. 15 also was pointed, and moreover a pointed insult, as indeed he finds in the whole passage nothing but biting mockery (p. 315, note 2). Fine irony, a noble humor, we also recognize in the replies of Joshua as well in ver. 15 as in vers. 17, 18, but between this and "biting mockery" there is a great difference. Irony is morally allowable, mockery and insult not. He who employs the latter is a bad man, and will never be regarded as "a true man of the people in the best sense of the word," which the most ancient myth is here said to have made Joshua. Joshua was certainly a true people's man; certainly our author will, in this old, precious narrative, so represent him, but as a people's man who has gained his popularity not through sharp and sharper sarcasms, but through his unselfishness and noble preëminence. For, that any one should have become a favorite by insulting mockery, would no more occur in Joshua's time than in ours. We must, therefore, deny the biting scorn which Ewald here scents out. Malicious teasing lay far enough remote from so noble a hero as Joshua. He knew nothing of it.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

The narrative, ch. xvii. 14–18, can, on the one hand, be employed to show Joshua as a pattern of an unselfish, noble, and prudent popular leader and statesman; and, on the other, to set home his decision toward the house of Joseph, as an impressive lesson to all at the present day who desire everything from the state, but would themselves put forth the least possible exertion. So in reference to the age in general; but the passage admits of an individual application also to all idle men who will not labor, for instance, in new founded colonies, where a sermon on this text would, under certain circumstances, be very much in place.

STARKE: That is the way with the covetous man, that the more he has the more he desires to have, and cannot but grudge his neighbor what belongs to him. One should be content with that which God gives. Those who are appointed to the duty of distributing goods and lands, however faithfully they may perform the service, yet commonly get no great thanks therefor.

An original remark occurs in the Bibl. Tub. on ver. 15: It is a duty of the magistrate, among others, this, namely, for the benefit of the inhabitants when there are many of them, to prepare the yet uncultivated land for cultivation, that the people may derive from it so much the more revenue and support.

LANGER: So it goes also with many an insincere combatant in the kingdom of God, that they would fain have many spiritual gifts but without a strife.

KRAMER: Prayer, labor, and trust in God must go together, Ps. cxxvii. 2.

[MATT. HENRY: Many wish for larger possessions, who do not cultivate and make the best of what they have, think they should have more talents given them, who do not trade with those with which they are intrusted. Most people's poverty is the effect of their idleness; would they dig they need not beg. — TR.]

3. The Territories of the Seven remaining Tribes: Benjamin, Simeon, Zebulun, Issachar, Asher, Naphtali, Dan; and the Possession of Joshua.

CHAPTERS XVIII., XIX.

a. Setting up of the Tabernacle at Shiloh. Description of the Land yet to be divided.

CHAPTER XVIII. 1-10.

1 And the whole congregation of the children [sons] of Israel assembled together at Shiloh, and set up the tabernacle of the congregation there: and the land was 2 subdued before them. And there remained among the children of Israel seven
3 tribes, which had not yet [omit: yet] received their inheritance. And Joshua said
4 unto the children of Israel, How long are ye slack to go to possess the land which 5 the Lord [Jehovah] God of your fathers hath given you? Give out from among [for]
6 you three men for each tribe: and I will send them, and they shall rise, and go 7 [about] through the land, and describe it according to the inheritance of them [their 8 possession]: and they shall come again [omit: again] to me. And they shall divide 9 it into seven parts: Judah shall abide in their coast [stand on his border] on the 10 south, and the house of Joseph shall abide in their coasts [stand on their border] in 11 the north. Ye shall therefore [And ye shall] describe the land into seven parts, and 12 bring the description [so Bunsen, but properly: them or it] hither to me, that I 13 may cast lots for you here before the Lord [Jehovah] our God. But [For] the 14 Levites have no part among you; for the priesthood of the Lord [Jehovah] is their 15 inheritance [possession]: and Gad, and Reuben, and half the tribe of Manasseh, 16 have received their inheritance [possession] beyond [the] Jordan on the east, which 17 Moses the servant of the Lord [Jehovah] gave them. And the men arose, and went 18 away: and Joshua charged them that went to describe the land, saying, Go, and 19 walk through the land, and describe it, and come again to me, that I may here cast
20 lots for you before the Lord [Jehovah] in Shiloh. And the men went and passed 21 through the land, and described it by [the] cities into seven parts in a book, and came 22 again [omit: again] to Joshua to the host [camp] at Shiloh. And Joshua cast lots
23 for them in Shiloh before the Lord [Jehovah]: and there Joshua divided the land 24 unto the children of Israel according to their divisions.

b. The Territory of the Tribe of Benjamin.

CHAPTER XVIII. 11-28.

a. Its boundaries.

CHAPTER XVIII. 11-20.

11 And the lot of the tribe of the children [sons] of Benjamin came up according 12 to their families: and the coast [border] of their lot came forth between the chil-
13 dren of Judah and the children of Joseph. And their border on the north side 14 was [De Wette: began; but properly: There was for them the border, etc.] from 15 [the] Jordan, [Fay: at the Jordan]; and the border went up to the side of Jericho 16 on the north side [omit: side], and went up through [on] the mountains west-17 ward; and the goings out thereof were at the wilderness of Beth-aven. And the 18 border went over from thence toward Luz, to the side of Luz (which is Beth-el)
19 southward; and the border descended to Ataroth-adar, near [on] the hill [mountain]
20 that lieth on the south side of the nether Beth-horon. And the border was drawn 21 thence, and compassed the corner of the sea [and bent around toward the west side] 22 southward, from the hill [mountain] that lieth before Beth-horon southward; and 23 the goings out thereof were at Kirjath-baal (which is Kirjath-jearim), a city of the 24 children [sons] of Judah. This was the west quarter [side].
25 And the south quarter [side] was from the end of Kirjath-jearim, and the bor-26 der went out on [toward] the west, and went out to the well [fountain] of the 27 waters of Nephtoah. And the border came [went] down to the end of the moun-28 tain that lieth before the valley [ravine] of the son of Hinnom, and [omit: and]

- which is in the valley of the giants [Rephaim] on the north, and descended to the valley [ravine] of Hinnom, to the side [prop.: shoulder] of Jebusi on the south [De Wette: on the south side of the Jebusite; Fay: on the side of the Jebusite]
 17 toward the south], and descended to En-rogel, and was drawn from [on] the north, and went forth to En-shemesh, and went forth toward Geliloth, which is over against the going up of Adummim, and descended to the stone of Bohan the son
 18 of Reuben, And passed along toward the side [shoulder] over against [מול] [the]
 19 Arabah [Jordan-valley] northward, and went down unto [the] Arabah: And the border passed along to the side [shoulder] of Beth-hoglah northward: and the out-goings of the border [it, the border] were at the north bay [tongue] of the salt sea, at the south end of [the] Jordan. This was the south coast [border].
 20 And [the] Jordan was the border of it [bordered it], on the east side. This was the inheritance of the children [sons] of Benjamin, by the coasts [borders] thereof round about, according to their families.

β. Cities of the Tribe of Benjamin.

CHAPTER XVIII. 21-28.

- 21 Now [And] the cities of the tribe of the children [sons] of Benjamin, according to their families, were Jericho, and Beth-hoglah, and the valley of [Emek]
 22 23 Keziz, And Beth-arabah, and Zemaraim, and Beth-el, And Avim, and Parah, and 24 Ophrah, And Chephar-haammonai, and Ophni, and Gaba; twelve cities with 25 26 [and] their villages: Gibeon, and Ramah, and Beeroth, And Mizpeh, and Chephirah, and Mozah, And Rekem, and Irpeel, and Taralah, And Zelah, Eleph, and Jebusi (which is Jerusalem), Gibeath, and Kirjath; fourteen cities with [and] their villages. This is the inheritance of the children of Benjamin according to their families.

c. The Territory of the Tribe of Simeon.

CHAPTER XIX. 1-9.

- 1 And the second lot came forth to [for] Simeon, even [omit: even] for the tribe of the children [sons] of Simeon according to their families: and their inheritance [possession] was within the inheritance [possession] of the children of Judah.
 2 And they had in their inheritance [possession], Beer-sheba, and Sheba, and 3 4 Moladah, And Hazar-shual, and Balah, and Azem, and Eltolad, And Bethul, and 5 6 Hormah, And Ziklag, and Beth-marcaboth, and Hazar-susah, And Beth-lebaoth, and Sharuhem; thirteen cities and their villages: Ain, Remmon, and Ether, 7 and Ashan; four cities and their villages: And all the villages that were round about these cities to Baalath-beer, Ramath of the south. This is the inheritance [possession] of the tribe of the children [sons] of Simeon, according to their families.
 9 Out of the portion of the children of Judah was the inheritance [possession] of the children [sons] of Simeon: for the part of the children [sons] of Judah was too large for them; therefore [and] the children [sons] of Simeon had their inheritance [possession] within the inheritance [possession] of them.

d. The Territory of the Tribe of Zebulun.

CHAPTER XIX. 10-16.

- 10 And the third lot came up for the children [sons] of Zebulun according to their 11 families: and the border of their inheritance was unto Sarid: And their border went up toward the sea [westward], and Maralah, and reached to Dabbasheth, and 12 reached to the river [water-course] that is before Jokneam: And turned from Sarid eastward, toward the sun-rising, unto the border of Chisloth-tabor, and then goeth
 13 [and went] out to Daberath, and goeth [went] up to Japhia. And from thence passeth [it passed] on along on the east [toward the east, toward the rising of the sun] to Gittah-hepher, to Ittah-kazin, and goeth [went] out to Remmon-methoar 14 [Remmon which stretches] to Neah; And the border compasseth [bent around] it on the north side [northward] to Hannathon: and the out-goings thereof are [were]
 15 in the valley of Jiphthah-el: And Kattath, and Nahallal, and Shimron, and Ida-

16 lah, and Beth-lehem; twelve cities with [and] their villages. This is the inheritance [possession] of the children [sons] of Zebulun according to their families, these cities with [and] their villages.

e. The Territory of the Tribe of Issachar.

CHAPTER XIX. 17-23.

17 And [omit: and] the fourth lot came out to [for] Issachar, for the children
18 [sons] of Issachar according to their families. And their border was toward Jezreel, 19 20 and Chesulloth, and Shunem, And Hapharaim, and Shihon, and Anaharath, And 21 Rabbith, and Kishion, and Abez, And Remeth, and En-gannim, and En-haddah, 22 and Beth-pazzez; And the coast [border] reacheth to [struck] Tabor, and Shahazimah, and Beth-shemesh; and the out-goings of their border were at [the] 23 Jordan; sixteen cities with [and] their villages. This is the inheritance [possession] of the tribe of the children [sons] of Issachar, according to their families, the cities and their villages.

f. The Territory of the Tribe of Asher.

CHAPTER XIX. 24-31.

24 And the fifth lot came out for the tribe of the children [sons] of Asher accord-25 ing to their families. And their border was Helkath, and Hali, and Beten, and 26 Achshaph, And Alammelech, and Amad, and Misheal; and reacheth to [it struck] 27 Carmel westward, and to [omit: to] Shihor-libnath; And turneth [turned] toward the sun-rising to Beth dagon, and reacheth to [struck] Zebulun, and to [omit: to] the valley [ravine] of Jiphtah-el, toward [on] the north side of Beth-emek, and 28 Neiel, and goeth [went] out to Cabul on the left hand, And Hebron, and Rehob, 29 and Hammon, and Kanah, even unto great Zidon; And then [omit: then] the coast [border] turneth [turned] to Ramah, and to the strong [fortified] city Tyre; and the coast [border] turneth [turned] to Hosah; and the out-goings thereof are 30 at the sea from the coast to Achzib [in the district of Achzib]: Ummah also [and Ummah], and Aphek, and Rehob: twenty and two cities with [and] their vil-31 lages. This is the inheritance [possession] of the tribe of the children [sons] of Asher according to their families, these cities with [and] their villages.

g. The Territory of the Tribe of Naphtali.

CHAPTER XIX. 32-39.

32 The sixth lot came out to [for] the children [sons] of Naphtali, even [omit 33 even] for the children [sons] of Naphtali according to their families. And their coast [border] was from Heleph, from Allon to Zaanannim, [the oak of Zaanannim], and Adami, Nekeb [or Adami-nekeb], and Jabneel, unto Lakum; and the 34 out-goings thereof were at [the] Jordan: And then [omit: then] the coast [border] turneth [turned] westward to Aznoth-tabor, and goeth [went] out from thence to Hukkok, and reacheth to [struck] Zebulun on the south side, and reacheth to [struck] Asher on the west side, and to [omit: to] Judah upon [the] Jordan to-35 ward the sun-rising. And the fenced [fortified] cities are Ziddim, Zer, and Ham-36 37 math, Rakkath, and Cinneroth, And Adamah, and Ramah, and Hazor, And 38 Kedesh, and Edrei, and En-hazor, And Iron, and Migdal-el, Horem, and Beth-39 anath, and Beth-shemesh; nineteen cities with [and] their villages. This is the inheritance [possession] of the tribe of the children [sons] of Naphtali, the cities and their villages.

h. The Territory of the Tribe of Dan.

CHAPTER XIX. 40-48.

40 And [omit: and] the seventh lot came out for the tribe of the children [sons]
41 of Dan, according to their families. And the coast [border] of their inheritance

- 42 [possession] was Zorah, and Eshtaol, and Ir-shemesh, And Shaalabbim, and Aja-43 44 lon, and Jethlah, And Elon, and Thimnathah, and Ekron, And Eltekeh, 45 and Gibbethon, and Baalath, And Jehud, and Bene-berak, and Gath-rimmon, 46 And Me-jarkon, and Rakkon, with the border before [over against] Japho.
 47 And the coast [border] of the children [sons] of Dan went out too little for them [Fay: went out from them (i. e., the children of Dan extended their border further); De Wette: and the border of the sons of Dan went out (afterwards) further from them; Bunsen: and the border of the children of Dan went yet further than this; Zunz: went beyond these]; therefore [and] the children [sons] of Dan went up to fight against Leshem, and took it, and smote it with the edge of the sword, and possessed it, and dwelt therein, and called Leshem, Dan, after 48 the name of Dan their father. This is the inheritance [possession] of the tribe of the children [sons] of Dan according to their families, these cities with [and] their villages.

i. Joshua's Possession.

CHAPTER XIX. 49, 50.

- 49 [And] when they had made an end of dividing the land for inheritance by their coasts [according to its borders], the children [sons] of Israel gave an inheritance 50 [possession] to Joshua the son of Nun among them: According to the command [mouth] of the Lord [Jehovah] they gave him the city which he asked, even Tim-nath-serah, in mount Ephraim; and he built the city, and dwelt therein.

j. Conclusion.

CHAPTER XIX. 51.

- 51 These are the inheritances [possessions], which Eleazar the priest, and Joshua the son of Nun, and the heads of the fathers of the tribes of the children of Israel, divided for an inheritance [possession] by lot in Shiloh before the Lord [Jehovah], at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation. So [And] they made an end of dividing the country [land].

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

As chapters xvi. and xvii. belonged together, so do these two chapters xviii. and xix., which contain the account of the allotments of the remaining seven tribes, Benjamin, Simeon, Zebulun, Issachar, Asher, Naphtali, and Dan. At the end follows a notice of the possession given to Joshua (ch. xix. 49, 50), with the conclusion of the whole section (ver. 51). There are seven tribes only left to be noticed, because the tribe of Levi was to receive no inheritance, as had been already before said (ch. xiii. 14, 33) and repeated (ch. xviii. 7). This distribution was effected at Shiloh (ch. xviii. 1), while Judah and the house of Joseph — Ephraim and Manasseh — had received their possessions, as may be confidently inferred from ch. xiv. 6, in the camp at Gilgal (see on xiv. 6). But before proceeding to divide the land, twenty-one men were sent out to survey and describe it (ch. xviii. 3, 10).

a. Chap. xviii. 1-10. Erection of the Tabernacle at Shiloh. Description of the Land yet to be divided. The whole congregation comes together at Shiloh, where they set up the tent of the congregation (tabernacle). The land is completely subdued, but seven tribes still remain, which have not yet received any possession, since the most powerful tribe of Judah, Ephraim, and the half tribe of Manasseh (to say nothing of the tribes east of the Jordan, previously spoken of), had first obtained their portion (vers. 1, 2). Joshua reproaches them for their listlessness, and, in order to discharge the remaining duty as impartially as possible, perhaps also bearing in mind the complaint of the sons of Joseph (ch. xvii. 14-18), he provides that twenty-one men, three from each of the seven tribes, shall first "describe" the land (vers. 3-7). This is done (vers. 8, 9), and now Joshua casts lots and distributes the still remaining territory (ver. 10). Eleazar is not mentioned here, while in ch. xiv. 1, 2 [also xix. 51] he and the patriarchs of the tribes are introduced with Joshua.

Ver. 1. And the whole congregation of the sons of Israel assembled together at Shiloh. "The congregation of the sons of Israel," here as Ex. xvi. 1, 2, 9; more briefly, "congregation of Israel," Ex. xii. 3, or merely "the congregation," Lev. iv. 15. The same is the "congregation of Jehovah" (עֲדָתָהּ from עָדָה, for יְעֻדָּהּ by aphæreais, Gesen.). It is called also קְהִל יִשְׂרָאֵל (קהל, convocation, from קָהַל, to call together, in Kal not used while Hiphil is found Num. viii. 9; x. 7; xx. 8; and Niphal, Num. xvi. 3, and in this passage, Gesen.), Deut. xxxi. 30; יְהוּדָה, Num. xvi. 3; xx. 4, or simply מִן־קָהֳלָהּ, Lev. iv. 13, precisely like מִן־עֲדָתָהּ. Shiloh (שִׁלּוֹה or שִׁלֹּה, 1 K. ii. 27, or שִׁלֹּה, Judg. xxi. 21, שִׁלֹּה, Judg. xxi. 19, shortened from שִׁלְיוֹן, from שָׁלַח, to rest, "a place of rest"), in Joseph. Ant. v. 1, 20, 21. שִׁלֹּה (hence pointing back to the form שִׁלְיוֹן).

from which שִׁלֹה, 1 K. xi. 29; xii. 13; Neh. xi. 5, with which Gesen. very aptly compares שִׁלֹה and שִׁלֹה, ch. xv. 51; 2 Sam. xv. 12), now Seilun, first correctly made out in modern times by Robinson (iii. 84 ff.) from its position, which is accurately given Judg. xxi. 19. Eusebius and Jerome already give the distances from Neapolis (Onom. art. "Selo") incorrectly; "the knights of the cross, also, found Silo at Neby Samwil, where the monks and pilgrims continued, with little variation, to seek the place until the middle of the sixteenth century." About this time there appears in Bonifacius (De Perenni Cultu) a more correct view concerning the sites of the holy places, but it was soon lost (Rob. iii. 89). Among the ruins, to which one ascends by a gentle slope, whose fertile soil, when Furrer visited Shiloh, was covered with wheat fields (p. 225), there are still found (Rob. l. c.) many large stones, and some fragments of columns which indicate the site of an ancient town. The tabernacle stood here from Joshua to Samuel (Jos. xviii. 1; 1 Sam. iv. 3). Afterward Shiloh was rejected by God (Ps. lxxviii. 60-68; 1 Sam. iii. 4; Jer. vii. 12, 14; xxvi. 6), and at a very early period utterly destroyed; for Jerome says: "Silo tabernaculum et arca Domini fuit, vix altaris fundamenta monstrantur" (von Raumer, p. 221; Rob. l. c.). Josephus (Ant. v. 1, 19) assumes that Joshua brought the tabernacle (τὴν ἱερὰν σκηνήν) to Shiloh, because the place by its beauty seemed to him appropriate, until an opportunity should be offered them to build a temple (ἱεροῖς ἰσθῶ τὴν ἱερὰν σκηνήν κατὰ Σιλοὺν πόλιν, ἐπιτῆδειον γὰρ ἰδοῦναι τὸ χερσὶν διὰ τὸ κάλλος, ὥς ἂν οἰκοδομῇεν ναὸν αὐτοῖς τὰ πρᾶγματα παράσχη). The site in the midst of the land was very suitable and also very beautiful, so that Josephus may at bottom have very nearly hit the truth. How Gen. xlix. 10 is to be explained does not concern us here. See Lange, Com. on Gen., in l., on the various interpretations of this difficult passage. Finally, let it be noticed that Shiloh lies eight and a half hours north of Jerusalem, and nearly five hours south of Shechem (Furrer, p. 413).

And set up the tabernacle of the congregation there; and the land was subdued before them. As regards the אֹהֶל מוֹעֵד, Luther's translation Stiftshütte, i. e. tent of the covenant, is, as Gesen. remarks, the Greek σκηνή τοῦ μαρτυρίου, Lat. tabernaculum testimonii, according to a derivation from עָד, testari; cf. הַמִּשְׁכָּן, tent of the law, Num. ix. 15. It is more probable that, with Gesen. and after him most of the moderns, מִוֶּעֶד is to be derived not from עָד but from עָדָה (Niph. נָוַעַד), and accordingly we translate tent of the congregation, place where the עָדָה meets.<sup>1</sup> If the national sanctuary is called also מִשְׁכַּן הָעֵדָוָה (Num. ix. 15), or אֹהֶל

הָעֵדָוָה (Num. ix. 15; xvii. 23; xviii. 2), the two names agree well with each other, in so far as the tent where the congregation met was, at the same time, the tent in whose most holy recess the law was preserved within the הָעֵדָוָה (Ex. xxv. 22). Concerning the construction and interior arrangement of the tabernacle, comp. Winer (ii. 529 ff.) as well as Riegenbach. The land was subdued (וַיִּשְׁבַּע from שָׁבַע, prop. to tread under the feet; in the same sense as here, Gen. i. 28; Jer. xxxiv. 16, and with the addition לְעַבְדֵי, 2 Chr. xxviii. 10; Jer. xxxiv. 11; Neh. v. 6; the Niphal, Num. xxxii. 22-29, Gesen.) before them. Because the land was subdued it might be divided.

Ver. 3-10. The mission of the twenty-one men for the description of the land is now related. Knobel refers this section to the Jehovist, and to the second of his documents; on which compare the Introduction. But when Knobel (p. 451) further supposes it improbable that such an occupation of the land would take place under Joshua, and maintains that the taking up the land and people must have been effected at a later period, say in the time of Judges i. 19-34 f., or Judges iv. 2 ff., we may urge, against this totally unsupported suggestion, that the time of Joshua, when the Canaanites were filled with terror and distress through the strange conqueror (ch. ii. 9-11), and had lost all confidence in themselves, was much better suited for the perilous accomplishment of such a result than the following age, in which the Israelites did indeed gain victories but were then immediately enslaved again (Judg. ii. 14-23; iii. 8, 13, 14; vi. 1, etc.). Besides, a man of the circumference of Joshua would, surely if any leader of the people, conceive the idea of occupying the land before he went forward hap-hazard to the division of it. For, although he acted under the divine command, he assuredly did not act without human consideration which was not at all excluded thereby. That Joshua, as Josephus (Ant. v. 1, 21) of his own invention relates, sent with these men some skilled in the art of mensuration (ἱεροῦσιν . . . ἄνδρας τοὺς ἐκμετρησομένους τὴν χώραν αὐτῶν ἐξέπεμψε, παρδούς αὐτοῖς τινὰς γεωμετρίαν ἐπιστήμονας), our text is altogether ignorant. Josephus may, indeed, as Keil also (in loc.) observes, have rightly judged when he makes the men attentive to the quality of the soil of Palestine, and assumes that the several inheritances were rather estimated than measured (καὶ διὰ τοῦτο, — on account of the diverse quality of the soil — τιμητοὺς μάλλον ἢ μετρητοὺς τοὺς κλήρους δεῖν δέεσθαι, πολλὰκις ἐνὸς πλεῖθρου κἂν χιλίων ἀνταξίου γενομένου (Ant. v. 1, 21)).

Ver. 3. A reproof to the remaining seven tribes who doubtless could not yet effectually resolve to give up their previous nomadic life, and accustom themselves to settled abodes, especially when these would in great part have yet to be conquered.

42-46. The same central thought occurs in Ex. xxv. 22, 'there I will meet with thee' (comp. also Ex. xxx. 6, 8; Num. xvii. 4). It is clear therefore that 'congregation' is inadequate. Not the gathering of the worshippers only, but the meeting of God with his people, to commune with them, to make himself known to them, was what the name embodied. Ewald has accordingly suggested Offenbarungszelt = Tent of Revelation, as the best equivalent (Altthümer, p. 180). This made the tent a sanctuary. Thus it was that the tent was the dwelling, the house of God (Bähr, Symbolik, i. 81). — Tr.]

<sup>1</sup> [Professor Plumtree (Dict. of the Bible, p. 8162) leads us rather to "the Tabernacle of meeting" (meeting-tent?) as the proper equivalent to the Hebrew designation, but with a deeper sense than would commonly be attached to the phrase. He well says: "The primary force of עָדָה is "to meet by appointment," and the phrase אֹהֶל מוֹעֵד has therefore the meaning of "a place of or for a fixed meeting." "The real meaning of the word is to be found in what may be called the locus classicus, as the interpretation of all words connected with the tabernacle, Ex. xxix.

Ver. 4. Joshua will not longer tolerate this lethargy, and therefore demands of each tribe to choose three men whom he will send out, and these shall rise (וַיָּקִימוּ) and go through the land and describe it according to their possession. There were accordingly  $7 \times 3 = 21$  men, and not merely ten as Josephus reports, reckoning one to each tribe (Ant. v. 1, 20), but in all ten (v. 1-21), because three surveyors were included in the total number. In the description was included particularly, according to ver. 9, an accurate designation of the cities, while at the same time situation and soil might be more particularly taken into account. לְפִי נִחְלָהֶם, i. e. "with reference to its being taken in possession by the seven tribes" (Knobel).

Ver. 5. More minute statement of the errand of the men sent out, ver. 4. They should divide the remaining land into seven parts, yet Judah should remain on his border in the south, and the house of Joseph in the north on his border, that is to say, no change should be made in the possessions of these tribes. With them it should remain as it was.

Ver. 6. When they had described the land thus into seven parts, they should bring the same, i. e. the list as Bunsen for distinctness translates, to Joshua at Shiloh (ver. 4), and then would he cast the lots before Jehovah their God. This list should be done at a consecrated place before God's face, that it might stand fast inviolably.

Ver. 7. Reason why there should be only seven parts. First, the Levites have no part among you; for the priesthood of Jehovah is their possession. Essentially the same reason for the lack of a possession as is given, ch. xiii. 14, 33; yet here instead of "the sacrifices of Jehovah, xiii. 14, or simply 'Jehovah God of Israel,' xiii. 33, we have 'the priesthood of Jehovah,' " as Num. xvi. 10; Ex. xxix. 9; xl. 15; Num. iii. 10; xviii. 1-7; xxv. 13" (Knobel). Second, Gad, and Reuben, and half the tribe of Manasseh, have received their possession beyond the Jordan on the east, etc.

Ver. 8. At the departure of the men Joshua repeats his command.

Ver. 9. They go and describe the land according to the cities into seven parts in a book, i. e. they describe it and divide it with special reference to the cities found therein, into seven parts.

Rosenmüller, incorrectly: "לְעָרִים, per urbes, i. e. additis etiam et adscriptis urbibus, quæ in quaque regione erant;" the cities rather give the proper ground of division. How long a time the messengers spent in this service we are not informed. Josephus makes up a story of seven months (Ant. v. 1, 21: Οἱ δὲ ἄνδρες οἱ πεμφθέντες . . . περιεβύσαντες τε καὶ τιμωσάμενοι τὴν γῆν, ἐν ἑβδόμῃ μηνὶ παρήσαντες πρὸς αὐτὸν εἰς Σιλοὺν πόλιν, ἔθα ἦν σκηπὴν ἐστράκεισαν). The Jewish historian appears to have been led to the seven months by the seven parts into which the land was divided. The statement is "of no value" (Bunsen), and is "of no more consequence than the assertion of the Rabbins that the division at Shiloh was made seven years after that at Gilgal" (Keil).

Ver. 10. After they have returned Joshua casts lots and effects the division. On בְּיַחְזָקָה, comp. ch. xi. 23; xii. 7.

b. Ch. xviii. 11-28. The Territory of the Tribe of Benjamin. First are given α. its boundaries, ch. xviii. 11-20, then β. its cities, ch. xviii. 21-28. It was in general mountainous, in part very desert, but in part also, as in the neighborhood of Jericho and Jerusalem (Joseph. Ant. v. 1, 21; Bell. Jud. iv. 8, 3), a well cultivated, fruitful land. The land of Benjamin now makes the impression of solitude and desolation, as if the breath of death rested upon it (Furrer, p. 218-327 [Stanley, S. & P. has an instructive chapter on the Heights and Passes of Benjamin]).

a. Ch. xviii. 11-20. Its Boundaries, ver. 11. The territory of Benjamin lay, according to this verse, between the sons of Judah on the south, and the sons of Joseph on the north.

Ver. 12. The border which is here drawn is the north border, on the north side. It went out from the Jordan, and ascended, north of Jericho, on to the mountains westward, i. e. ascended north of Jericho, on the mountain lying west (and northwest) of this city, and already familiar (ch. xvi. 1). Its goings out were at the wilderness of Beth-aven. In ch. vii. 2, Beth-aven is clearly distinguished, as lying east of Beth-el, from this latter city which itself is often called by the prophets בֵּית־אֵתָן (Idol-house, Am. iv. 5: Hos. iv. 15; v. 8; x. 5, 8). Since Michmash again, according to 1 Sam. xiii. 5, lay east of Beth-aven, this place must have been situated between Beth-el and Michmash. Kiepert has introduced Beth-aven on his map somewhat to the northeast of Michmash, whose immediate surroundings, contrasted with the bare and rocky heights to the east and north, might be called green and fertile (Furrer, p. 217). "The bare and rocky heights" to the east and north of Michmash are no other than those of Beth-aven.

Ver. 13. And the border went over from thence toward Luz, to the side of Luz (which is Beth-el) southward. Here the difficulty which we met in ch. xvi. 2 from the distinction between Beth-el and Luz falls away, since it is said that the border between Benjamin and Ephraim went over out of the wilderness of Beth-aven toward Luz, that is Beth-el, and more particularly on the south side of Luz, thus excluding Beth-el from the cities of Benjamin, while yet, in ver. 22, it belongs to them. In this way contradiction would arise which Knobel seeks to obviate, thus: "The author does not say that the border went merely to the south side of Beth-el; it went to the south side of the ridge (רֶמֶשׁ) of Beth-el, i. e. toward Bethel." Beth-el (בֵּית־אֵל), Gen. xxviii. 11-19;

xxx. 13, earlier לֵחַ = almond-tree), familiar through all the history of Israel, from the patriarchs to the Maccabees (1 Macc. ix. 50), and even later (Joseph. Bell. Jud. iv. 9, 9), now a seat of the worship of God, again a place of idolatry, lies on the right of the road from Jerusalem toward Shechem (von Raumer, p. 178), is now called Beitin (Robinson, p. 225 ff.), and was first recognized by the Missionary Nicolayson in 1836 (von Raumer, p. 174). Ruins cover three or four acres, and there are interesting remains of a great reservoir which Furrer saw (p. 221). Beitin lies 1,767 feet high, three and three-quarters or four hours from Jerusalem (von Raumer, p. 179; Furrer, p. 413). From this position of Beth-el we may understand how the border went down (יָרַד) from thence toward Ataroth-addar, which is identical with the place of the same name, ch. xvi. 2, but different from the Ataroth, ch. xvi. 7. "Robinson found an Atara about six miles south, and a second one about four miles north of Gophna. The southern one appears to be the same as Ataroth-addar, past which ran the north border of Benjamin from Beth-el toward lower Beth-horon, Jos. xvi. 2, 3, 5; xviii. 13, 14." So von Raumer, (p. 175), with whom Knobel agrees, while Robinson himself, according to the passage cited by Knobel (ii. 315), holds that this southern Atara cannot be Ataroth-addar, because it lies too far within the territory of Benjamin. He has been followed by Kiepert, Van de Velde, and Menke on their maps. Von Raumer, also has only marked this northern Ataroth, and entirely omitted the southern one which, according to his view and that of Knobel, should be = Ataroth-addar. We, like Keil (on ch. xvi. 2), adopt the view of Robinson.

From Beth-el the border went thus north-westwardly toward Ataroth-addar, and thence on toward the southwest, upon (De Wette: on; Bunsen: over) the mountain that lieth on the south side of the nether Beth-horon. This is the north border of Benjamin, which, as far as lower Beth-horon, coincides with the south border of Ephraim.

Beth-horon (בֵּית־חֲרוֹן) = house of the hollow mentioned, ch. x. 11, in the history of the battle of Gibeon, and in ch. xvi. 3-5, as here, as a border city between Benjamin and Ephraim, a city of Levites, ch. xxi. 22, fortified by Solomon, 1 K. ix. 17; 2 Chron. viii. 5, spoken of in the Maccabæan wars (1 Macc. iii. 15-24; vii. 39 ff.; ix. 50), and in the history of the wars of the Jews (Joseph. Bell. Jud. ii. 19, 18). There was, as appears from ch. xvi. 3, 5; 1 K. ix. 17; 1 Chron. vii. 24; 2 Chr. viii. 5, as well as from the passage before us, an upper and a lower Beth-horon. Both places are still recognized. The upper is now called Beit ur el-Forka, the lower Beit ur et-Tahta. The latter place stands on the top of a low ridge (Robinson, iii. 58 f.) and is separated from the upper Beth-horon by a wady. Robinson and his companion passed through this, and then began to ascend the long and steep pass. "The ascent is very rocky and rough; but the rock has been cut away in many places and the path formed into steps; showing that this is an ancient road. . . . The pass between the two places was called both the ascent (מַעְלֵה) and descent (מַדְרֵה) of Beth-horon, Josh. x. 10, 11 (Gr.: ἀνὰβασις καὶ κατὰβασις Βαιθεβὼν, 1 Macc. iii. 15-24)." (Robinson, 58-60). Remains of ancient walls are found in both places as well as in the pass between them (iii. 58). Furrer (p. 14) found the hill on which stands the village of lower Beth-horon, partly covered with olive trees. The barley fields in the low ground were mingled with patches full of dark green beans. He also describes the pass as "rocky, steep, and extremely laborious." Seldom does a trader drive his camels through it (contrast Israel's hope, Is. lx. 5, 6, 9). The land on almost all sides is burnt up like a desert, through which no one passes (Furrer, p. 15).

Ver. 14. At this point, namely, at the mountain south of Lower Beth-horon, the boundary line of Benjamin bends southwardly toward Kirjath-baal, or Kirjath-jearim, separating this territory from that of Dan on the west; while the border of Ephraim runs out in a northwest direction past Gezer to the sea. Of this west border of Benjamin, of which we now read for the first time, it is said: and the border was drawn (וַיִּדְרֹשׁ), as ch. xv. 11, and often) and bent around toward the west side southward from the mountain that lieth before Beth-horon southward; and the goings out thereof were at Kirjath-baal (which is Kirjath-jearim), a city of the children of Judah. This was the west side. בְּצֵדָה = sea-side [side toward the sea].

וְפִי is properly "mouth" = to פִּה, from פָּה (cogn. with פָּה, פִּי, פִּיחַ) to blow; then, like Lat. ora (from os), "side," which is turned to any quarter of the heavens. As here בְּצֵדָה, so ver.

15 we have בְּצֵדָה, פִּי, and Ex. xxvi. 20, בְּצֵדָה [comp. ver. 12 of this chap.]. Kirjath-baal: see ch. xv. 60.

Ver. 15-19. South Border. This coincides entirely with the north border of Judah, ch. xv. 5-9.

"וְיָדָה" merely indicates that the south border started from the west and ran toward the east." That Kirjath-baal (Kirjath-jearim) belonged to the cities of Judah and not to those of Benjamin, is plainly apparent from ch. xv. 60. The border, therefore, on Kiepert's Map requires correction; Menke has drawn it right.

Ver. 20. The east border consists of the Jordan.

β. Ch. xviii. 21-28. Cities of the Tribe of Benjamin. They fall into two groups of twelve and fourteen cities, the former lying in the east, the latter in the west. Jericho, ch. ii. 1, and often. Beth-hoglah, ch. xv. 6. Emek (vale of) keziz. There is a Wady el-Kaziz east of Jerusalem (Van de Velde, Mem. p. 328, apud Knobel).

Ver. 22. Beth-arabah, ch. xv. 6, now Kaffir Hajla. Zemaraim, probably a place of ruins. Sumrah, northeast of the Wady el-Kaziz, near the road from Jerusalem to Jericho, opposite the Khan Hadschur. See Van de Velde's Map. Bethel, ver. 13.

Ver. 23. Avim. Since Avim (אֵימִי) here follows directly after Beth-el, while Ai (אֵי) which stood near Beth-el (ch. vii. 2; xii. 9), and to the east of it, is not mentioned, it is natural with Knobel to regard Avim as identical with Ai, which is called also Aiah (Neh. xiii. 11) and Aiath (Is. x. 23). The signification of all these names is essentially the same: ruins, heaps, stone-heaps, Mich. i. 6 (see Gesen.). Where Ai lay is not accurately made out. Van de Velde, following Finn, supposes, as may be seen from his map, that it was the same as Tel el-Hadshar (Stonehill), thirty-five minutes east of Beth-el (ii. 251-255, and Mem. p. 282, apud von Raumer, p. 169). Robinson (ii. 119, 312 f.) sought it twice, but after all his investigation only reached the conclusion that the most probable site of Ai is the place of ruins exactly south of Deir Dirvan, one hour distant from Beth-el. The direction would be south-east. Knobel on the passage before us has not kept the two views sufficiently distinct. Furrer also visited the region, but undertook no further researches. He too speaks of "many stones" existing there (p. 219). [Tristram, 168 f. confidently agrees with Robinson's view.] The tent of Abraham once stood here between Beth-el and Ai (Gen. xii. 8; xiii. 3). The history of the conquest of Ai has been treated above, ch. viii. Hitzig (ubi sup. pp. 99, 100) disputes the existence of a city of Ai altogether, and proposes the view that Ai signifies in Turkish "moon," and can therefore have been the Scythian, perhaps Amoritic name for Jericho as Dibon was the Hebraized Dirvan Council (??). After the Exile, Benjamites dwelt there again (Neh. xi. 31; vii. 32; Ezra ii. 28), so that the city had been rebuilt.

Farah, a place of ruins, Fara, west of Jericho on Van de Velde's Map. Ophrah, in Saul's time attacked by the Philistines (1 Sam. xiii. 17), perhaps, as Robinson (ii. 124) conjectures, the modern Taiyibeh. Von Raumer (p. 216, n., 235 c) suggests that Ophrah may be the same as Ephraim or Ephron (John xi. 54).

Ver. 24. Chephar-haamonai, Ophni, mentioned only here, and hitherto undiscovered. Gaba (גָּבָא) = גִּבְעָה "height," "hill." This Gaba is according to ver. 28 distinct from Gibeath or Gibeah, with which further 1 Sam. xiii. 2, 3; Is. x. 29 are to be compared. Now since between Anathoth and Michmash (see Kiepert's Map) there is a place called Jeba, the question has arisen whether this Jeba was Gaba or Gibeah. Robinson (ii. 114, 316) was at first inclined to regard Jeba as = Gibeah, the Gibeah of Saul, but afterward became satisfied (comp. Bibl. Sac., Aug. 1844, p. 598) that Gibeah of Saul was rather, as Gross suspected, to be looked for on the hill Tuleil el-Fuleh ("hill of beans," Rob. p. 317), where von Raumer also, and Van de Velde, and Kiepert place it, while our Gaba, as the similarity of the name renders probable, has been preserved in the Jeba just spoken of. Knobel on the contrary identifies Gaba and Gibeah of Saul in accordance with Robinson's earlier view, and proposes a variety of conjectures in regard to Gibeath of ver. 28. For the distinctness of Gaba and Gibeah of Saul, Is. x. 29 is, we may remark in conclusion, decisive, a passage whose vividness of description Furrer (who likewise regards the two places as clearly different, pp. 212, 213, compared with 215, 216), was constrained on the spot to admire (pp. 216, 217). To this eastern division belong also the two cities of priests, Anathoth and Almon, ch. xxi. 18, of which more hereafter.

Ver. 25-28. "The fourteen west Benjamite cities."

Ver. 25. Gibeon, גִּבְעֹן, properly the same name again as גִּבְעָה, גִּבְעָה, quite familiar to us from the narrative, in this book, of the wives of its inhabitants (ch. ix.) and from the battle at Gibeon (ch. x. 1-15); later (ch. xxi. 17) a Levite city as well as Geba. It is the modern el-Jib lying on an oblong hill or ridge of limestone rock, which rises above a very fertile and well cultivated plain (Robinson, ii. 135 ff.). Of the fertile plain Furrer also (p. 16) makes mention. He found the hill on which el-Jib is situated well cultivated in terraces. Vines, figs, and olives flourish on the eastern slope, while on the north the Tel falls off somewhat abruptly (Furrer, pp. 16, 17). Historical associations with days subsequent to Joshua attach to this place where stood the Tabernacle under David and Solomon (1 K. iii. 5 ff.; 1 Chr. xvi. 29; xxi. 29; 2 Chr. i. 3; 2 Sam. xx. 9). To Gibeon belonged Chephirah (ver. 26), Beeroth (ver. 25), Kirjath-jearim (ch. xv. 9-60; xviii. 14).

Ramah (רָמָה) = height, a frequently occurring name of places, on which compare Gesen.), not to be confounded with the Ramah of Samuel or Ramathaim (von Raumer, p. 217, No. 148); near Gibeah (Judg. xix. 13; Hos. v. 8), noted in the contests with Syria (1 K. xv. 17; 2 Chr. xvi. 1) and Assyria (Is. x. 29); the place where Jeremiah was set free (Jer. xl. 1, compared with xxxi. 15); inhabited again after the exile (Ezra ii. 26; Neh. vii. 30; xi. 33); now er-Ram (Robinson, ii. 315); a wretched village north of Gibeah, on a hill (Furrer, p. 214). Furrer discovered here remains of Roman milestones, and supposes that a Roman road ran from Gibeah, Rama, Geba down toward the narrow pass of Michmash (p. 215).

Beeroth mentioned, ch. ix. 17, as belonging to Gibeon, or allied with Gibeon; home of the murderers of Ish-bosheth (2 Sam. iv. 2), and of Joab's Armor-bearer (2 Sam. xxiii. 37), likewise rebuilt after the exile (Neh. vii. 29). Robinson (ii. 132) regards the present Birch as Beeroth, a village with old foundations, remains of a Gothic church, and about seven hundred Mohammedan inhabitants. With him agree Keil and Knobel, while von Raumer disputes the view of Robinson as contradicting the statements of Jerome (p. 197, n. 187). But compare, for a defense of Robinson, Keil on ch. ix. 17.

Ver. 26. Mizpeh, not the same as the Mizpeh in the lowland, ch. xv. 38; already in the time of the Judges a place of assembling for Israel (Judg. xx. 1; xxi. 1); but specially celebrated on account of Samuel (1 Sam. vii. 5-15; x. 17); after the fall of Judah, the seat of the Chaldean governor Gedaliah (2 K. xxv. 23, 25; Jer. xl. 6 ff.; xli. 1 ff.); now the Nebi Samwil, i. e. prophet Samuel, five hundred feet above the level of the plain, 2,484 feet above the sea (von Raumer, after Symonds, p. 213), with a very rich and extensive prospect (Robinson, ii. 143, 144). Here they would have it that Samuel was buried under the half-decayed mosque on the mountain. Thus Nebi Samwil would be = the Rama of Samuel. Robinson has, however, among others, shown that this is not so, but that Mizpeh is probably to be sought here. He is followed by Keil, Knobel, Tobler, Van de Velde, Kiepert, Furrer (p. 212). The last named writer from the Scopus near Jerusalem perceived Nebi Samwil in the northwest, "the high watch-tower of the land of Benjamin."

Chephirah, like Beeroth belonging to Gibeon (ch. ix. 17; Ezr. ii. 25); the present place of ruins Kefir on the mountain east of Ajalon (Jalo). See Robinson (Later Bibl. Res. p. 146). The name is related to כִּפְרָה, village, instead of which כִּפְרִי occurs, Neh. vi. 2. Mozah, mentioned only here and unrecognized.

Ver. 27. Bekem, Irpeel, and Taralah, also unrecognized, and like Mozah mentioned only in this place, — a proof again of the integrity of the LXX. in ch. xv. 59.

Zelah (זֶלֶח, rib, side), burial-place of Saul and Jonathan (2 Sam. xxi. 14); unknown; and so with Eleph. — Jebusi, i. e. Jerusalem. See ch. xv. 8.

Gibeath (גִּבְעָה). This is the Gibeah of Saul (גִּבְעַת שָׁאֵל, 1 Sam. x. 26; xi. 4; xv. 34, and often); as was already shown above on ver. 24, to be sought on the hill Tuleil el-Ful. Here occurred before Saul's time the outrage reported in Judg. xix. which resulted in the destruction of the city, and the extirpation of the Benjamites except six hundred (Judg. xx). Comp. also Hos. ix. 9; x. 9. After Saul's death its inhabitants hung seven of his descendants, on the mountain of Gibeah (2 Sam. xxi. 6-9), but Mephibosheth was spared. Furrer accomplished the way from Jerusalem to Tel el-Ful, on foot, in one hour and twenty-five minutes (p. 412). He found the summit completely strown with ruins. There the traveller was rewarded with a wide and glorious prospect scarcely inferior to that of Mizpeh. "The land of Benjamin with its many famous old cities lay spread out around me. Over the heights of Hizmeah, Anathoth, and Isawijeh, the eye swept downward to the Jordan valley, which here appeared more beautiful than on the mount of Olives. In the southeast the dark blue of the Dead Sea enlivened wonderfully the stiff yellow mountain rocks of its neighborhood. On the far distant horizon the mountain chains of Moab were traced in soft and hazy lines. Northward lay Ramah and the hill of Gela. Further west and around toward the south followed Gibeon, 'the glorious height,' Mizpeh, the queen among the mountains of Benjamin, and then in the south, the most beautiful of all, the Holy City" (pp. 212, 213). Excellently descriptive!

Kirjath, not to be confounded with Kirjath-jearim, ver. 14, ch. xv. 60, which belonged to Judah. Perhaps, as Knobel conjectures, Kerteh, west of Jerusalem (Scholtz, Reise, p. 161).

c. Ch. xix. 1-9. The Territory of the Tribe of Simeon. The second lot came out for the tribe of Simeon, who, since the portion assigned to the tribe of Judah was too large for them (ver. 9), received their possession out of that of Judah; concerning which comp. Gen. xlix. 7. Two groups of cities are enumerated, one of thirteen or fourteen (comp. on this difference, ch. xv. 32), all lying in the land of the south, the other of four cities. Of these latter, Ashan and Ether lay, according to ch. xv. 42, in the Shephelah. When now Ain and Rimmon, which in ch. xv. 32 are ascribed to the Negeb, are here placed with Ashan and Ether, the author seems, as Knobel remarks, to refer them here to the Shephelah also. "The dividing line between the Negeb and Shephelah was not so accurately determined." The province of Simeon, although only the cities and villages are mentioned, appears to have been a continuous one, namely the Negeb, with a small part of the Shephelah, while the Levites, as we learn from ch. xxi. acquired particular cities with their appurtenant pasture-ground throughout the whole land. The list of the abodes of Simeon is found again, 1 Chr. iv. 28-32, with slight deviations (see Keil, p. 420). The explanations concerning the places see on ch. xv. 24-32, 42.

d. Ch. xix. 10-16. The Territory of the Tribe of Zebulun. The third lot fell to Zebulun (Gen. xlix. 13; Deut. xxxiii. 19), the bounds of which, from the data given, can be but imperfectly determined. Josephus (Ant. v. 1, 22) assigns the sea of Gennesaret as the eastern border, Carmel and the sea as the western. He says: Ζαβουλωνίται δὲ τὴν μέγιστον μέχρι Γεννησαρίτιδος, καθήκουσαν δὲ περὶ Κάρμηλον καὶ θάλασσαν ἔλαχον. In general this statement agrees with our book, only Zebulun appears not to have reached to the sea. His province was, especially in the interior where it embraced the beautiful valley el-Buttauf (Robinson, iii. 189), fertile, toward the sea of Gennesaret mountainous but pleasant and well cultivated, higher than the plain of Jezreel and lower than the mountains of Naphtali: "a land of mountain terraces" (Knobel [cf. Robinson, iii. 190]).

Ver. 10. South Border, given as at ch. xvi. 6; xix. 33, from a central point toward west and east. It went to Sarid. Where this Sarid (סָרִיד) lay cannot be made out. Von Raumer is entirely silent concerning it; Masius and Rosemüller seek the place south of Carmel, near the Mediterranean Sea, which however does not answer well on account of ver. 11; Keil and Knobel, just on account of this verse, place it more in the interior, north or east of Legio (Lejjim) in the plain of Esdraelon (Keil), or one hour southeast of Nazareth (Knobel). The latter, however, supposes no place to be intended but, since Sarid may signify brook, incision (according to שָׂרִיד, perforavit, and שָׂרִיד, incidit), "the southern mouth of the deep and narrow wady descending from the basin of Nazareth." It is possible that Sarid lay here, and was named after the mouth of this wady. But that this itself was intended appears to me contrary to all analogy in the other determinations of boundary.

Ver. 11. From hence the boundary went up toward the sea (westward), and (more particularly) toward Maralah, and struck Dabbasheth and struck the water-course that is before Jokneam. Marawah is unfortunately altogether unknown; perhaps on account of מַרְוָה, to which Keil calls attention, to be sought somewhere on Carmel. Dabbasheth (דַּבָּשֶׁת), camel's hump, Is. xxx. 6, therefore a name like שָׂרִיד perhaps situated on the height of Carmel (Keil). Knobel refers to Jebata (Robinson, iii. 201) between Mujeidil and Kaimon, near the edge of the mountains which border the plain of Jezreel, or to Tel Tureh somewhat further toward the southwest (Robinson, Later Bibl. Res. p. 115). These are pure conjectures without any firm foundation. The water-course that is before Jokneam (see ch. xii. 22) is, without doubt, the Kishon, (קִישׁוֹן), i. e. which curves, winds about, from קִישׁ, now Nahr el-Mukattaa (Mukattua) with clear, green water (von Raumer, p. 50). "It flows through the slender valley which separates Carmel from the hills lying along to the north of it. Dense oleander thickets skirt the bed of the brook, and follow its pleasantly winding course" (Furrer, p. 280). The Kishon is historically celebrated for the events recorded, Judg. iv. 7, 13; v. 21 (comp. Ps. lxxxiii. 10), and 1 K. xix. 40. With reference to Judg. v. 9, Furrer observes, "The water flowed in a swift stream of about a foot in depth, strong enough to carry away corpses." Differing from all other commentators, Knobel will see nothing of the Kishon here, but thinks of the Wady el-Mih on whose eastern bank Kaimeia (Jokneam) should lie. The grounds of his view are given in his Commentary, p. 458.

Ver. 12. As the border turned from Sarid westward, so also it turned from the same point toward the east: Eastward, toward the sun-rising, unto the border of Chialoth-tabor, and went out to Daberath, and went up to Japhia. Chialoth-tabor (חִיאלוֹת-תָּבוֹר), like בָּקְשִׁיּוֹן, ch. xv. 10, from בָּקַשׁ, to be strong), probably = בָּקְשִׁיּוֹת, ver. 18, in the tribe of Issachar; now Iksal, Ksal, Zal, on a rocky height west of Tabor, with many tombs in the rock (Rob. iii. 182). The rocky height on which it stands lies more in the plain (Rob. l. c.). Daberath, a Levitical city, ch. xxi. 28; 1 Chron. vi. 72, pertaining to Issachar; now Deburijeh, a small and unimportant village "lying on the side of a ledge of rocks directly at the foot of Tabor" (Rob. iii. 210). Furrer describes its situation thus: "A little valley running north and south divides

Tabor from the low hills in the west. Near the mouth of this wady, in the northeast arm of the valley of Jezreel, lies the village of Deburijeh" (p. 306). Japhia (יָפִיָּה, "glancing," Gesen.).

Jafa, somewhat over half an hour southwest of Nazareth in another valley. It contains thirty houses with the remains of a church and a couple of solitary palm trees. . . . The Japha fortified by Josephus was probably the same, a large and strong village in Galilee, afterward conquered by Trajan and Titus under the orders of Vespasian (Rob. iii. 200). When it is said of the border that it ascended (עָלָה) toward Japhia, this is correct, for "Monro ascended the Galilean mountains from the plain of Jezreel, 'in a ravine' toward Jaffa" (Monro, i. 276 ap. von Raumer, p. 128).

- With this comp. Knobel's remark: "עָלָה stands correctly, since according to von Schubert, iii. 169, the valley of Nazareth lies about four hundred feet higher than the plain at the western foot of Tabor."

Ver. 13. From Japhia the border ran still in an easterly direction: Eastward, toward the rising (of the sun), to Gittah-hepher, to Ittah-kazin, and went out to Remmon, which stretches to

Neah. Gath-hepher (גַּתְּהֶפֶר, with ה local), the birth-place of the prophet Jonah (2 K. xiv. 25), whose grave is shown in a mosque = el Meschad, one hour northeast of Nazareth (Rob. iii. 209). Robinson says concerning it (note, p. 209): "At el-Meshhad is one of the many tombs of Neby Yunas, the prophet Jonah; and hence modern monastic tradition has adopted this village as the Gath-hepher where the prophet was born (2 K. xiv. 25; Quarlesinus, ii. 855)." Ittah-kazin (עֵטָה קַזִּין, with ק local), unknown. The name signifies, "time of the judge."

Remmon, a city of Levites, ch. xxi. 35; 1 Chron. vi. 62, perhaps the present Rummaneh, north of Nazareth (Rob. iii. 194, 195; von Raum, p. 138). Which extends to Neah. Thus, according to the very simple and therefore obvious conjecture of Knobel: רַמְמֹן מְרַחֵק. The LXX. made a proper name out of מְרַחֵק, Amuθapλu, Vulg. Amthar. Fürst renders the participle by "marked off, staked out." With him agree Knobel and Bunsen. Gesenius, Rosenmüller, De Wette, on the other hand, translate it, "which stretches toward." Since מְרַחֵק everywhere else is employed of the boundary, we side with Knobel.<sup>1</sup> Neah (נֶעַח, perhaps "inclination," slope, declivity, r. נֶעַע, Gesen.), unknown; "perhaps the same as נֶעַחֵל, ver. 27, which lay south of Jiphtha-el, as they said also יִבְנֶה for יִבְנֵאל, ch. xv. 11" (Knobel).

Ver. 14. And the border bent around it (Neah) northward to Hannathon: and the outgoings thereof were in the valley of Jiphthah-el (God opens). Compassed Neah, not Rimmon (Keil), and went in a northerly direction toward Hannathon (חַנְּתוֹן, pleasant), in which Knobel and Keil (Bibl. Com. ii. 1, in loc.) suspect the New Testament Cana (John ii. 1, 11; iv. 46; xxi. 2); the present Kana el-Jelil between Jefat and Rummaneh. Jiphtha-el (יִפְתָּה־עֵל) is perhaps the Japata defended by Josephus, now Jefat, midway between the sea of Tiberias and the Bay of Accho (von Raumer, p. 129; Knobel and Keil). The valley would be, according to this view, the great Wady Abille, which commences above in the hills near Jefat (Rob. Later Bib. Res. p. 103 f.). It empties into the Nahr Amar (Belus), as Van de Velde's map clearly shows. Comp. ver. 27. Keil remarks very correctly, "that this verse should describe the northern boundary," but, as is to be inferred also from the other expressions of Keil, does this very imperfectly.

<sup>1</sup> [The author translates precisely with Gesenius, indeed there seems to be little difference in conception between these critics. — Ta.]

Ver. 15. This verse beginning with י is evidently a fragment. There must something before have fallen out, in favor of which is the circumstance also, that at the close of the verse twelve cities and their villages are summed up, while only five are named. We must conclude, as Keil also assumes, that there is here a chasm in the text where we are left in the lurch even by the LXX., who at ch. xv. 59 offered so helpful a supplement. Probably there has dropped out (a) the statement of the west border, which Knobel also feels to be wanting; (b) the enumeration of seven cities among which it is likely that Nazareth would not have failed to be. In respect to this last city, it cannot help striking one without needing to agree with Jerome on ch. xv. 59, that here Nazareth is wanting as there Bethlehem. As regards the missing west border, it is indicated ver. 27, in connection with Asher, but "in a very general and vague manner." The five cities are: Kattath, perhaps =

קִרְיָת (ch. xxi. 34), Kireh, a place of ruins one and a half hour's south of Kaimon (Knobel, on the authority of Rob. Later Bibl. Res. p. 116). Nahallal or Nahalol, a Levitical city, ch. xxi. 35; Judg. i. 30; unknown. Shimron (ch. xi. 1), likewise. Idalah, the same. Beth-lehem, now Beitlahm, west-northwest of Nazareth (Rob. Later Bibl. Res. p. 113; von Raumer, p. 122).

e. Ch. xix. 17-23. The Territory of the Tribe of Issachar. The borders of the tribe of Issachar are not particularly noted by the author, having been given by him in connection with the other tribes, except the eastern part of the north border and the east border, ver. 22. Issachar touched in the north on Zebulun and Naphtali; in the west on Asher and Manasseh; in the south likewise on Manasseh in part, and in part also (see the maps) on Ephraim; in the east on the Jordan. Its most important and most beautiful section of country was the fertile plain of Jezreel (von Raumer, Palest. p. 39 ff.; Ritter, xvi. 689 ff.; Furrer, p. 258 ff.). Josephus observes concerning the boundaries, merely: Kal μετὰ τούτοις Ἰσάχαρις, Κάππυλον τε ἔσος καὶ τὸν ποταμὸν τοῦ μήκου ποιησάμενη τέρμονα, τὸ δ' Ἰταβύριον (Tabor) ἔσος τοῦ πλάτους (Ant. v. 1, 22).

Ver. 18. Jezreel (יִזְרְעֵאל), "i. e., God's plant ing. Esdraela, among the Greeks, from which Stradela; at the time of the crusades, Little Gerinum (Parvum Gerinum); now Zerim" (von Raumer, p. 157). It stands on the brow of a very steep rocky slope of one hundred feet or more toward the northeast, commanding a wide and noble view of the country around in all directions (Rob. iii. 161 ff.). The present village is small and poor. The inhabitants live in constant strife with the Bedouins of the plain of Jezreel, who, with violence or craft, practice incessant provocations and robberies on the wretched people (Furrer, pp. 262-264). The splendid site induced Ahab and his house to reside here, perhaps more especially in the summer (Keil), to keep court, 1 K. xviii. 45, 46; xxi. 1 ff.; 2 K. viii. 29; ix. 15-37; x. 1-11. Hosea refers to the blood-guiltiness of Jezreel (ch. i. 4, 11; ii. 22). Chesulloth = Chisloth-tabor, ver. 12.

Shunem, שֻׁנָּם (prop., according to Gesenius, "two resting-places," for שְׁנֵי מְנוּחִים, for which, as Eusebius informs us, שֻׁנָּם also was employed), now Solam or Sulem (Rob. iii. 169), on the declivity at the western end of Mount Duhy (little Hermon), over against Zerin, but higher. Furrer required one and a half hours between Zerin and Shanem. The ground in the broad valley rose and fell in gentle undulations. The village itself lies behind tall cactus hedges and trees (Furrer, p. 264, 265). Here the Philistines encamped before Saul's last battle (1 Sam. xxviii. 4). Shunem was the home of Abishag (1 K. i. 3). In the house of a Shunamite woman Elisha often lodged, and her son he raised from death (2 K. iv. 8-37; viii. 1-6). Shunem (Shulem) was probably also the birth-place of the Shulamite (Cant. vi. 12).

Ver. 19. Chepharaim, perhaps = Chepher, the residence of a Canaanitish king mentioned ch. xii. 17; according to the Onom., Affara, according to Knobel, Afuleh, west of Shulem, and more than two hours northeast of Lejun. Shihon, not found.

Anaharath. According to Knobel either Na'urah, on the east side of Little Hermon (Rob. Later Bibl. Res. p. 339) on an elevation, or—since Cod. A of the LXX. gives instead of this name, Pardo and 'Apparê, therefore אֶרְדֹּת — Arraneh, north of Jenin, in the plain (in Seetzen, ii. 156; Rob. iii. 157, 160).

Ver. 20. Rabbith, "conjecturably Arabboneh, somewhat further toward the northeast on Gilboa, in Rob. iii. 158" (Knobel).

Kiahion, a Levitical city, ch. xxi. 28, is erroneously called שִׁיחִין, 1 Chr. vi. 57 (Knobel, Keil). The site is unknown.

Abes, not identified.

Ver. 21. Remeth, "or Ramoth, or Jarmuth, belonging to the Levites (ch. xxi. 29, 1 Chron. vi. 58); the name signifies height" (Knobel). Concerning Knobel's further conjectures, see Keil, Bibl. Com. on the O. T. ii. 145, rem. Unknown.

En-Gannim, עֵין גַּנִּים, i. e., Garden-spring, a Levitical city, ch. xxi. 29, "without doubt," as Knobel rightly says, "the present Jenin." For, according to Robinson (iii. 155), this town lies in the midst of gardens of fruit-trees, which are surrounded by hedges of the prickly pear; but having for its most remarkable feature a beautiful, flowing, public fountain, rising in the hills back of the town, and brought down so that it issues in a noble stream in the midst of the place. Furrer describes it as an important place on the border of the Samaritan mountain, and mentions not only the copiousness of the water, but the fruitfulness of the gardens there (p. 257). In Josephus (Ant. xx. 6, 1; Bell. Jud. iii. 3, 4), En-gannim is called Gadala, from which Jenin has come, as Robinson rightly conjectured (iii. 156, note 1).

En-Haddah and Beth-passas, not yet identified. En-haddah may have been the same as Jdeideh or Beit Kad, Kadd on Gilboa (Rob. iii. 157), Knobel.

Ver. 22. And the border struck Tabor and Shahasimah, and Beth-shemesh; and the outgoings of their border were at the Jordan. In this the eastern part of the north border is given. The western point of beginning was Tabor, here probably not the mountain of this name, but a city lying on this mountain (Knobel and Keil), which was given to the Levites (1 Chr. vi. 62). Remains of walls have been found there by Seetzen, Robinson (iii. 213 ff.), Buckingham, Rusegger, and most recently Furrer (p. 307 ff.). The largest and best preserved mass of ruins is found, according to Furrer's representation, on the southeast corner of the plateau of the mountain, where the large closely-jointed blocks of cut stone lie firmly one upon the other, from fifteen to twenty feet high. Shahasimah (the Kethib reads שְׁחַשִּׁימָה) = heights, therefore a city lying on a height, perhaps Hazetheth, on the hills east of Tabor toward the Jordan (Knobel). Beth-shemesh, not to be confounded with Beth-shemesh in the tribe of Judah (ch. xv. 10, mentioned besides in Judg. i. 33), perhaps = Be-sum (Rob. iii. 237), a conjecture of Knobel's with which Keil agrees. "The eastern portion of the north border of Issachar toward Naphthali may have run from Tabor northeastward through the plain to Keft Sabt, and thence along the Wady Bessum to the Jordan. But how far the territory of Issachar extended down into the Jordan Valley is not stated" (Keil).

Sixteen cities. The number is correct if Tabor is taken as a city. This city would then be ascribed here to Issachar, while in 1 Chron. vi. 62 it is reckoned to Zebulun; not a remarkable thing in the case of a border town.

f. Ch. xix. 24-31. The Territory of the Tribe of Asher. The fifth lot fell to the tribe of Asher, which received its territory on the slope of the Galilean mountains toward the Mediterranean; in general, likewise, a very beautiful and fertile region, whose olive trees (Deut. xxxiii. 24) were formerly famous for their rich product. Even yet there are in that region "ancient olive trees, large gardens with all kinds of southern fruit trees, and green corn-fields" (Furrer, p. 291). From the Franciscan cloister at Accho "the eye sweeps eastward over the wide, fertile, grassy plains up to the mountains of Galilee" (ibid. p. 294). Here Asher had his beautiful possession. This was the κοιλὰς of which Josephus speaks: τὴν δὲ ἀπὸ τοῦ Καρυῆλου, κοιλὰδα προσαγορευομένην διὰ τὸ καὶ τοιαύτην εἶναι, Ἀσπρίται φέρονται πᾶσαν τὴν ἐπὶ Σιδῶνος τετραμμένην (Ant. v. 1, 22). The description begins in the vicinity of Accho (ver. 25), goes first toward the south (vers. 26, 27), then northward (vers. 28-30).

Ver. 25. Holkath, a city of the Levites, ch. xxi. 31 = Jelka or Jerka, northeast of Accho (Robinson iii. App. p. 133), on the slope of the mountains by a little wady.

Hali, passed over by von Raumer, possibly Julia or Gulis, in the same region, somewhat to the southwest of Holkath and more toward the sea.

Beth (בֵּית, Belly, = Valley, κοιλὰς, Gesen. with which the designation used by Josephus for the whole region is suggestively accordant), not yet identified; according to the Onom. called Beth-beten or Beßerén, eight Roman miles east of Ptolemais. Von Raumer (p. 121, Rem. 18, E.) inquires whether it is identical with Ekbatana not far from Ptolemais (Plin. v. 17, 5; Reland, p. 617).

Achahaph, ch. xi. 1; xii. 20.

Ver. 26. Alammelech. The name is preserved in the Wady el-Malek which empties into the Kishon from the northeast.

Amad. Knobel supposes this to be the modern Haifa, about three hours south of Accho, on the sea, called by the ancients Sycaminon, i. e. Sycamore-town, since the Hebrew name עֲמָד must, according to the Arab., be interpreted by Sycamoros. Knobel further thinks that since d passes into r, for which Ex. ii. 15 is cited, the old name Amad may be preserved in Ammara as the country people call Haifa.

Misheal, a Levitical city (ch. xxi. 30; 1 Chr. vi. 59), according to the Onom. s. v. Masan, situated on the sea, juxta Carmelum. This suits with the following statement of the direction of the boundary: and struck Carmel westward and Shihor-libnath. — Shihor-libnath. The brook of Egypt was called simply שִׁיחֹר, ch. xiii. 8. Here by שִׁיחֹר לִבְנָת is intended not the Belus (Nahr Raaman), which empties into the Mediterranean north of Carmel, but, from the direction which the description takes, and with respect to ch. xvii. 10, a stream south of Carmel, and quite probably the Nahr Zerkā or Crocodile Brook. Its name Zerkā, "blue," bluish stream, as Knobel and Keil suppose, might answer both to the שִׁיחֹר, "black," and to the לִבְנָת, "white."

Ver. 27. From that point the border returned toward the sunrise, to Beth-dagon. This Beth-dagon, different from the Beth-dagon in the Shephelah which was assigned to Judah, ch. xv. 41, has not been discovered. Proceeding in a northeasterly direction the border struck Zebulun and the ravine of Jiphtha-el, that is, according to the explanations on ver. 14, the Wady Abilin, to the north of Beth-emek and Neiel. — Beth-emek is not identified. Neiel is perhaps the same as Neah, ver. 13. — From hence the border went out to Cabul on the left hand, i. e. "on the north side of it. Cabul, northeast of the Wady Abilin, four hours southeast of Accho still bears the same name; in the LXX. Καβούλα; in Josephus κάμμη Καβουλώ (Vit. § 43). Comp. Robinson, Later Bibl. Res. p. 88.

Vers. 28–30. The main province proper of the tribe of Asher having been marked out in the preceding verses, the northern district is now more particularly defined (Knobel).

Ver. 28. Hebron, probably a mistake of the copyist for Abdon, which is named ch. xxi. 30; 1 Chr. vi. 59, among the Levitical cities (עֲבְדֹן = עֲבְדֹן). Not yet recognized; neither is Rehob, Hammon, or Kanah. See Conjectures in Knobel, pp. 464, 465; and Keil, Bibl. Com. ii. 2, in l. [also Dict. of the Bible]. The limitation even unto Great Zidon indicates that these places are to be sought for in that direction. Concerning Sidon, see on ch. xi. 8.

Ver. 29. From Sidon the border returned southward toward Ramah and to the fortified city of Tyre (Zor). Ramah is, according to Robinson (Later Bibl. Res. p. 63), Rameh, southeast of Tyre, on a solitary hill (hence the name) in the midst of a basin of green fields and surrounded by greater heights. יְבִיעֶזֶר "Fortress of Zor," i. e. Tyre, is not the island of Tyre, but the city of Tyre standing on the main land, now Sur" (Keil). At present the once mighty Tyre is a "small and wretched" town, in respect to which the predictions of the prophets have been fulfilled (Is. xxiii. 7, 8; Ezek. xxvi. 12, 27). For the future also "she seems destined to remain necessarily a miserable market spot" (Furrer, p. 385).

The site is a noble one. The name צֹר signifies "rock" = צָר. Notice the alliteration יְבִיעֶזֶר צֹר.

צֹר. Comp. further, Ritter, Erdk. xvii. p. 320 ff. and Movers, Phönizier, ii. 1, 118 ff. (in Keil). Now the border turned toward Hosah, which is unknown, and finally ran out to the sea in the region of Achzib. "Achziph. Hæc est Ecdippa in nono milliario Ptolemaidis pergentibus Tyrum" (Onom.). Now Zib, three hours north of Accho; the Ἀφῆ or Ἀκτινός of Josephus (Ant. v. 1, 22). Another Achzib belonged to Judah, ch. xv. 44. The name is probably = to יְבִיעֶזֶר, "Winter-brook," Gesen. In fact, "Pococke saw (ap. Ritter, xvi. 811) a brook pass along on the south side, over which, a beautiful bridge having an arch crossed." By a wide circuit the author has arrived again at the vicinity of Accho.

Ver. 30. Finally he names still three cities by themselves, Ummah and Aphek, and Rehob, of which only the Aphek on Lebanon, ch. xiii. 14, can with certainty be made out, as was there stated. Possibly, nay probably, Ummah and Rehob also lay in that mountain region. It is to be noted that the name Rehob (רְהוֹב, from רָחַב, "to be wide, spacious") occurs twice in the territory of Asher, namely, here and in ver. 28 above. (It is a name precisely analogous to בְּצֶרֶת and רָחֵב). The total twenty-two does not agree with the enumeration, as is often the case.

g. Ch. xix. 32–39. The Territory of the Tribe of Naphtali. The sixth lot came to the tribe of Naphtali, which is designated in Gen. xlix. 21 as the "hind let loose" (נַפְתָּלִי שְׁלֹחַת הַיָּד). Their province was bounded east by the sea of Genesaret and the Jordan, west by Asher, south by Zebulun and Issachar. In the north it reached far up into Coele-syria, and so to the very extremity of west Palestine. The possession of the tribe, through which runs the mountain of Naphtali rising to the height of 3,000 feet — the modern Jebel Safed, — sinks down on the west into the plain on the sea, while in the east it falls off to the Jordan valley and the sea of Merom. The soil is, generally speaking, fruitful, the natural scenery of great beauty. Comp. besides the former travellers, Furrer, pp. 306–331, for the vicinity of the sea of Merom, p. 361 ff.

Ver. 33. Knobel assumes that here, as in ver. 10 and ch. xvi. 6, the author, proceeding from a central point, describes the west border first toward the north, then toward the south. To us it appears more simple, since Heleph is not repeated like Sarid (vers. 10, 12), to understand with Keil that in ver. 33 the west border toward Asher, with the north and east border is described, in ver. 34 the south border.

Heleph is unknown. On the other hand we know from Judg. iv. 11, where Allon, the Oak, i. e., according to Gen. xii. 6, the oak forest (אֵלֹן, taken collect.) near Zaannanim lay, namely, by Kadesh northwest of the sea of Merom. Here Sisera was slain (Judg. iv. 21) by Jael, the wife of Heber the Kenite, who had pitched his tent there (Judg. iv. 11). The name יַעֲנַנִים is derived from יָעַן, "to wander," a place, therefore, where the tents of the wanderers, the nomads, stand

Such a nomadic herdsman was Heber. Even to the present day the Bedouins more or less friendly disposed wander about in the north of Palestine, in the plain of Jezreel, on Gilboa, and on Tabor. Comp. Furrer, p. 311, and often. Robinson notices the oaks growing in this region (iii. p. 370; Later Bibl. Res. p. 365 [Stanley, S. & P. p. 142, 355 n.]). Furrer clearly perceived from Tibnin, looking eastward, near the elevated Biraschit, the mighty Messiah-tree, "a solitary, majestic oak" (indicated on Van de Velde's Map). Forests, however, nowhere met the view, however eagerly he sought to discern them. He is led accordingly to the remark: "Other travellers have praised the abundance of trees in northern Galilee. They could not, I think, have followed my road. An atmosphere of death seemed to me to lie on the holy land here as in Benjamin" (Furrer, p. 337).

Adami-nekeb (אָדאָמי-נֶכֶב), i. e. Adami of the depth, hollow, "of the pass" (Knobel and Keil). The name אָדָם (reddish) recalls אָדָם, ch. iii. 16.

Jabneel, Lakum, like the preceding, unrecognized, although Knobel thinks he has found Adami-nekeb in Deir-el-ahmar, i. e. red cloister, three hours northwest of Baalbec. See particulars, Knobel, p. 466; a different view, Keil, ii. 1, p. 149.

And the outgoings thereof were at the Jordan (ver. 22). The upper Jordan is meant, the Nahr Hasbany, as a source of the Jordan, comp. Num. xxxiv. 10-12.

Ver. 34. And the border returned westward, i. e. from the Jordan, the border, namely, the south border of Naphtali turned back, probably following the Wady Beasum westward to Amath-tabor.

אֲמָת, as in ver. 12. Aznath-tabor is, according to the Onom. a "vicus ad regionem Diocæsareæ pertineñs in campestribus." Not discovered. From this notice it stood near Diocæsarea = Sepphoris = Sefurieh, perhaps, as Knobel and Keil suppose, southeast of this city, toward Mount Tabor. Thence it ran on to Hukkok, which cannot be identified.

And struck Zebulun on the south, and struck Asher on the west, and Judah; the Jordan (was) toward the sun-rising. The south and west boundary is to be understood, which grazed Zebulun in the south, and Asher and Judah in the west, while the Jordan is noticed as the east border. Great difficulties are raised by the enigmatical בְּיַהֲוֵדָה. The LXX. do not have it, but read: Kal συνάγει τῷ Ζαβουλὸν ἀπὸ νότου, καὶ τῷ Ἀσὴρ συνάγει κατὰ ὁρίαν, καὶ δὲ ἰσθμὸς ἀπὸ ἀνατολῆς ἑλθὼν. Either the word was wanting in their text, or, which is more likely, they left it out because they knew not what to do with it. The Vulgate translates, disregarding the punctuation of the Masoretes: "Et in Juda ad Jordanem." This Luther [and the Eng. Ver.] followed; but von Raumer (p. 233 ff.) has labored to show that this Judah on the Jordan consisted in the sixty Jair villages on the east side of the Jordan. His reason is that Jair, who is brought in, ch. xiii. 40; Num. xxxii. 41, contra morem (i. e. contrary to the rule proposed Num. xxxvi. 7, as a descendant of Manasseh, from Machir the Manassite) was actually, according to 1 Chr. ii. 5, 21 f., descended through Hezron, on his father's side, from Judah, and therefore to be designated properly and regularly a descendant of Judah. Keil also has adopted this view, which, however, after all the care with which von Raumer has labored to develop it, appears not sufficiently established by that solitary passage in Chronicles combined with Josephus, Ant. viii. 2, 3. Rather "it is hard to believe that the possession of Jair, which belonged, from ch. xiii. 30, to Manasseh, could have borne the name of Judah" (Bunsen). Not more satisfactory are the attempts of older writers; of Masius, who supposes that a narrow strip of the land of Naphtali stretched along down the west shore of the Sea of Galilee to Judah; of Bachiene, who places a city Judah on the Jordan; of Reland, who says that sometimes all Palestine, the whole land of the twelve tribes, was called Judæa, therefore the land east of the Jordan might be so called. Hence alterations of the text have been resorted to.

From the omission of יַהֲוֵדָה by the best Codices of the LXX. (Vat., Alex., and Ald.), Clericus had proposed to treat it simply as not belonging to the text. Maurer, followed by Bunsen, referring to ch. xvii. 10; xix. 22, would read בְּיַבְרֵם, and translates accordingly: "et terminus eorum erat Jordanus ab oriente." Concerning the LXX. he says briefly and well: "Sept. יַהֲוֵדָה suo Marte omiserunt, cfr. ad vers. 15, 30, 38 al." Knobel thinks "it would be more suitable to read

בְּיַשְׁשָׁכָר, since Naphtali bordered on Issachar on the west and south." He says further, "If we retain יַהֲוֵדָה, we must assume that the part of Issachar bordering on Naphtali was called Judah, of which, however there is no evidence." But what if not an adjacent portion of Issachar, but a place in Asher, which was mentioned immediately before

יַהֲוֵדָה, was so called? And this appears in fact to have been the case, for on Van de Velde's Map there is a place north of Tibnin marked el-Jehudijeh, in whose name the old name has been preserved, since Jehudijeh might come from יַהֲוֵדָה

as well as from יַהֲוֵדָה, ch. xix. 45 (see below). Furrer reached this Jehudijeh from Tibnin in an hour (p. 339 l. 11, compared with l. 4 from bottom). After first descending the steep path, which winds down along the west slope from Tibnin, he went up then out of the ravine (the Wady Ilmah is meant) toward the west, and came to the little village Jehudijeh, "Jews village," surrounded by many trees. Of ruins, Furrer found there a finely chiseled block of stone which he regards as the slight trace of a synagogue. In this manner we may solve the riddle, simply and easily, as it seems to us, without any change of the text and holding fast the Masoretic punctuation. If, however, we were to change the text, Maurer's conjecture would deserve the preference over that of Knobel, because יַהֲוֵדָה, from the similarity of the letters, might very easily have arisen from יַבְרֵם, which is not the case with יַשְׁשָׁכָר.

Ver. 35-39. Fortified Cities of Galilee, ver. 35. Ziddim, unknown. Zer, likewise unknown. Hammath, to be kept distinct from the often mentioned Hamath, the northern boundary-town of Palestine; a Levitical city, ch. xxi. 32, called also Hammoth-dor or Hammon (1 Chr. vi. 61). The name indicates warm springs, such as existed at Ammaus south of Tiberias (Ἀμμαοῦς in Joseph. Ant. xviii. 2, 3; Bell. Jud. iv. 1, 3; see Menke's Map v., side map of Galilee), and still exist.

Rakkath, situated, as the Jews have thought, on the site of the later Tiberias.

Oinneroth (פִּנְרוֹת or פִּנְרוֹת, ch. xi. 2; Targ. :

פִּנְרוֹת, פִּנְרוֹת, פִּנְרוֹת, Γεννησάδ, Joseph. Bell. Jud. iii. 10, 7, 8), the city already mentioned, ch. xiv. 2, which gave name to the beautiful and fertile plain, pictured by Josephus (l. c.) in the most splendid colors, and to the sea (ch. xii. 3; xiii. 27; Num. xxxiv. 11), but which has itself disappeared. Knobel supposes the Khan Minijeh to be the place where it stood. The plain, which is about an hour long and twenty minutes broad, extends from near Mejdol to Khan Minijeh. Comp. further Furrer, p. 319 ff.; Robinson, iii. 290). פִּנְרוֹת signifies probably "low ground," a hollow, κοιλάς, from פָּנָה (Knobel).

Verse 36. Adamah, unknown. Ramah, the present Rameh, southwest of Safed, on a plain, a large, beautiful village surrounded with plantations of olive trees. Hazor, see on ch. xi. 1.

Ver. 37. Kadesh, see on ch. xii. 22. Edrei, not to be confounded with Edrei in Bashan, ch. xii. 4, unknown. En-hazor, doubtless Ain Hazur south of Rameh.

Ver. 38. Iron, now Jaron, Jarun, on a height northwest of el-Jisch (Giscala) in a fertile and cultivated region with ruins near by. Seezen, ii. p. 123 f.; Van de Velde, Narr. i. 174 ff., apud Knobel.

Migdal-el (מִגְדַּל־אֵל, God's tower). The name speaks for Magdala (Matt. xv. 39), now el-Mejdel, which it is supposed to be by Gesen. and Robinson (iii. 278), only it is remarkable that Migdal-el was not before (ver. 35) included in the cities lying on the Sea of Gennesaret, rather than here among such as lie further west. On this account Knobel, contrary to the Masoretic pointing מִגְדַּל־אֵל, joins it with the following מִגְדַּל־אֵל, and then finds the place in Mejdol Kerum, west of Rama, three hours east of Acccho (Robinson, Later Bibl. Res. p. 86). Too far west.

Horem, unless one accepts Knobel's combination, not yet found. So with Beth-anath (Judg. i. 33), and Beth-shemesh, which is different from Beth-shemesh in Judah (ch. xv. 10), and Beth-shemesh in Issachar (ver. 22). Nineteen cities. The number detailed is sixteen.

g. Ch. xix. 40-48. The Territory of the Tribe of Dan. This tribe received the seventh lot, which fell to them in "pleasant places" (Ps. xvi. 6), west of Benjamin, north of Judah, south of Ephraim. Their country lay mostly in the Shephelah, but hindered by the Amorites (Judg. i. 34) from taking possession of their province, the warlike tribe conquered, besides, a small tract far up in the mountains of the north (Judg. xviii. 1 ff.). Josephus does not mention this (Ant. v. 1, 27), but our author does (ver. 47).

Ver. 41. Zorah, Eshatol, and Ir-shemesh, three cities of Judah which were yielded to the Danites, but of which they did not occupy Irshemesh, a city assigned to the Levites (ch. xxi. 16).

Ver. 42. Shaalabbin (שְׁאֵלָבִין), גֶּסֶנִיּוֹן, Gesenius: place of jackals, comp. שְׁאֵלָבִין, ch. xv. 28), 2 Sam. xxiii. 32; 1 Chr. xi. 33; 1 K. iv. 9; now Salbit (Robinson, Later Bibl. Res. p. 144, n. 3 [Selbit]. Ajalon, ch. x. 12.

Jethlah. According to Knobel contained in the Wady Atallah west of Jalo (Ajalon) (Robinson, Later Bibl. Res. pp. 144, 145).

Ver. 43. Elon, perhaps Ellin (Robinson, iii. Ap. p. 120). Thimnathah, ch. xv. 10. Ekron, ch. xv. 11.

Ver. 44. Eltekeh, a city of the Levites, ch. xxi. 23, otherwise unknown.

Gibbethon, ch. xxi. 23, a Levitical city also. Mentioned 1 K. xv. 27; xvi. 15, 17, in the contests with the Philistines; not yet discovered in modern times.

Baalath, fortified by Solomon, 1 K. ix. 18; unknown. Whether identical with Baala, ch. xv. 11? (Knobel).

Ver. 45. Jehud, very probably el-Yehudijeh, two hours north of Ludd (Robinson, iii. 45), in a beautiful, well-cultivated plain.

Bene-berak, now Ibn Abrak, one hour to the west of Yehudijeh.

Gath-rimmon, a Levitical city, ch. xxi. 24; 1 Chr. vi. 54, to be sought according to the Onom. in the vicinity of Thimnah, but not yet discovered (Keil).

Ver. 46. Me-jarkon (aquæ flavedinis, yellow water), unknown.

Rakkon (רָקֹן from רָקַח = רָקַח, "cheek," Gesen.) unknown.

With the border before Japho. These words indicate that Me-jarkon and Rakkon are to be sought in the region of Japho.

Japho (יָפוֹ, beauty) is mentioned elsewhere in the O. T. only 1 K. v. 9; 2 Chr. ii. 16; Ez. iii. 7; Jon. i. 3. Under the Greek name of Ἰόππη, Lat. Joppe, it occurs often in the books of Macca-bees (1 Macc. x. 74, 76; xii. 34; xiv. 15, 34; xv. 28, 35; 2 Macc. xii. 3-7), and in the Acts of the Apostles (ch. ix. 36-43; x. 5, 8, 23, 32; xi. 5). The place is now called Jaffa, in which the old name Japho is preserved, and it has, since the times of the Crusaders to the present day been the landing-place of pilgrims who go thence to Jerusalem. The population amounts to not far from five thousand souls, including about three thousand Mohammedans, six hundred Christians, and only about one hundred and twenty Jews (von Raum. p. 205). The city is very old, built, as the ancients thought, before the Flood: "Est Joppe ante diluvium, ut ferunt condita" (Pomp. Melas, i. 11); "Joppe Phenicum antiquior terrarum inundatione, ut ferunt" (Plin. Hist. Nat. v. 13) (apud von Raumer, p. 204). On the east the town is surrounded by a wide circle of gardens and groves of noble trees. Oranges, almonds, figs, apricots, peaches, pomegranates, apples and plums, sugar-cane and cotton, all flourish admirably here (Furrer, pp. 6, 7). Even to these gardens extended, according to the passage before us, the territory of Dan. Concerning Joppe, comp. further, Ritter, xvi. 574 ff. [Gage's transl. iv. 253-259], Winer in the Real-woerterbuch, Robinson,<sup>1</sup> Tobler, Wanderung, and Nazareth, nebst Anhang u. s. w., p. 302. This author found civilization so far advanced there in 1865 that houses were numbered, and "in genuine Arabic numerals," and their "gates named, e. g. Tarif el-Baher, Sea-gate."

And the border of the children of Dan went out from them, i. e. the children of Dan extended their territory as is related in Judg. xviii; not, however, in the immediate vicinity, but rather, after having through five scouts become satisfied of the feasibility of their undertaking (Judg. xviii. 7-10), at the foot of Anti-Lebanon in Laish (לַיִשׁ, Judg. xviii. 7, 27), or לַיִשׁ, as the place is called in the latter half of our verse. The reason for this migration lay in the pressure of the Amorites who did not allow the Danites to spread themselves in the plain (Judg. i. 34). With the peaceful and quiet Sidonians they were able more easily to deal and then conquer them also. For the children of Dan went up to fight against Leshem, and took it, and smote it with the edge of the sword, and possessed it, and dwelt therein, and called Leshem Dan, after the name of Dan their father. This Leshem or Lais which was called Dan by the Danites, and per prolepsin, is called so also in Gen. xiv. 14, is preserved in the present name of the place, Tel el-Kadi (hill of the judge), hill of Dan, for  $\text{דן}$  means judge, as Wilson, ii. 172, apud von Raumer, p. 125, Rem. 24 a, has pointed out, and with this Gen. xlix. 16 may be compared. It is a pleasant green hill of not more than twenty or thirty feet in height on the north side, while toward the south it falls off to a considerably greater depth (Furrer, p. 365, 366). Furrer saw no trace of an ancient city except some heaps of stones near the southwest edge. The same traveller describes very vividly the capture of Leshem by the Danites, p. 367. Comp. Robinson, iii. 351, 358; Later Bibl. Res. p. 392; Ritter, xv. p. 207 [Gage's transl. ii. 204-207], von Raumer, p. 125. The name was most familiar from the expression "from Dan to Beersheba," Judg. xx. 1; 1 Sam. iii. 20; xxx. 30; 2 Sam. xvii. 11. Jeroboam established here the worship of the calves, the "Neo-Israelitish worship," 1 K. xii. 28, 29. Jehu was still devoted to it, 2 K. x. 29; Am. viii. 13, 14. May not the old name Leshem have been retained in that of the middle source of the Jordan, el-Leddān (Keil, i. 2, p. 53)?

<sup>1</sup> [Robinson gives no original information concerning Joppe; see iii. 81, note. — Tr.]

i. Ch. xix. 49, 50. Joshua's Possession. According to his desire, the moderation of which has already been alluded to, ch. xvii. 14 ff., Joshua received, after the land had been divided, Timnath-serah (remaining portion, Gesen.), or Timnath-heres (portion of the sun), as a possession, on Mount Ephraim. There on the mountain Gaash was he buried, ch. xxiv. 30; Judg. ii. 8, 9. It is now Tibneh between Gophnah and el-Mejdel, first discovered by Smith in 1843 on an affluent of the Wady Belat. The ruins are of considerable importance; the tombs there are similar to the royal tombs at Jerusalem (Bib. Sacra, 1843, p. 484 ff. in von Raumer, p. 166). Robinson, Later Bibl. Res. p. 141. Ritter, xvi. p. 562 ff. [Gage's transl. iv. 246 f.]. The place is not to be confounded with Timnath (ver. 43) ch. xv. 10.

k. Ch. xix. 51. Conclusion. This general remark in closing the narrative, directly refers, by the statement that the division was made in Shiloh, only to ch. xviii. 1, because there the majority of the tribes had received their portions.

4. Appointment of the Cities of Refuge.

CHAPTER XX.

a. The Command of God to Joshua.

CHAPTER XX. 1-6.

1 The Lord also [And Jehovah] spake unto Joshua, saying, Speak to the children
2 [sons] of Israel, saying, Appoint out [Appoint] for you [the] cities of refuge,
3 whereof I spake unto you by the hand of Moses: that the slayer that killeth [smite] any person unawares [by mistake] and unwittingly, may flee thither:
4 and they shall be your refuge from the avenger of blood. And when he that doth flee unto one of those cities shall stand at the entering of the gate of the city, and shall declare his cause [speak his words] in the ears of the elders of that city, they shall take him into the city unto them, and give him a place, that he may dwell 5 among them. And if the avenger of blood pursue after him, then they shall not deliver the slayer up into his hand; because he smote his neighbor unwittingly, and 6 hated him not beforetime. And he shall dwell in that city, until he stand before the congregation for judgment, and until the death of the high priest that shall be in those days: then shall the slayer return, and come unto his own city, and unto his own house, unto the city from whence he fled.

b. Fulfillment of this Command.

CHAPTER XX. 7-9.

7 And they appointed [consecrated] Kedesh in Galilee in mount Naphtali, and Shechem in mount Ephraim, and Kirjath-arba, (which is Hebron) in the mountain
8 of Judah. And on the other side [of the] Jordan by Jericho eastward, they assigned [appointed ver. 2] Bezer in the wilderness upon the plain [the table land] out of the tribe of Reuben, and Ramoth in Gilead out of the tribe of Gad, and Golan in 9 Bashan out of the tribe of Manasseh. These were the cities appointed [prop. of appointment] for all the children of Israel, and for the stranger [sojourner] that sojourneth among them, that whosoever killeth [smiteth] any person at unawares [by mistake] might flee thither, and not die by the hand of the avenger of blood, until he stood before the congregation.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL

Ch. xx. contains the designation of the free cities for homicides as Moses had already (Num. xxxv. 9-34; Deut. xix. 1-13) ordained. There were to be six of them (Num. xxxv. 6, 13; Deut. xix. 3-9) and they were taken from the number of the Levitical cities (Num. xxxv. 6). The way to them must be prepared (Deut. xix. 3), that the fugitive might as quickly as possible reach his asylum.

a. Ch. xx. 1-6. God's Command to Joshua, vers. 1, 2. Recollection of the ordinance established by God through Moses (Num. xxxv. 9 ff.; Deut. xix. 5 ff., with which Gen. ix. 5 ff., and Ex. xxi. 12-14 may be further compared). The cities are called עָרֵי מִקְלָה. The root מִקְלָה signifies (1.) to draw together, to contract ones self, (2.) to draw in, hence to receive (a fugitive), as in the Chal. (Gesen.) [The meaning of the noun comes near to asylum].

Ver. 3. In these cities the man-slayer (רֹצֵחַ, from רָצַח, prop. "to break or crush in pieces") might flee, yet only the one who smote (רָצַח) a soul by mistake (רָצַח בְּטִלְיָהּ, from רָצַח, to go astray, to err," for which in Num. xxxv. 22, עָרֵי מִקְלָה [in a twinkling] stands). Knobel remarks on רָצַח בְּטִלְיָהּ, on Lev. iv. 2: "This expression, as well as רָצַח and רָצַח, occurs in reference to transgressions of the divine law which are committed without consciousness of their being unlawful, and which are only afterwards recognized as sins (vers. 13, 22, 27, v. 18; xxii. 14), e. g., of sins of the congregation without their knowledge (Num. xv. 24 ff.), or even of unlawful conduct which has resulted from some weakness, carelessness (ch. v. 15), or which was occasioned by some unfortunate accident (Num. xxxv. 11, 15, 22 ff.; Josh. xx. 3, 9). Hence it stands in general for unpremeditated sins in opposition to

רָצַח בְּקִדְיָהּ, i. e., violent intentional sins, which must be punished with death (Num. xv. 27-31), and could not be expiated with sacrifices." Thus it is added here also, unwittingly (רָצַח בְּטִלְיָהּ, without his knowing it). Now for those who had slain any person by mistake, without intending it, these cities should be for a refuge from the avenger of blood. He is מִקְלָה לָּהֶם, LXX. δ ἀρχιστεῦς τοῦ αἵματος (ἀρχιστεῦς, whence ἀρχιστεῦς, is the nearest of kin, according to Ammonius the one entitled to the heirship, different from συγγενεῖς, who have no such right, and from οἰκείοι, related by marriage, Herod. x. 80. The word ἀρχιστεῦς occurs frequently in the LXX. still also in Isæus, Orat. Att. ii. 11, and in Eurip. Trach. 243). Vulg.: ultor sanguinis. מִקְלָה signifies properly to demand back, reclaim what belongs to one, hence, in connection with עָרֵי, to require, revenge the blood which has been stolen by the murderer. As such a reclamation in reference to real estate belonged to the family (Lev. xxv. 35; Ruth iv. 4-6), so that they alone had a right to repurchase it; so also the reclamation for the blood of a member of a family was a duty of the family, and they alone had a right in regard to it. Precisely so was it with the duty of marrying a brother's widow (Deut. xxv. 5; Matt. xxii. 23 ff.; Mark xii. 19; Luke xx. 28) which is expressed Ruth iii. 13 by מִקְלָה. On the custom itself of vengeance for blood [the vendetta], see the Theological and Ethical.

Ver. 4. More particular directions, not given in the passages of the Pentateuch, how the man-slayer should proceed on his arrival at the free city. He must remain standing at the entering of the gate of the city, i. e. ante portam (Vulg.), and state his case before the ears of the elders of that city. Then they shall gather him (רָצַח) into the city, and shall give him a place, that he may dwell among them, i. e. assign to him a habitation.

Vers. 5, 6. He might not be delivered to the avenger of blood, but might, according to ver. 6, to the congregation, that is, as appears from Num. xxxv. 24 ff., to the congregation of his own city, who should hold judgment upon him, and either, if they found him guilty, give him up to the avenger of blood, or, if they esteemed him innocent, send him back to the city of refuge, where he must remain until the death of the anointed high-priest (Num. xxxv. 25), that is, of the ruling high-priest. After the death of the latter there follows, somewhat as upon the death of an anointed prince, an amnesty, and the man-slayer is at liberty to return to his home. If, however, he presumptuously leaves his asylum sooner, he is exposed to the anger of the avenger (Num. xxxv. 26, 28).

b. Ch. xx. 7-9. Fulfillment of this Command, ver. 7. They consecrated to this use six cities. עָרֵי מִקְלָה, as Keil rightly notices, is not merely to set apart, but to set apart something to a holy destination from the remaining mass of things. "The free cities" as Ranke says (Untersuch. über den Pentateuch, ii. 316, apud Keil, pp. 363), "are intended to keep the people and land of Jehovah pure from blood guiltiness. They exist as a monument of Jehovah's love for his chosen." Hence not cities at random but Levitical cities were chosen (Num. xxxv. 6).

Kedesh in Galilee. Ch. xii. 22; xix. 37. מִקְלָה, from מִקְלָה, signifies a ring, Esth. i. 6; Cant. v. 14, then circle, section of land, like עֵרֶב. In particular it is a circuit of twenty cities (1 K. ix. 11) in the tribe of Naphtali, מִקְלָה, within whose borders many heathen still dwelt, and hence called, Is. viii. 13, מִקְלָה (comp. Matt. iv. 15, Γαλιλαία τῶν ἐθνῶν). From it the name Galilee, which occurs in the translation here and in ch. xxi. 32, has been formed. Shechem, ch. xvii. 7. Kirjath-arba, ch. xv. 13. The three cities of refuge west of the Jordan thus lay so distributed that one (Kedesh) was found in the north, one (Shechem) in the centre, and one (Kirjath-arba = Hebron) in the southern part of the land.

Ver. 8. East of the Jordan there are likewise three which Moses had already (Deut. iv. 41-43) established.

Bezer, perhaps identical with Bozra (Jer. xlviii. 24), but not to be identified more particularly, although we may, as Knobel remarks on Num. xxxii. 38, compare the place of ruins Burazin, some way east of Heshbon in the plain (Robinson, App. p. 170), or Berza (Robinson, ibid.).

Ramoth in Gilead, the same city which is called, ch. xiii. 26, Ramath-Mizpeh,<sup>1</sup> now, as was shown at the place cited (comp. also Knobel on Num. xxxii. 42, p. 183), es-Salt, and therefore not to be placed so far northward as on Menke's Map iii.; comp. Gen. xxxi. 49.

Golan in the country of Gaulanitis (Jaulan) not yet discovered by modern travellers, but in the time of Eusebius and Jerome called a κώμη μεγάλῃ and villa prægrandis. Since Ramoth in Gilead lay in the middle of the land, Bezer probably in the south, and Golan in the north, there seems to have been a similarly fit distribution of the cities to that which we have noticed in West Palestine. But while they were enumerated there from north to south, these are mentioned, as in Deut. iv. 43, in the opposite order.

Ver. 9. These were the cities appointed, — עָרֵי הַמִּצְוָה, the Vulgate, rightly: civitates constitutæ, cities of appointment (from צָוָה, to appoint), i. e., which were appointed in order that every one . . . might flee thither; Kimchi, inaccurately; urbes congregationis (with reference to the signification of צָוָה, in Niph.); Gesen., not precisely: urbes asyli, for in that view they are called, ver. 3, עָרֵי הַמִּקְלָט. Luther [and Eng. Vers.] translated quite rightly: these were the cities appointed for all the children of Israel, etc.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

So long as no organized commonwealth exists among a people, a common consciousness of right develops itself first in that sphere of society which is immediately given by the divine order of nature — the family. It will therefore interpose when the right of one of the members is violated, whether in the loss of material goods through robbery, or by injury to body and life. So we find vengeance for blood, not only among the Hebrews, Arabs, Persians, but also among the Greeks, with the Germanic and Slavic peoples, in the infancy of their development, as now among savage nations. The theocratic legislation found the custom existing, and sought, without attempting to abolish, to restrain it. This purpose was served by the free cities, as also by the other restricting appointments in the passages of the law quoted above, as well as in this passage. It deserves to be carefully considered also, that according to the view of the O. T., in a case of manslaughter, not merely the family to which the slain man belonged was injured, but God himself in whose image man was created (Gen. ix. 6). On this account the real avenger of blood, as is said just before, is God himself (Gen. ix. 5; Ps. ix. 13; 2 Chron. xxiv. 22). He avenges the murdered man even on brutes (Gen. ix. 5; Ex. xxi. 28, 29). Since God is wronged in intentional murder, even the altar itself affords no protection to the slayer (Ex. xxi. 14), ransom is not allowed (Num. xxxv. 31), the land even is defiled and cannot be purified from the blood which has been shed in it, without the blood of him who has spilled it (Num. xxxv. 33). The legislation of the O. T. is, therefore, on this side, much stricter than the Greek, Roman, or German idea of right. These allowed ransom, and regarded consecrated places as places of asylum even for the intentional murderer (comp. Winer, Realw., art. "Freistatt"). On the other hand, it appears much more humane and equitable in regarding God himself as the proper avenger (see Gen. ix. 5 ff., and comp. Lange on the passage), in distinguishing between premeditated and unintentional homicide, and in requiring punishment of the perpetrator only, not at all of his relations. Comp. on this subject the art. "Bluträcher" by Oehler in Herzog's Realencyk. ii. 260 ff., also Winer, art. "Bluträcher," Keil, Com. on Josh. in loc., [and Smith's Dict. of the Bible, arts. "Blood, Avenger of," and "Cities of Refuge." — Tr.]

<sup>1</sup> [Osborn's large map makes them distinct places. — Tr.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

The chapter is suitable to be treated as a Bible lesson, to show, with reference to the passages Gen. ix. 5 ff.; Ex. xxi. 12-14; Num. xxxv. 9 ff.; Deut. xix. 1 ff., how solemnly and strictly, and at the same time how justly and mildly, the O. T. legislation spoke concerning violence to human life; how it in part clung still to the patriarchal institutions, but in part prepared for a better order; in particular, how this arrangement for free cities put a check on family revenge, and endless, bloody quarrels. For the practical application, the following comments of Starke give hints: The name of the Lord is a strong tower and safe refuge; the righteous flee thereto and are protected, Prov. xviii. 19; Ps. xviii. 2, 3. — The blood of a man is highly esteemed before God; he who sheds it has God's wrath upon him, Gen. ix. 10; ix. 6; Gal. v. 21; Rev. xxii. 15. — God has no pleasure in sin, Ps. v. 5, nor delight in the death of the sinner, Ezek. xviii. 23, 24.

5. Appointment of the Cities for the Priests and Levites.

CHAPTER XXI.

a. Demand of the Levites that Cities should be given them.

CHAPTER XXI. 1-3.

- 1 Then [And] came near the heads of the fathers of the Levites unto Eleazar the priest, and unto Joshua the son of Nun, and unto the heads of the fathers of the 2 tribes of the children [sons] of Israel; And they [omit: they] spake unto them at Shiloh in the land of Canaan, saying, The Lord [Jehovah] commanded by the hand of Moses to give us cities to dwell in, with the suburbs [and their pasture-grounds; De Wette: their circuits; Bunsen: common-pastures; Knobel: driving-3 grounds] for our cattle. And the children [sons] of Israel gave unto the Levites out of their inheritance [possession], at the commandment of the Lord [Jehovah], these cities and their suburbs [pasture-grounds].

b. General Account of the Levitical Cities.

CHAPTER XXI. 4-8.

- 4 And the lot came out for the families of the Kohathites: and the children [sons] of Aaron<sup>1</sup> the priest, which were of the Levites, had by lot out of the tribe of Judah, and out of the tribe of Simeon [the Simeonites], and out of the tribe of Benjamin, thirteen cities. And the rest of the children [sons] of Kohath had by lot out of the families of the tribe of Ephraim, and out of the tribe of Dan, and out of the 6 half-tribe of Manasseh, ten cities. And the children [sons] of Gershon had by lot out of the families of the tribe of Issachar, and out of the tribe of Asher, and out of the tribe of Naphtali, and out of the half-tribe of Manasseh in Bashan, thirteen
 7 cities. The children [sons] of Merari by their families had out of the tribe of Reuben, and out of the tribe of Gad, and out of the tribe of Zebulun, twelve cities.
 8 And the children [sons] of Israel gave by lot unto the Levites these cities with [and] their suburbs [pasture-grounds], as the Lord commanded by the hand of Moses.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 4. אֲרֹנִי לְבִנָּי, strictly: and there were for the sons of Aaron . . . by the lot thirteen cities. And so through the following verses to the 7th inclusive. — Tr.]

c. Cities of the Children of Aaron (Cities of the Priests).

CHAPTER XXI. 9-19.

- 9 And they gave out of the tribe of the children [sons] of Judah, and out of the tribe of the children [sons] of Simeon, these cities which are here mentioned by 10 name [which were called by name], Which the children [sons] of Aaron,<sup>1</sup> being of the families of the Kohathites, who were of the children of Levi, had: for theirs
 11 was the first lot. And they gave them the city of Arba the father of Anak (which city is Hebron) in the hill-country [on the mountain] of Judah, with the suburbs
 12 thereof [and its pasture-grounds] round about it. But [And] the fields of the city, and the villages thereof, gave they to Caleb the son of Jephunneh for [in] his pos-
 13 session. Thus [And] they gave to the children of Aaron the priest, Hebron with her suburbs, to be a city [the city] of refuge<sup>2</sup> for the slayer; and Libnah with 14 her suburbs, And Jattir with her suburbs, and Eshtemoa with her suburbs, 15 16 And Holon with her suburbs, and Debir with her suburbs, And Ain with her suburbs, and Juttah with her suburbs, and Beth-shemesh with her suburbs; nine 17 cities out of those two tribes. And out of the tribe of Benjamin, Gibeon with her 18 suburbs, Geba with her suburbs, Anathoth with her suburbs, and Almon with her 19 suburbs; four cities. All the cities of the children of Aaron, the priests, were thirteen cities with their suburbs.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 10. יָדָיו לְבָנֵי אֵן, as in verse 4, properly: And there was for the sons of Aaron (sc. the lot, see exeg. note), or. there were [the cities]. The subject in any case has to be supplied, on account of the parenthesis at the end of the verse. — Tr.]

[2 Ver. 13. Hebron the city of refuge for the slayer, and its pasture-grounds. It may be remarked, once for all, that "suburbs" in the version, should uniformly throughout the chapter be understood in the sense which we have hitherto indicated by substituting "pasture-grounds." The "with" which precedes it should as uniformly be "and." — Tr.]

d. Cities of the remaining Kohathites.

CHAPTER XXI. 20-26.

20 And the families of the children of Kohath, the Levites which [who] remained of the children of Kohath, even [omit: even] they had the cities of their lot out of the tribe of Ephraim. For [And] they gave them Shechem with her suburbs in mount Ephraim, to be a city [the city] of refuge<sup>1</sup> for the slayer; and Gezer with her suburbs, And Kibzaim with her suburbs, and Beth-horon with her suburbs; four cities. And out of the tribe of Dan, Eltekeh with her suburbs, Gibbethon with her suburbs, Aijalon with her suburbs, Gath-rimmon with her suburbs; four cities. And out of the half-tribe of Manasseh, Tanach with her suburbs, and Gath-rimmon, with her suburbs; two cities. All the cities were ten with their suburbs, for the families of the children of Kohath that remained.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 21. Heb. nearly as in ver. 13. And they gave them the city of refuge for the slayer, Shechem and its pasture-grounds, on Mount Ephraim. — Tr.]

e. The Cities of the Gershonites (comp. ver. 6).

CHAPTER XXI. 27-33.

27 And unto the children [sons] of Gershon, of the families of the Levites, out of the other [omit: other] half-tribe of Manasseh they gave Golan in Bashan with her suburbs, to be a city of refuge for the slayer,<sup>1</sup> and Beesh-terah with her suburbs; two cities. And out of the tribe of Issachar, Kishon with her suburbs, Dabareh with her suburbs, Jarmuth with her suburbs, En-gannim with her suburbs; four cities. And out of the tribe of Asher, Mishal with her suburbs, Abdon with her suburbs, Helkath with her suburbs, and Rehob with her suburbs; four cities. And out of the tribe of Naphtali, Kedesh in Galilee with her suburbs, to be a city of refuge for the slayer;<sup>2</sup> and Hammoth-dor with her suburbs, and Kartan with her suburbs; three cities. All the cities of the Gershonites, according to their families, were thirteen cities with their suburbs.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 27. As in ver. 21: The city of refuge for the slayer, Golan, in Bashan, etc. — Tr.]

[2 Ver. 32. As in ver. 27. — Tr.]

f. The Cities of the Merarites (comp. ver. 7).

CHAPTER XXI. 34-42.

34 And unto the families of the children [sons] of Merari, the rest of the Levites, out of the tribe of Zebulun, Jokneam with her suburbs, and Kartah with her suburbs; two cities. Dimnah with her suburbs, Nahalal with her suburbs; four cities. And out of the tribe of Reuben, Bezer with her suburbs, and Jahazah with her suburbs; two cities. Kedemoth with her suburbs, and Mephaath with her suburbs; four cities. And out of the tribe of Gad, Ramoth in Gilead with her suburbs, to be a city of refuge for the slayer;<sup>1</sup> and Mahanaim with her suburbs, Heshbon with her suburbs, Jazer with her suburbs; four cities in all. So all the cities [All the cities] for the children [sons] of Merari by their families, which were remaining of the families of the Levites, were by their lot twelve cities.<sup>2</sup> All the cities of the Levites within the possession of the children of Israel were forty and eight cities with 42 their suburbs. These cities were every one with their suburbs round about them. Thus were [So to] all these cities.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL

[1 Ver. 33. As in vers. 27, 32. — Tr.]

[2 Ver. 40. Heb. with broken construction: and their lot was twelve cities. — Tr.]

g. Conclusion.

CHAPTER XXI. 43-46.

43 And the Lord [Jehovah] gave unto Israel all the land which he swore [had 44 sworn] to give unto their fathers: and they possessed it, and dwelt therein. And the Lord [Jehovah] gave them rest round about, according to all that he swore [had sworn] unto their fathers: and there stood not a man of all their enemies before them; the Lord [Jehovah] delivered all their enemies into their hand.
45 There failed not aught of any good thing which the Lord [Jehovah] had spoken unto the house of Israel; all came to pass.

EXOGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The chapter contains the catalogue of the Levitical cities, which were appointed according to the regulations already given by Moses, Num. xxxv. 1 ff. There were forty-eight of them in all, of which six were at the same time (ch. xx.) cities of refuge. On Kiepert's Wall Map they are distinguished by a colored line drawn under each [on Clark's Bible Atlas of Maps and Plans, by being printed in small capitals, and on Menke's by a distinguishing mark].

The list of the Levitical cities is given also in 1 Chron. vi. 39-66, with several in part easily removable deviations, due probably, as Keil supposes (ii. 1, p. 156, note), to another documentary source. The chronicler names only forty-two cities, although he also relates ver. 45 ff. that the children of Aaron had received thirteen, the other Kohathites ten, the Gershonites thirteen, the Merarites twelve cities, in all therefore forty-eight. Omitted are (1) Jutta in Judah, (2) Gibeon in Benjamin, (3) Eltekeh in Dan, (4) Gibbethon in Dan, (5) Jokneam in Zebulun, (6) Nahalal in Zebulun. Knobel seeks the reason in mere negligence on the part either of the chronicler himself or of a transcriber. Judging somewhat more leniently, we may find the explanation in an oversight, well deserving excuse amid so many names. If, further, the author of Chronicles gives to some extent different names, many of them exhibit faulty readings, as עֲגֵר for חֶצְרוֹן (ver. 25), קֶזֶשׁ for קֶזֶשׁ (ver. 29), etc., but others, on the contrary, the true reading, as עֲשֵׁן for עֵין (ver. 16), בִּלְעָם for גִּרְדֵּימוֹן (ver. 25), and דִּמְקָה for רִמְמוֹן (ver. 35).

In other places he shows only different forms of the same name, as the examples cited by Keil, עֲלָמוֹן for עֲלָמוֹן, קֶשֶׁל for קֶשֶׁל, חֶצְרוֹן for חֶצְרוֹן, and many others (Keil, ub. sup.). Some, finally, are probably different designations of the same city, as יִקְמָעִם for יִקְמָעִם, יִקְמָעִם for יִקְמָעִם, and עֵין־גִּנְנִים for עֵין־גִּנְנִים (1 Chron. vi. 53, 58 [Eng. 68, 73] compared with Josh. xxi. 22, 29).

a. Vers. 1-3. Demand of the Levites that Cities should be given to them. The account which we have here of the application of the heads of the tribe (Ex. vi. 14, 25) reminds us of ch. xiii. 6, where it is similarly told concerning Caleb, that he, accompanied by members of his tribe, brings to mind the promise that had been given him by Moses. Calvin regards it as probable that the Levites had been forgotten, adducing in support of this: "Sic enim accidere solet, dum quisque ad sua curanda attentus est, ut fratrum obliviscatur." Considering the great respect in which their fellow tribesman of that day, Eleazar, was held, and that he himself shared in the distribution of the land, we may much rather assume with Masius (in Keil, p. 155), "illos, cum res ad eam opportunitatem perductæ fuissent, accessisse ad divisores communi suorum tribulium nomine ut designatas ab illis urbes sortirentur." They had not deemed it opportune to urge their claim before.

b. Vers. 4-8. Account of the Levitical cities in general. According to Ex. vi. 16-20, and Num. iii. 17-19, compared with 1 Chron. v. 27-vi. 34 [Eng. vi. 1-49], we have the following family-tree for the Levites, to keep which before the eyes may help to understand the following allotment:—

LEVI.

- |             |  |                        |  |                                       |  |
|-------------|--|------------------------|--|---------------------------------------|--|
| 1. Gershon. |  | 2. Kohath.             |  | 3. Merari (Ex. vi. 16; Num. iii. 17). |  |
| 1. Amram.   |  | 2. Ishar.              |  | 4. Uzziel (Ex. vi. 18; Num. iii. 19). |  |
| 1. Aaron.   |  | 2. Moses (Ex. vi. 20). |  |                                       |  |

Aaron's posterity received the priesthood, Num. xviii. 1, 2, 7 (1 Chron. vi. 49). All the other Levites, hence the descendants of Moses also, were appointed, Num. xviii. 3-6 (1 Chron. vi. 33 [48]), to the inferior service of the sanctuary. The children of Israel, according to Num. xxxv. 6 ff., de-terminated what cities the families of the Levites should receive, but the lot decided which of these cities each particular family should have.

Ver. 4. The first lot came out for the families of the Kohathites, and, amongst these, for the sons of Aaron the priest, of the Levites. They, namely, the proper priests, received thirteen cities in the territory of the tribe of Judah, Simeon, and Benjamin. Upon which Calvin remarks: "Quod non contigit fortuito eventus: quia Deus pro admirabili suo consilio in ea sede eos locavit, ubi statuerat templum sibi eligere."

Ver. 5. The other Kohathites, that is, the posterity of Izhar, Hebron, Uzziel, and, in the line of Amram, those of Moses, shared ten cities in the land of Ephraim, Dan, and Manasseh west of the Jordan.

Ver. 6. The Gershonites received eighteen cities of Issachar, Asher, Naphtali, and Manasseh east of the Jordan.

Ver. 7. To the Merarites were allotted twelve cities out of Reuben, Gad, and Zebulun.

c. Vers. 9-19. The Cities of the Sons of Aaron (cities of the priests). In vers. 9-16 are mentioned the cities which the Aaronides received in the country of Simeon and Judah, then in vers. 17-19 the four cities of Benjamin. That they had so many was reasonable in view of the future increase of the posterity of Aaron.

[Keil, Bibl. Comm. ii. 1, pp. 155, 156, says on this topic: "This number for the cities allotted to the Levites will not appear too large if we consider, that (1) most of the cities of Canaan, to judge from the great number in so small a country, could not have been very large; (2) the Levites were not the sole occupants of these cities, but had only the necessary abodes in them for themselves, and pasture for their cattle in the vicinity, while the remaining space was for the other tribes; (3) that the twenty-three thousand male persons which the Levites numbered in the second census in the steppes of Moab, when distributed among thirty-five cities, would give to each six hundred and fifty-seven males, or about thirteen hundred male and female Levites. On the other hand, the allowance of thirteen cities to the priests has raised objections tending to the supposition that, since Aaron, in Joshua's time, could scarcely have had so numerous a posterity from his two remaining sons as to fill two, not to speak of thirteen cities, therefore the catalogue betrays a document of a much later date (Maurer and others). But in this, not only is there ascribed to those who effected the division, the monstrous short-sightedness of assigning to the priests their abodes with reference merely to their necessity at that time, and without regard to their future increase; but also of having taken the size of the cities as much too important, and the number of the Levites as much too small. But it was not at all designed that the cities should be filled with the families of the priests. And although the poll-list of the priests then living is nowhere given, still, if we remember that Aaron died in the fortieth year of the exodus, at the age of one hundred and twenty-three years (Num. xxxiii. 38), and so was already eighty-three years old when they left Egypt, it will appear that there might be now, seven years after his death, descendants of the fourth generation. But his two sons had twenty-four male offspring who founded the twenty-four classes of priests instituted by David (1 Chron. xxiv.). If, then, we allow only six males respectively to each of the following generations, the third generation would already have numbered one hundred and forty-four persons, who, ranging from twenty-five to thirty-five years of age at the distribution of the land, might now have had eight hundred and sixty-four male children. Thus the total number of male persons of the priestly class might at that time have amounted to over one thousand, or to at least two hundred families." — Tr.]

Ver. 9. The cities were called by name, that is, they indicated them by their names, "specified them by name" (Knobel).

Ver. 10. The subject of the principal sentence is גִּבְעֹן, which must be supplied from the parenthetical explanatory sentence ("for theirs was the first lot"). The awkwardness of the construction reminds us of ch. xvii. 1.

Vers. 11, 12. The first city named is Hebron, here also as in ch. xv. 13, and often, called the city of Arba. When this Arba is here called the father of Anok, אֲנוֹךְ, but elsewhere always the father of Anak (אֲנָק, 'Eved), the אֲנוֹךְ is undoubtedly a mere variety of pronunciation of the same name. The A sound easily passes over, in the German dialects also into the O sound. At Hebron the Levites received, besides the city, only מִקְנֵי־שֵׂם (from מִקְנֵה, to drive), the "drives," the pasture-grounds, but not the tillable land which, with the villages thereon, belonged to Caleb (ch. xiv. 12).

Compare also in reference to the מִקְנֵי־שֵׂם, ver. 8, as well as Num. xxxv. 2.

Ver. 13 repeats the sense of ver. 11 on account of the parenthetical remark in ver. 12. Libnah (ch. xv. 42; x. 29); Jattir (ch. xv. 48); Eshetemoa (ch. xv. 50); Holon (ch. xv. 51); Debir (ch. xv. 15, 49; x. 38); Ain (ch. xv. 32); Jutta (ch. xv. 55); Bethshemesh (ch. xv. 10). Of the cities so far enumerated six, Hebron, Jattir, Eshetemoa, Holon, Debir, Jutta, lay on the mountain of Judah; two, Libnah and Bethshemesh, in the lowland, to which is added one city of Simeon, Ashan in the lowland (אֲשָׁן, ch. xv. 42; xix. 7, as should be read, 1 Chron. vi. 44 (59), instead of עֲזִין.

Ver. 17 ff. The four Levitical cities in Benjamin, Gibeon (ch. ix. 3 ff.; x. 1 ff.; xviii. 25), Geba (ch. xviii. 24), Anathoth, and Almon. The two latter are wanting in the list of the cities of Benjamin, and are therefore still to be spoken of here. Anathoth (אֲנָתוֹת), Jeremiah's birth-place (Jer. i. 1; xxix. 27), whose inhabitants, however, hated him (Jer. xi. 21), and were therefore threatened by the indignant prophet (Jer. xi. 22, 23), lies one hour and a quarter (Furrer one hour and seventeen minutes) northeast of Jerusalem, and is now called Anata, built "on a height rising a little above the table-land." As traces of its antiquity, Furrer, who made a trip thither from Jerusalem (pp. 75-80), found in a house stones with jointed edges, three feet long and one and a half feet wide (p. 77). Robinson (who first recognized in Anata the ancient Anathoth, while ecclesiastical tradition had chosen for it another site, near the village of Kuryet el-Enab, about three hours from Jerusalem on the road to Ramleh, and had called it Jeremie) also notices ancient remains of walls, and, like Furrer, praises the prospect from this place (Rob. ii. 109, 110; Furrer, p. 77). The statements of Joseph. (Ant. x. 7, 3), of the Onom., and of Jerome in the Comm. in Jer. 1, on the distance of Anathoth from Jerusalem have been proved correct (see von Raumer, p. 171). Almon (עֲלִמון), 1 Chron. vi. 45 (60) עֲלִמֶת, now Almit (Rob. Later Bibl. Res. 287) or el-Mid, as Tobler writes it (Denkbl. p. 631, note 1), situated a little to the northeast of Anathoth. A place of ruins.

Ver. 19. Thirteen cities in all.

d. Vers. 20-26. The Cities of the remaining Kohathites. Of these there were ten, namely, four in Ephraim (ver. 22), four in Dan (ver. 24), two in west Manasseh (ver. 25).

Vers. 20-22. a. Four Cities in Ephraim, Shechem (ch. xvii. 7), Gezer (ch. x. 33; xvi. 3), Kibzaim (instead of which 1 Chron. vi. 53 (68) has יִקְצִים, not discovered. That Kibzaim and Jokneam may be, as Knobel and Keil suppose, different names of the same place, is confirmed perhaps by the fact referred to by Gesenius in his Lex., that יִקְצִים, "gathered by the people," from r. יִקְצֶה.

and יִקְצִים, to collect, cognate with יִקְצֶה, Ezek. xxii. 20, "have a quite similar etymology." The fourth city is Beth-horon. "Whether the upper or lower city, is not said" (Keil).

Vers. 23, 24. β. Four Cities in Dan, Eltekeh, Gibbethon (ch. xix. 44), Aijalon (ch. x. 12; xix. 42), Gath-rimmon (ch. xix. 45).

Ver. 25. γ. Two Cities in West Manasseh; Tannach (ch. xii. 21; xvii. 11). Gath-rimmon, an old mistake in copying for גִּתְרִמּוֹן (1 Chron. vi. 55 [70]), that is Ibleam (ch. xvii. 11).

Ver. 26. In all, ten cities.

e. Vers. 27-33. The Cities of the Gershonites. Thirteen, again, as with the sons of Aaron (vers. 4, 19), namely, two in East Manasseh (ver. 2), four in Issachar (ver. 28), four in Asher (ver. 30), three in Naphtali (ver. 32).

Ver. 27. a. Two Cities in East Manasseh. Golan (ch. xx. 8; Deut. iv. 43). Beesh-tera (בְּעִשְׁתֶּרָה), cont. from בֵּית-עִשְׁתֶּרָה, that is, House of Ashtarte; called 1 Chron. vi. 56 (71) עִשְׁתֶּרָה. It was plainly a city with a temple of Ashtarte, perhaps the Ashteroth-Karnaim mentioned in Gen. xiv. 5 as the residence of Og, king of Bashan, the site of which cannot now be determined. In any case, we must not, as Keil and Knobel observe, think of the present Busra in the east of Hauran (as Reland does, pp. 621, 662), for this was called even from ancient times Βόσσυρα, Βοσρόδ (1 Macc.

v. 26; Joseph. Ant. xii. 8, 3), hence as now בְּעִשְׁתֶּרָה, which the Greeks and Romans corrupted into Βόσσυρα (Knobel). But we must not either refer, as Knobel would, to a Bostra or Bustra on Mount Hermon, north of Banias, since the territory of the tribes did not extend so far north. Knobel, indeed, assumes this when he discovers Baal-gad in Heliopolis; which view we have attempted to disprove in ch. xi. 17. The site of this Beeshterah, therefore, must be regarded as not yet ascertained. That the name Beeshterah should occur more than once, and therefore on Mount Hermon, is owing to the wide spread of the worship of Ashtarte through that region. So much the more difficult will it be to make out the situation of our city.

Vers. 28, 29. β. Four Cities in Issachar: Kishon (ch. xix. 20), Dabareh (ch. xix. 12), Jarmuth, En-gannim (ch. xix. 21).

Vers. 30, 31. γ. Four Cities in Asher: Mishal (ch. xix. 26), Abdon (ch. xix. 28), Helkath (ch. xix. 25), Rehob (ch. xix. 28).

Ver. 32. δ. Three Cities in Naphtali: Kedeah (ch. xix. 37), Hammoth-dor, called Hammath in ch. xix. 35, and Hammon in 1 Chron. vi. 61 (76), Kartan (כָּרְתָן), according to Keil contracted from כָּרְתָן = כָּרְתָן, 1 Chron. vi. 61 (76), like Dothan, 2 K. vi. 13, from Dothain, Gen. xxxvii. 17), not named among the cities of Naphtali. Knobel says: "Perhaps Katanah, with ruins, northeast from Safed," in Van de Velde, Mem. p. 147.

Ver. 33. Thirteen cities in all.

f. Vers. 34-42. The Cities of the Merarites. They acquired twelve cities (ver. 40), namely, four in the tribe of Zebulun (ver. 34), four in the tribe of Reuben (ver. 36), and four in the tribe of Gad; mostly therefore in eastern Palestine.

Vers. 34, 35. a. Four Cities in Zebulun: Jokneam (ch. xii. 32; xix. 11), Kartah (ch. xix. 15), Dimnah, perhaps אֲרִמְנָה (ch. xix. 13; 1 Chron. vi. 62). So Knobel and others. Keil questions the identity, because in the passage quoted from the Chronicles the text is undoubtedly corrupt, since it presents not four but only two cities, Rimmon and Tabor. Nahalal (ch. xix. 15). Instead of this Tabor, 1 Chron. vi. 62.

Vers. 36, 37. β. Four Cities in Reuben: Bezer (ch. xx. 8; Deut. iv. 43), Jahashah, Kedemoth, and Mephathth (ch. xiii. 18). Both verses are supported by the majority of Codd., are not wanting in the early translations, and correspond to the statements of vers. 7, 40, 41. When Rabbi Jacob ben Chasim omitted them in his great Rabbinic Bible of the year 1525, on the authority of the Masora, he proceeded altogether without right, cf. Knobel, p. 474; Keil, Bibl. Com. p. 155, Anm. 2; and Com. on Josh., p. 457, note; also De Rossi, Variae Lectiones, ad h. l., and J. H. Michaelis, note to his Heb. Bibl., ed. Halle (ap. Keil, l. c.).

Vers. 38, 39. γ. Four Cities in the Tribe of Gad: Ramoth in Gilead (ch. xx. 8; xiii. 26), Mahanaim (ch. xiii. 26), Heashbon (ch. xiii. 17), Jaser (ch. xiii. 25).

Ver. 40. Twelve cities in all.

Vers. 41, 42. End of the list of Levitical cities. There were forty-eight of them, as had been commanded, Num. xxxv. 6, and as is here again mentioned. Each one had its pasture-ground; עִיר עִיר, city city, i. e., each city according to the manner of distributive numerals, Gesenius, Gram. § 118, 5.

g. Vers. 42-45. Conclusion. He refers to what God had said to Joshua, ch. i. 2-6, when he directed him to take possession of the land.

Ver. 43. Jehovah gave Israel the land which he had sworn to their fathers (Gen. xii. 7; xv. 18; Num. xi. 12; xxxii. 11; Deut. xxxi. 21). And they possessed it, and dwelt therein. The same expression is used ch. xix. 47.

Ver. 44. And he gave them rest round about, as he likewise had sworn to their fathers (Ex. xxxiii. 14; Deut. iii. 20; xxv. 19). Their enemies could not stand against them, and although these were not yet entirely subjugated, as appears from Judg. i., they dared not enterprise against the Israelites while Joshua lived (Judg. ii. 6 ff.). As Rahab said to the spies (ii. 9), a terror had fallen on the Canaanites.

Ver. 45. The good words not one of which failed (פָּלַל, fell), i. e., remained unfulfilled (ch. xxiii. 14), are God's promises. Comp. on this in the New Testament, 2 Cor. i. 20, "God is in his promises truthful, and keeps them, only that we through unbelief and indifference ourselves stand in the way," Osiander.

SECTION THIRD.

THE RELEASE OF THE TWO AND A HALF TRANSJORDANIC TRIBES. JOSHUA'S FAREWELL DISCOURSE. HIS DEATH AND THAT OF ELEAZAR.

CHAPTERS XXII-XXIV.

1. The Release of the Two and a Half Transjordanic Tribes.

CHAPTER XXII.

a. Joshua's Parting Address.

CHAPTER XXII. 1-8.

1 THEN Joshua called the Reubenites, and the Gadites, and the half-tribe of Manasseh, And said unto them, Ye have kept all that Moses the servant of the Lord [Jehovah] commanded you, and have obeyed [hearkened to] my voice in all that I
3 commanded you: Ye have not left your brethren these many days unto this day, but [and] have kept the charge of [omit: of] the commandment of the Lord [Jehovah] your God. And now the Lord [Jehovah] your God hath given rest
4 unto your brethren, as he promised [spoke to] them: therefore [and] now return ye, and get you unto your tents, and [omit: and] unto [into] the land of your possession, which Moses the servant of the Lord [Jehovah] gave you on the other
5 side [of the] Jordan. But [Only] take diligent heed to do the commandment and the law, which Moses the servant of the Lord [Jehovah] charged [commanded] you, to love the Lord [Jehovah] your God, and to walk in all his ways, and to keep his commandments, and to cleave unto him, and to serve him with all your heart, and 6 with all your soul. So [And] Joshua blessed them, and sent them away; and they
7 went unto their tents. Now [And] to the one half of the tribe of Manasseh, Moses had given possession in Bashan: but [and] unto the other half thereof gave Joshua among their brethren on this [the other]<sup>1</sup> side [of the] Jordan westward. And [and also] when Joshua sent them away also [omit: also] unto their tents, then he 8 blessed them, And he [omit: he] spake unto them, saying, Return with much riches unto your tents, and with very much cattle, with silver, and with gold, and with brass, and with iron, and with very much raiment: divide the spoil of your enemies with your brethren.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[<sup>1</sup> Ver. 7. — מִן הַיַּרְדֵּן מֵעֵבֶר, ch. v. 1, except that the latter is defined by יַרְדֵּן; here it is "on (lit. out of) the other side" with reference to Bashan east of the Jordan, which has just been mentioned. — Tr.]

b. Return Homeward of the Two and a Half Tribes. Erection of an Altar on the Jordan.

CHAPTER XXII. 9, 10.

9 And the children [sons] of Reuben, and the children [sons] of Gad, and the half-tribe of Manasseh returned, and departed from the children [sons] of Israel out of Shiloh, which is in the land of Canaan, to go unto the country [into the land] of Gilead, to the land of their possession, whereof they were possessed [in which they had possessions], according to the word of the Lord [Jehovah] by the 10 hand of Moses. And when they came unto the borders of [into the circles<sup>1</sup> of the] Jordan, that are in the land of Canaan, the children [sons] of Reuben, and the children [sons] of Gad, and the half-tribe of Manasseh built there an altar by [the] Jordan, a great altar to see to [an altar great to behold].

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 10. — גִּלְיָוִת רִי, "circles, circuit, region;" see the exeg. note. That this district is said to have been in the "land of Canaan," which is in general strongly distinguished from the table-land east of the Jordan, certainly favors the supposition that the altar in question was erected on the west side of the river. Still everything else is against it, and we cannot but think that the recent commentators, against many of the older and against Josephus, have too readily assumed that it was so. It is in itself highly improbable that the Gileadites should have built an altar with their design on ground not belonging to them, where they could have no control over its safety, and where it is impossible to see how it could bear witness for them. And the expressions in ver. 11, אֶל־מִכְנֵי אֲרָץ פְּנֵי, "over against the land of Canaan," and אֶל־עֵקֶר פְּנֵי יִשְׂרָאֵל, both naturally point to the other side, and can only with a degree of violence be understood of a locality in the fullest sense within and of the land of Canaan. Consider further that there was no mention by the Israelites of simply destroying the altar, which would on this supposition be easy, and in their state of mind very natural (as indeed they would not have allowed it to be built without explanation on their territory), but that the ambassadors must pass over into Gilead to treat of the matter, and that there to all appearance the naming of the altar took place, and there will appear to be more reasons for the view of those who place the altar on the east bank of the Jordan than against it. May not the solution of the difficulty lie in the extension of the "land of Canaan," in ver. 10, so as to include the whole of the Ghor (ancient Arabah), overlooking the river, for the moment, as a boundary, and making the boundary between Canaan, the "low country," and Gilead to be the wall of eastern mountains which fences in the Jordan Valley? This being conceded, the phrase "over against," quasi "fronting," in ver. 11, and אֶל־עֵקֶר פְּנֵי יִשְׂרָאֵל (English version, "at the passage of," etc.), "to the other side with reference to the sons of Israel," might both be understood in their most usual sense. Certainly some notice ought to be taken of the probabilities for this opinion. — Tr.]

c. Embassy from Israel to the Two and a Half Tribes on account of the Altar.

CHAPTER XXII. 11-20.

- 11 And the children [sons] of Israel heard say, Behold, the children [sons] of Reuben, and the children [sons] of Gad, and the half-tribe of Manasseh, have built an [the] altar over against the land of Canaan,<sup>1</sup> in the borders [circles] of [the]
- 12 Jordan, at the passage of [opposite to] the children [sons] of Israel. And when the children [sons] of Israel heard of it, the whole congregation of the children [sons] of Israel gathered themselves together at Shiloh, to go up to war against
- 13 them. And the children [sons] of Israel sent unto the children [sons] of Reuben, and to the children [sons] of Gad, and to the half-tribe of Manasseh into the land
- 14 of Gilead, Phinehas the son of Eleazar the priest, And with him ten princes, of each chief house<sup>2</sup> a prince throughout [for] all the tribes of Israel; and each one was an [a] head of the house of their fathers [the head of their chief houses]<sup>2</sup> among the thousands of Israel.
- 15 And they came unto the children [sons] of Reuben, and to the children [sons] of Gad, and to the half-tribe of Manasseh, unto the land of Gilead, and they spake
- 16 with them, saying, Thus saith the whole [all the] congregation of the Lord [Jehovah], What trespass is this that ye have committed against the God of Israel, to turn away [return] this day from following the Lord [Jehovah], in that ye have
- 17 builded you an altar, that ye might rebel this day against the Lord [Jehovah]? Is the iniquity<sup>3</sup> of Peor too little for us, from which we are not cleansed until this day, although there was a plague [and the plague was] in the congregation of
- 18 the Lord [Jehovah], But that ye must turn away this day from following the Lord [Jehovah]? and it will be, seeing ye rebel to-day against the Lord [Jehovah], that to-morrow he will be wroth with the whole congregation of Israel.
- 19 Notwithstanding [And truly], if the land of your possession be [is] unclean, then [omit: then] pass ye over unto the land of the possession of the Lord [Jehovah] wherein the Lord's [Jehovah's] tabernacle dwelleth, and take possession among us: but rebel not against the Lord [Jehovah], nor rebel against us, in build-
- 20 ing you an altar beside the altar of the Lord [Jehovah] our God. Did not Achan the son of Zerah commit a trespass in the accursed thing [in what was devoted], and wrath fell on all the congregation of Israel? and that man perished not alone in his iniquity.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 11. — לָהּ, "is a place to which one has come;" comp. לָהּ, letter B, also Greek eis, εἰς for iv. In all this, however, the idea of motion is not wholly lost, namely, "a motion that preceded" (Gesen. Lex. p. 62 B). — Ta.]

[2 Ver. 14. — בֵּית אָבִי, "house of a father," and בֵּית אֲבוֹתָם, "house of the fathers," = father-house, father-houses. On the use of the genitive plural instead of the plural of the noun limited, see Gesen. Lex. s. v. בֵּית (11), p. 129. — Ta.]

[3 Ver. 17. — אֶת־עֲוֹנוֹ, prop. an adverbial acc., "in respect to" the iniquity, etc. The sense of the question is, "Had we not enough of the iniquity?" etc. Zuns's version appears to take the last member of the verse singularly, as giving a vivid designation of the time of the transgression: als die Sünde war, etc. "And" (1) need not be understood here as = "although," but more naturally in its proper sense: "and the plague [for which] was upon the congregation (not the particular sinners) of Jehovah." The next verse (18) then proceeds: And (nearly = and yet) ye are turning away this day from after Jehovah. Or, if we suppose a somewhat more free combination of clauses, than is often met with in this style of Hebrew writing, we may consider the two verses as making up a compound sentence, in which one question runs through to the end of the first member of ver. 18. We should then translate thus: Is the iniquity of Poor too little for us, from which we are not cleansed until this day, and [for which] the plague was on the congregation of Jehovah, — and are ye turning away this day from after Jehovah? And it will be (q. d., the result is) ye will rebel to-day against Jehovah, and to-morrow upon the whole congregation of Israel he will break forth." — Ta.]

d. Apology of the Two and a Half Tribes for Building the Altar.

CHAPTER XXII. 21-31.

- 21 Then [And] the children [sons] of Reuben, and the children [sons] of Gad, and the half-tribe of Manasseh answered, and said [spake] unto the heads of the thousands of Israel, The Lord God of gods, the Lord God of gods [God, God Jehovah, God, God Jehovah, or, the God of gods, Jehovah, etc.], he knoweth, and Israel he shall know; if it be [was] in rebellion, or [and] if in transgression [trespass] against the Lord [Jehovah], (save us not this day,) That we have built us an altar to turn [return] from following the Lord [Jehovah], or [and] if to offer thereon burnt-offering, or [and] meat-offering, or [and] if to offer [make] peace-offerings
- 24 thereon, let the Lord [Jehovah] require it; And if we have not rather [omit: rather] done it for fear of this thing [done this from concern, for a reason], saying, In time to come your children [sons] might [will] speak unto our children [sons], saying,
- 25 What have ye to do with the Lord [Jehovah] God of Israel? For [And] the Lord [Jehovah] hath made [the] Jordan a border between us and you, ye children [sons] of Reuben and children [sons] of Gad; ye have no part in the Lord [Jehovah]: So [And] shall your children [sons] make our children [sons] cease from fearing the Lord [Jehovah]. Therefore [And] we said, Let us now prepare to build us an altar [let us now do for ourselves to build the altar], not for burnt-offering,
- 27 nor for sacrifice: But that it may be a witness between us and you, and between our generations after us, that we might do the service of the Lord [Jehovah] before him with our burnt-offerings, and with our sacrifices, and with our peace-offerings; that your children [sons] may not say to our children [sons] in time to come, Ye have no part in the Lord [Jehovah]. Therefore [And] said we, that it shall be, when they should [shall] so say to us or [and] to our generations in time to come, that we may [will] say again [omit: again], Behold [See] the pattern of the altar of the Lord [Jehovah], which our fathers made, not for burnt-offerings, nor for sacrifices; but it is a witness between us and you. God forbid [Far be it from us] that we should rebel against the Lord [Jehovah], and turn this day from following the Lord [Jehovah], to build an altar for burnt offerings, and for meat-offerings, or [and] for sacrifices, beside the altar of the Lord [Jehovah] our God, that is before his tabernacle [dwelling].
- 30 And when Phinehas the priest, and the princes of the congregation, and heads of the thousands of Israel which were with him, heard the words that the children [sons] of Reuben, and the children [sons] of Gad, and the children [sons] of Manasseh spake, it pleased them [was good in their eyes]. And Phinehas the son of Eleazar the priest said unto the children [sons] of Reuben, and to the children [sons] of Gad, and to the children [sons] of Manasseh, This day we perceive that the Lord [Jehovah] is among us, because ye have not committed this trespass against the Lord [Jehovah]: now ye have delivered [then did ye deliver] the children [sons] of Israel out of the hand of the Lord [Jehovah].

e. Return of the Embassy. Naming of the Altar.

CHAPTER XXII. 32-34.

- 32 And Phinehas the son of Eleazar the priest, and the princes, returned from the children [sons] of Reuben, and from the children [sons] of Gad, out of the land of Gilead, unto the land of Canaan, to the children [sons] of Israel, and brought 33 them word again. And the thing pleased [was good in the eyes of] the children [sons] of Israel: and the children [sons] of Israel blessed God, and did not intend to go up [Heb. nearly: did not say they would go up] against them in battle, to destroy the land wherein the children [sons] of Reuben and [the sons of] Gad 34 dwelt. And the children [sons] of Reuben and the children [sons] of Gad called the altar Ed [Witness; or, more probably, omit: Ed]: for it shall be a witness [it is a witness] between us that the Lord [Jehovah] is God.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The author of chaps. xiii.-xxi. having given the report, distinguished by his valuable and accurate statements, of the division of the land, the appointment of the cities of refuge and the Levitical cities, relates to us in the three following chapters, which close the book, the release of the two and a half transjordanic tribes, transcribes Joshua's last discourses to the people, and finally gives account of his death and that of Eleazar.

Chap. xxii. itself falls naturally into the following smaller sections: (a.) Joshua's farewell discourse to the two and a half tribes, vers. 1-8; (b.) Return of these tribes to their home. Erection of an altar on the Jordan, vers. 9, 10; (c.) Embassy from Israel on account of this altar, vers. 11-20; (d.) The apology of the eastern tribes, vers. 21-31; (e.) Return of the embassy, vers. 32-34.

a. Vers. 1-8. Joshua's Farewell Discourse to the Two and a Half Tribes from across the Jordan. Joshua acknowledges their obedience to Moses and to his own commands (ver. 2), and further, that they had faithfully stood by their brethren and kept the commandment of God (ver. 3). As now Jehovah had given rest to the others, they might return to their tents in the land of their possession already given to them by Moses beyond the Jordan (ver. 4). To this he adds the admonition that they should continue to observe the commandment, to serve God in unchanging love, with their whole heart and their whole soul. Still further are they called upon to share their rich booty with their brethren (ver. 8). That he sent them away with his blessing is twice related (vers. 6 and 7 b). A geographical notice is inserted (ver. 7).

Ver. 1. <sup>א</sup>, almost certainly not immediately at the end of the war, but, from the connection in which this narrative occurs, and according to ver. 4, not until after the division of the land was completed.

Ver. 2. They have kept their obligations to Moses (Num. xxxii. 20 ff.) and to Joshua himself (ch. i. 16 ff.).

Ver. 3. Still further, they had kept what was to be kept, the commandment of Jehovah. On <sup>וַיִּשְׁמְרֵם מִצְוַת יְהוָה</sup>, vid. Gen. xxvi. 5; Lev. viii. 35.

Ver. 4. Comp. ch. i. 15, <sup>וַיִּשְׁמְרֵם מִצְוַת יְהוָה</sup>, vers. 9, 10; Gen. xxxvi. 43; Lev. xiv. 34; xxv. 24, and often.

Ver. 5 recalls Deut. iv. 2, 29; vi. 5; viii. 6. On the infin. form. <sup>וַיִּשְׁמְרֵם</sup>, cf. Gesen. § 133; Ewald, § 238 a; Knobel on Deut. i. 27.

Ver. 6 properly closes in its first half the account of the sending away of the two and a half tribes, while ver. 7 adds a notice which was given in a similar way ch. xiv. 3, xviii. 7, and was therefore not necessary. Keil, in his earlier commentary on Joshua, noticed it quite sharply. He says (p. 462), "in ver. 7 we find again a notice, characteristic of our author, as Maurer rightly observes, in which he, from a mere desire to be perfectly explicit, sometimes falls into redundancy and superfluous repetitions." He now (Bibl. Com. in loc.) says more mildly, "in ver. 7 the author, for the sake of perspicuity, inserts the repeated observation, that only half of Manasseh had received their inheritance at the hand of Moses in Bashan, while the other half, on the contrary, had received theirs through Joshua west of the Jordan, as in ch. xiv. 3 and xviii. 7. To us this repetition appears redundant; it agrees, however, with the fullness, abundant in repetitions, of the ancient Hebrew style of narrative." The second half of the verse now repeats what is known already from ver. 6.

Since it begins with the words <sup>וְכָל הָעָם</sup>, it would almost seem that something immediately preceding had fallen out or "been omitted."

Ver. 8 presents a continuation of the foregoing in the demand not previously made, that they should share the rich booty with their brethren. This booty consisted in cattle, silver, gold, brass, iron, and clothing, and these all in very large quantities (Ex. iii. 22; xi. 2; xii. 36). By the brethren are meant the members of their tribes who had remained at home, to whom, according to Num. iii. 27, one half belonged. Although we cannot, with Knobel, recognize three original elements of the section, namely, vers. 1-4 and 6 from the War-book, ver. 5 from the Deuteronomist, vers. 7, 8 from the Law-book, we may not suppress the remark that ver. 7 b. and 8 appear to have sprung from a different source, the statements of which are not fully communicated. Whoever put the finishing hand to the whole work, has added that portion of its contents which offered a new thought, as a valuable complement.

wherein they had taken possessions (MINE), as in Gen. xxxiv. 10; xlvii. 27; Num. xxxii. 30; prop., "wherein they had been held fast," or established themselves), according to the command of Jehovah by Moses. That they departed from Shiloh, favors the view that this return took place not till after the division of the land. From ver. 9 we see that only the country west of the Jordan is regarded as the land of Canaan; that on the east of that river is called here simply Gilead, although it embraced Gilead and Bashan, the kingdoms of Sihon and Og. The command of Jehovah by Moses, see Num. xxxii. 20 ff.

גִּלְיוֹת הַיַּרְדֵּן. As in ch. xiii. 2 and Joel iv. 4, the circles of the Philistines (הַפְּלִשְׁתִּים) or גִּלְיוֹת (גִּלְיוֹת) are mentioned, so here the הַיַּרְדֵּן (בֵּית הַיַּרְדֵּן), which, Gen. xiii. 10, 11; 1 K. vii. 47, are designated as הַיַּרְדֵּן (Matt. iii. 5, ἡ περὶ τοὺς τοφθάρους), then, Gen. xiii. 12; xix. 17, simply, as הַיַּרְדֵּן; now the Ghor. The west side of the Ghor is intended, as appears from the addition, which is in the land of Canaan, — on the west bank of the Jordan. Here they built an altar on the Jordan, an altar great to behold. Hebrew, גִּדּוֹל לְפָנָיו, i. e., an altar so high and broad that it could be seen from a great distance [or, great in appearance, great as compared with other altars, quasi "great-looking"]. Since Moses had once raised such an altar to commemorate his victory over Amalek (Ex. xvii. 15), they believed they were acting in good faith, as also they afterwards with a good conscience testify (ver. 24 ff.).

(צַדְיָמָל אֶרֶץ כְּנָעַן), i. e., on its eastern side, Knobel), in the circles of the Jordan (אֶרֶץ הַיַּרְדֵּן), i. e., in the Ghor), at the side of the sons of Israel (אֶרֶץ בְּנֵי יִשְׂרָאֵל), as in Ex. xxv. 37; xxxii. 15). It is the east side [Zunz: at the side (of the river) turned toward the children of Israel. But comp. Textual Note].

Ver. 12 repeats that the children of Israel had heard of this, but adds that the whole congregation of the children of Israel gathered themselves together at Shiloh, to overrun the two and a half tribes with war. Knobel regards this verse as an interpolation, and out of the War-book. It is noticeable, indeed, that the beginning of ver. 11 is repeated here, and that ver. 13 might perfectly well follow ver. 11. But, on the other hand, the verse contains nothing at all which could disturb the connection or would be improbable in itself, since in view of Lev. xvii. 8, 9 (comp. Ex. xx. 24) such an excitement appears so much the more intelligible, as the tabernacle had been a short time before (ch. xviii. 1) erected for the first time in and a half tribes ought not to have undertaken the building of this altar without the consent of Joshua, or of the high-priest."

according to Gesen. = brazen mouth, פֶּה־נְחָשׁ (הַשֵּׁת), son of Eleazar and one of the daughters of Putiel (Ex. vi. 25), is named (Num. xxv. 6 ff.) as zealous for discipline and morality in Israel, as a victorious leader of the people (Num. xxxi. 6 ff.) in the strife with the Midianites, and was therefore very well suited, on account of the high respect which he undoubtedly enjoyed, to be the head and spokesman of the embassy. Afterwards, he was, as related Judg. xx. 28, himself high priest. The ten princes who were sent with him represented the nine and a half tribes west of the Jordan, and in ver. 30 are called נְשֵׂאֵי הָעֵדָה קְשִׁיָּה. Each of them was head of a chief (father) house among the thousands of Israel. On the relation of the chief houses, or, as De Wette translates family houses (Stammhäuser), to the whole tribe, cf. ch. vii. 14, 16-18. The אֲלֵפֵי יִשְׂרָאֵל are the families of Israel, as appears from 1 Sam. x. 19, 21, where אֲלֵה is exchanged with מְשֻׁפְּחָה. The expression is often met with, e. g., Judg. vi. 15; Num. i. 16; x. 4; in our ch., ver. 30, and above all in the famous passage Mic. v. 1.

Vers. 15-20. The messengers come to the children of Reuben, and the rest, in the land of Gilead, and make to them earnest representations. As their speaker we have to imagine to ourselves Phinehas, the man of the brazen-mouth, whose words sound vehemently and as instinct with feeling. He assumes from the first that the altar was built mala fide by the two and a half tribes, that the question is one of rebellion against Jehovah (vers. 16, 22), and then asks whether the iniquity of Peor was not enough, of which the people were not yet purified, that they should call forth against them the wrath of Jehovah anew (vers. 17, 18). Rather, he admonishes them in the second part of his discourse, if the land of their possession seemed to them unclean, should the brother tribes cross over into the land of Jehovah's possession, where his dwelling was, and there take possession, but not rebel against Jehovah and apostatize by building them an altar besides the altar of Jehovah (ver. 19). With an impressive reference to the crime of Achan who perished not as an individual man, but likewise brought God's anger on the entire congregation, the noble zealot concludes his discourse (ver. 20).

Vers. 15, 16. What trespass is this—to turn away—that ye might rebel against Jehovah. The expressions here chosen are to be particularly noted: (1) פָּשָׁע, used ch. vii. 1 and ver. 20 with פָּ, of the thing, to commit a trespass in respect to something; but here with פָּ, of the person, and he the most exalted person, Jehovah; “to deal with him as he dealt with others.”

treacherously, with concealment, underhandedly," in consistency with the probable ground signification; "to cover," whence קָלַעַל, mantle. For strengthening, the substantive כִּזְעַל is added to the verb, as [ch. vii. 1] 1 Chron. v. 25; x. 13; 2 Chron. xii. 2. (2) לִשְׁכַּח מִן־יְהוָה, as vers. 23, 29 (cf. ch. xxiii. 12), to turn away from Jehovah. In that consists the treacherousness in general, that they turn away from Jehovah. But since they have so far forgotten themselves as even to build an altar, so (3) the strongest expression is chosen, namely, קָלַעַל, to be disobedient, refractory, to rebel (Gen. xiv. 4; 2 K. xviii. 7, 20; xxiv. 1), first, against human rulers, as the passages quoted show, but here, as in Ezek. ii. 3; Dan. ix. 9, against Jehovah.

Ver. 17. Is the iniquity of Peor too little for us? That is, the iniquity which we committed (Num. xxv. 3; xxxi. 16) in the worship of Baal Peor, consisting in the offering of young maidens (Winer, Realw., art. Baal [Smith's Bibl. Dict.]). At that time twenty-four thousand of the people died as a punishment. To the zeal of Phinehas the people owed the cessation of the plague (Num. xxv. 9-12). Of him God said to Moses, "he has turned away my anger from the children of Israel" (Num. xxv. 11). So much the more remarkable must it appear that Phinehas himself here still designates the iniquity as one from which we are not cleansed until this day. He is thinking, perhaps, that, as in his opinion the case of the two and a half tribes shows, the inclination to idolatry still exists among the Jews. So explained already, after the example of R. Levi ben Gerson, C. a Lapide, and Clericus: "A quo nondum satis abhorremus; multi enim videntur fuisse, qui nondum delicti magnitudinem intelligebant." Vid Prov. xx. 9. "Non deerant etiam, qui clam Cananeorum et Chaldaeorum deos colerent, ut liquet ex oratione Josue, cap. xxiv. 14, 23" (ap. Keil, Com. on Josh. in loc.). With this agree Keil and Knobel.

Ver. 18. And ye turn away this day from following Jehovah. The sense is: so little do you think of that plague which once came upon the congregation, that you are to-day ready again to turn away from Jehovah [comp. Textual and Gram. Note].

And it will be, since ye rebel . . . will be wroth. The construction is the same as in Gen. xxxiii. 13, אָמַם הַמָּרְדִּי = אָמַם אֶת. Meaning: "Consider well, for if you rebel to-day against Jehovah, to-morrow he will be angry with the whole congregation of Israel." The judgment of God comes quickly, and it comes not alone on the two and a half tribes, but upon the whole people. In the latter circumstance lies, for Phinehas, at the same time, a sort of warrant for his speaking so earnestly to his transjordanic countrymen.

Ver. 19. Proceeding in a milder tone, Phinehas proposes to them, that if their land seemed unclean to them they should go over to the others in the land where Jehovah has his dwelling, only they should build no separate altar. Knobel: "And, indeed (וְעַתָּה), as Gen. xxvi. 9; xxix. 14; xlv. 28), if the land which they have taken were unclean, they could cross over into the land of Jehovah's possession, where the dwelling of Jehovah had its seat (שָׁכַן), as ch. xviii. 1), and there settle; only they should not, through such building of a special altar besides the true altar of Jehovah, rebel against the Lord, and bring their brethren into hostility, i.e., draw down mischief on the whole people from God."

If the land . . . be unclean, etc., i. e., because Jehovah had not his abode there, and because many heathen dwelt among them.

Land of your possession . . . land of the possession of Jehovah. The antithesis is worthy of careful notice. כִּלְכֵּל, with the accus. as Job xxiv. 13, כִּלְכֵּל אֶדֶר.

Ver. 20. Finally, Phinehas reminds them of the crime of Achan (ch. vii. 1 ff.), which was yet fresh in memory, and which, as once the iniquity of Peor, had involved in its consequences, not only the particular man, but also his children (ch. vii. 24), and, through the unfortunate attack on Ai (ch. vii. 1-5), the entire people. Keil: "Phinehas argues a minore ad majus. Yet the antithesis of minus and maius is not, with Calvin, to be sought in the clandestinum unius hominis maleficium and the manifesta idololatria, but to be understood with Masius, thus: 'Si Achan cum fecisset sacrilegium, non solus est extinctus, sed indignatus est Deus universae ecclesiae, quid futurum existimatis, si vos, tantus hominum numerus, tam graviter peccaveritis in Deum'" (p. 381).

d. Vers. 21-31. Defense of the Two and a Half Tribes against the Reproach on Account of this Altar. With a solemn appeal to God, and that as the God Jehovah, whom Israel worshipped, these tribes declare that they have built the altar, not in treachery, to turn away from Jehovah and establish a new worship (vers. 21-23), but rather from solicitude lest the posterity of those who dwelt in Canaan proper should say to their posterity: You have no part in Jehovah! and should so restrain their children from worshipping Him. This had led them to think of building an altar, not as an altar of sacrifice, but as a witness to their common worship of Jehovah, even to future generations, that, if ever the case before supposed should occur, they might point to this altar fashioned after the pattern of the altar of Jehovah (vers. 26-28). In conclusion, they again repeat that rebellion or apostasy was furthest from their thoughts (ver. 29). With this frank reply, evidently springing from a good conscience, Phinehas and the princes declare themselves satisfied; for to-day have they learned that Jehovah is among them, from whose hand the children of Reuben, Gad, and Manasseh have saved Israel (vers. 30, 31).

Vers. 21-23. The answer of the Eastern tribes begins with much solemnity: God (יְהוָה), God Jehovah (יְהוָה יְהוָה), God (יְהוָה), God Jehovah (יְהוָה יְהוָה), he knoweth it (יָדַעַתְּ), and let Israel also know. "The combination of the three names of God, יְהוָה, the strong, יְהוָה, the Supreme Being worthy to be feared, and יְהוָה, He who truly is, the covenant God (ver. 22) serves, as in Ps. l. 1, to strengthen the appeal, which is intensified by the repetition of the three names" (Keil).

If it be in rebellion, etc. The apodosis to this follows at the close of ver. 23, let Jehovah require it. Interpolated into the asseveration is the imprecation, proceeding from an excited feeling, and addressed immediately to God, save us not this day! This day, הַיּוֹם הַזֶּה = to-day. He should to-day not help them, to-day not stand by them, to-day forsake them if they have reared the altar in rebellion or in trespass. Knobel: "In case of our unfaithfulness, help thou us not in our present trouble, but leave us to destruction! A parenthetic clause, in which the excited feeling passionately invoking evil upon itself passes into the appeal to God." On the different kinds of sacrifice, in vers. 23 and 27, see Winer, Realw., art. "Opfer"; Herzog, Realenc. x. 614 ff. [Smith's Dict. of the Bible, art. "Sacrifice"].

Vers. 24, 25. And if not rather from anxiety, for a reason, we have done this thing, saying, etc. From anxiety, מִדָּאָנְיָהּ, from דָּאָנָה, to fear, to be concerned, 1 Sam. ix. 5; x. 2; Ps. xxxviii. 19. The substantive occurs Ezek. iv. 16; xii. 18, 19;

Jer. xlix. 23; Prov. xii. 25. — For a reason, מִדָּבָר, comp. ch. v. 4, as also עַל דָּבָר, Gen. xii. 17; xx. 11. — Saying, i. e., saying to themselves, and so = thinking.

Ver. 25. יָרָא. "This infin. form, instead of the shortened, לָרָא, 1 Sam. xviii. 29, has analogies in יָצָא, Ezek. xxiv. 3, and לִישׁוֹן, Cant. v. 11, whereas in the Pentateuch only יָרָאָה is used" (Keil). The anxiety was not unfounded, in so far as in the promises only Canaan was spoken of, therefore only the land west of the Jordan according to the clear signification of ver. 10. Comp. Gen. xii. 7; xiii. 15; xv. 18; xvii. 8, and in particular, Num. xxxiv. 1-12.

Vers. 26-28. Let us now do for ourselves to build the altar, not . . . but that it may be a witness, etc., נִצָּנְתָה לָנוּ לְבָנוֹת. Either to be taken, according to the examples cited by Knobel, Gen. ii. 3; xxx. 30, as we have aimed to express it in our translation, or as Keil prefers: "We will make us to build an altar (an expression out of the language of common life for: We will build us an altar)." Both explanations afford a good and apposite sense; which Luther renders with pregnant brevity: "Lasset uns einen altar bilden" (let us build an altar), doubtless following the Vulg.: "Exstruamus nobis altare." The LXX. refer the נִצָּנְתָה not to the building in itself, but to the design of the altar to be built: καὶ εἰσάμεν ποιῆσαι, οὗτος τοῦ οικοδομησάι τὸν βωμὸν τούτων, οὐκ ἔνεκεν μαρτυρίαν . . . ἀλλ' ἵνα ᾖ μαρτύριον τοῦτο, etc.

Ver. 27. The altar, therefore, should serve not for sacrifices, but to be a witness (cf. Ex. xvii. 15) between the generations on both sides, in the present and future times, that we might do [or that we do] the service of Jehovah before Him (לִפְנֵי) (לְעֵבֶד אֶת־יְהוָה) with our burnt-offerings, etc. The offerings were not to be made upon this altar, but before Him, before Jehovah, in Canaan. There would they perform the service of Jehovah.

Ver. 28. Simply for that should the altar be built after the pattern of the altar in the Tabernacle, that it might be a witness to which posterity also might point. תִּבְנֶינָה from בָּנָה, is the model, Ex. xxv. 9, 40; 2 K. xvi. 10, after which anything is built; but then also here, as Deut. iv. 16-18; Ezek. viii. 10, copy, image of anything. This sense is expressed by the LXX. quite correctly by ὁμοίωμα, by Luther by "likeness." The Vulgate does not translate תִּבְנֶינָה; De Wette's Bau (structure) is too indefinite.

Ver. 29. Another asseveration of their innocence. "The speakers conclude with the expression of their horror at the idea of forsaking Jehovah, הֲיִלֵּיָה לָנוּ מִיְהוָה, far be it to us from Him, i. e., from God (מִיְהוָה = מִיְהוָה, 1 Sam. xxiv. 7; xxvi. 11; 1 K. xxi. 3), that we should rebel against Jehovah," etc. ["The sense is: 'profane or accursed be it from Jehovah,' God forbid, LXX., μή γένοιτο; or, the primary signification being neglected; 'woe to me' [or us] 'from Jehovah,'" etc., Gesen. in v., הֲיִלֵּיָה].

Ver. 30. It was good in their eyes, namely, in the eyes of the ambassadors, who had heard these words of the two and a half tribes. The sense of בְּעֵינֵיהֶם is very correctly given by the LXX. by καὶ ἡρεσεν αὐτοῖς.

Ver. 31. In his explanation Phinehas gives the glory to God alone, when he says: This day we perceive that Jehovah is among us, because (וְהָיָה, in this sense, as Gen. xxx. 18; xxxi. 49; xxxiv. 13, 27; Eccl. iv. 9; viii. 11, more completely וְהָיָה וְלֹא־נִשְׁכַּח) ye have not committed this trespass against Jehovah. God himself, as Phinehas rightly assumes, hindered that. Now (אָז) before conclusions = then or now, Job ix. 31; Prov. ii. 5; Ps. cxix. 92) have ye rescued Israel from the hand of Jehovah. "On הַצִּיל מִיָּד, comp. Gen. xxxvii. 21; Ex. ii. 19" (Knobel). This was realized in so far as otherwise a punishment like that in Num. xxv. 8 would have again fallen on the whole people.

e. Vers. 32-34. Return of the Embassy. Naming of the Altar. Phinehas and the princes return from the land of Gilead to Canaan, and bring back word which is universally acceptable, so that the people thank God, and all thought of going to war against the eastern tribes is dropped (vers. 32, 33). The chapter concludes with the mention that the children of Reuben and Gad had named the altar: It is a witness between us that Jehovah is God (ver. 34). In ver. 32 the children of Reuben and Gad alone are named, and so in ver. 34, merely for brevity's sake.

Ver. 34. By the giving of this name the two and a half tribes distinctly professed themselves worshippers of Jehovah as the true God. The first כִּי stands like the Greek ὅτι, as sign of the quotation of direct discourse (cf. Gen. iv. 23; xxix. 33; Ruth i. 10; 1 Sam. x. 19), and is therefore not to be translated.

THEOLOGICAL AND ETHICAL.

1. As Israel was to honor only one God, Jehovah, who truly was (Ex. iii. 14; xx. 2), so should there be in Israel only one place of sacrifice (Lev. xvii. 1-9); for to the שְׂעִירִים (Lev. xvii. 7), prop. goats, then, probably, shepherd deities, whose worship the apostate Jeroboam, according to 2 Chron. xi. 15, brought in again with that of the calves, to these they should not sacrifice. Considering the strong inclination of the people to turn aside to heathenish idolatry, which had shown itself repeatedly (Ex. xxxii; Num. xxv.) on their march through the wilderness, the leaders of Israel must have felt, now that the people had received their dwelling-place, and the tabernacle been reared at Shiloh, and the land divided, the supreme necessity of establishing the unity of the worship. This could be truly instituted with a people that needed to be educated through the law (Gal. iv. 23, 24), only by absolutely prohibiting the offering of sacrifices on any other altar than the altar in the tabernacle. One God, one house of God among the one people chosen by him: one altar of sacrifice before the door of this one habitation, — all this belonged together in the Old Testament, precisely as in the New, one Lord, one faith, one baptism, one God and Father of all (Eph. iv. 5, 6).

1 [Perhaps, rather, simply: "then (sc., when ye adopted the pious course)." — Tr.]

2. The zeal which animated a Phinehas already once before (Num. xxv.), and now again, was a holy zeal for the honor of God, manifestly springing from a deep moral aversion to the shameful Peor-worship which threatened to bring Israel into destruction. Altogether in the same spirit as Phinehas, Elijah acted at a later period (1 K. xviii.). If this involved the shedding of blood, we must consider that, according to Lev. xvii. 4, idolatry was regarded exactly as if a murder had been committed, and was therefore to be punished with death. The spirit of Jewish zealotry, as it was developed at the time of the destruction of the city by Titus, was a caricature of that which Phinehas and Elijah cherished. How Christ stood related to it appears from the account of the purification of the Temple (John ii. 13 ff.; Matt. xxi. 12 ff.; Mark xi. 15 ff.), which teaches us how in Him holy zeal was blended with temperate self-restraint (John ii. 15, 16), as an impressive admonition to blind zeal in all ages. True, holy zeal is in all respects different from the wild excited passion of fanaticism. That resembles the flame which purifies the noble metal from the dross, this is the torch which, wherever it is hurled, sets all in flames, destroys everything, not in majorem Dei gloriam, but in majorem insanie gloriam. If our times in ecclesiastical matters show again a very strong tendency to that false zealotry, this sign of the times is to be esteemed one of the worst, a sign in which no one will conquer, but many certainly perish.

3. How a good conscience might appeal to God, the two and a half tribes show in their reply to the ambassadors of Israel. On the ground and foundation of Christianity also, the same appeal is still allowable, as the asseverations employed by Christ and his Apostles prove, comp. e. g., John iii. 5; v. 24, 25; vi. 53; xiii. 16, 21; Luke xxiii. 43; Rom. i. 9; ix. 1, 3; Phil. i. 8. Such affirmations are not thoughtlessly ejaculated assertions, but they spring immediately from the temper of the soul filled with the spirit of God, which temper they evince.

4. To have no part in the Lord is the worst thing which can befall a people, a congregation, an individual. How deeply Peter once felt this we learn from John xiii. 8, 9.

5. In all that men do or leave undone constantly to recognize the hand of the Lord, therefore the control of his providence (ver. 31), is an altogether peculiar result of earnest religious meditation. The eye of the ancient Israelites for this, as the passage before us shows, and 1 Sam. iii. 8 very impressively, was sharpened in an unusual degree. The more clearly this ultimate causality of God is discerned, so much the more intelligible appears to us all human history, and that as the hypothesis of divine control and human conduct, or of divine appointment and human freedom.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

The release of the brother tribes from Gilead, by Joshua. (1) How he acknowledges the fraternal help which had been afforded; (2) admonishes to faithful compliance with the commands of God; (3) dismisses them, with his blessing, to their tents (vers. 1-8). — The return of the tribes to the country east of the Jordan, and the erection of the altar on the border of Canaan (vers. 9, 10). — Israel's embassy to their brethren beyond the Jordan, (1) occasion (vers. 11-14); (2) the message of Phinehas and the princes (vers. 15-20); (3) the answer to this (vers. 21-31); (4) the return of the messengers (vers. 31-33). — Phinehas the holy zealot for the honor of God (vers. 15-20, with appropriate and skillful use of Num. xxv. 1 ff. — So let the whole congregation of the Lord say to you — a powerful, solemn word (ver. 16)! — How people with a good conscience speak. (1) They may appeal to God as their witness; (2) they may, however, also state clearly and frankly what they have done, without being obliged to conceal anything (vers. 21-31). — Monuments of historical events are dumb and yet eloquent witnesses (ver. 28 compared with vers. 9, 10, and 34). — How brethren can understand each other (vers. 30, 31). — To-day we perceive that the Lord is among us! Can we not also frequently say so, when God keeps us that we commit no trespass against Him (vers. 31). — A joyful return home (vers. 32, 33). — What joy good tidings may spread abroad (ver. 33). — In all things be the honor God's (ver. 33, comp. Ps. cxv. 1).

STARKE: It is not enough to begin well, but we must also continue in that way and persevere even to the end, Heb. iii. 12, 14; Matt. x. 22; xxiv. 13. — When God releases us from our service we may go but not before, Ps. xxxi. 16; xxxix. 5; Luke ii. 29. — A Christian zeal for religion is not wrong. — It is certainly allowable in important cases, with moderation to answer, and with adjuration by the name of God to manifest truth and innocence. — Altars and images are not in themselves wrong and forbidden: only we must not practice superstition with them, 2 K. xviii. 4.

OSIANDER: By this it is manifest and known that we love God if we keep his commandments, John xiv. 23; xv. 14. — Whenever we hear concerning Christian believers that they stand fast in the faith, we ought to thank God for such a benefit [1 Thess. i. 1-3; ii. 6-9]. — We should, as far as possible, guard beforehand that none be offended (ver. 34).

HEDINGER: Precipitate blood-thirstiness is not consistent with true religion; for how can he who himself would not break the bruised reed, allow us either to bruise that which is whole, or break that which is bruised, or burn up the broken? Is. xliii. 3. — In cases which are ambiguous and uncertain, it is better to let the judgment stand suspended than to act contrary to love, 1 Cor. xiii. 7. — As good householders plant trees of which only their children and children's children will eat the fruit, and sit under the shadow, so should Christian parents strive still more earnestly that true godliness may be propagated to their children.

2. Joshua's Parting with the People. His Death and that of Eleazar.

CHAPTERS XXIII., XXIV.

a. The First Parting Address.

CHAPTER XXIII.

a. Promise that Jehovah will still fight for his people, and help them to the complete possession of the land.

CHAPTER XXIII. 1-11.

1 And it came to pass, a long time [many days]<sup>1</sup> after that the Lord [Jehovah] had given rest unto Israel from all their enemies round about, that Joshua waxed
 2 old and stricken in age. And<sup>2</sup> Joshua called for<sup>3</sup> [omit: for] all Israel, and [omit: and] for their elders, and for their heads, and for their officers [overseers], and said unto them, I am old and [omit: and] stricken in age [far gone in years]:
 3 And ye have seen all that the Lord [Jehovah] your God hath done unto all these nations because of you; for the Lord [Jehovah] your God is he that hath fought
 4 for you. Behold [See], I have divided unto you by lot these nations that remain, to be an inheritance [as a possession] for your tribes; from [the] Jordan, with 5 [and] all the nations that I have cut off, even unto [and] the great sea westward [toward the going down of the sun]. And the Lord [Jehovah] your God, he shall expel them from before you,<sup>4</sup> and drive them from out of your sight;<sup>4</sup> and ye shall possess their land, as the Lord [Jehovah] your God hath promised [spoken] unto 6 you. Be ye therefore very courageous [And be ye, or, ye shall be, very strong] to keep and to do all that is written in the book of the law of Moses, that ye turn
 7 not aside therefrom to the right hand or [and] to the left; That ye come not among these nations, these that remain among [with] you; neither make mention of the name<sup>5</sup> of their gods, nor cause to swear by them [it], neither serve them, nor bow
 8 yourselves unto them: But cleave unto the Lord [Jehovah] your God, as ye have 9 done unto this day. For [And] the Lord [Jehovah] hath driven out from before you great nations and strong: but as for [and] you, no man hath been able 10 to stand [hath stood] before you unto this day. One man of you shall chase [chaseth] a thousand: for the Lord [Jehovah] your God, he it is that fighteth for 11 you, as he hath promised [spoken] unto you. Take [And take] good heed therefore [omit: therefore] unto yourselves [your souls], that ye love the Lord [Jehovah] your God.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 1. מִיָּמִיִּם, prop. after, or following, many days. This is taken by our version rather as modifying the following clause, "at the end of many days after," etc., than as parallel to it (De Wette, Fay), and meaning the same thing: "after many days, after Jehovah had given," etc. The latter is preferable. — Tr.]

[2 Ver. 2. וַיִּקְרָא] should introduce the apodosis to ver. 1, and the translation be (ver. 1), "and it came to pass . . . after that Jehovah . . . and Joshua was old, far gone in years (ver. 2), that Joshua called all Israel," etc. — Tr.]

[3 Ver. 2. Lit. "called to," but the "to" is superfluous in consistency with the usage generally; so that "for" should be omitted throughout this verse. — Tr.]

[4 Ver. 5. Our version rightly, although perhaps too strongly marks the variety in מִצְרַיִם and מִצְרַיִם, which De Wette and Fay neglect. — Tr.]

[5 Ver. 7. לֹא תִשָּׁבַח. To indicate exactly the construction of the prep. בְּ with both verbs, is scarcely possible in English. We have to adopt some such substitute as, "and not make mention of, and not cause to swear by the name of their gods." — Tr.]

β. Warning against Apostasy from God.

CHAPTER XXIII. 12-16.

12 Else [For] if ye do in any wise go back [return], and cleave unto the remnant of these nations, even [omit: even] these that remain among [with] you, and shall

- make marriages with them, and go in unto them, and they to you [and come among them, and they among you]:<sup>1</sup> Know for a certainty that the Lord [Jehovah] your God will no more drive out any of [omit: any of] these nations from before you: but [and] they shall be snares [a snare] and traps [a trap] unto you, and scourges [a scourge] in your sides, and thorns in your eyes, until ye perish from off this good land [ground אֶרֶץ] which the Lord [Jehovah] your God hath given you.
- 14 And behold, this day I am going the way of all the earth; and ye know in all your hearts and in all your souls, that not one thing [word] hath failed of all the good things [words] which the Lord [Jehovah] your God spake concerning you; all are come to pass unto you, and [omit: and] not one thing [word] hath failed thereof. Therefore [And] it shall come to pass, that as all good things are [every good word is] come upon you, which the Lord [Jehovah] your God promised [spoke to] you; so shall the Lord [Jehovah] bring upon you all evil things [every evil word], until he have destroyed you from off this good land [ground] which the Lord
- 16 [Jehovah] your God hath given you. When ye have transgressed [transgress] the covenant of the Lord [Jehovah] your God, which he commanded you, and have gone and served [go and serve] other gods, and bowed [bow] yourselves to them; then shall the anger of the Lord [Jehovah] be kindled against you, and ye shall perish quickly from off the good land which he hath given unto you.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[<sup>1</sup> Ver. 12. The idea is that of general intercourse. The verb "come" is used for brevity's sake, instead of saying fully: "and you go among them and they come among you." — Ta.]

b. The Second Parting Address. Renewal of the Covenant. Conclusion.

CHAPTER XXIV.

a. The Second Parting Address.

CHAPTER XXIV. 1-15.

- 1 And Joshua gathered all the tribes of Israel to Shechem, and called for [omit: for<sup>1</sup>] the elders of Israel, and for their heads and for their judges, and for their
- 2 officers [overseers]; and they presented themselves before God. And Joshua said unto all the people, Thus saith the Lord [Jehovah] God of Israel, Your fathers dwelt on the other side of the flood [river] in old time, even [omit: even] Terah, the
- 3 father of Abraham, and the father of Nachor; and they served other gods. And I took your father Abraham from the other side of the flood [river], and led him throughout all the land of Canaan, and multiplied his seed, and gave him Isaac.
- 4 And I gave unto Isaac Jacob and Esau: and I gave unto Esau mount Seir, to possess it; but [and] Jacob and his children [sons] went down into Egypt. I sent [And I sent] Moses also [omit: also] and Aaron, and I plagued Egypt, according to that
- 6 which I did among them: and afterward I brought you out. And I brought your fathers out of Egypt: and ye came unto the sea; and the Egyptians pursued after
- 7 your fathers with chariots and horsemen unto the Red Sea. And when they cried unto the Lord [Jehovah], he put darkness between you and the Egyptians, and brought the sea upon them, and covered them; and your eyes have seen [saw] what I have done [did] in Egypt: and ye dwelt in the wilderness a long season [many
- 8 days]. And I brought you into the land of the Amorites [Amorite], which [who] dwelt on the other side [of the] Jordan; and they fought with you: and I gave them into your hand, that ye might possess [or, and ye possessed] their land; and I destroyed them from before you. Then [And] Balak the son of Zippor, king of Moab, arose and warred [fought<sup>2</sup>] against Israel, and sent and called Balaam the son of
- 10 Beor to curse you: But I would not hearken unto Balaam; therefore [and] he blessed you still:<sup>3</sup> so [and] I delivered you out of his hand. And ye went over [the] Jordan, and came unto Jericho: and the men of Jericho fought against you, the Amorites,<sup>4</sup> and the Perizzites, and the Canaanites, and the Hittites, and the
- 11 Gergashites, the Hivites, and the Jebusites, and I delivered [gave] them into your

- 12 hand. And I sent the hornet before you, which [and it] drove them out from before you, even the [omit: even the] two kings of the Amorites: but [omit: but] not with thy sword, nor with thy bow. And I have given you a land for [or, in] which ye did not labor, and cities which ye built not, and ye dwell in them; of the vineyards and olive-yards [trees] which ye planted not do ye eat. Now therefore [And now] fear the Lord [Jehovah], and serve him in sincerity and in truth; and put away the gods which your fathers served on the other side of the flood [river], and in Egypt; and serve ye the Lord [Jehovah]. And if it seem evil unto you to serve the Lord [Jehovah], choose you this day whom ye will serve, whether the gods which your fathers served that were on the other side of the flood [river] or the gods of the Amorites [Amorite] in whose land ye dwell: but as for me [and I] and my house, we [omit: we] will serve the Lord [Jehovah].

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 1. Omit "for" throughout this verse as ch. xxiii. 2. — Tn.]

[2 Ver. 9. לִמְלָחָה, although capable of meaning "to war," "wage war," is, with one exception, translated throughout our book, "to fight." — Tn.]

[3 Ver. 10. The emphatic force of the infin. abs. here might be variously expressed: "he kept blessing you;" "he must ain bless you;" "he did nothing but bless you." Equivalent is the intent of "he blessed you still."

[4 Ver. 11. These names are all singular in the Hebrew throughout the verse, and are best so read in English.

β. The Renewal of the Covenant.

CHAPTER XXIV. 16-28.

- 16 And the people answered and said, God forbid [Far be it from us] that we should forsake the Lord [Jehovah], to serve other gods; For the Lord [Jehovah] our God, he it is that brought us up, and our fathers, out of the land of Egypt, from [out of] the house of bondage [lit. of bondmen], and which [who] did those great signs in our sight, and preserved us in all the way wherein we went, and among all the people [peoples] through whom we passed: And the Lord [Jehovah] drove out from before us all the people [peoples], even [and] the Amorites [Amorite] which [who] dwelt in the land: therefore [omit: therefore] will we also [we also will] serve the Lord [Jehovah]; for he is our God.
- 19 And Joshua said unto the people, Ye cannot serve the Lord [Jehovah]: for he is an holy God: he is a jealous God; he will not forgive your transgressions, nor [and] your sins. If [when] ye forsake the Lord [Jehovah], and serve strange gods, then he will turn and do you hurt, and consume you, after that he hath done you good.
- 21 And the people said unto Joshua, Nay; but we will serve the Lord [Jehovah].
- 22 And Joshua said unto the people, Ye are witnesses against yourselves that ye have chosen you the Lord [Jehovah], to serve him. And they said, We are witnesses.
- 23 Now therefore [And now], said he, put away the strange gods which are among you, and incline your heart unto the Lord [Jehovah] God of Israel. And the people said unto Joshua, The Lord [Jehovah] our God will we serve, and [to] his voice will we obey [hearken].
- 25 So [And so] Joshua made a covenant with the people that day, and set them a statute and an ordinance in Shechem. And Joshua wrote these words in the book of the law of God, and took a great stone, and set it up there under an [the] oak that was by [in] the sanctuary of the Lord [Jehovah]. And Joshua said unto all the people, Behold, this stone shall be a witness [for witness לְעֵדוּת] unto [against ver. 22] us; for it hath heard all the words of the Lord [Jehovah] which he spake [hath spoken] unto [with] us: it shall be therefore [, and shall be] a witness unto [against] you, lest ye deny your God. So [And] Joshua let the people depart, every man [one] unto his inheritance [possession].

γ. Death of Joshua and Eleazar. The Bones of Joseph.

CHAPTER XXIV. 29-33.

- 29 And it came to pass after these things, that Joshua the son of Nun the servant 30 of the Lord [Jehovah] died, being an hundred and ten years old. And they buried him in the border of his inheritance [possession] in Timnath-serah, which is in 31 mount Ephraim, on the north side of the hill of [of mount] Gaash. And Israel served the Lord [Jehovah] all the days of Joshua, and all the days of the elders that over-lived [lit. prolonged days after] Joshua, and which [who] had known [knew] all the works of the Lord [Jehovah] that he had done for Israel.
- 32 And the bones of Joseph, which the children [sons] of Israel brought up out of Egypt, buried they in Shechem, in a parcel of ground [portion of the field] which Jacob bought of the sons of Hamor the father of Shechem for an hundred pieces of silver [kesita]; and it became the inheritance of [they were for a possession to] the children [sons] of Joseph.
- 33 And Eleazar the son of Aaron died; and they buried him in a hill that pertained to [in Gibeah of] Phinehas his son, which was given him in mount Ephraim.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

These two closing chapters of the book are intimately related, containing the two farewell addresses of Joshua to the people, an account of the renewal of the covenant in connection with the latter of those addresses, and the report of the death of Joshua and Eleazar. They give information also concerning the last transactions of Joshua, and the closing circumstances of his life so full of activity, and so significant with reference to the establishment of the religious character of the people of Israel.

Particularly to be considered here, from the first, is the relation between the two farewell addresses in respect to differences and agreement of their subject-matter; and manifestly, the first presents to the Israelites what Jehovah will do for them to bring them into full possession of the land, while the second in powerful words calls to mind in detail what Jehovah, since the time of the patriarchs, has already done for them. Admonitions to fidelity towards Jehovah, warnings against backsliding from him, are found in both addresses (ch. xxiii. 6, 7, 8, 11, 12, 13, 15, 16; xxiv. 14, 15), and are repeated, at the renewal of the covenant, in a lively dialogue between Joshua and the people (ch. xxiv. 19, 20, 27).

a. Ch. xxiii. The First Farewell Discourse. This, after the introduction, vers. 1, 2, falls into two sections, vers. 3-11 and 12-16. a. In the first section Joshua announces that Jehovah will continue to fight for his people, and help them to the entire possession of their land; β. in the second he warns them vehemently against apostasy from him, lest, instead of help, the judgment of God, consisting in their expulsion from Canaan, shall come upon them.

Vers. 1, 2. Introduction, recalling ch. xiii. 1, as well as ch. xxi. 42. Where Joshua held this discourse, is not said; perhaps at his residence in Timnath-serah (ch. xix. 50), perhaps, and this is more probable, at Shiloh. He first begins by reminding them that he is become old, but that they have seen all that Jehovah has done to all these nations before them, for he has fought for them. Of his own merits toward Israel the modest hero boasts not a word. He only remarks (ver. 4) that he has divided by lot for them the remaining nations also, from the Jordan, and all the nations which I have cut off, and the great sea toward the going down of the sun. The sense is, In the country lying between the Jordan on the east and the great sea on the west, have I distributed to you by lot as well the still remaining peoples, therefore to be driven out (comp. ch. xvii. 15), as those already destroyed (comp. ch. xi. 12), that you may possess their land.

Ver. 5. These nations, viz., the בְּנֵי הַנִּשְׁכָּרִים, will Jehovah himself expel, thrust out (הִדְרִיכָם), comp. Deut. vi. 19; ix. 14, likewise used of the expulsion of the Canaanites) before them, and drive them off (הִדְרִיכָם), and they (the Israelites) shall possess the land (ch. i. 15) as Jehovah has spoken (ch. xiii. 6; Ex. xxiii. 23 ff.). That will Jehovah do, as is afterward repeated in ver. 10. But they must, as Joshua admonishes, ver. 8, be very strong to keep and to do all that is written in the book of the law of Moses, etc., comp. ch. i. 7.

Vers. 7, 8. Especially they are warned against all intercourse with those nations, and above all, against participation in their idolatry. "On הַזֵּבֶךְ הַזֶּה, to mention any one by his name, i. e., to make him the object of a call and proclamation, comp. Is. xlviii. 1; Ps. xx. 8; הָרָא בַיָּסֶס, Is. xii. 4; xli. 25" (Knobel). Keil aptly remarks further, that, "to mention the names of the gods (Ex. xxiii. 13), to swear by them, to serve them (by offerings), and to bow down to them (call upon them in prayer), are the four expressions of divine worship," see Deut. vi. 13; x. 20.

Ver. 9. A fresh reminiscence of God's help, who has driven out before them great and strong nations, cf. ver. 3. And you—no man hath stood before you unto this day. Meaning: and you were so powerful through his assistance that you conquered everything before you, comp. ch. xxi. 44.

Ver. 10. To be understood neither with the LXX., who render הַיְּהוָה יִלְחָם by διὰ τῆς χάριτος, of the past, nor with the Vulg., which translates persequetur, of the future, but rather of the present; one man of you chaseth a thousand, for Jehovah your God, he it is who fighteth for you as he hath spoken to you. So De Wette rightly translates, for it must be the actual present state of the people, and their actual present relation to Jehovah, in which the sure guarantee of their future complete extirpation of the Canaanites will consist. Deut. xxxii. 30; Num. xxvi. 8, should be compared.

Ver. 11. A repeated admonition to love Jehovah their God. There follows  $\beta$ , in vers. 12-16, the warning against apostasy from God, which is closely connected by  $\text{וְ$  with the last words of the admonition.

Vers. 12, 13. For if ye do in any wise turn back ( $\text{וְיָשׁוּבִים$ ), and cleave ( $\text{וְיִצְּתוּ$ ) to the remnant of these nations, these that remain with you, and make marriages with them (contrary to the prohibition, Ex. xxxiv. 16;  $\text{וְיִתְּנָתָם$ ), from  $\text{וְיִצְּתוּ}$ , prop. to cut off, then =  $\text{וְיִתְּנָתָם$ , to determine, make fast; to betroth, as in old Lat. festa for bridegroom [ $\text{וְיִתְּנָתָם$ ] or the father of the bride [ $\text{וְיִתְּנָתָם$ ], Ex. xviii. 1 ff.; Judg. xix. 4 ff. Hithpaël: to intermarry, to contract affinities by marriage, and that either by taking another's daughter, or giving him one's own, with  $\text{וְ$  as here (Deut. vii. 3; 1 Sam. xviii. 22, 23, 26, 27; Ezra ix. 14. Gesen.), and ye come among them and they among you, know for a certainty ( $\text{יָדוּעַ$ ) that Jehovah your God will no more drive out these nations from before you, and they will be for you a trap ( $\text{לִפְתָּא}$ ), in the same tragic sense as in Ps. lxxix. 23 and Is. viii. 15, where also  $\text{לִפְתָּא}$  is connected with  $\text{וְיִצְּתוּ}$ , as likewise in the N. T., Luke xxi. 35, rays), and a snare and a scourge ( $\text{וְיִשְׁמָטוּ$ , commonly  $\text{שׁוֹט$ , e. g., Prov. xxvi. 3: 1 K. xii. 11) in your sides, and thorns ( $\text{וְיִצְּתוּ$ ), Num. xxxiii. 55, from  $\text{וְיִצְּתוּ}$ , in the signif. to be interwoven, entangled) in your eyes, until ye perish from off this good ground ( $\text{וְיִצְּתוּ$ ) which Jehovah your God hath given you. The declaration of Joshua is much more severe than that of Moses, Num. xxxiii. 55, which speaks only of  $\text{וְיִצְּתוּ}$  (thorns), parallel to  $\text{וְיִצְּתוּ}$ . But here Joshua threatens that the Canaanites shall be to them a trap and snare for their feet; a scourge—in their sides; thorns—in their eyes, so that they shall be endangered by them and plagued on every side of the body, as it were. Keil: Joshua multiplies the figures to picture the inconvenience and distress which will arise from their intercourse with the Canaanites, because, knowing the fickleness of the people, and the pride of the human heart, he foresaw that the falling away from God, which Moses had in his day predicted, will only too soon take place; as indeed it did, according to Judg. ii. 3 ff., in the next generation. The words  $\text{וְיִצְּתוּ}$ , repeat the threat of Moses, Deut. xi. 17; comp. ch. xxviii. 21 ff."

Ver. 14. Joshua, as in ver. 3, calls to mind his approaching end: I am going the way of all the earth, i. e., on the way to death, which a man goes and returns not, into the land of darkness and the shadow of death (Job x. 21; 1 K. ii. 2). This way all the earth, the whole world must take.

The lesson which he connects with these words teaches them to perceive that, as was said ch. xxi. 45, God has fulfilled to them all his promises, in which Joshua thinks particularly of the conquest of Canaan.

Vers. 15, 16. Reiterated warning against backsliding (comp. ver. 13). As God has fulfilled the good words concerning them, so will Jehovah bring ( $\text{וְיָבִיֵא$ ) upon them also every evil word (Lev. xxvi. 14-33; Deut. xxviii. 15-68; xxix. 14-28; xxx. 1, 15; comp. Josh. viii. 34, 35), until he destroys them ( $\text{וְיִשְׁמָדוּם$ , as Deut. vii. 34; xxviii. 48, Keil). Nay, if they transgress the covenant of Jehovah, to serve other gods and worship them, then his anger will burn against them, and they will quickly ( $\text{וְיִשְׁמָדוּם$ ) perish out of the good land, which he has given them. The second part of ver. 16 occurs word for word in Deut. xi. 17, the first in part.

b. Ch. xxiv. The Second Farewell. Renewal of the Covenant. Conclusion. a. Vers. 1-15. The discourse, the general character of which has been described, falls, after the exordium, into two divisions; vers. 2-13 a recapitulation of what God, since the time of the patriarchs, has done for his people; vers. 14-16, a demand to abstain entirely from idolatry, and to cleave to Jehovah, whom Joshua, at all events, and his family, will serve.

Ver. 1. The assembly gathered not in Shiloh but in Shechem, where the solemn transaction related ch. viii. 30-35, had taken place. On this account particularly, to recall that transaction, were the people summoned thither. A second reason is found by Hengstenberg (Beiträge, iii. p. 14 ff.) and Keil, in the fact that Jacob had dwelt here after his return from Mesopotamia, here purified his house of strange gods and buried their images under the oak at Shechem (Gen. xxxiii. 19; xxxv. 2, 4). An opinion intrinsically probable, but neither in the context of our chapter nor elsewhere in the book is it mentioned. The  $\text{וְיִצְּתוּ}$ , as ch. i. 10; iii. 2; viii. 33; xxiii. 2.

And they presented themselves before God ( $\text{וְיִתְּנָתָם$ ), as in Job i. 6; ii. 1,  $\text{וְיִתְּנָתָם$  [על יי]. Joshua had, ch. viii. 31, raised an altar on Mount Ebal, on which at that time, before the building of the tabernacle, sacrifices were offered. Of offerings there is no mention here.

Ver. 2. God of Israel; significant, so ver. 23. In this verse, as in vers. 3, 4, Joshua, in the name of Jehovah, holds up to the people what He has done for Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; the first proof of his divine grace. The fathers dwelt of old ( $\text{וְיִצְּתוּ}$ ) beyond the stream, i. e., the Euphrates, namely, in Ur in Chaldea, and then in Haran (Gen. xi. 28, 31).

Terah ( $\text{וְיִצְּתוּ}$ , LXX.:  $\Theta\epsilon\rho\alpha$ , from  $\text{וְיִצְּתוּ}$ , in Chald. to delay, comp. also Num. xxxiii. 27) the father of Abraham, and the father of Nahor, and served other gods. And I took your father Abraham . . . Isaac. The gods which Terah revered were, as appears from Gen. xxxi. 19, 34, Teraphim, Penates (see Winer, Realw. s. v. Theraphim, [Smith's Dict. of Bible, art. "Teraphim."]) It is worthy of notice that it is not said distinctly of Abraham that he served other gods, on which account we agree with Knobel, who says: "Whether, according to our author, Abraham also was originally an idolater, is rather to be denied than affirmed, comp. Gen. xxxi. 53." Dangerous even for him certainly were the idolatrous surroundings, wherefore God took him (לקח) and caused him to wander through Canaan. According to a tradition preserved in the Targum Jonathan (Keil, Com. ub. Jos. 169, Ann. 1), and which recurs in the latter Rabbin, Abraham had to suffer persecution on account of his aversion to idolatry, and to forsake his native country; while an Arabic story (Hottinger, Hist. or. 50 ap. Winer, Realw. s. v. Abraham) makes him wander as far as Mecca, and there lay the first foundation of the Caaba. According to this, therefore, it must be assumed that he was a Sabæan.

Of Abraham's life nothing further is mentioned, ver. 3, than that Jehovah caused him to wander through all the land of Canaan, and multiplied his seed and gave him Isaac.

Ver. 4. To Isaac gave Jehovah Jacob, and Esau, who received Mount Seir (Gen. xxvi. 6 ff.) for a possession. Jacob alone was to have Canaan for himself and his posterity, of which, however, nothing further is here said. Rather, there is added only the remark, which leads to ver. 5, that Jacob and his sons went down into Egypt, as is told Gen. xlv. 1 ff.

Vers. 5-7. The second proof of the Divine favor: Israel's deliverance out of Egypt, the chief incidents of which are succinctly enumerated, namely, (1) the sending of Moses and Aaron and the infliction of the plagues upon Egypt (Ex. iii.-xii.); (2) the destruction of the Egyptians in the Red Sea (Ex. xiv.).

Vers. 5, 6. The words in ver. 5, according to that which I did in the midst of them (בְּאֶשְׁרֵי בְּקִרְבִּי), occasion some difficulty. The LXX., without doubt, read בְּאֶשְׁרֵי, for they translate the whole verse, "freely it is true: καὶ ἐνταῦθα ἡν Ἀλγυπτὸν ἐν σημείοις, οἷς ἐποίησα ἐν αὐτοῖς, καὶ μετὰ ταῦτα ἐξήγαγον." The Vulgate also, following them, offers no sure standing ground when it renders: "Et percussi Ægyptum multis signis atque portentis eduxique vos." Knobel, appealing to the translation of the LXX., would read בְּאֶשְׁרֵי instead of בְּאֶשְׁרֵי; but even בְּאֶשְׁרֵי, gives not a bad sense, if we paraphrase the very curtly spoken sentence thus: "As you, according to all that which I did in the midst of them, sc. the Egyptians, perfectly well know." Bunsen: "So as you know that I did among them." We retain בְּאֶשְׁרֵי, therefore, because it is the more difficult reading.

Red sea, see on ch. ii. 10.

Ver. 7. A poetical, noble description. The Israelites cried to Jehovah. Then he placed darkness (לְחֹשֶׁךְ, LXX.: νεφέλην καὶ γνόφος, from בָּשָׁר, to go down [of the sun], to become dark, ἀπ. λεγ. In Jer. ii. 21, we meet again with the compound כְּחֹשֶׁךְ, as a designation of the wilderness, i. e., the pillar of cloud (Ex. xiii. 21 ff.; xiv. 19 ff.) between them and the Egyptians, brought the sea upon the latter and covered them. But the eyes of the Israelites saw what Jehovah did to the Egyptians. The change between the third and the first person is to be noticed. While we find the first person in vers. 5, 6, Jehovah is spoken of at the beginning of ver. 7 in the third person, and then proceeds in the first. Ye dwelt in the wilderness many days. Transition to ver. 8, comp. ver. 5 b.

Vers. 8-10. The third proof of God's favor: Victory over the Amorites (Num. xxi. 23), and turning away of Balaam's purposed curse from Israel (Num. xxii. 22-24).

Ver. 8. They fought with you, namely, under the command of their kings, Sihon, who was slain at Jahaz (Num. xxi. 23), and Og, who was slain at Edrei (Num. xxi. 33).

Ver. 9. When it is said of Balak that he, the king of the Moabites, warred against Israel, we learn from the following words, and sent and called Balaam the son of Beor to come and curse you, how this is meant by the author. Balak contended not with arms against the Israelites, but would have them cursed by the false prophet Balaam, the לִיִּם (ch. xiii. 22), in which the terrified king at least staked his gold (Num. xxii. 7), although it did not win. He lacked the courage for warfare with arms.

Ver. 11. The fourth proof of God's favor: The passage of the Jordan, capture of Jericho, victory over the Canaanites. The בְּקִרְבִּי יִרְדֵּן are not, as Knobel supposes, appealing to ch. vi. 2, the king and his heroes, since the author in this case would have chosen the same expression; but, according to the example of 2 Sam. xxi. 12; 1 Sam. xxiii. 11; Judg. ix. 6, the citizens of Jericho.

Vers. 12, 13. Summary conclusion of the first division of Joshua's speech, in which he again emphasizes the fact, that it was God who inspired the Canaanites, particularly Sihon and Og, with terror, and who has given the Israelites a rich and well cultivated land.

Ver. 12. And I sent the hornet (בְּצִרְקֹה) before you. (So had it been promised by God, Ex. xxiii. 28; Deut. vii. 20, and now also fulfilled, comp. Wisd. xii. 8). בְּצִרְקֹה is not to be understood literally, nor of plagues generally, but with Knobel and Keil, and most of the recent authorities, in such figurative sense as to be compared with Deut. ii. 25; Josh. ii. 11, where it is stated that Jehovah began, on the day of the victory over Sihon, to spread among all peoples, fear and terror, trembling and quaking and anguish, on account of Israel. The swarm of hornets is a terror and consternation to those against whom it turns, to fall upon them; before it they cannot stand but hurry away in distress. Like this is the consternation which, after their first great battle, preceded the Hebrews, and, like a heaven-sent spiritual plague, fell upon the peoples so that they fainted before Israel. Elsewhere the bees appear as an image of terrible foes (Deut. i. 44; Ps. cxviii. 12; Knobel, on Ex. xxiii. 28). It ought also to be considered that in Ex. xxiii. 27, the next preceding verse, terror is spoken of (אֶת-יִמְתֵּי אֱשֵׁלָה). The same conclusion follows if we compare Deut. vii. 20 with ver. 19, ver. 21 (end), vers. 23, 24.

Not by thy sword and not by thy bow. The same thought as in Ps. xlv. 4.

Ver. 13. Thus Israel has, through God's goodness, without merit on his part, received a glorious land, a land which he has not worked with the sweat of his brow (לֹא-יִצְרְקָהּ בֶּהָ), i. e., made productive, cities which he has not built, vineyards and olive-trees which he has not planted, but of which he shall eat. The LXX. render יִצְרִי by ἐλαίωτας, the Vulgate, by olivea = olive plantations, olive-yards, as Luther and De Wette translate; rightly, no doubt, for the sense. If the Hebrew language had a special word for this, as it had in קֶדֶשׁ for vineyard, it would certainly have made use of it here. This all happened as Jehovah had promised, Deut. vi. 10.

Vers. 14–16. A demand to forsake idolatry entirely, and cleave to Jehovah alone, whom Joshua at least with his house will serve.

Ver. 14. And now fear Jehovah (cf. Ps. ii. 11; v. 8; especially Prov. i. 7; Job xxviii. 28) and serve him (עֲבַדְיָהוָה, LXX.; λατρεύσατε, comp. Rom. i. 25) in sincerity and in truth (בְּיֵשׁוּעַ וּבְאֵמֶת, cf. Judg. ix. 16, 19, and on בְּיֵשׁוּעַ, in the N. T. εὐαγγελία, 1 Cor. v. 8; 2 Cor. i. 12; ii. 17), and put away the gods which your fathers served on the other side of the river and in Egypt (comp. Lev. xvii. 7; Amos v. 26; as well as Ezek. xx. 7 ff.; xxiii. 3, 8), and serve Jehovah.

Ver. 15. Finally, Joshua challenges the people to decide with the utmost freedom: "if it seem evil in your eyes, if it please you not (LXX.: εἰ μὴ ἀπέσκει), he calls to them, to serve Jehovah, then choose you (for yourselves, בְּיָהוָה לָכֶם) this day whom ye will serve; whether the gods which your fathers served on the other side of the river, or the gods of the Amorites, in whose land ye dwell." He gives them the choice, therefore, between the old worship of the Penates practiced by their fathers and the Baal-worship of the inhabitants of the land, if they will not serve Jehovah. The latter will he for his part and his family do, in any case, for he adds: but I and my house will serve Jehovah.

β. Ch. xxiv. 16–28. The Renewal of the Covenant. Struck by the words of Joshua the whole people with one consent reply, that they will not forsake Jehovah: "We also will serve Jehovah, for he is our God" (vers. 16–18). Being reminded further by Joshua how hard this is, since Jehovah is a holy and a jealous God (vers. 19, 20), the people persist in their former declaration (ver. 21) whereupon the choice of Jehovah is, solemnly made (vers. 22–24), and the covenant renewed (ver. 25). All these things Joshua writes in the law-book of God (ver. 26), raises a monument of stone as a witness of what has taken place (ver. 27), and then dismisses the people (ver. 28) each to his possession.

Vers. 16–18. The People's Reply to Joshua's Speech. Ver. 16. The idea of forsaking Jehovah and serving other gods, is rejected with expressions of the deepest aversion (חָלִילָה לָנוּ וְגו') to idolatry, comp. ch. xxii. 29.

Ver. 17. The reason: Jehovah was their God, he who had brought them up (מִצְרָיִם), for which, in Ex. xx. 2, we have (הוֹצֵאתֵנוּ מִצְרָיִם) out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage (בֵּית עֲבָדִים, as Ex. xx. 2), and had done these great signs, i. e., the wonders mentioned by Joshua (vers. 8–12) before their eyes, and had kept them in all the way wherein they went, etc.

Ver. 18. Among the deeds of Jehovah they recall especially the expulsion of the original inhabitants of the land, and then add, in allusion to Joshua's last word, "we also will serve Jehovah, for he is our God."

Vers. 19, 20. Joshua still calls the people to notice how difficult it was to serve Jehovah, by showing that he was a holy God (אֱלֹהִים קְדוֹשִׁים), as 1 Sam. xvii. 26; אֱלֹהִים חַיִּים, where also the adj. is in the plural; in respect to the sense, comp. Ex. xix. 6; Lev. xxi. 6, 7, 8; 1 Pet. ii. 9, as well as the numerous passages in Isaiah, where God is designated as the קְדוֹשׁ יִשְׂרָאֵל, e. g., ch. v. 19, 24; xii. 6; xxx. 11, 12; xli. 14, 43, etc.), a jealous God (אֱלֹהִים קַנָּא; Ex. xx. 5, אֱלֹהִים קַנָּא; Nah. i. 2, אֱלֹהִים קַנָּא, as here), who will not forgive transgressions (חַטֹּאת) and sins. "רַחֲמֵינוּ", spoken of the forgiveness of sins, is commonly construed with acc. rei; less frequently with ? rei, besides this passage in Ex. xxiii. 21; Ps. xxv. 18, with slight modification of meaning — to award forgiveness to sin" (Keil).

Ver. 20. This jealousy of the holy God will show itself in this, that if they should forsake him and serve strange gods (אֱלֹהֵי זָרָה, as Gen. xxxv. 4, while in ver. 16, as in ch. xxiii. 16, we found אֱלֹהֵי זָרָה) he will turn (וְהִטָּה) and do them harm and consume (וְהִכָּה), finish, abolish) them, after that he has done them good, i. e., without any regard to the fact that he had done them good.

Ver. 21. The people adhere to their resolution to serve Jehovah. On לֵא, minime, comp. ch. v. 14.

Ver. 22. Joshua calls them now to witness against themselves, that they have chosen Jehovah as their God, to serve him, i. e., they will, if they ever fall away, be obliged to admit that they once chose Jehovah, and that he now has a right also to punish them for their unfaithfulness. To this, too, they assent, replying, as with one mouth: witnesses (are we).

Ver. 23. Still another exhortation of Joshua, resting on that assent, to put away the strange gods (as ver. 20, אֱלֹהֵי זָרָה) which were in the midst of them, and incline their heart to Jehovah, the God of Israel (as ver. 2). Keil, following the example of R. Levi ben Gerson, Augustine, and Calvin, takes בְּיָהוָה בְּעֵינֵינוּ, figuratively = in your hearts, because the people, with all their willingness to renounce idolatry, yet deliver to Joshua no images to be destroyed, as was done in the similar cases, Gen. xxxv. 4; 1 Sam. vii. 4. He thinks, further, that although the people, as Amos represents to his generation (Am. v. 26, comp. Acts vii. 43), carried about with them idols in the wilderness, yet with the dying out of the generation condemned at Kadesh, gross idolatry would have disappeared from Israel. We may grant that so long as Joshua lived, Israel publicly served the true God, but hold it very probable that, as he might full well know, many a one in secret worshipped the idols which he now demanded that they should put away, using the same word (וְהִכָּה) which Jacob had used before, and Samuel used after him. As regards the actual removal of the images, this may have followed, although we are not so informed. Finally, בְּיָהוָה בְּעֵינֵינוּ here certainly is used precisely as much in the proper sense as in Gen. xxxv. 2, בְּיָהוָה בְּעֵינֵינוּ, and 1 Sam. vii. 8, בְּיָהוָה בְּעֵינֵינוּ.

Ver. 24. For the third time (vers. 16, 21) the people aver that they will serve Jehovah and hearken to his voice.

Ver. 25. Upon this, Joshua made a covenant with them that day, i. e., he renewed the covenant concluded on Sinai by God with Israel (Ex. xix. 20), in like manner as Moses had done (Deut. xxviii. 69) in the field of Moab. When it is said further concerning Joshua, that he set them a statute and an ordinance (or judgment) in Israel, these words are in allusion to Ex. xv. 25, where, in connection with the change (not by this, Keil) of the bitter water into sweet, God himself established for Israel a statute and right. Here, it was precisely through the renewal of the covenant that statute and right for the people were established and determined,—"what in matters of religion should be with Israel law and right" (Knobel).

Vers. 26-28. After this had been done, Joshua wrote these things, (prop. words, וַיִּכְתֹּב יְהוֹשֻׁעַ), i. e., all which had happened there at Shechem, the whole transaction between him and the people, in the book of the law of God. He wrote a document—a protocol, so to speak—concerning the matter, and introduced it into the book of the law. At the same time he took a great stone and set it up there under the oak which was in the sanctuary of Jehovah (וַיִּתֵּן יְהוֹשֻׁעַ אֶת הַבֵּית). The sanctuary is not the tabernacle (Ex. xxv. 8; Lev. xii. 4; xix. 30; xx. 3; xxi. 12; Num. iii. 38; xix. 20 ap. Knobel), since this, according to ch. xviii. 1, stood in Shiloh, but a consecrated space, a sacred spot; and this place, indeed, within whose limits stood the oak, where the great stone was set up by Joshua (cf. Gen. xxviii. 18; Josh. iv. 20-22; 1 Sam. vii. 12), had been hallowed by the altar which Abraham and Jacob had formerly built there (Gen. xii. 7; xxxiii. 20). We may add with Knobel, that according to ch. viii. 30, Joshua himself had built an altar on Mount Ebal, therefore in close proximity to Shechem, which, like Gilgal (ch. iv. 20 ff.; xv. 7), became a holy place.

Ver. 27. Joshua finally explains the significance of the stone, which is to be a witness against the people in case they deny God, since it has heard all the words of Jehovah (ver. 2). In a vivid imagination the stone is regarded as a person, so to speak, which has seen and heard every thing, comp. ch. xxii. 34.

Ver. 28 relates the dismissal of the people. Every one returns to his possession.

γ. Ch. xxiv. 29-33. Death of Joshua and of Eleazar. Vers. 29, 30. It is probable that immediately thereafter Joshua died, one hundred and ten years old, at the same age precisely as that which Joseph reached, Gen. i. 26. He was buried at Timnath-serah (ch. xix. 50). The mountain of Gaash, mentioned here as well as in Judg. ii. 9; 2 Sam. xxiii. 30; 1 Chr. xi. 32, cannot be identified. Its name, גִּישׁ from שָׁשׂ, to push, thrust, signifies, according to Gesenius, perhaps the same as fore-thrust, foreshadowing.

Ver. 31. So long as Joshua and the elders, who with him had led the people, lived, and those who had known (וַיִּדְעוּ), i. e. experienced, all the works (וַיַּעֲשׂוּ) of Jehovah, which he had done for Israel, Israel served Jehovah, as is likewise related Judg. ii. 11 ff.

Ver. 32 contains an additional statement concerning the bones of Joseph, which suited the conclusion here, especially as the discourse in vers. 1-28 had been concerning Shechem, where they were buried, in the piece of ground which Jacob had once bought for one hundred kesita (Gen. xxiii. 19) of the sons of Hamor the father of Shechem. We learn from Ex. xiii. 19, that the Israelites had, in conformity with a last wish of Joseph, recorded Gen. i. 25, brought these bones out of Egypt, and this circumstance is mentioned by our author in the beginning of this verse.

Ver. 33. After Joshua, died Eleazar also, the son of Aaron. How long afterward we cannot determine. They buried him at Gibeah-phinehas, the city of his son, which had been given to the latter on Mount Ephraim. Since it is expressly said that this Gibeah-phinehas lay on mount Ephraim, we agree with Robinson, von Raumer (p. 155), and Knobel, who regarded it as being the present Geeb in Maundrell, p. 87, or Jibia in Rob. iii. 80, 81, or Chirbet Jibia in Ritter, Erdk. xvi. p. 559 f., the κώμη, villa Geba of Euseb. and Jerome. It stood five miles, i. e., two hours, north of Guphna, toward Neapolis or Shechem. Keil, however, thinks of the Levitical city Geba (ch. xviii. 24), to which view the position "on Mount Ephraim" need not, in his opinion, be an objection, because this mountain, according to Judg. iv. 5 and other passages, reached far into the territory of Benjamin (!).

The Hebrew original of our book closes with this notice of the death of Eleazar. The LXX. have added a supplement, combining Judg. ii. 6, 11 ff., and iii. 7, 12 ff., which, however, is nowhere found in the MSS. and editions of Joshua. We give it according to the Polyglott Bible of Stier and Theile: Ἐν ἐκείνῃ τῇ ἡμέρᾳ λήγοντες οἱ υἱοὶ Ἰσραὴλ τὴν κιβωτὸν τοῦ θεοῦ περιεφέροντες ἐν ἑαυτοῖς, καὶ φησὶς ἱεράτευσε ἀπὸ Ἐλεάζαρ τοῦ πατρὸς αὐτοῦ ὡς ἀπέθανε, καὶ καταπόνην ἐν Γαβαὰ τῇ ἑαυτοῦ. Οἱ δὲ υἱοὶ Ἰσραὴλ ἀπῆλθον ἕκαστος εἰς τὸν τόπον αὐτῶν καὶ εἰς τὴν ἑαυτῶν πόλιν. Καὶ ἐβόηον οἱ υἱοὶ Ἰσραὴλ τὴν Ἀσθάρτην καὶ Ἀσθαὶ καὶ τοὺς θεοὺς τῶν ἐθνῶν τῶν κύκλων αὐτῶν. Καὶ παρέδωκεν αὐτοὺς κύριος εἰς χεῖρας Ἑλλάνων βασιλέως Μωαβιτῶν, καὶ κατεκρίνευσεν αὐτῶν ἐπὶ δάκα δακτύ.

THEOLOGICAL AND ETHICAL.

1. Joshua's noble character, his deep insight into God's leadings of his people, his accurate knowledge of the inconstancy of the human heart, his beautiful treatment of religious occasions, all appear in his last two addresses at parting with the people. As far as possible he keeps his own personal merit in the background. It is God who has fought for Israel (ch. xxiii. 3) and will still further fight for him (ch. xxiii. 10), the God of Israel (ch. xxiv. 2, 23), who from ancient times (ch. xxiv. 2) to the present day has wonderfully manifested himself to his people, shown them much favor, and finally given them a beautiful dwelling-place (ch. xxiv. 13). Of himself he says repeatedly that he is old and must go the way of all the earth (ch. xxiii. 2, 14), therefore a mortal man subject to the lot of all earthly existence, a man who, having fulfilled his task and distributed the land to the people (ch. xxiii. 4), must now retire from the theatre of his activity, but who, as long as he lives, will with his family serve Jehovah (ch. xxiv. 15). How nobly, on the other hand, he sketches in large features, particularly in the second discourse, the works of God; Abraham's call (ch. xxiv. 2 ff.), the mission of Moses and Israel's deliverance out of Egypt (ch. xxiv. 5 ff.), the conquest of the Amorites beyond the Jordan, the turning away of the curse of Balaam, the capture of Jericho, the conquest of the land (ch. xxiv. 8 ff.). Since he knew, however, the human heart in its fickleness, and in particular understood accurately the want of steadfastness on the part of Israel, he repeatedly admonishes them to fidelity towards God (ch. xxiii. 6, 7, 11; xxiv. 14, 15), warns them likewise, and in part with words of sharp severity, against all apostasy (ch. xxiii. 12-16; xxiv. 14, 20), and puts them a third time to the test whether they will really serve Jehovah (ch. xxiv. 15, 19, 20, 22). In this, however, appears at the same time Joshua's excellent understanding of the treatment of religious concerns, for he will employ no constraint, but leaves entirely to their own choice the decision whether Israel will serve Jehovah or the strange gods of whom they had knowledge (ch. xxiv. 15, 19, 20). But then, after the people have decided for Jehovah, although Joshua has very emphatically pointed out that He is a holy and a jealous God (ch. xxiv. 19), who will not forgive transgressions and sins, he demands of them also so much the more pointedly that they shall put away all strange gods.

2. In respect to this putting away of strange gods, we take the liberty of adding Gerlach's remark on ch. xxiv. 23, which still more definitely supports our explanation of the passage. "It is remarkable," he says, "that, after Achan's trespass in the matter of things devoted, and after the Israelites had not long before been ready to avenge so signally the supposed crime of their transjordanic brethren in erecting a rival altar, idolatry could still have been secretly practiced among them. In this, however, we must fairly consider how hard it was for the thought of the one, almighty, omnipresent God to find lodgment in the mind of the heathen-spirited people, how, with this faith they stood alone among the nations of the whole contemporary world, how they, therefore, were continually overcome anew and taken captive by the spirit of the world and of the age, and incessantly turned away to other helpers from the divinely appointed means of grace which seemed not to satisfy their carnal desires; how, in particular, they still afterwards worshipped partly the true God under images, partly the divining household gods (teraphim) in secret; and how the judgment of God might indeed seize upon and hold up one example (Achan, ch. vii.), without, therefore, at a later period, in like manner, extirpating the sin. That in the wilderness the people in secret worshipped idols Amos declares (ch. v. 25; comp. Acts vii. 43), that there were household gods even in David's house, is shown by 1 Sam. xix. 13, 16. No apostasy from the true God followed from that, but a partial and ever renewed corruption of his service through superstition." Analogous examples are found in Grimm's Mythology, from the history of our German people.

3. Similar representations of the benefits of God to his people may be read in many passages of the Psalms, partly abridged, partly in more full accounts. Thus Ps. xlv. 1-4; lxxviii. 8 ff.; lxxviii.; lxxx. 9 ff.; lxxx. 11; xcix. 6, 7; cv.; cvi.; cxxxv. 8 ff.; cxxxvi. 10, 11, 19. Touching the deliverance from Egypt the tenderly winning representation of Hosea (ch. xi. 1 ff. [and of Jeremiah, ch. ii. 1 ff.]) may be compared.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Joshua's first farewell discourse considered in the two sections above given, for comfort and admonition (ch. xxiii. 1-15).—As the Lord once brought Israel into rest, so will He also bring us to rest, for "there remaineth a rest for the people of God" (ch. xxiii. 1).—Joshua, in his humility and modesty, set before us as a pattern, that we should in all things give God alone the honor, while we know and feel ourselves to be weak and dying men.—The Lord has fought also for you. (1) The Lord has fought; (2) the Lord has fought for you (ch. xxiii. 3; sermon for victory).—Depart neither to the right hand, nor to the left from the commands of God; a text suitable for confirmation addresses.—God gives victory only when the combatants most diligently keep their souls and love him.—Bad men will be, as the heathen were for the Israelites, a trap and a snare and a scourge in the sides, and thorns in the eyes for those who live in intercourse with them.—Ver. 14, a very beautiful text for a farewell sermon for a preacher who is obliged to lay down his office from advanced age, also for a funeral discourse when a father, for instance, to whose family God has shown much kindness, is deceased.—Vers. 15, 16. Suitable for a sermon on a day of fasting and prayer. (1) Think to-day of all the good which you have received, according to what God has spoken to you; but (2) be warned against the transgression of his covenant, lest his judgment come upon you.

Joshua's last congress at Shechem. (1) His discourse (ch. xxiv. 1-15); (2) the answer of the people (vers. 16-18); (3) the final decision and renewal of the covenant (vers. 19-25).—Joshua's second farewell discourse treated by itself, and that as a review of the history of Israel from the days of the patriarchs to his own, in its most important incidents as above stated (ch. xxiv. 1-15).—Of the terror of God upon nations doomed to destruction (ver. 12).—Not by thy sword nor by thy bow!—God's surpassing benefits proved by what He bestowed upon Israel.—Earnest exhortation to give up all the idolatry still remaining among them.—In matters of religious conviction the decision must be altogether free; all constraint is to be condemned. That Joshua teaches once for all.—I and my house will serve the Lord!—A text of inexhaustible richness for weddings; yet rightly employed only when the individual dispositions correspond,—a thing which in occasional services should never be wanting. That Frederick William IV., king of Prussia, at the opening of the United Diet in 1847, declared this word of Joshua to be his own maxim, is well known.—Such deep horror of all idolatry becomes us also, as it once became Israel. Only our aversion must be more permanent than it was with that people.—We also will serve Jehovah, for He is our God.—God a holy, and a jealous God.—How the thought that God is holy, pure from all evil, and jealous, zealously intent on his proper glory, should restrain us from all evil, and especially from all idolatry.—When does God not spare (forgive)? (1) When transgression and sin is wilfully committed, and when (2) forgiveness would, as He foresees, lead to no amendment.—When we forsake the Lord He forsakes us also, and turns away from us although He may have done us ever so much good.—Ver. 22 also may be employed as a text for discourses at confirmation [and at all receptions into the church], in which it is to be impressed upon the candidates that their "yes" will testify against them if they prove unfaithful to the Lord. — In what must the true and sincere conversion (repentance) of an entire people consist? (1) In their putting away their strange, often very secretly worshipped gods; (2) in the inclination of their hearts to the Lord God of Israel. — The God of Israel (vers. 2, 23). — The repeated profession of the people that they will serve the Lord, regarded (1) in reference to its import, (2) to the responsibility which the people thus took upon them. — It is easily said: I will serve the Lord and obey his voice; but actually to keep the promise when the world allures to its altars, is quite another thing. — Israel's resolution to serve the Lord was wholly voluntary. So should it be also with us. There should be no compulsion. — Men may well hearken to God's voice, for (1) it always warns against the evil, (2) always admonishes to the good. — O! how peaceful is it in the heart when we really serve the Lord our God in sincerity, and hear nothing in preference to his friendly voice, that we may joyfully obey it. — The renewal of the covenant at Shechem; to be treated in such a way that (1) Joshua, (2) the people, (3) the matter of the covenant (law and rights of God), (4) the place where it was accomplished — keeping in view the historical recollections so richly associated with Shechem, (5) the memorial of the covenant, shall all receive due attention. — Joshua's death, the end of a faithful servant of the Lord who had proved himself such (1) already in Moses' time (Num. xiii.; xxvii. 15-23); (2) in the conquest and partition of the land, in which (a) his trust in God, (b) his bravery, (c) his unselfishness (ch. xvii. 14-18; xix. 49, 50) are to be signalized; (3) even to the end (comp. ch. xxiii. 1-11; xxiv. 1-15). — Vers. 29, 30. How beneficially the good example of a pious and true leader may influence a whole people, illustrated by the case of Joshua, Eleazar, Phinehas, and the other elders of Israel. — The burial of Joseph's bones, an act of grateful respect, and the conscientious fulfillment of a dying wish. — Eleazar's death the end of a priest after God's heart (Ex. vi. 23, 25; xxviii. 1; Lev. viii. 24; Num. iii. 32; xx. 26; xxvii. 18 ff.; xxxiv. 17; Josh. xiv. 1).

STARKE: Peace and rest is also a favor from God, therefore we may well pray: Graciously grant us peace, etc., and, From war and bloodshed preserve us, merciful Lord God, etc. — Although God alone, in all things which happen, deserves the honor, and He it is also who is and remains the one who effects all good, yet we must not leave anything wanting in our own fidelity. — A Christian must not walk in his own way, but order all his conduct by God's word. — Soul lost, all lost! Therefore watch, make haste and save thy soul! — God demands not merely an outward but an inward obedience to his law. — By our might nothing is done, by God's might everything. — To serve the true God is the highest propriety and our duty; O that all might recognize it as such and serve God from the heart! — The service which one renders to God must be unconstrained.

CRAMER: Faith is an assured confidence and excludes doubt (Heb. xi. 1; Jas. i. 6) even where one cannot see (John xx. 29). — The promises of the law are conditioned on obedience (Deut. xxviii. 1). — There is, however, none other who could fight for us, etc., Ps. liii. 6; lxxix. 10 (ch. xxiii. 10). — With the froward God is froward. — Death knows no difference in person, age, sex, condition, or country. — By repeating and meditating on the great deeds of God we should strengthen ourselves in faith, and press on towards obedience to his commands (Ps. xlv. 2; lxxxv. 2; cv. 5; cvi. 6).

OSIANDER: Whoever desires to live in accordance with the prescribed word of God, so as to add nothing thereto and take nothing therefrom, he is on the right road and walks most safely. — It is not enough to have made a good beginning, but he who perseveres to the end shall be saved, Matt. xxiv. 13. — To God must we ascribe the victory, and not to our own might and strength. — The church of God is never without hypocrites and apostates. — God can put up with no mixed religion; with him it is "all mine or let it alone altogether," Matt. iv. 10.

BIBL. TUB.: The precious covenant which we have made with God we should have constantly before our eyes.

[MATT. HENRY; on ch. xxiii. 1, 2: When we see death hastening toward us, that should quicken us to do the work of life with all our might. — On ch. xxiv. 1: We must never think our work for God done, till our life is done; and if He lengthen out our days beyond what we thought, we must conclude it is because He has some further service for us to do. — Ibid. ver. 15: When we cannot bring as many as we would to the service of God, we must bring as many as we can, and extend our endeavors to the utmost sphere of our activity; if we cannot reform the land, let us put away iniquity far from our own tabernacle. — Those that lead and rule in other things, should be first in the service of God, and go before in the best things. — Those that resolve to serve God, must not mind being singular in it, nor be drawn by the crowd to forsake his service. — Those that are bound for heaven, must be willing to swim against the stream, and must not do as the most do, but as the best do. — Ibid. vers. 29-33: This book which began with triumphs here ends with funerals, by which all the glory of man is stained. — How well is it for the Gospel church that Christ our Joshua is still with it, by his Spirit, and will be always, even unto the end of the world!]

THE BOOK OF JUDGES.

BY PAULUS CASSEL, D. D.,
PROFESSOR IN BERLIN.

TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN, WITH ADDITIONS,

BY
P. H. STEENSTRA,
PROFESSOR OF BIBLICAL LITERATURE IN THE PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL DIVINITY SCHOOL AT CAMBRIDGE, MASS.

NEW YORK:
CHARLES SCRIBNER & CO., 654 BROADWAY.
1872.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1871, by CHARLES SCHIBNER AND COMPANY,
in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

RIVERSIDE, CAMBRIDGE:
STEREOTYPED AND PRINTED BY
H. O. HOUGHTON AND COMPANY.

THE BOOK OF JUDGES.

INTRODUCTION.

§ 1. Contents and Plan.

1. THE Book of Judges is in a special sense the first historical book of Israel. It does not, like the Book of Joshua, relate the deeds of one man, nor does it, like the last four books of Moses, revolve around the commanding figure and lofty wisdom of a prophet. To a certain extent, this book also is a Genesis. The first book of the Pentateuch describes the opening period of the primitive patriarchal family; the Book of Judges relates the earliest history of the people of Israel in Canaan. "The children of Israel asked the Lord," is its opening sentence. It rehearses the fortunes, deeds, and sufferings of the people, as they occurred after the death of Joshua. For this personage was only the testamentary executor of the prophet who remained behind on the other side of the Jordan (cf. on ch. i. 1). When he also died, Israel, the heir, deprived both of the authoritative direction of Moses and the executive guidance of Joshua, entered upon the independent management of its acquired possession. The Book of Joshua is the history of a conqueror; the Book of Judges that of a people for the first time in possession. Hitherto, Israel had always been in a condition of unrest and movement, first enslaved, then wandering in the desert, finally undergoing the hardships of the camp and conquest; the Book of Judges exhibits the nation in the first period of its life as a settled, possessing, and peaceable people. Hitherto, the nation, like a minor, had been authoritatively directed by its guardian and friend; the Book of Judges opens at the moment in which the people itself is to assume the administration of its affairs in accordance with the sacerdotal and civil constitution which has been framed for it. This is indicated, from various points of view, by the name which our Book bears in the Canon: Shophetim, Judges. The same title is borne by the Synagogue pericope which begins, at Deut. xvi. 18, with the command, "Thou shalt make thee Judges (Shophetim) in all thy gates which the Lord thy God giveth thee." Since Moses no longer exercised his legislative, nor Joshua his executive functions, these Shophetim constituted the highest civil authority (cf. on ch. ii. 16), who in conjunction with the priesthood, were to watch over the observance of the law. The Book of Judges, accordingly, recounts the history of the times, after the death of Joshua, in which the governing authority in Israel was to be exercised by the Shophetim.

2. The Biblical books are throughout books of instruction. For this purpose, and this alone, were they written. Their design is to show the relations, first of God, and through God of Israel, to history. In their view, all history, and that of Israel especially, is a continuous fulfillment of the truth and purposes of God. The achievements and the fortunes of all nations are the consequences of their moral relations to God. But the preëminence of Israel consists in this, that the God of nature and of time was first revealed to it, and that in the Law which it received from Him, it has a clear and definite rule by which it can order its relations to God and know the moral grounds of whatever befalls it. Upon the observance of this law, as the evidence and expression of faith in the living God, the freedom, well-being, and peace of Israel repose. This had been made known to the people, before under Joshua's direction they left the desert and addressed themselves to the conquest of Canaan. If after victory, they shall observe the law, and be mindful of their calling to be a holy People of God, prosperity will follow them; if not, they shall fall into bondage, poverty, and discord (Deut. vii. 1 ff.). The Book of Judges is a text-book of fulfillment to this prediction. The twenty-one sections of which it consists are organically put together for this purpose. It may, indeed, be said that there are three principal divisions recognizable: first, chap. i. and ii.; secondly, chaps. iii.-xvi.; thirdly, chaps. xvii.-xxi. But the lessons which these three divisions respectively contain, evince precisely the organic connection in which the whole narrative stands with all its parts, as the necessary fulfillment of what was promised in the law. The first two chapters are a pragmatic introduction to the history of the book as a whole. They explain the possibility of the events about to be related. Not in the history of Joshua could the germs of the subsequent conflicts lie; for Joshua stood in the spirit of the law, and moved in the steps of Moses. It was only in what the tribes did after his death, that their foundation was laid. Accordingly, when ch. i. relates the prosecution of the conquest by Israel, its main object in so doing is not to tell what was conquered and how, but rather to show that in violation of the Mosaic command the tribes failed to expel the Canaanites. In consequence of this failure, the forewarnings of the law (Deut. vii.) went into fulfillment. Peace endured only so long as the elders yet lived who remembered all the great works that were done for Israel at their entrance into Canaan (Josh. xxiv. 31). The younger generation soon fell into the snares of temptation, and consequently into spiritual and political servitude. In distress, indeed, they sought after God, and then heroes rose up among them, who were truly their Judges, and who, acting in the spirit of God, regained their liberty. Their deeds are reported in chaps. iii.-xvi. But the root of the evil was not thereby removed. Heathenism continued to exist in the bosom of Israel. The occasion of apostasy afforded by the idolatry of the Canaanites was permanent, but the institution of the judgeship was transient. The service of Baal perpetuated itself from generation to generation; but the strength and energy of the Judge expired with the person in whom they dwelt. So also all those judges whom according to the law Israel was to elect for the administration of its local affairs (Deut. xvi. 18 f.), were invested with merely personal, not hereditary, dignity. The permanent evil was not confronted with any equally permanent institution. To this fact ch. ii. already alludes; for it says, ver. 19, that "when the Judge was dead, they turned back."

3. In consequence of this, the Book of Judges is the book of fulfillment from yet another point of view. It teaches that by reason of the fact just alluded to, the hereditary kingly office had to be set up. In Deuteronomy (xvi. 18 f.), the institution of Judges in all the gates of Israel is immediately followed by this provision (ch. xvii. 14 ff.): "When thou art come into the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee, and shalt possess it, and shalt dwell therein, and shalt say, I will set a king over me, like as all the nations that are about me, then shalt thou set him king over thee whom the Lord thy God shall choose." The Book of Judges shows that this result was unavoidable. The government of the Judges, it points out already in ch. ii., has no traditional strength. The authority of the greatest among them ceases when he dies. Each one of the great heroes who are portrayed from ch. iii. onward, affords proof of the want of the hereditary kingly office, albeit in different ways. When Othniel died, no second hero of Judah was forthcoming to restrain Israel from sin. Ehud was a deliverer (ch. iii.), but he is not even called a Judge. After him, the work of delivering and judging devolved on a woman, and Barak was willing to fight only if she went with him (chaps. iv., v.). Gideon became inspired with courage only through great wonders on the part of God (ch. vi.); and however pious and great, he himself occasioned confusion in Israel (ch. viii. 27). Jephthah had no legal descent of any kind. Samson was an incomparable hero; but he fought single-handed, without a people to support him.

The Judges were indeed deliverers; but their authority was not recognized throughout all Israel. The call of Deborah was answered by only two tribes. Gideon's leadership was at first opposed by Ephraim. Jephthah fell into sanguinary discord with the same tribe. Samson was bound to be delivered up to the Philistines by the terror-stricken tribe of Judah itself.

The judgeship did not even maintain itself within the same tribe. Of the six principal heroes, three belonged to the south, — Othniel, Ehud, Samson, — and three to the north, — Barak, Gideon, Jephthah; none to Ephraim, the tribe of Joshua, and two to Manasseh.

The title of the hero was Shophet, Judge. But judges there were always. In every tribe, the judge was the local magistrate. The hero who rose up to conquer bore no new title. And his authority was merely the authority of the common Shophet territorially extended by virtue of his mighty deeds. But whatever unity he might have formed during his activity, dissolved itself at his death. The tribes then stood again under their separate Shophetim. Permanent organic connection could be secured only through a king. Without this common and permanent centre, the interests of the several tribes diverged, and each section became indifferent to whatever occurred in the others. National interest decayed, and with it, of course, national strength. The narratives of chaps. xvii.-xxi. form, it is true, a division by themselves, but a division that stands in organic connection with the whole Book. The events there related do not follow after the last judge of whom ch. xvi. speaks. They belong to much earlier times, and yet the position assigned them is well considered and instructive. They demonstrate by new and striking illustrations the necessity of the kingly office to strengthen Israel, within and without, over against the existing idolatry, which could maintain itself only by reason of the divisions and want of unity between the tribes of Israel. The events of these last five chapters do not seem to have occurred under the tyranny of any hostile king. So much the more strikingly do they set forth the weakness of the form of government which Israel had at that time, — a weakness which, to be sure, had its ultimate ground in the weakness of the people itself. They show the decay both of religion among the people and of the priesthood. The first two of these chapters (xvii. and xviii.) teach us what sins in spiritual matters and what deeds of civil violence were possible in Israel, without causing the whole nation to rise in remonstrance. The last two show the reverse of this, namely, the fanaticism of self-righteousness with which the whole people proceeded against one of the brotherhood of tribes, reducing it even to the verge of extinction. Both kinds of sins were possible only because the hereditary, general, and authoritative kingly office was wanting, which everywhere interposes with the same comprehensiveness of view, because it everywhere governs with the same strength. For that reason the narrator several times adds the remark (ch. xvii. 6, xviii. 1, xix. 1): "There was no king in Israel." It is the last sentence he writes: "In those days there was no king in Israel; every man did that which was right in his own eyes." But the whole Book points to this conclusion. It is the essence of its special teaching. It is that which makes its title doubly significant. The civil authority of the Shophetim would have sufficed, if Israel had been obedient, and had not retained the Canaanites in its borders. As it was not obedient, it needed extraordinary Shophetim to effect its deliverance. But their sporadic activity could not prevail against a permanent evil. This the concentrated strength of the kingly office alone could overcome; just as, according to the gospel, every evil to which the children of men were subject, has been dissolved by the true kingship of the Son of God.

§ 2. Time of Composition.

The doctrinal tendency which we thus perceive in the Book is of great importance; for it undoubtedly furnishes a clew to the time in which it was edited. The idea of explaining the possibility of such events as are related in chaps. xvii.-xxi. by the remark, "There was no king in Israel," could be entertained only at a time when perfect political unity and order were still expected to result from the kingly office. No such explanation could have been appended to the account of Micah in ch. xvii., if the division of Israel, and the institution of Jeroboam's political idolatry, had already taken place. After the reigns of various sinful kings of Judah and Israel had become matters of history, and after the rebellion against David and the sanguinary conflicts between Judah and Israel had taken place, the want of a king could not have been offered in explanation of the civil war between Israel and Benjamin. This could only be done while people yet looked with confidence to the kingly office for certain victory without, and divine peace and order within. On the other hand, the prominence with which the lack of hereditaryness in the judgeship, and the want of any guaranty against apostasy are set forth, is explainable only if done at a time when the judicial office had ceased to inspire confidence. There is but one period in the history of Israel in which both these conditions meet, namely, when the people desired a king from Samuel, and he consecrated Saul, and the victories of the latter afforded peace within and without. The Book might be called a text-book for the people, collected and written to instruct and establish them in the new kingly government.

The desire for a king appears as early as Gideon's time. After that hero's victory, the people come and wish to have him for a king. But Gideon declines, and our author manifestly approves his course. Abimelech's disgraceful kingship is minutely related; but the parable of Jotham sets in a convincing light the wrongfulness of the manner in which the trees, i. e. the people, seek to make a king. A king so made can be of no service to Israel. It is written (Deut. xvii. 15): "Thou shalt make him king whom the Lord shall choose."

In Samuel's time, also, the people wish a king, but they do not undertake to choose one themselves. They pray Samuel to select one for them; and it is only at God's command that Samuel complies.

Samuel, as chronologically he stands between King Saul and the Judges, so as Prophet and Priest he mediates the transition from the judicial to the kingly office. His prophetic exercise of the judicial office first teaches the people how rightly to desire and ask for a king. It is on that account that the Book of Judges closes with the heroic deeds and death of Samson. The age of heroes is past. The age of kings can begin only when a prophet enjoys respect as a judge throughout all Israel, which had never been the case before Samuel. Hence, this prophet's history forms the introduction to the history of the kingship, since without his consecration no king could exist. This is why the Septuagint and the Vulgate call the Books of Samuel the First and Second of Kings.

The extreme points of time between which the composition of our Book must have taken place, may easily be indicated. It must have been later than the great victory of Samuel over the Philistines, the reformation of Israel, and the return of the ark of the covenant from exile (cf. on ch. xviii. 30). One consequence of the reformation was that, notwithstanding Samuel's protest at first, the people desired a king; for in this promised office they sought security both against their enemies and against themselves and their own unbelief. Another consequence, probably, was the composition of this manual of penitence and instruction.

On the other hand, our Book must have been written before the reign of David. Jerusalem was still called Jebus, and the Jebusites had not yet been expelled (ch. i. 21, xix. 10). But if 2 Sam. v. 6 ff. is to have any meaning at all, it must refer to the utter destruction of the Jebusites' power by David, a conclusion which the whole history confirms. Moreover, if our Book had not been written before the time of David, references to his reign could not be wanting. From Othniel's time, the tribe of Judah, David's tribe, falls into the background. The mention of it in the history of Samson, is far from honorable. The relatively copious treatment of affairs in which Benjamin figures, points to the time of King Saul. While the history of Othniel is quite summarily related, that of Ehud is drawn out to the minutest detail. Similarly rich is the flow of tradition in the narrative concerning Gibeah (ch. xix. seq.). Saul says of himself that he is "of the smallest of the tribes" (1 Sam. ix. 21). This history of Gibeah explains the cause of Benjamin's smallness, and traces it to the savage war made on him by Israel.

§ 3. The Sources.

1. The author did not command materials in equal abundance from all the tribes. A full supply flowed in upon him out of the traditions of the tribes bordering on Ephraim, namely, Benjamin, Manasseh, and Dan. The story of Deborah describes the heroic exploit of Naphthali and Zebulun; but Deborah herself resided between Ramah and Bethel, on Mount Ephraim, near the confines of Benjamin. Of the tribes at the extremities of the land, of Reuben (Gad is included in Gilead), of Simeon (only the incident in ch. i.), of Asher, the author's sources afforded scarcely any information. Concerning Judah's preëminence, only ch. i. (cf. ch. xx. 18) communicates anything. Toward Ephraim (for ch. i. 22 ff. refers to the whole house of Joseph), the sources nourish an unfavorable disposition. No hero, properly speaking, came out of Ephraim; for of Abdon nothing but his name and wealth is mentioned (ch. xii. 13). Ephraim originates the sinful opposition to Gideon and Jephthah. In Ephraim Abimelech plays his rôle as royal usurper. There Micah sets up his false religion. Thence also sprang that Levite who was the cause of the civil war. It must not be overlooked that for the author and his times all this was of great significance. When the king demanded of Samuel is appointed, he is not chosen out of Ephraim, but out of Benjamin. The author, who favors the institution of the kingship, brings the moral incapacity which Ephraim as leading tribe has hitherto shown, into prominence. The priesthood, it is true, had their seat at Shiloh. But the whole history of the Judges shows the powerlessness of the priesthood in times of danger. The facts related in the last five chapters of our book, by way of supplement to the deeds of the heroes, are sufficiently indicative of the fall of the priestly tribe. Such things, also, as are told of Levites, occurred only "because there was no king." Ephraim, it is true, gave Samuel to the nation, the restorer of Israel's spiritual strength, and the reformer of the priesthood; but even he could give no guaranty for his children, who when in old age he transfers his office to them, do not walk in his steps.

2. As to the authorship of the Book of Judges, the traditions which ascribe it to Samuel are ancient; but if in such obscure matters one were to risk a conjecture, he would hardly attach himself to these traditions. The Book apparently presupposes the reign of Saul, just as in the Books of Samuel the reign of David is presupposed. To record the deeds and instructions of God, as brought to view in the history of the nation, was certainly a well-considered, and, as the extant sacred writings show, a fearlessly and honestly executed office. If this was the office held by the mazkir at the courts of David, Solomon, and the kings in general (cf. 2 Sam. viii. 16, 1 Kings iv. 3, etc.), it would be natural to ascribe our Book to a Benjaminite of the court of Saul. This man had before him narratives, extending over a period of 400 years, which must have been written by contemporaries of the events related. Local and material details such as the histories of Ehud, Gideon, Abimelech, Jephthah, Samson, as also those of Micah and the priest at Gibeah, exhibit, can only proceed from narrators who stood personally near the events. Nevertheless, as has already been remarked, an organic recasting of the materials extends through the whole Book, by means of which the doctrine it is designed to teach is brought prominently to view, and the arrangement of the individual narratives determined. To this it is owing that the record of the great deeds achieved by the Judges closes with Samson, although it is not certain that the death of that hero is the latest event of the Book, and also that the narratives concerning Micah and Gibeah stand at the end, although, as the author himself does not conceal, the events occurred much earlier (cf. ch. xviii. 12, xiii. 25; also, xx. 28). The lesson conveyed in the introduction of the Book, especially in ch. ii., that sin and apostasy are the cause of servitude, and that apostasy in turn is the consequence of the people's disobedience in not expelling the Canaanites, is brought out in similar turns of thought and expression throughout the work (cf. ch. ii. 11, iv. 1, vi. 1, x. 6, xiii. 1; ch. ii. 14, iii. 8, x. 7; ch. ii. 17, viii. 33, x. 13 ff.). The objection that chaps. xvii.-xxi. do not contain such expressions, testifies only to the clearness and order which everywhere pervade the simple narrative. Until the story reaches the age of Samson, these expressions occur because they indicate the moral links in the historical connection. But chaps. xvii. - xxi. are placed outside of this connection. They present occurrences out of times in which the formulae, "the sons of Israel continued to do evil" (cf. ch. iv. 1, etc.), or, "they did evil" (cf. ch. ii. 11, etc.), were not properly applicable, since they were times of "rest" to the land, in consequence of the victories of one great Judge or another (cf. ch. iii. 11, etc.). Accordingly, these chapters find the ground of the evils they set forth not in the want of a Shophet but of a king. Their unity with the Book as a whole, appears clearly on a comparison of them, as to style and diction, with the introduction, chaps. i. - iii.; as again similar philological characteristics testify to the unity of chaps. i. - iii. with iv. - xvi. (cf. Keil, Lehrb. der hist. krit. Einleit., § 47, notes 4 and 5).

3. Notwithstanding this, it is plain that the different narratives of the Book exhibit a difference of coloring among themselves. This could not be otherwise. From the earliest times down to the Middle Ages, it has ever been the manner of the chronicler to tell his story, for the most part, in the very words of his sources. Precisely the Christian historiography of pious men in mediæval times abounds with proofs and instructive illustrations of this fact. To this practice the numerous hapax legomena of our Book, found nowhere else, are due (cf. ch. i. 15, iii. 22, iv. 4-19, v. 10, 28, vii. 3, xiv. 9-18, xv. 8, xviii. 7, etc.); while in many places traces of abridgment by the author might be pointed out (cf. ch. iv. 15, xvi. 13 ff., xx.). The communication of invaluable contemporary documents like the Song of Deborah and the Parable of Jotham not only confirms this explanation, but also makes it probable that in other parts of his work too the author made use of popular and heroic songs, although the fact that his prose account of the victory of Deborah and Barak is manifestly independent of the Song of Deborah shows that this conjecture is to be applied with great caution.

The author was acquainted with the contents of the Book of Joshua and of the entire Pentateuch. His first chapter becomes intelligible only when viewed in connection with the Book of Joshua. In the 13th chapter of that Book, the Lord says to Joshua that while he is so much land remains still to be possessed. The territories yet to be conquered are indicated, and orders are given for the division of the whole land among the tribes. With this account ch. i. of our Book connects itself. It shows what conquests remained to be made, from what necessary exertions the people still shrank, and where contracts of toleration were still made with the heathen inhabitants. The enumeration of places, especially in ch. i. 27-36, presupposes familiarity with chaps. xiii.-xix. of Joshua so necessarily, that without it it would be altogether unintelligible. Only those places are named which were not fully subdued; consequently, the knowledge of what formed the entire territory allotted to each tribe is presupposed. But this knowledge could only be obtained from the above-mentioned chapters in Joshua, since the territorial possessions of the respective tribes had nowhere else been defined.

In fact, the Book of Judges as a whole sets forth the fulfillment of what was contained in the Pentateuch and Joshua: its author must therefore have been acquainted with the contents of both. Chapter ii. is largely made up of sentences found in the last four books of Moses [cf. Hengst. Pentateuch, Ryland's ed., ii. 24 f.]. The history of the exodus is evidently known to the author in the very words of the Biblical narrative (cf. ch. ii. 12, vi. 13). The song of Deborah speaks in like manner of the journey through the desert and of Sinai. The narrative of the discord in Shechem (ch. ix. 28), reminds one of the story of Dinah (Gen. xxxiv.); and the deed in Gibeah is related in phraseology similar to that used in the history of Lot (Gen. xix.). We must here glance at a misunderstanding emphatically maintained by Bertheau in several passages of his Commentary. The Book of Judges, he asserts, contains references to matters that occurred under Solomon, and therefore its author must have lived after this king. In support of this, he refers to 1 Kgs. iv. 7-19 compared with Judg. i. 27, 28; but the reference proves nothing. The passage in Kings relates, to be sure, that Solomon appointed twelve officers over all the realm, whose duty it was to provide for the royal household. Of course, the districts mentioned Judg. i. 27 fell under the charge of some one of these officers. But in Judg. i. 28, it is stated that Manasseh did not drive out the Canaanites of these districts, but let them remain on condition of paying tribute, and in that we are to find a reference to Solomon!! As if Solomon had not appointed these officers over the whole kingdom! or as if their appointment had any reference to the Canaanites or to "tribute," neither of which are so much as named in connection with it! A measure necessary in every regal government for the existence of the state, we are to identify, forsooth, with a measure of subjugation against enemies in a district! The very passage in 1 Kgs. ix. 15-22, which Bertheau connects with 1 Kgs. iv. 7-19, should have shown him the true nature of the appointment of these officers. For these verses, while they state that Solomon made serfs of the still remaining heathen, expressly add that he did not make servants of any Israelites. But this action of Solomon toward heathen is not the subject of discourse at 1 Kgs. iv. 7-19, where officers are appointed over all Israel; and as little in Judges i. 28, which speaks of the time when Israel grew strong (which it certainly had been long before Solomon's day), and imposed tribute<sup>1</sup> upon the Canaanites. This is the very thing for which Manasseh is blamed, that when it grew strong, instead of expelling the heathen inhabitants, it made them tributary, thus sowing the seeds of future sin. The whole passage, if it referred to Solomon, would be senseless. And why, if the author thought of Solomon, did he not name him?

Yet more singular is another conjecture put forth by Studer and Bertheau. Judg. i. 29 states that Ephraim did not drive the Canaanites out of Gezer, but that they continued to dwell there. Now, we read in 1 Kgs. ix. 16 ff., that an Egyptian Pharaoh conquered Gezer, and slew the Canaanites, after which Solomon rebuilt the city. To this conquest, now, we are to suppose the author of Judges alludes in ch. i. 29! But the author manifestly knows only this, that the Canaanite still dwelt in Gezer! Had he alluded to the conquest of Gezer and its rebuilding, he must have told of the destruction of the Canaanite; for at the time of Solomon's rebuilding, the Canaanite was no longer there! Of such grounds as these for bringing down the date at which our book was written, Bertheau has four more (p. xxix.): 1. His interpretation of ch. xviii. 30, which he thinks may refer either to the Assyrian or Babylonian conquest, on which see the commentary below. 2. The expression "until this day" (ch. i. 21, 26, vi. 24, x. 4, etc.), implies a long lapse of time between the occurrence and the author. But even fifty years would suffice, and the author had a period of four centuries under review. 3. The author was acquainted with regal government in Israel (ch. xvi. 6, xviii. 1, etc.). Undoubtedly, because he lived under Saul, and therefore also, 4. Shiloh had ceased to be the seat of the priesthood. But how all this can be made to prove the composition of the Book of Judges in the Assyrian period, it is hard to say. Bertheau (after others) speaks of a cycle of twelve judges; but to justify this, either Barak or Abimelech must be omitted. The Jews counted fourteen. The number seven can only be got by force; for the Book contains eight extended biographical sketches, to which Othniel is to be added.

1 מָסַח, the difference between which and מָסַח לְכָר, 1 Kgs. ix. 21, is also to be noted.

All such play on numbers, which if the author had intended or found, he would have unquestionably set forth clearly and boldly, can at best neither prove nor disprove anything.

4. But it is precisely the traces by which the author's use of earlier narratives is indicated, that testify to his freedom and originality. They show a natural and living appropriation of sacred history and its teaching, not a slavish and mechanical borrowing. The language of our Book, too, contains expressions not found in the Pentateuch and in Joshua (cf. on ch. ii. 14 and 18, xx. 26, and Keil, l. c.). The manner in which earlier history records occurrences analogous to those which our author has to relate, is recalled with freedom, without servile imitation. Compare, e. g. the account of the appearance of the angel to Gideon and the kindling of his present, with that of the visit of the angels to Abraham (Gen. xviii.) and the kindling of his sacrifice (Gen. xv. 17); the story of Jephthah's vow with Abraham's offering up of Isaac (Gen. xxii.).

Very significant is the clearly discriminating use of the divine names Jehovah and Elohim, the former of which constantly designates the absolute God who has revealed himself to Israel, while the latter expresses the general conception of Deity, as recognized also by heathenism. The nations of Canaan were not without Elohim on whom to call. But Baal and Ash-taroath were false Elohim. Israel had the true Deity, the only Elohim (יהוה-אלהים): the living Jehovah. This God of Israel the heathen, and with them the apostate Israelites themselves, did indeed consider and speak of as an Elohim; but he was no nature-deity, but the God of Israel's history, Jehovah, the Deliverer from Egypt, the mighty wonder-worker, the Creator of all men. The use of the names Jehovah and Elohim is indicative of the difference between Israel and the nations in their relations to the true God and in their views of the universe. It implies not different documents but different spiritual conditions; and the profound subtlety of the narrative is shown nowhere more strikingly than in the alternation of these names. When the heathen Adonibezek speaks, in ch. i., he uses Elohim. Ehud, when he addresses King Eglon, says Elohim; but when he speaks to Israel, Jehovah (cf. ch. iii. 20, 28). Micah's private chapel is merely called a house of Elohim (ch. xvii. 5), although he himself pretends to serve Jehovah. To sinning Ephraim Gideon speaks only of Elohim, just as this name only occurs in the history of Abimelech. The name used corresponds with the spirit of those by whom or in whose ears it is spoken. In Micah's idolatrous temple, in the Shechem of Abimelech's time, and in Ephraim's pride, the fear of the true God of Israel does not manifest itself.

Occasionally, Jehovah and ha-Elohim (האלהים), the God, sc. of Israel, are used interchangeably; but yet not altogether as equivalents. Even the heathen Midianites may speak of the God of Israel as ha-Elohim (ch. vii. 14), but not as Jehovah. The latter is only put into the mouths of such as worship the Holy One in full faith. Very instructive in this respect is the alternation of the divine names in the accounts of the angelophanies to Gideon and the parents of Samson. The angels appear in human form, but their exalted nature shines through the lowlier appearance. On this account, an angel (ch. xiii. 6), as also a prophet, may be called an Ish ha-Elohim, a godlike man; but no one is ever called Ish Jehovah, a Jehovah-like man. That description can be applied to neither angel nor man. The divine appearance in the human form under which the angel comes, can only be described by the term Elohim, or, in so far as its source in the God of Israel is to be specially indicated, by ha-Elohim.<sup>1</sup> True, the expression "Angel of Jehovah" may be used as well as "Angel of ha-Elohim;" but still, in ch. vi. 20, 21, these expressions seem to be distinguished from each other in such a way, that the latter designates the angel simply in his appearance (ver. 20), the former as the possessor of supernatural powers (ver. 21). When Gideon once more hesitates, and desires to assure himself whether he be really the chosen deliverer, and therefore longs to have the reality of the angelic appearance already enjoyed confirmed, he addresses himself to ha-Elohim (vers. 36, 39). It may indeed appear strange that in connection with the answer in ver. 40 simply Elohim is used; but the explanation is that the meaning being plain, the article is omitted as unnecessary.

[1 The author seems to take the genitive in איש האלהים, as a gen. of quality, as in איש דברים, "an eloquent man." But this is certainly incorrect. The expression "man of God," does not indicate subjective character or nature, but objective official relations. First applied to Moses (Deut. xxxiii. 1), it was commonly used to designate a prophet. It denotes a man whom God has taken into relations of peculiar intimacy with himself in order through him to instruct and lead his people. The genitive may be defined as the gen. of the principal, from whom the "man" derives his knowledge and power, and for whom he acts. — Tr.]

5. These discriminations between the divine names are not to be ascribed to our author in any such sense as if the earlier times which he describes, and the sources which came down to him out of them, had not yet possessed any clear perception of them. All tradition, in whatever form he used it, narrative and song, was pervaded with the same consciousness as that which lives in Biblical books and doctrines, from which indeed it had derived them. The Song of Deborah, the documentary character and genuineness of which are undoubted, celebrates with prophetic power the Jehovah of the generations of Israel. The document which Jephthah sends to the king of Ammon shows a living knowledge of the contents and language of the Books of Moses, although it treats both with great freedom. If Gideon did not live in the consciousness of the authoritative God, who revealed himself in the law, and led Israel through the desert into Canaan, he could not say, while refusing an offered crown, "Jehovah shall rule over you" (ch. viii. 23). When Jephthah makes a vow, he makes it not after the model of any heathen usage, but in the language, form, and spirit of the Israelitish vow, as regulated by Moses. The story of Samson becomes intelligible only by the light of the Nazaritic institute of the Pentateuch (Num. vi.). The priestly body comes to view in the service with Urim (ch. i. 2, xx. 18). Respect for the priesthood shows itself plainly, albeit in a perversion of it, in the conduct of Micah (ch. xvii. 13). The officiating Levite is known by his priestly dress, furnished with the prescribed bells (ch. xviii. 3). It is undoubtedly true that the circumstances of the Levites, as they come to view here and there, as also the story in ch. xix., indicate a wretched condition of the order; but decay implies vigor, just as caricature implies truth. The false ephod points to the true; the idol altar of Gideon's father, to that which his son erects in the place of it. The Book of Judges treats of great international conflicts. But these wars are waged by the nations of Canaan not only against the strange people, but against that people's God. No conflict had ever arisen, but for Israel's Jehovah, from whom his people derived their national existence and character, — and, indeed, it was only the living Jehovah, who would not suffer himself to be represented by dead images, that could produce this deep and lasting antagonism. Without him, Israel could not have maintained itself in a struggle of four hundred years, to be finally victorious, and to find itself in possession of solid foundations for future civil and religious life.

Of course, the Book of Judges does not aim at giving a history of the general culture of the age, after the manner of modern times. That it says so little of the priestly institutions and the law, proves only that it presupposes them as known. It is certain, at least, that the discourses of the prophetic messengers (chaps. ii. and x.), like the whole Book, explain the several apostasies of the nation out of the decay of their religious and spiritual life.

To infer from the abnormities that come to view, as the idolatry in Ophrah, the sin of Abimelech, the discord between the tribes under Jephthah, the abomination in Gibeah, and the wretched condition of the Levites, that the law, in all the fullness of its instructions, was not yet known or published, would be a singular procedure. As if during the times succeeding Clovis there had been no churches, no bishops, no Christian people, in Gaul, notwithstanding the horrible deeds of the kings and their helpers! Or as if in our own day and land, in which the Christian Church and Christian doctrine are unquestionably prevalent, the presence and existence of these might nevertheless be denied, because of the abominations of apostasy which come to light, as to morals, in police-reports, and as to doctrine in the myriad books of modern idolatry! It is the nature of Biblical historiography to disclose the truth, without regard to men and without flattery. It does not, in modern fashion, glorify in breathless declamations the dutiful deeds of the "faithful"; it mentions them in few words. But it brings the disgrace and punishment of sin into the foreground, in order to warn against transgression and induce repentance. That it has become common, especially since the rationalistic period, to represent the age of the Judges as wild and barbarous, only shows that men are prone to overlook the vices and bloodshed peculiar to their own day. Our Book covers a space of four hundred years. Now, as the periods of servitude are characterized as times of apostasy, while those of independence are represented as times of order, it is not unimportant to observe that apostasy prevailed during but one third of the time described.

§ 4. Chronology.

1. The Book of Judges contains also chronological data in connection with the occurrences which it records. It is a suggestive fact, with reference to the peculiarities of his sources, and the manner in which he used them, that the first numerical statement of time given by the author refers to the duration of the oppression of Israel by Chushan Rishathaim, king of Aram. Concerning the occurrences between the death of Joshua and the time of Chushan, related in the introductory chapters, no dates are given, and their duration can only be approximately ascertained. The table of chronological data is conveniently divided into two parts: from Chushan to the domination of Ammon, and from that to the death of Samson.

Israel served Chushan . . . . .	8 years.
Had rest under Othniel . . . . .	40 "
Served Moab . . . . .	18 "
Had rest under Ehud . . . . .	80 "	(40 ?)
Served Jabin . . . . .	20 "
Had rest under Barak . . . . .	40 "
Served Midian . . . . .	7 "
Had rest under Gideon . . . . .	40 "
Was ruled by Abimelech . . . . .	3 "
Had Tola for Judge . . . . .	23 "
Jair, Judge . . . . .	22 "
Total . . . . .	301 years.	(261 ?)

Among these numbers, only the statement that after Ehud's victory there followed eighty years of rest, excites special attention. The number forty is by no means an unhistorical, round number. Nevertheless, it seems manifestly to express the duration of a period, particularly that of a generation. In forty years the generation of the desert died out (cf. Num. xiv. 33). The statements that after the achievements of Othniel, Deborah, and Gideon, respectively, a period of forty years passed in rest, bring to light the internal ground of renewed apostasy, already indicated in the introduction (ch. ii. 10), namely, that after the death of the generation which had witnessed the deeds of the heroes, another rose up which had no living remembrance of them. So much stress may properly be laid on this internal ground, as to make the number eighty after Ehud's exploit very remarkable in its singularity; so remarkable, in fact, as to incline one to suppose that the original reading was forty. Apart from every other consideration, this supposition would have much in its favor, if it were certain — which, however, despite the statement in ch. iv. 1, it is not — that the number in question was also intended to give the length of Ehud's subsequent life. It would also give a clearness unusual in chronological matters to the statement of Jephthah that three hundred years had passed since Israel gained a firm footing in Heshbon, beyond the Jordan (ch. xi. 26). For from the year in which Jephthah says this, backward to the first year of Chushan, would on this reckoning be  $261 - 18 = 279$  years. Twenty years would very satisfactorily fill up the gap between the last of Joshua's conquests and the commencement of the Aramæan domination. For although the kings of Sihon and Og were defeated by Moses seven years earlier, the two and a half trans-Jordanic tribes came into possession, properly speaking, only after the conquest of Canaan (Josh. xxii.). If the number eighty be left untouched, we get a period of three hundred and nineteen years from Jephthah back to Chushan's domination, to which the interval of twenty (or twenty-seven) years must be added, for this length of time must in any case have elapsed between the entrance into Canaan and the invasion of Chushan (cf. ch. ii. 10, iii. 7). But it is natural to suppose that Jephthah in his letter to the king of Ammon would use the larger, not the smaller, number of which the case admitted, in order to prove the right of Israel to its land. The change of eighty into forty is also of importance with reference to other chronological combinations, as will appear farther on.

2. In ch. x. 7 the historian states that God, by reason of Israel's renewed apostasy, delivered them into the hands of the Philistines and Ammonites. The statement gives the impression that this domination of these nations over Israel was contemporaneous, but exerted over different parts of the land. The narrative then proceeds to speak first of the tyranny of Ammon, which lasted eighteen years, and then of that of the Philistines, which continued forty years. From the first of these oppressors, Jephthah delivered the eastern tribes; against the other, Samson began the war of liberation.

It certainly seems as if the author of our Book wished to convey the lesson that, as time went on, the condition of kingless Israel became continually worse. At first, hostile attacks had come from one side only; a great victory was then won, and "the land rested." After Gideon, this expression no longer occurs. Moreover, it is never said of subsequent heroes that "they judged;" and the duration of their official activity no longer reaches to forty years. These facts are not to be neglected in our chronological survey.

The combination of the chronological data of the Book of Judges with those found elsewhere, and especially with the well-known statement in 1 Kgs. vi. 1, according to which four hundred and eighty years intervened between the exodus from Egypt and the building of the temple, is still attended with difficulty. Doubtless, the difficulty is itself a most striking proof of the antiquity, originality, and independence of our Book. Had it been composed at a late period, by the same hand that wrote the Books of Kings, would not its author have attempted to get rid of these remarkable difficulties? But the fidelity of the Old Testament tradition never shows itself more clearly than in cases in which, according to modern notions, it had been so easy for an editor to remove all occasion for resorting to hypotheses. For without these, it is at this day impossible to produce agreement. We know that agreement must exist, — for, surely, ancient authors were not incapable of arithmetical addition! — but coercive, scientific proof of it, we do not possess. The opinions of even the oldest Jewish chronologists were divergent. In support of our hypothesis we adduce the passage 1 Sam. xii. 11, where it is said that "Jehovah sent Jerubbaal, and Bedan, and Jephthah, and Samuel," and delivered Israel from their enemies round about. Now, Bedan is, without doubt, to be understood of Samson, the hero out of Dan. The passage, therefore, presents the peculiarity that it places Samson before Jephthah. Keil insists that the Ammonitish and Philistine oppressions occurred, not successively, but simultaneously: It is undoubtedly correct to say, that we are not first to sum up the numbers relating to the occurrences set forth in chaps. xi. and xii. thus: —

Ammon . . . . .	18 years.
Jephthah . . . . .	6 "
Ibzan . . . . .	7 "
Elon . . . . .	10 "
Abdon . . . . .	8 "
<hr/>
Total . . . . .	49 years.

and then add the years of the Philistine domination and those of Samson. Just as in 1 Sam. xii. 11, Samson stands before Jephthah, so in Judg. x. 7 the Philistines are named before the Ammonites: "Jehovah gave Israel into the hands of the Philistines and of the sons of Ammon." That notwithstanding this Jephthah's deeds are first related, has its ground in the fact that in this way the achievements against the Philistines connect themselves with the principal wars of Israel in the days of Samuel and Saul. According to ch. xiii. 1, the Philistine domination lasted forty years. After Samson's great victory at Lehi, it is remarked, ch. xv. 20, and afterwards repeated, that "he judged Israel twenty years." These twenty years cannot be included in the forty. It is against the spirit of the Book, after such a victory to speak of Samson's "judging," and yet to suppose that at the same time Israel continues to be given "into the hands of the Philistines." Therefore, when the prediction concerning Samson (ch. xiii. 5) only says that "he shall begin to deliver Israel," the meaning is that he will not thoroughly subdue them, as was done in the days of Samuel and David, for after the death of Samson their power again became dominant. Now, if this be undoubtedly correct, the supposition that the Ammonitish and Philistine servitudes commenced exactly at the same time, would compel us, notwithstanding 1 Sam. xii. 11, to place Jephthah long before Samson; for the Ammonitish domination lasted only eighteen years, and Jephthah ruled only six. The following conjecture is therefore to be preferred: With Gideon's death the land ceased "to have rest." Judges of forty years' service appear no more; but a servitude of forty years begins. The Philistine attack occurred perhaps soon after Abimelech, induced probably by reports of the discord that prevailed in Israel. While in the North and East Tola and Jair judged forty-five years, the Philistine servitude began in the southwest; and while Ammon oppressed Gilead in the East, Samson smote the Philistines in the southwest. The Gileadites make Jephthah their chieftain "because he had begun to smite the enemy" (cf. on ch. xi. 1, 2); for Samson also had become Judge when he had commenced to put down the Philistines (cf. on ch. xv. 20).

The combination of the chronological data of our Book with those of Samuel and especially the important one in 1 Kgs. vi. 1, is further facilitated by the fact that in 1 Sam. xii. 11, Eli is not named between Jephthah and Samuel. The inference from this omission is, that the forty years during which he ruled, are not to be separately taken into account. He was high-priest during the occurrence of the events in the North and South. The following additional conjectures may therefore be regarded as probable: The war spoken of in 1 Sam. iv. 1, commenced by Israel against the Philistines, may be held to indicate the new vigor which the victories of Samson and the terrible catastrophe at Gaza had infused into the people. About thirty years had probably elapsed since the death of Samson. Then follow twenty years of penitence on the part of Israel (1 Sam. vii. 2), dated from the exile of the ark and its restoration to Kirjath-jearim, that great event with which the Book of Judges is also acquainted. If next, according to ancient tradition, we add forty years for the time of Samuel and Saul, and forty for the reign of David, we arrive at the number four hundred and eighty in a manner sufficiently satisfactory and historically probable, as shown by the following tables:—

Wanderings in the desert . . . . .	40	Chushan . . . . .	8	ABIMELECH . . . . .	3
Conquest of the land . . . . .	7	OTHNIEL . . . . .	40	TOLA . . . . .	23	} = {	Philistines . . . . .	40
Until Chushan . . . . .	20	Moab . . . . .	18	JAIR . . . . .	22		SAMSON . . . . .	20
		EHUD . . . . .	40	Ammon . . . . .	18	} = {	From death
	67	Jabin . . . . .	20	JEPHTHAH . . . . .	6		of Samson to
		BARAK . . . . .	40	IBZAN . . . . .	7		Sam'l, about 30
		Midian . . . . .	7	ELON . . . . .	10
		GIDEON . . . . .	40	ABDON . . . . .	8
				213	97
SAMUEL before the victory (1 Sam. vii. 10)	20	Therefore, From Exodus to Chushan . . . . .	67
SAMUEL and SAUL . . . . .	40	Chushan to Gideon . . . . .	213
DAVID . . . . .	40	Abimelech to Abdon . . . . .	97
SOLOMON . . . . .	3	Samuel to Solomon . . . . .	103
				103					480 years.

Those who accept the eighty years of Ehud, as has hitherto been done, are obliged with Keil to reduce the interval from the death of Moses to Chushan to seventeen years, and that from the death of Jair to Solomon to one hundred and twenty-three, whereby Samson's judgeship vanishes, and no account is taken of the twenty years preceding the victory under Samuel.

3. In conclusion, we remark that in the historical sketch of the Apostle Paul, Acts xiii. 18–20, where he says, ver. 18, “and God nourished (τροφοφόρησεν) them forty years in the wilderness;” ver. 19, “and destroying seven nations in the land of Canaan, he divided their land to them by lot;” ver. 20, “and after that he gave them Judges for about four hundred and eighty years, until Samuel the prophet,” the reading four hundred and eighty can scarcely be the original one. The apostle evidently had his eye on our canonical books: in vers. 17 and 18, on the Books of Moses; in ver. 19, on the Book of Joshua; in ver. 20, on the Book of Judges; for this is followed by references to the Books of Samuel. As he was undoubtedly acquainted with the number four hundred and eighty in Kings, he could not assign four hundred and fifty years to the period from Joshua to Samuel, with which moreover no ancient tradition coincided. The conjectural reading, three hundred and fifty, appears therefore to be preferable; and it is certainly not a matter of indifference that, adding the numbers one after another as was done by Jewish tradition in general, three hundred and fifty years would actually represent the period from Chushan to the end of the Philistine domination. True, it would show that Paul also read only forty years in connection with Ehud. The objection that Paul also assigns a definite period of forty years for the reign of Saul, for which the Old Testament gives no authority, is destitute of force. For the Book of Samuel gives no information at all concerning the length of this king's reign, and the Apostle followed the view, entertained also by Josephus (Ant. vi. 14, 9), according to which the reign of Saul, during and after the lifetime of Samuel, lasted forty years. It was sought in this way to explain 1 Sam. xiii. 1.

[NOTE BY THE TRANSLATOR. Keil and Bachmann, both of whom have repeatedly investigated the chronology of the Book of Judges, have come to conclusions somewhat different from those of our author. As their schemes essentially agree, it will be sufficient to indicate that of Bachmann, the latest published and the least accessible to the English reader. It may be found in his commentary, Das Buch der Richter, vol. i. pp. 53-74. Its turning points so far as they differ from our author's, may be briefly stated as follows: (1.) It adheres in every instance to the numbers given; hence, the period from Chushan to Gideon inclusive (cf. the table above), becomes two hundred and fifty-three years. (2.) It makes the forty years' Philistine servitude come to an end with the victory near Mizpeh. (3.) While it makes the Ammonitish and Philistine servitudes synchronistic in the main, as required by ch. x. 7, it supposes the beginning of the Philistine to fall from three to five years later than that of the Ammonitish oppression. If they began simultaneously, it would follow that a new Judge, Abdon, was somewhere recognized after Samuel had already assembled all the house of Israel, and had shown himself the Judge and deliverer of all Israel (cf. 1 Sam. vii. 3, 5, 6), which is not likely. Abdon, however, having once been recognized as Judge, before the victory under Samuel, might continue to be regarded as such until his death. It is only necessary, therefore, to bring down the beginning of the Philistine servitude far enough to allow of this previous recognition. (4.) It includes the twenty years of Samson in the "days of the Philistines," according to ch. xv. 20. It supposes Samson to begin his work as a young man of eighteen or nineteen years of age (cf. ch. xiv. 4 ff.), and thus allows his birth to fall after the beginning of the Philistine servitude, as demanded by ch. xiii. 5. (5.) As to Eli, since his pontificate ended twenty years before the victory of Mizpeh, its beginning must antedate the commencement of the Philistine oppression by twenty, and the Ammonitish by from fifteen to seventeen years. And, in fact, the earlier years of Eli's pontificate afford no traces of hostile oppression. The people journey to the great festivals regularly and securely (1 Sam. i. 3, 7, 21, 24; ii. 19); and even the sins of the sons of Eli, by which the people also are led astray (1 Sam. ii. 17, 24), are such as bespeak a time of careless security and prosperity. The following table exhibits the results thus obtained, for the time beginning with the Ammonitish and ending with the Philistine oppression. The figures at the left denote years after the death of Jair:—

1 Ammonitish servitude begins in the East, and continues eighteen years.	Eli is in the seventeenth year of his pontificate.
4 . . . . .	In this year or one year earlier or later, the Philistine servitude begins in the West.
18 Jephthah breaks the Ammonitish yoke, and judges six years.
22 . . . . .	Samson begins his career, as a young man of eighteen to nineteen years.
24 Ibzan, Judge, seven years.	Eli dies. Samuel.
31 Elon, Judge, ten years.
41 Abdon becomes Judge, and rules eight years.
42 . . . . .	Samson dies.
44 The third year of Abdon's Judgeship.	The victory near Mizpeh, under Samuel, ends the Philistine servitude, 1 Sam. vii.

Now, allowing ten years, instead of Dr. Cassel's twenty, for the interval between the division of the land and the invasion of Chushan, and retaining the eighty years of Ehud, we get,—

From the Exodus to Chushan, . . . . .	57 years.
From Chushan to Gideon, . . . . .	253 "
From Abimelech to Mizpeh, . . . . .	92 "
Samuel and Saul, 40; David, 40; Solomon, 3, . . . . .	83 "
Total, . . . . .	485 years.

This total, which it would be more proper to express variably as four hundred and eighty-four to four hundred and eighty-six, is not so far away from four hundred and eighty as to occasion any difficulty. In the first place it may be questioned whether the three years of Abimelech ought to be reckoned in; and in the second place, it is highly probable that some of the periods include fractional years, so that the last year of one and the first of the next properly form but one, whereas in the process of addition they come to stand for two. But are not ten years too short to cover the interval between the division of the land and the inroad of Chushan-Rishathaim? No, says Bachmann, p. 72 ff., "for, 1. Nothing demands a lengthened period between the death of Joshua and the beginning of the Mesopotamian servitude. The passage at ch. ii. 11 ff. does not describe an earlier visitation than the Mesopotamian, but merely gives a general view of the causes and consequences of all the visitations about to be related. Under the דור אחר, the "other generation," cf. ch. ii. 10, neither a chronological generation of forty years (Bertheau), nor a familia eminens, that placed itself at the head of the nation (M. Hartmann), is to be understood. Nor does the remark of ch. ii. 7, about the elders who "outlived Joshua," require any considerable number of years. It merely affirms that they outlived him, without saying that they outlived him long. If in the second year of the Exodus these elders were eighteen or nineteen years old (Num. xiv. 29), at the division of the land, that is 38 + 7 years later, they would be sixty-three or sixty-four; and ten years more, until the first hostile oppression, would suffice fully to bring them to that age which according to Ps. xc. 10 constituted the highest average of human life even in the time of Moses. Nor, finally, is it necessary to assign much time to the process of moral deterioration in Israel (ch. ii. 6 ff.); for this began and went on progressively in and even before the days of the elders, and it was only the completed apostasy to idolatry that ensued after their death. 2. From Josh. xiii. 1, compared with xiv. 10 ff. it is evident that Joshua cannot have continued to live long after the division of the land. While the second of these passages represents Caleb, at the age of eighty-five years, still full of youthful strength and perfectly ready to undertake the conquest of his inheritance, the first gives the great age of Joshua as the reason for the command to divide the land, although the conquest was yet far from complete. And since exactly the same expression recurs in ch. xxiii. 1, 2, it is impossible to suppose that the farewell gatherings of chaps. xxiii. and xxiv., which were held shortly before the death of Joshua (ch. xxiii. 14), took place many years later. Neither the ימים רבים, "many days," of ch. xxiii. 1, nor the circumstance that, according to ch. xix. 50, Joshua built a city and lived in it, can prove the contrary; for a few years' time satisfies them both. Nor is there any ground in Ex. xxxiii. 11 and Num. xi. 28 for inferring that Joshua must have lived a considerable time after the division of the land; for the term נָצַר denotes office, not age, and מִבְּדָרָיו, even if we explain it "from his youth" ("of his chosen ones," is probably to be preferred, cf. the Sept. and Vulg.), does not assert that Joshua was then a young man. On the other hand, it is only when we assume that Joshua died at a relatively early date, that the contents of Judg. i. 1-21 appear in their true light. But especially decisive for the utmost possible reduction of the length of the interval in question is the passage Judg. xi. 26. According to this passage, three hundred years had elapsed since Israel took possession of the land on the east of the Jordan. Now, between the Mesopotamian invasion and the death of Jair, there lies a period of three hundred and one, or, excluding Abimelech, two hundred and ninety-eight years. It is evident, therefore, that, reckoning Jephthah's three hundred years from the dismissal of the eastern tribes (Josh. xxii.) to the attack of the Ammonites (Judg. x. 7), the shorter the preceding period be computed, the closer becomes the agreement between the historical fact and the approximate number of Jephthah. It is manifestly more likely that three hundred and eight to three hundred and eleven, than that three hundred and thirty to three hundred and forty or more years, should be roundly represented as three hundred. We hold, therefore, with Lightfoot (Opp. i. 42), S. Schmid, Vitringa, Keil, and others, that an interval of about ten years, as left at our disposal by our computation of the chronology of the whole period, is in fact fully sufficient for the events between the division and the first subjugation of the land; and we accordingly reject, as wholly groundless extensions of the chronological frame, the assumption, since Josephus (Ant. v. 1, 29; vi. 5, 4) almost become traditional, that twenty-five years are to be allowed for Joshua, and eighteen for the "elders;" the computation of various Rabbins (Sed. Olam, Isaaki, Abr. Zakut, and others), which assigns twenty-eight years to Joshua and the "elders" together; and every other similar hypothesis."—TR.]

§ 5. Critical and Exegetical Helps.

1. In the criticism and translation of the Hebrew text, constant use has been made of the large Rabbinic Bible published at Venice, 1617-1618 by Petrus and Laurentius Bragadin, after the Bomberg edition. Compare the preface by Judah Arjeh of Modena, corrector of the work. Use has also been made of the Biblia Universa, published in 1657, at Leipzig, by Christian Kirchner, after the edition of B. A. Montanus. Compare the preface prefixed to the work by the Dean and Theological Faculty of the University of Leipzig. Also of the Biblia Hebraica of Joh. H. Michaelis, Halle, 1720; the Biblia of Döderlein and Meisner, as edited by Knapp, 1819; and the edition of the Book of Judges, with a German translation and commentary, by Mair Obernik, Fürth, 1805.

A treatment of the text such as has recently again been attempted by the wild theories of Geiger, Dozy, and others, is at variance with the laws of objective scientific criticism, and renders textual tradition, language, and contents so many footballs for subjective caprice. Its application is the more to be lamented, since it also increases the difficulties of such criticism as is both necessary and in accord with the spirit of Holy Scripture. But we must not be hindered by excesses of this kind from acknowledging, that it is more in keeping with piety toward the sacred volume to venture upon textual emendations in a few passages than to reject them. This conviction has governed us in the exposition of several passages (cf. on ch. ii. 3, iv. 15, v. 11, vii. 6 and 8), and especially in the treatment of ch. xviii. 30, where it is shown that the antiquity of the current reading is by no means a guaranty of its correctness, but only a proof of the fidelity of the Masoretic tradition.

It is unfortunately impracticable here to institute a closer collation of the Hebrew text with the LXX. and the Targum, as also with Josephus, than has been incidentally done in the exposition. It is, however, a matter sufficiently necessary, not to be neglected hereafter. The beginnings made by Ziegler (Bemerkungen über das Buch d. Richter, in the Theol. Abhandl., Göttingen, 1791) and Frankel (in his Vorstudien zur Septuaginta, Leipzig, 1841) are certainly still in want of a thorough continuation.

The Syriac version of the Books of Judges and Ruth by Paul of Tella (beginning of the 7th century), has been published at Copenhagen, by Th. Skat Rørdam: Libri Judicum et Ruth, secundum versionum Syriaco-Hexaplaem, Havniæ, 1859. The exposition of the Midrash on the Book of Judges, is given in the Jalkut Shimeoni, by R. Simeon, of Frankfurt, Venice edition, printed by Bragadin, tom. ii.

For assistance in gaining acquaintance with Talmudic expositions, the following works may be consulted: Nachalath Shimeoni, by R. Simeon, of Lissa, ed. Wandsbeck; Toledoth Jakob, by R. Jakob Sasportas, Amsterdam, 1657, 4to; Sepher Mareh Kohen, by R. Isachar, Cracow edition, 1689, 4to. The Jewish expositors of the Middle Ages, R. Solomon Isaaki (i. e. Raschi, frequently but improperly called Jarchi), R. David Kimchi (Radak), R. Levi ben Gerson (Ralbag), and other expositions, are found in the large Rabbinic Bibles. The commentary of R. Isaak Abarbanel on the Prophetæ Priores appeared at Leipzig, 1686.

Expositions, partly excellent, of passages of our Book, by the Karaite Aaron, are found in Wolff's Bibliotheca Hebræa, Hamburg, 1715-43. A Jewish German translation in rhyme is found in Koheleth Jakob, Prague, 1763, but with expositions and legends intermixed. A better, older, and literal Jewish German translation appeared at Amsterdam, 1679, fol. In more recent times several synagogue versions of the Holy Scriptures have been printed. Of these that which appeared under the conduct of Dr. Zunz adheres most closely to the Masoretic text, cf. Orient. Literaturbl., 1840, p. 618.

The Book of Judges as a whole did not receive separate and special treatment at the hands of the earlier Christian exegesis. We must here refer to the general introductions to the O. T. for information concerning editions and expositions which include our Book. Jerome, Theodoret, and, later, Rhabanus Maurus and Rupert von Deutz, might be particularly mentioned.

Among the later Roman Catholic expositors Serarius stands preëminent on account of his diligence and voluminousness: Commentarii in libros Judicum et Ruth, Paris, 1611, Moguntiae, 1619. Among Protestant expositors Brentius, Bucer, P. Martyr, Chyträus, Seb. Schmid, Osiander, Starke, and Drusius, are still worthy of attention. The commentary of Le Clerc began the rationalistic mode of exposition, and has furnished it with most of its materials. It is only forty years since the Book began again to receive any real attention. For ten years the commentary of Studer, Das Buch der Richter, grammatisch und historisch erklärt, Bern, 1835, almost entirely controlled the exposition. Valuable matter was contributed by Hengstenberg, die Authentie des Pentateuchs [translated into English by Ryland, under the title Dissertations on the Genuineness of the Pentateuch, Edinburgh, 1847. — Tr.]. Still longer than Studer did Bertheau's exposition, Das Buch der Richter und Rut, Leipzig, 1845, maintain its prominence, to which for that reason special attention is given in the present work. The first volume of C. R. Keil's Biblischer Commentar über die Prophetischen Geschichtsbücher des A. T., containing Joshua, Judges, and Ruth (Leipzig, 1863), appeared after the greater part of our Book was finished. The author's theological attitude, diligence, and erudition are in no need of special characterization in this place. [Since the publication of Dr. Cassel's work, the first volume of a new commentary by Dr. Joh. Bachmann, Professor at Rostock, has appeared, entitled, Das Buch der Richter, mit besonderer Rücksicht auf die Geschichte seiner Auslegung und kirchlichen Verwendung erklärt, etc., Berlin, Ersten Bandes erste Hälfte, 1868, Zweite Hälfte, 1869. Theologically, the author stands on substantially the same ground with Cassel and Keil. His work is thorough and exhaustive. For English works on the whole Bible, cf. the commentary on Matthew, p. 19. We here add: Bush, Notes Critical and Practical on the Book of Judges, New York; and the Books of Joshua, Judges, and Ruth; with Notes and Introductions by Chr. Wordsworth, D. D., London, 1865, forming Part I. of vol. ii. of The Holy Bible; with Notes, etc., by the same author. Dr. Wordsworth is learned and devout, but somewhat too much given to allegorizing. — TR.]

It cannot be desirable to enumerate here all the exegetical introductions and other writings more remotely connected with the business of exposition. For such enumeration we refer to Danz's Universalwörterbuch, to the works named by Dr. Lange in the commentary on Genesis, and to the older general commentaries of Starke, Lisco, and Gerlach. It is sufficient here to mention the Introductions of Hävernick and Keil, Ewald's Geschichte Israels, and Stähelin's Untersuchungen über den Pentateuch, die Bücher Joshua, Richter, etc., Berlin, 1843. Much that is excellent — to confine ourselves to what specially belongs here — is contained in the little work of Prof. Wahl, Ueber den Verfasser des Buches der Richter, a "programme" of the Gymnasium and Realschule at Ellwangen, 1859. Compare also Nägelsbach, s. v. Richter, in Herzog's Real Encyclopädie, vol. xiii.; and in general, the articles of this encyclopædia on the several Judges.

On the chronology of the Book, the following works deserve to be mentioned: Jewish — the Sepher Juchasin, by Abraham Sacuto, Amsterlam, 1717; Tsemach David, by David Gans, in the edition of Vorstius, Hebrew and Latin, 1644, 4to; and Seder Haddoroth, by R. Jehiel, of Minsk, 1810, fol. Herzfeld, Chronologia Judicum et primorum Regum Hebræorum, Berolini, 1836; and Bachmann, Symbolarum ad tempora Judicum recte constituenda specimen (Rostock University "Programme" for 1860). The very latest conjectures may be found in Rockerath, Bibl. Chronologie, Münster, 1865.

2. Of writings treating single parts of the Book of Judges, the number is larger. The Song of Deborah has been especially favored. We mention the following: <sup>1</sup> Lette, Animadversiones Sacrae, L. Bat. 1759. Ruckersfelder, Sylloge comentt. et observatt. philol. exeget., Deventræ, 1762. Wilh. Abrah. Teller, Uebers. des Segens Jakobs und Moses, insgleichen des Liedes der Israeliten und der Debora, etc., Halle and Helmst., 1766. Schnurrer, Diss. in Deboræ-Canticum, Tüb. 1775 (cf. his Dissertt. Phil. Criticae, Gothæ, 1790). Köhler, Nachlese einiger Anmerk. über das Siegeslied der Deb., in Eichhorn's Repertorium for 1780, p. 163 ff. Hollmann, Comment. phil. crit. in Carmen Deboræ, Lips. 1818. Köhler, in the Studien und Kritiken for 1831, pp. 72-76. Kemink, Commentatio de Carmine Deboræ, Traj. ad Rhen., 1840. Kalkar, Questionum Biblic. Specimen, I., Othinæ, 1835. Böttger, in Käuffer's Biblischen Studien (only to ver. 23), Dresden and Leipzig, 1842-44. Gumpach, Alttestamentlichen Studien, Heidelberg, 1852. Sack, Die Lieder in den historischen Büchern des A. T., Barmen, 1864. Among translations, that of Herder, in his Geist der Hebräischen Poesie, ii. 196 (Cotta's edition of his works, 1852), still holds its merited rank. Little known, and yet not unimportant, is that of J. C. W. Scherer, in Irene, a monthly periodical by G. A. v. Halem, Münster, 1804, i. 44. Less valuable is Debora, a Portrait of Female Character, by E. Münch, in Minerva, an annual, for 1828, p. 339. Many excellent remarks on the Song of Deborah are found in Lowth's celebrated book on Hebrew Poetry; but the annotations of Schmidt (in Auszüge aus Lowth's Vorlesungen, Dantzig, 1793) are worthless.

In the exposition of the Song below, compression has been so much sought after, that its brevity, in view of the many new explanations that are offered, may be deemed a fault. Some improvement may perhaps be made in this respect hereafter.

The history of Jephthah has experienced an equally abundant treatment. To the literature mentioned in the exposition below, we here add the following: Reinke, Beiträge zur Erklärung des A. T., Münster, 1852. Very sensible remarks against the assumption that Jephthah's daughter was sacrificed are found in Schedius, Syngramma de Diis Germanis, Halæ, 1728. A discourse on "Jephthah's Sacrifice," with special reference to the importance of vows of homage, may be found among the Discourses of the Stolberg Chancellor, Joh. Titius, Halberstadt, 1678. F. Ranke, also, in his Klaglied der Hebräer, felt himself obliged to follow the old view. It is a curiosity of uncommon ignorance that in the French Opera L'Enfant Prodigue, of Sue and Auber, the bride of the Prodigal, that is to say, a woman, is named Jephthah.

<sup>1</sup> The Jewish traditions concerning Deborah are given in a popular form in Brit Israel, Amsterdam, 1724.

Roskoff, in his work Die Simsonssage, nach ihrer Entstehung, Form, und Bedeutung, und der Heraklesmythus, Leipzig, 1860, gives the literature of those writings in which Samson is put on a parallel with Hercules. The author's own zeal for the parallelism is far more moderate than that of E. Meier, for instance, in his Gesch. der poetischen Nationalliteratur der Hebräer, Leipzig, 1856. But even his admissions we have not been able to consider well founded and trustworthy. We cannot believe, for instance, that there is such similarity between the answer to Samson's prayer, after his exploit at Lehi, and the myth which recounts how Hercules, when unable to sleep on account of crickets, got rid of them, as to make it a safe foundation for scientific results. And it is only the thorough-going establishment of the historical and moral as well as ideal difference between the two characters that can give any real significance to other analogies that may exist, and that appear to suggest themselves so plainly. In the commentary on the narrative we have engaged in no polemics, but have attempted a positive exposition of the ideas contained in it.

Single parts of Samson's life were formerly frequently treated. As against the boundlessly insipid and wretched views of the so-called rationalistic exposition, which reached its acme in Baur's Biblicher Moral, 1803, i. 195 ff. the modern mythical apprehension is, to a certain extent, a real advance. But it is only by setting aside the subjective party opinions of the day, and by adopting a mode of apprehending the narrative that shall be at once objective, historical, and congenial to its contents, that exegesis can claim to be scientific or be capable of advancing science. A beautiful eulogium of Samson as compared with Hercules is found in Petri Labbe Elogia Sacra, Lips. 1686, p. 667:—

"Herculi cœtaneus versus Hercules fuit; Quæ in illo fabula, in hoc fuere miracula."

"Samson's Foxes" are treated of by Paullini, in his Philosoph. Luststunden, i. 147. Essays on the jawbone in Lehi are named below. Schiller, perhaps, had the miracle of Lehi in mind in his ballad Der Bürgschaft, verses twelve and thirteen, where Möros in answer to prayer is delivered from thirst by water issuing from the rock. In the Wiltinasage (ed. Peringskiöld, p. 272), Sigurd, who has freely allowed himself to be bound, at the right time rends all his cords asunder. Thackeray relates (in his Four Georges, ch. vii.) that when George III. of England was blind and mentally diseased, he nevertheless selected himself the music for sacred concerts, and always from the Samson of Milton and Händel, and all his selections had reference to blindness, imprisonment, and suffering. There is a dramatic poem in three acts, by Sack, entitled Simson, Zurich, 1854.

The narrative in Judg. i. 17 is supposed to be improved and supplemented in the work of the Leiden Professor, Dozy: De Israeliten te Mekka, van Davids tyd tot in de vyfde eeuw onser tydrekening, Haarlem, 1864. German translation, Leipzig, 1864. If any book can bring contempt and ridicule on philological and ethnographical investigations and expositions, it is this volume. Few books can ever have been written whose authors presumed, to such an extent, and with such naive boldness, to substitute subjective arbitrariness for objective tact and moderation in the treatment of history and language. It is here made clear how little a knowledge of Arabic literature implies a fitness for historical investigation and conjecture. It happens unfortunately too often that some knowledge of technology imagines itself to be master of art, and that some acquaintance with grammatical forms deems itself proficient in exegesis. Let it not be thought that this judgment is here written down because Prof. Dozy holds the freest views of the Bible, considers Abraham and Sarah to be myths, and subscribes to Geiger's opinion that the Jews falsified Scripture. For Prof. Dozy, the credibility of Scripture is conditioned by the necessities of his hypothesis. If a passage suits him, it is by all means to be accepted; if it does not suit him, the reasons for rejecting it are at once apparent. The book, likely to dazzle and deceive by reason of its unequaled audacity and the splendor of its exterior, deserves the severest censure, because it treads under foot all lawful methods of scientific and philological research. A few sentences, having reference to the above-mentioned passage will show this.

We pass over his identification of the fact recorded at Num. xxi. 2, 3, with that related in Judg. i. 17, for therein he follows others. But he thinks that the reading of the Syriac and Arabic versions, "Simeon went with Judah his brother," is better than that of the Hebrew text (which the Sept. has also), "Judah went with Simeon his brother." The Hebrew text, he thinks, was altered by the Jewish doctors, "who begrudged Simeon the first rôle." Now, the matter stands thus: In ver. 3 Judah invites Simeon to assist him to subjugate the territory allotted to him, promising that he will afterwards help him (Simeon) to take possession of his also. Simeon consents, "and," says the writer, "Simeon went with him (Judah). Simeon therefore stands first in this instance, and yet the envy of the Jews did not alter the clause. When the turn came to Simeon's territory, to which Zephath belongs, Judah rendered assistance to Simeon; consequently ver. 17 says, "and Judah went with Simeon." If rank comes into consideration at all in this expression, it belongs to the second named, to whom he who goes with him merely renders assistance. If the Peshito reversed the order in ver. 17, it was only to bring about a verbal agreement with ver. 3 b.

Simeon and Judah had smitten the Canaanites in Zephath, inflicted the ban upon them, and given to Zephath the name Hormah (prop. Chormah) from cherem, cf. below on ch. i. 17. Now this putting under the ban was not anything peculiar to these two tribes. Moses had done it in behalf of all Israel (Num. xxi. 3). Its infliction throughout the conquest was expressly enjoined, Deut. vii. 2. Joshua executed it in Jericho, in Ai, and everywhere else (cf. Josh. vi. 17, vii. 10, etc.). But Dozy finds in the ban (cherem) something peculiar to the tribe of Simeon; and combining this assumption with the narrative in 1 Chron. iv. 24-43, where (ver. 41) we read of a ban executed by the tribe of Simeon, he arrives at the following conclusion: "Since the sons of Simeon made and inflicted the ban (וַיִּחְרֹם), it follows that they made a herem." The place therefore "was called Herem or Hormah." But what place in Arabia—for that the place was in Arabia similar reasonings have previously proved—could be called Herem but Mecca! For Herem means also a "place consecrated to God," and Mecca is called Haram, which is equivalent to Herem. Therefore, the battle of the sons of Simeon took place in Mecca; and even the name Mecca dates from it; for maka raba signifies a great defeat, to wit, that which the enemy there suffered at the hands of Simeon. The Simeonites came to the entrance of Gedor, on the east side of the valley (1 Chron. iv. 39). Now, of course, the walls of the old temple in Mecca were called al gadr (al gidar = the wall); consequently, Gedor is to be read Geder, and signifies the temple in Mecca, to which they came. It must, however, be read Geder Baal, although the second word be wanting; for 2 Chron. xxvi. 7 speaks of Arabians who dwelt in Gur Baal, and Gur is to be read Geder. The LXX. at this place speaks of Arabians dwelling ἐν τῇ πέτρᾳ. Common sense would think of Petra; but Dozy knows that they mean the black stone in Mecca, etc.

Dozy says at the beginning, that exegesis requires so much learning only because it deals with "Hebrew books." Unquestionably! for where but in Hebrew exegesis would one dare to be guilty of such scientific folly! Had one ventured to do this in the domain of classical philology, he would have experienced the fate with which the philosophers menaced Homer when they threatened to drive him from the stadium with scourges.

All science becomes impossible, when credible objective tradition is made the plaything of subjective caprice. We cannot here enter farther into details; these must be left for other places. For those who know, it is enough to say, that if such arguments are valid, the next thing will be, instead of the Israelites in Mecca, a book on "the Meccans in Zion."

Science, too, needs to experience the promise written in Ezek. xxxix. 29.

§ 6. The Course of Thought.<sup>1</sup>

The Book derives its name from the Judges whom God raised up to guide and deliver Israel. It begins, therefore, by depicting the sins and consequent sufferings into which Israel fell after the death of Joshua, and which rendered the judgeship necessary.

[1 The following paragraphs were written by the author as "Preliminary Observations" to the "Homiletical Hints," which he gives in a body at the close of the commentary, and not, as in the other volumes of this work, after the several sections to which they refer. It was thought advisable in translating the book to alter this arrangement and make it conform to that observed in other parts of the general work. The more detailed analysis of the contents, as also the formal division of the work itself into parts and sections, together with the resumés placed at the head of each division throughout the work, have been added by the translator, guided for the most part by hints, and largely even in the language of the author himself. It is proper to add that these are the only additions that have not been inclosed in brackets.

—Ta.]

After this introduction follows the main body of the work, which treats of the history of Israel under the Judges themselves. The raising up of the successive heroes exhibits with ever-growing lustre the gracious guidance of God, revealing itself more and more wonderfully as the distress into which Israel falls becomes more pressing. The selection of the several judges and heroes forms a climax of divine wonders, in which the multiformity of Jehovah's saving resources shows itself in contrast with the monotonousness of Israel's sins, and the workings of His grace in the hidden and obscure in opposition to that pride of the people in which their falls originated. The histories of the Judges, especially those of Othniel, Ehud, Deborah and Barak, Gideon, Jephthah, and Samson, through whom and their adherents the great and merciful deeds of God do show themselves in ever-increasing fullness, form the sections into which the Book may be divided. From Othniel to Samson, under whom the history returns to the tribe of Judah from which it started, every Judge illustrates a new side of God's wonderful assistance. This manifoldness characterizes the judgeship. It rests on no tradition. The changes of the persons and tribes entrusted with its functions, interrupt its efficacy. The narrative gradually indicates the want of unity, despite the abundance of strength. Hence that which peculiarly characterizes the judgeship, marks at the same time its imperfection. For even times of peace admitted of such occurrences as those which fill the closing part of the Book, after the record of Samson's death.

In the closing part of the Book, the decay of the priesthood, the arbitrariness of individuals, and the abominations of licentiousness, passion, and discord, are traced back to the want of a settled, permanent government. The close of the Book of Judges forms an introduction to the Books of Kings.

The following analysis indicates a little more in detail the course of the narrative as sketched above:—

PART FIRST.

Introductory delineation of the condition of Israel after the death of Joshua; sin, and the judgments entailed by it, rendering the judgeship necessary. Chaps. i.—iii. 4.

1st Section. The relations of Israel towards the remaining Canaanites, as forming the background of the ensuing history. Believing and obedient Israel enjoys divine direction and favor, is united within and victorious without; but faithlessness and disobedience lay the foundations of apostasy and servitude. Ch. i.

2d Section. The religious degeneracy of Israel which resulted from its disobedient conduct with respect to the Canaanites, and the severe discipline which it rendered necessary, as explaining the alternations of apostasy and servitude, repentance and deliverance, characteristic of the period of the Judges. Chaps. ii.—iii. 4.

PART SECOND.

The history of Israel under the Judges: a history of sin, ever repeating itself, and of divine grace, constantly devising new means of deliverance. Meanwhile, however, the imperfections of the judicial institute display themselves, and prepare the way for the appointment of a king. Chaps. iii. 5.—xvi.

1st Section. The servitude to Chushan Rishathaim, King of Mesopotamia. Othniel, the Judge of blameless and happy life. Ch. iii. 5—11.

2d Section. The servitude to Eglon, King of Moab. Ehud, the Judge with the double-edged dagger. Shamgar, the deliverer with the ox-goad. Ch. iii. 12—31.

3d Section. The servitude to Jabin, King of Canaan. Deborah, the female Judge of fiery spirit, and Barak, the military hero. Chaps. iv., v.

4th Section. The incursions and oppressions of the Midianites. Gideon, the Judge who refuses to be king. Chaps. vi.—viii.

5th Section. The usurped rule of Abimelech, the fratricide and thorn-bush king. Ch. ix.

6th Section. Two Judges in quiet, peaceful times: Tolah of Issachar, and Jair the Gileadite. Ch. x. 1—5.

7th Section. The oppression of the Midianites. Jephthah, the Judge of the vow. Chaps. x. 6—xii. 7.

8th Section. Three Judges of uneventful lives in peaceful times: Ibzan of Bethlehem, Elon the Zebulonite, and Abdon the Pirathonite. Ch. xii. 8—15.

9th Section. The oppression of the Philistines. Samson the Nazarite Judge. Chaps. xiii.—xvi.

PART THIRD.

The conclusion of the Book, tracing the evils of the period, the decay of the priesthood, the self-will of individuals, and the prevalence of licentiousness, passion, and discord, to the absence of a fixed and permanent form of government. Chaps. xvii.-xxi.

1st Section. The history of Micah's private temple and image-worship: showing the individual arbitrariness of the times, and its tendency to subvert and corrupt the religious institutions of Israel. Chaps. xvii., xviii.

2d Section. The story of the infamous deed perpetrated at Gibeah, and its terrible consequences: another illustration of the evils that result when "every man does what is good in his own eyes." Chaps. xix.-xxi.

THE BOOK OF JUDGES.

PART FIRST.

INTRODUCTORY Delineation of the Condition of Israel after the Death of Joshua ; Sin, and the Judgments entailed by it, rendering the Judgeship necessary.

FIRST SECTION.

THE RELATIONS OF ISRAEL TOWARDS THE REMAINING CANAANITES AS FORMING THE BACKGROUND OF THE ENSUING HISTORY. BELIEVING AND OBEDIENT ISRAEL ENJOYS DIVINE DIRECTION AND FAVOR, IS UNITED WITHIN AND VICTORIOUS WITHOUT ; BUT FAITHLESSNESS AND DISOBEDIENCE LAY THE FOUNDATIONS OF APOSTASY AND SERVITUDE.

"Who shall first go up against the Canaanite?"

CHAPTER I. 1, 2.

1 Now [And] after the death of Joshua it came to pass, that the children [sons] of Israel asked the Lord [Jehovah],<sup>1</sup> saying, Who shall go up for us<sup>2</sup> against<sup>3</sup> the 2 Canaanites first to fight against them? And the Lord [Jehovah] said, Judah shall go up : behold,<sup>4</sup> I have delivered the land into his hand.

• TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[<sup>1</sup> Ver. 1. — The author renders : "the sons of Israel asked God;" and by way of explanation adds the following note : "Thus do we intend constantly to render יהוה, on the ground that it expresses the absolute idea of the true God in Israel. Since יהוה is also used in connection with heathen worship, it corresponds to our 'Godhead, Deity' or 'the Gods.'" In this translation the word Jehovah will be inserted. — Tr.]

[<sup>2</sup> Ver. 1. — מִי־יֵעָלֶה. Dr. Cassel takes לָנוּ in a partitive sense, and translates, "who of us shall go up." It is more properly regarded as dat. commodi ; for, (1.) The partitive relation, though sometimes indicated by ל (apparently, however, only after numerals, cf. Ges. Lex. s. v. ל, 4 b), would be more properly expressed by אֶל or מִן ; and (2.) If the writer had intended to connect לָנוּ with מִי, he would not have placed the verb between them, cf. Is. xiv. 14 ; Judg. xxi. 8. As it stands, the expression is a perfect grammatical parallel with Is. vi. 8 : מִי־יֵעָלֶה. Moreover, לָנוּ, in the sense of אֵלָינוּ or מִלִּפְנֵינוּ, adds nothing which is not already implied in the words, מִי־יֵעָלֶה בְּתוֹכָם, "who shall first go up." On the other hand, taken in its natural sense, as indirect object after the verb, it expresses the thought that whoever "goes first," makes a beginning, will do it for the advantage of all. What that advantage was, may be seen from our author's exposition of the inquiry. — Tr.]

[<sup>3</sup> Ver. 1. — אֶל, properly, towards. Dr. Cassel has gegen, which means both "towards" and "against." The same preposition occurs in vers. 10, 11 ; and though translated "against," is not to be taken in the sense of אֶל. The hostile intent in these passages is not expressed by לֹא, but appears from the context. In this verse, attention to the proper meaning of לֹא does away with the appearance of tautology which in English the inquiry presents — Ta.]

[<sup>4</sup> Ver. 2. — Dr. Cassel: "Wohlan! Up then!" On this rendering of וְהָיָה, cf. the foot-note on p. 23. — Ta.]

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

Ver. 1. And after the death of Joshua it came to pass. This commencement corresponds entirely with that of Joshua, ch. i. 1: "and after the death of Moses, the servant of Jehovah, it came to pass." On account of this correspondence the usual addition, "the son of Nun," but also the designation "servant of Jehovah," elsewhere applied to Joshua (Josh. xxiv. 29; Judg. ii. 8), is omitted. A similar correspondence exists between Josh. xxiv. 29, and Deut. xxxiv. 5. Wherever Joshua is compared with Moses, care is taken to indicate at the same time the important difference between them. Joshua also is a "servant of Jehovah," but not in the same high sense as his master. Joshua also died, but not like Moses "through the mouth of Jehovah" (עַל פִּי יְהוָה). Moses was clothed with the authority of origination and establishment. He had been the Father (cf. Num. xi. 12), the Priest (Ex. xxiv. 8), the sole Regent (Num. xvi. 13), and Judge (Ex. xviii. 16), of his tribes. He transferred the priesthood from himself to Aaron (Ex. xxviii. 1); he selected those who assisted him in deciding minor lawsuits (Ex. xviii. 21; Num. xi. 17). He took seventy men of the "elders of the people," to bear with him the burden of governing the tribes (Num. xi. 16); he imparted of his own honor to Joshua, that the congregation

1 If in Ex. vi. 20, 23, the order is "Aaron and Moses," it is only to indicate Aaron as the first-born; hence, ver. 27 of the same chapter, as if by way of correction, says, "these are that Moses and Aaron." For the same reason Num. iii. 1 reads: "These are the generations of Aaron and Moses." As the order is everywhere Moses and Aaron, so it is naturally also "Moses and Eleazar." This difference in the relations of Moses and Joshua respectively to the Priest, it is important to notice. For it is of itself sufficient to show the unenableness of Bertheau's assertion (Buch der Richter, p. 9), that Num. xvii. 21 is to be so taken that Joshua is to ask, not before, but for, instead of, Eleazar, whether he shall go out: that is (as he thinks), "in a manner just as valid as if the high-priest had inquired of Jehovah." To inquire of God by means of the Urim, the Priest alone could do, for he alone had it. Moses and the prophets received revelations immediately; but when the Urim is mentioned, the Priest is the only possible medium. The passages to which Bertheau refers, speak against his assertion. The LXX. are as plain as the Hebrew text. In 1 Sam. xxii. 10, it is the Priest who inquires of God for David. Josephus, Ant. iv. 7, 2, is an irrelevant passage, and therefore cannot be cited at all. Moreover, Josephus himself puts Eleazar before Joshua, when he speaks of both (iv. 7, 8). Nor is there any good ground for doubt as to the clearness of the passage in Num. xxvii. If we find no mention anywhere of Joshua's having inquired by Urim, the foundation of this fact is deeply laid in his relations to Moses. He was called only to be the executor of the designs of Moses. His activity expends itself in continuing the work of Moses. It moves entirely within the lines prescribed by Moses, and is impelled by his inviolable authority. Joshua's deeds are but the historical outgrowth of the spirit of Moses. The Book of Joshua is but the narrative of Joshua's obedience to the word of Moses. Whatever Joshua ordains, is rendered sacred by an appeal to Moses. Even the division of the land is conducted according to this authority (Josh. xiii.-xv.). "Every place have I given you, as I said unto Moses," is the language used (Josh. i. 8). Remember what Moses commanded you, says Joshua to the tribes of Reuben, Gad, and Manasseh (Josh. i. 13). The fact is brought out of Israel might obey him (Num. xxvii. 20.) With the death of Moses the work of legislation is closed.

After him, Joshua exercises the authority of government and direction. By his deeds he gains for himself respect among the people, like that which Moses had (Josh. i. 5, i. 17, iv. 14, xvii. 4, xviii. 3); similar wonders are wrought through him: but he executes only inherited commands; his task demands the energy of obedience. Moses had always been named before Aaron (Moses and Aaron);<sup>1</sup> but when Joshua and the Priest were named together, Eleazar stood first. (Thus, Num. xxxiv. 17; Josh. xiv. 1, xvii. 4, xix. 51, xxi. 1). When Moses lived, the priesthood received their commands through him; after his death, Joshua received support and aid through the Priest (Num. xxvii. 21). In accordance with this, we must understand what is said, Josh. i. 1, namely, that "the Lord spake unto Joshua." For henceforth "there arose not a prophet like unto Moses." That which Moses was, could not repeat itself in any other person. Joshua, therefore, was only the reflection of a part of the power of Moses; but as such he had conducted the first historical act of fulfillment demanded by the Mosaic law. The conquest of Canaan was the necessary presupposition of the Mosaic system. Israel, having been liberated, received a national homestead. When Joshua died, the division of the land among the tribes was completed. With the death of Moses with peculiar emphasis in the following passages: "Be strong and very courageous to do according to all the laws which Moses my servant commanded thee: turn not from it to the right hand or the left" (Josh. i. 7). "There was not a word of all that Moses commanded which Joshua read not before all the congregation of Israel" (Josh. viii. 35). "As the Lord commanded Moses his servant, so did Moses command Joshua, and so did Joshua; he left nothing undone of all that the Lord commanded Moses" (Josh. xi. 15).

Wherever, therefore, Joshua simply executes the will of God as expressed in the commands of Moses, the necessity for inquiring by Urim does not arise. It is precisely in this execution of the Mosaic commands that God speaks to Joshua, as Josh. iv. 10 clearly teaches: "until everything was finished that the Lord commanded Joshua to speak, according to all that Moses commanded Joshua." The direct command of God to Moses operates on Joshua who executes it.

That Joshua is the executor of the commands of Moses, cannot consistently with the spirit of the book which relates his history, be overlooked. When, however, the decision by Urim is alluded to, and it is said, "according to his mouth" (עַל פִּי), the reference is to the same (priestly) mouth which, Josh. xix. 50, assigns an inheritance to Joshua, "according to the mouth of Jehovah" (עַל פִּי יְהוָה).

This method of decision comes into play when Joshua has no instructions from Moses according to which to act. The peculiar position of Joshua, by whom, through the word of Moses, God still always speaks and acts as through Moses (Josh. iii. 7), and who nevertheless does not like Moses stand before, but after, the priest, becomes everywhere manifest. This position also is unique, and never again recurs. It is therefore at his death, and not till then, that the preponderance of the Priest as the sole possessor of the word of God, becomes fully manifest. The fact, therefore, that we now first hear of an "asking of the Lord," so far from being obscure, is full of instruction on the historical position of affairs.

the spirit revealed in the law enters upon its course through the history of the world. With the departure of Joshua, the national development of Israel in Canaan commences. The position of Moses was unique, and like that of a father, could not be refilled. When he dies, the heir assumes the house and its management. This heir was not Joshua, but the people itself. Joshua was only a temporary continuator of the Mosaic authority, specially charged with the seizure of the land. He was but the executive arm of Moses for the conquest (מִשְׁרָף, "minister," Josh. i. 1). His personality is inseparable from that of Moses. As Elijah's spirit does not wholly depart from the nation until Elisha's death, so the personal conduct and guidance of the people by Moses do not entirely cease until the death of Joshua. Joshua's activity is just as unique as that of his teacher. He is no lawgiver, but neither is he a king or judge, as were others who came after him. He is the servant of Jehovah, inasmuch as he is the minister of Moses. The correspondence between Judg. i. 1 and Josh. i. 1, is therefore a very profound one. The death of the men, which these verses respectively record, gave rise to the occurrences that follow.

The sons of Israel asked Jehovah. Literally: "And it came to pass . . . and the sons of Israel asked," etc. The first "and" (ו) introduces the cause,<sup>1</sup> the second the consequence. It is moreover intimated that the consequence is speedy in coming, follows its cause without any interval. The translation might have been: "And it came to pass . . . that the sons of Israel immediately asked;" or, "Scarcely had Joshua died, when the sons of Israel," etc. It lies in the nature of the Hebrew copula, that when it introduces a consequence, it also marks it as closely connected with its antecedent in point of time. The Greeks and Romans made similar use of καὶ and et. Cf. the line of Virgil (Æneid, iii. 9): Vix prima incepit aetas, et pater Anchises dare fatis vela jubebat. The Hebrew idiom has also passed over into the Greek of the New Testament, cf. Luke ii. 21; καὶ ὅτε ἑπλήθυνον ἡμέραι οὐκ ὀλίγαι . . . καὶ ἐκλήθη, etc.: "and the child was eight days old, when forthwith it was named Jesus," where the Gothic version likewise retains the double yah, "and." This brings out the more definite sense, both in the parallel passage, Josh. i. 1, and here. Scarcely had Moses died, is the idea there, when God spake to Joshua. The government of Israel was not for a moment to be interrupted. Scarcely was Joshua dead, when the sons of Israel asked Jehovah. As Joshua succeeded Moses in the chief direction of affairs, so the congregation of the children of Israel succeeded Joshua. The representatives of this congregation, as appears from Josh. xxiv. 31 and Judg. ii. 7, are the Elders (זִקְנֵי). Jewish tradition, accordingly, makes the spiritual doctrine pass from Moses to Joshua, and from Joshua to the Elders. These Elders are the seventy men chosen by Moses (Num. xi. 16) to assist him in bearing the burden of the people. The term "Elder," it is true, is applied to every authority among the people, especially civil. "Elders," as representatives of the people, are witnesses of the wonders of God in the desert (Ex. xvii. 5). The "Elders" are judges<sup>2</sup> (Deut. xxii. 16); the civil authorities of each city are "Elders" (Deut. xxv. 7). "Seventy of the Elders," with Moses and the priests, behold the glory of God (Ex. xxiv. 1, seq.). The שֹׁטְרִים, shoterim, officers charged with executive and police duties, become "Elders" as soon as they execute the regulations of Moses among the people (Ex. xii. 21). The seventy Elders who assisted Moses in bearing the burden that pressed upon him must, therefore, be distinguished from the authorities of the several tribes and cities. They represent the whole nation. As such, they unite with Moses, at the close of his career, in commanding the people to keep the law, and after passing the Jordan to erect a memorial of great stones (Deut. xxvii. 1, 2). During the regency of Joshua, the authorities and representatives of the people, beside the priests and Levites, consist of Elders, heads of tribes, judges, and magistrates (shoterim). Such is the enumeration after the conquest of Ai, and particularly in Josh. xxiii. 2, where, in order to give his last instructions to Israel, Joshua calls all the representatives of the people together. Again, in ch. xxiv. 1, it is stated that Joshua "called for the Elders of Israel, and for their heads, judges, and magistrates." If no distinction were intended here, it had been sufficient to say, "elders and heads;" for judges and magistrates were also "elders." But he called together the national representatives and those of the several tribes, like two "Houses" or "Chambers." The tribal representatives and authorities he dismisses; but the "Elders," who belong to all the tribes in common, remain near him, as they had been near Moses. These, therefore are they who, when Joshua dies, step into his place. As on him, so on them, there had been put of the spirit that was on Moses (Num. xi. 17). They quickly and zealously undertake the government. They determine to begin at once where Joshua stopped, to make war on the nations who have not yet been conquered, though their lands have been assigned to the several tribes (Josh. xxiii. 4). Joshua is scarcely dead, before the Elders inquire of God.<sup>3</sup>

No father ever cared for his children as Moses, under divine direction, cared for his people. Who, then, when he is gone, shall determine what the people are or are not to undertake? The answer to this question is recorded Num. xxvii. 21: After the death of Moses, Joshua is to stand before Eleazar the priest, inquire of him after the judgment of Urim from Jehovah, and according to his answer they shall go out and come in. That Joshua ever did this, the book which bears his name nowhere records. It is characteristic of his exceptional position, as bound by the word and directions of Moses,

<sup>1</sup> [BRETHAU: "וַיִּשְׁאָל" in conjunction with the words, 'after the death of Joshua,' first connects itself with the closing narrative of the Book of Joshua (xxiv. 29-38), and secondly designates the Book of Judges as a link in the chain of books which relate, in unbroken connection, the [sacred] history of the world, from the creation to the exile of the inhabitants of the southern kingdom. The several books which contain this connected historical account are joined together by the connective וַ—Ta.]

<sup>2</sup> Cf. Josephus, Ant. iv. 8, 14, who states on the authority of Jewish tradition that there were in every city seven judges, each with two Levitical assistants, corresponding to the seventy-two of the general senate.

<sup>3</sup> [BACHMANN: "The sons of Israel here are not the whole nation, but only the tribes west of the Jordan, who are spoken of in the same way, and in express contradistinction from the tribes east of the Jordan, in Josh. xii. 12, 13, 32. According to Josh. xiii. and xlii. the further conflict with the Canaanites was incumbent on the western, not on the eastern tribes. Hence, also, the following account treats only of the doings and omissions of the western Israel." — Ta.] that the word of God comes directly to him, although he ranks after Eleazar the priest. But this is not the position of the congregation of Israel; and hence the provision made by Moses for Joshua now formally becomes of force. For the first time since Num. xxvii. 21, we find here the word שָׁאַל with פְּ, in the signification "to inquire of Jehovah;" for the שָׁאַל בַּחַיִּים of that passage and the שָׁאַל בִּיהוָה of this are equivalent expressions. Inquiries put to the Urim and Thummim were answered by none but God. In the sublime organism of the Mosaic law every internal thought, every spiritual truth, presents itself in the form of an external action, a visible symbol. Urim and Thummim (Light and Purity) lie in the breast-plate on the heart of the priest, when he enters into the sanctuary (Ex. xxviii. 30). They lie on the heart; but that which is inquired after, receives its solution from the Spirit of God in the heart of the priest. Consequently, although in the locus classicus (Num. xxvii. 21), the expression is, "to inquire of the Urim," here and elsewhere in the Book of Judges it is always, "and they inquired of Jehovah." The Greeks also used the expression ἀπορᾶν τὸν θεόν for "inquiring of the oracle," cf. Xenoph., Mem., viii. 3). The Urim also were an oracle, and a priest announced the word of God. The God of Israel, however, does not speak in riddles (Num. xii. 8), but in clear and definite responses. Israel asks:—

Who of us<sup>1</sup> shall first go up against the Canaanite to fight against him? The word "go up" is not to be taken altogether literally. The Hebrew עָלָה, here and frequently answers in signification to the Greek ἀπορᾶν, Latin aggredi. It means to advance to the attack, but conceives the defense as made from a higher level. The point and justification of the inquiry lies in the word "first." The question is not whether aggressive measures shall or shall not be adopted, but which of the tribes shall initiate them. Hitherto, Moses, and after him, Joshua have directed the movements of the people. Under Joshua, moreover, all the tribes united in common warfare. All for one, each for all. The general war is at an end; the land is divided, the tribes have had their territories assigned them. Now each single tribe must engage the enemies still settled within its borders. This was another, very difficult task. It was a test of the strength and moral endurance of the several tribes. The general war of conquest under Joshua did not come into collision with the joy of possession and rest, for these had as yet no existence. But after the dispersion of the tribes such a common war, under one leadership, was no longer practicable. It may also have appeared unwise that all the tribes should be engaged in general and simultaneous action within their several territories. Had one tribe been defeated, the others would not have been in a position to assist it. The question therefore concerned the honor and duty of the first attack. As yet no tribe held any definite priority of rank. For the sake of peace and right, it was left with God to determine who should first go up to fight against the inhabitants of the land, to grind them, as the word used expresses it, and thus deprive them of that power for evil which as nations they possessed. The signification "to war" of לָחָם, is illustrated by the meaning "to eat," which it also has. The terrible work of war is like the action of the teeth on bread, it tears and grinds its object. Hence the Greek μάχαμα, knife, belongs to μάχομαι, to fight, just as the Hebrew כַּף, knife, belongs to כָּלַל, to eat.

Ver. 2. And Jehovah said, Judah shall go up. Judah takes a prominent position among the sons of Jacob, even in the lifetime of their father. The misdemeanors of his elder brethren favor this. It is he who saves Joseph from the pit in which the wrath of the others designed him to perish; and who, by suggesting his sale into Egypt, paves the way for the wonderful destinies which that land has in store for Israel. He is capable of confessing his sins (Gen. xxxviii. 26). He pledges himself to Jacob for the safe return of Benjamin, and him the patriarch trusts. He, also, in the hour of peril, speaks the decisive word to the yet unrecognized Joseph (Gen. xli. 18); and, although he bows himself before Joseph, the blessing of Jacob nevertheless says of him (Gen. xlix. 8 ff.): "Thy brethren praise thee; the sceptre shall not depart from Judah." The tribe of Judah holds the same prominent position. It is the most numerous tribe. At the first census (Num. ii.), its military strength is greater than that of both the tribes of Joseph. In the desert, it leads the first of the four encampments,—that, namely, which faces the east (Num. ii. 3).<sup>2</sup> It began the decampment and advance (Num. x. 14). Among those appointed by Moses to allot the land, the representative of Judah is named first (Num. xxxiv. 19); and hence when the allotment was actually made under Joshua, the lot of Judah came out first (Josh. xv. 1).

But the tribe of Judah had yet other merits, by reason of which it took the initiative on the present occasion. When Moses sent twelve men to reconnoitre the land, one man from each tribe, the messengers of Judah and Ephraim alone, full of faith and courage, sought to awaken within the people a spirit pleasing to God. The messenger of Ephraim was Joshua, the son of Nun, the minister of Moses; the representative of Judah was Caleb. Both obtained great credit for their conduct. Joshua became the successor of Moses. When Joshua died, Caleb still lived. The great respect which he enjoyed, as head of the tribe of Judah, and on account of the approbation of Moses, may also be inferred from Josh. xiv. 6.<sup>3</sup>

Up then! I have delivered the land into his hand. "Up then!" the address of encouragement: agite, macte!<sup>4</sup> Judah may boldly attack—victory is certain. Caleb stands at the head of the tribe.

<sup>1</sup> Cf. on this rendering the note under the text on p. 28.—Tr.

<sup>2</sup> Cf. Ps. cxlv. 2, and the Psalmist and Jehoiakim on the Book of Judges (Ed. Amsterd.) § 37, p. 2, ch. viii.

<sup>3</sup> The history of Athens contains a similar instance. The council of war before the battle of Marathon was presided over by Callimachus, of the tribe Ajax. A preponderance of votes, exaggerating the danger, already inclined to avoid the Persian army, when Callimachus voted for the course urged by Miltiades, and turned the tide. In consequence of this, the tribe of Ajax was specially honored. Notwithstanding the use of the lot, the last place in the chorus was never assigned to this tribe (Plutarch, Qu. Symp., i. 10; cf. Büchli, Staatshaushalt der Athener, i. 743, note). It is said that Charlemagne, induced by the heroic deeds of Count Gerold, bestowed on the Swabians the right of forming the vanguard in every campaign of the empire.

<sup>4</sup> [Occasionally עָלָה may be properly rendered by "Up!" or "Now then!" cf. Ps. cxxiv. 1, where it is followed by an imperative; but in situations like the present such a rendering is unnecessarily free. The word is designed

He has already been assured of victory by Moses (Num. xiv. 24; Josh. xiv. 9). Josephus (Ant. v. 2, 1) calls the priest who officiates Phinehas. He infers this from Josh. xxiv. 33, where the death of Eleazar is recorded. According to Jewish tradition, Phinehas also wrote the conclusion of the Book of Joshua.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Ver. 1. Israel is believing and obedient after the death of Joshua. Like a child after the death of its father, it has the best intentions. It is zealous to perform, with speed and vigor, the task imposed by Joshua. As directed by the law (Num. xxvii. 21), it inquires of God through His priest, the appointed medium for announcing His will. The recollection of benefits received from the departed hero, and the feelings of piety toward him, are still exerting their influence. So does many a child finish the period of instruction preparatory to confirmation, with a heart zealously resolved to be pious. Many a Christian comes away from an awakening sermon with resolutions of repentance. Principium fervet. First love is full of glowing zeal. To begin well is never without a blessing. The best inheritance is to continue obedient toward God.

STARKE: God gives more than we seek from him. — GERLACH: Not even the task which had been imposed on each individual tribe, will they take in hand, without having inquired of the Lord concerning it.

Ver. 2. God therefore vouchsafes direction and promise. Judah is to go before. When Israel is believing and obedient, Judah always goes before (Gen. xlix. 10): in the desert, at the head of the host; after the time of the Judges, when David sits upon the throne of Israel; and finally, when to excite the attention and put it on the alert for what is coming. Of course, the assurance which here follows it, would animate and incite; but the agite! macte! are in the the Lion of the tribe of Judah conquers the last enemy, which is death.

STARKE: If we also desire to war against our spiritual Canaanites, the first attack must be made, and the war must be conducted, by Christ Jesus, the Lion of the tribe of Judah (Rev. v. 5).

LISCO: The words, "I have delivered the land," are meant prophetically; with God that which is certain in the future is as if it were present.

(BUSH (combining Scott and Henry): The precedence was given to Judah because it was the most numerous, powerful, and valiant of all the tribes, and that which the Lord designed should possess the preëminence in all respects, as being the one from which the Messiah was to spring, and for that reason crowned with the "excellency of dignity" above all its fellows. Judah therefore must lead in this perilous enterprise; for God not only appoints service according to the strength and ability He has given, but "would also have the burden of honor and the burden of labor go together." Those who have the precedence in rank, reputation, or influence, should always be disposed to go before others in every good work, undismayed by danger, difficulty, or obloquy, that they may encourage others by their example.

WORDSWORTH: The death of Joshua is the date of degeneracy. So in spiritual respects, as long as the true Joshua lives in the soul, there is health. St. Paul says, "I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me." The true Joshua lives in the souls of his saints; but if He dies in the soul, that death is theirs; the death of their souls (Origen).

BACHMANN: As the Book of Joshua opens with the mention of Moses' death, so the Book of Judges with that of Joshua. The servants of the Lord die one after the other; but the history of his kingdom goes on uninterruptedly. — TR.]

words to which יְהוָה calls attention, not in יְהוָה itself. TR.]

Judah and Simeon agree to assist each other in clearing their allotted lands of Canaanites. They defeat the enemy in Bezek, capture Adoni-bezek, and burn Jerusalem.

CHAPTER I. 3-8.

- 3 And Judah said unto Simeon his brother, Come up with me into my lot, that we may [and let us] fight [together] against the Canaanites; and I likewise will go with 4 thee into thy lot. So Simeon went with him. And Judah went up, and the Lord [Jehovah] delivered the Canaanites and the Perizzites into their hand: and they
5 slew [smote] of [omit: of] them in Bezek ten thousand men.<sup>1</sup> And they found [came upon, unexpectedly met with] Adoni-bezek in Bezek: and they fought against him, 6 and they slew [smote] the Canaanites and the Perizzites. But [And] Adoni-bezek fled; and they pursued after him, and caught him, and cut off his thumbs and his
7 great toes. And Adonibezek said, Threescore and ten kings, having their thumbs and their great toes cut off, gathered their meat under my table; as I have done, so
8 God [the Deity] hath requited me. And they brought him to Jerusalem, and there he died. (Now [Omit the ( ), and for Now read: But] the children [sons] of Judah had fought [omit: had<sup>2</sup>] against Jerusalem, and had taken it, and smitten it [and took it<sup>3</sup> and smote it] with the edge<sup>4</sup> of the sword, and set the city on fire [gave the city up to the fire].

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 4. — "Smote them in Bezek ten thousand men" i. e. to the number of 10,000 men. Cf. ch. iii. 29, 31, etc. As for the word נָכַח, its proper meaning is "to strike, to smite;" here, doubtless, so far as the ten thousand are concerned, to smite fatally, to kill; elsewhere (in ver. 5, for instance), to defeat, vanquish. — Ta.]

[2 Ver. 8. — MATTHEW HENAY: Our translators judge it [the taking of Jerusalem] spoken of here, as done formerly in Joshua's time, and only repeated [related] on occasion of Adoni-bezek's dying there, and therefore read it, "they had fought against Jerusalem," and put this verse in a parenthesis; but the original speaks of it as a thing now done; and that seems most probable, because it is said to be done by the children of Judah in particular, not by all Israel in general, whom Joshua commanded. — Ta.]

[3 Ver. 8. — To fight against a city, וַיִּלָּחֶם בְּעִיר, is to besiege it, or assault it by storm, cf. Josh. x. 31; 2 Sam. xii. 26. לָכַד is to take by such a movement. Hence Dr. Cassel translates, "fought against Jerusalem, and took it by storm, erstürmten es." — Ta.]

[4 Ver. 8. — לְפִי דֶרֶב: lit. "according to the mouth (i. e. edge) of the sword. The expression denotes unsparing destruction, a killing whose only measure is the sharpness of the sword's edge. Cf. Bertheau in loc. — Ta.]

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

Ver. 3. And Judah said unto Simeon his brother. In matters of war the tribes were represented by the Nasi'im (נָשִׁים). A Nasi, prince or chief, stood at the head of each tribe, and acted in its name, although with great independence. At the numbering of the people in the desert, the Nasi of Judah was Nahashon, the son of Aminadab; but after the sending of the spies, Caleb, the son of Jephunneh, held that position (Num. xxxiv. 19). According to the directions of Moses in the passage just referred to, these princes were to assist the Priest and Joshua in the allotment of the land to the tribes. They are the same who, in Josh. xix. 51, are called "heads of families." For, as appears especially from Josh. xxii. 14, only he could be Nasi who was "head of a family." Collectively, they are styled "the princes of the congregation" (Josh. xxii. 30). That Moses names only ten (Num. xxxiv. 18, etc.), arises from the fact that he refers only to the allotment of the land this side the Jordan. The princes of the two and a half tribes beyond the Jordan had nothing to do with this. When the trans-Jordanic tribes were erroneously suspected of apostasy, the ten princes with the priest went to them as an embassy from the other tribes (Josh. xxii. 14). It was these princes who ratified the treaty with the Gibeonites (Josh. ix. 15); and the congregation was bound by their oath, although greatly dissatisfied when the deception of the Gibeonites was discovered.

Come up with me into my lot. The territory of a single tribe was called its lot, נַחֲלָה. Compare the Greek κληρος, used to denote possessions in general, and also the portion of territory assigned to each party embarked in a colonial enterprise. ("Cresus devastated the lots of the Syrians," φείλατο τοὺς κληρούς, Herod. i. 76.) — It was natural for Judah to summon his brother Simeon to join him; for Simeon's territory lay within the borders of Judah.<sup>1</sup> According to the statements of Josh. xv., the inheritance assigned to the tribe of Judah might be bounded by two lines, drawn respectively from the northern and southern extremities of the Dead Sea to the Mediterranean, the northern line passing below Jerusalem. Simeon's part lay in the middle between these lines, toward the west. For this reason, Simeon is already in Num. xxxiv. 20 named second, next to

1 [Kun: Simeon is called the "brother" of Judah, not so much because they both descended from one mother, Leah (Gen. xxix. 33, 35), as because Simeon's inheritance

Judah, the first tribe. This summons of Judah to Simeon to conquer together their territories is instructive in several respects. It shows that the whole south had indeed been attacked, but was not yet occupied. True, the narrative of the conquest of Canaan by Joshua is not complete, and leaves much to be supplied; but thus much is clear, that though Joshua undoubtedly made war on the southern and northern Canaanites, he by no means obtained control of all the land. It is also evident from Josh. i.-x. 42, that as long as Joshua fought with the more southern enemies, his encampment was at Gilgal, in the neighborhood of Jericho and the Jordan, to which after each victory over the southern kings, whom he pursued far into the southwest, he always fell back (Josh. x. 15, 43). Hence the conversation with Caleb, concerning the inheritance of the latter takes place while the camp is still at Gilgal (Josh. xiv. 6). Consequently, it can only have been the result of victories over the northern princes, that Joshua, in the last years of his regency, transferred the encampment of the people to Shiloh (Josh. xviii. 1, xxi. 2) and Shechem (Josh. xxiv. 1). Of this territory he had already gained permanent possession. It belonged to the inheritance of the tribe of Ephraim. Joshua himself was of this tribe. That fact explains how it was that Ephraim was the first to come into secure and permanent territorial possession. In this also Joshua differs from Moses. The latter, although sprung from the tribe of Levi, belonged to all the tribes. He was raised above every special tribe-relationship. His grave even none can boast of. Joshua does not deny that he belongs to Joseph, although he does not yield to their less righteous demands (Josh. xvii. 14). His tribe forms the first circle around him. When he locates the national centre in Shiloh and Shechem, it is in the possessions of Ephraim. Here, as long as Joshua lived, the government of the Israelitish tribes and their sanctuary had their seat. Here the bones of Joseph were buried; here are the sepulchres of Joshua and his contemporary, the priest Eleazar. Ephraim was the point from which the farther warlike expeditions of the individual tribes were directed. Precisely because the first permanently held possession had connected itself with Joshua and his tribe, the summons to seize and occupy their assigned territory came next to Judah and its prince Caleb, the associate of Joshua, and after him the first man of Israel. But Judah and lay within that of Judah (Josh. xix. 1 ff.), on account of which Simeon's connection with Judah was closer than that of the other tribes. — Ta.]

Simeon cannot have set out on their expedition from Shiloh or Shechem. There was not room enough in the territory of the tribe of Ephraim to afford camping-ground for all Israel. The encampment in Gilgal had not ceased; and there the tribe of Judah found a suitable station whence to gain possession of its own land. Thence they could enter immediately into the territory assigned them. Moreover, it is only upon the supposition that Gilgal was the point of departure of the army of Judah, that it becomes entirely clear why Judah turned to his brother Simeon. Had he come down from Shechem, he might also have turned to Benjamin. But Simeon needed the same avenue into his dominions as Judah. He must pass through the country of the latter to reach his own. From Gilgal, the armies of Judah advanced along the boundary line between their own land and Benjamin, in the direction of the western shore of the Dead Sea which formed their eastern border (Josh. xv. 5-7), intending to march through the wilderness, and perhaps after passing Tekoah, to turn first against Hebron. There the enemy met them.<sup>1</sup>

Ver. 4. And they smote them in Bezek, ten thousand men. The position of Bezek is indicated by the direction of Judah's advance. It must have been already within the limits of Judah; for "Judah went up," namely, to his territory. Its distance from Jerusalem cannot have been great, for they brought the wounded and maimed Adoni-bezek thither, and immediately after the battle in Bezek the tribes attack Jerusalem. If it were the name of a city, the place bearing it would seem to have been of such importance, as to make it matter of surprise that we find no further mention of it.<sup>2</sup> The name announces itself as an appellative derived from the character of the region. בֶּזֶק (Bezek) is undoubtedly equivalent to בָּרָק (Barak). It designates unfruitful, stony sand-areas (Syrtes). The desert Barca in North Africa is familiar in ancient and modern times. The inhabitants of deserts received the name Barcians, as Jerome remarks (Ep. cxxix.), "from the city Barca, which lies in the desert." At the present day a chasm in the rocks, in the peninsula of Sinai, bears the name Bereika (Ritter, xiv. 547). The ancient name Bene-berak (Josh. xix. 45) also explains itself in this way. In Arabic بَرَك designates stony, unfruitful land. Now, the land west of the Dead Sea, through which Judah marched into his territory, is for the most part of this character. "The desert here, covered with chalk and crumbling limestone, and without the least trace of vegetation, has a truly terrible appearance" (Ritter,

<sup>1</sup> [That Judah, nor in fact any of the western tribes, except Ephraim, had not hitherto enjoyed actual possession of any part of his land, is also the view of Bertheau and Ewald. It is strenuously objected to by Bachmann, who maintains that "not only the allotment of the land among the tribes, but also its actual occupation by them, are constantly presupposed in all that this first chapter relates both about the prosecution of the local wars, and the many instances of sinful failure to prosecute them." And, certainly, such passages as Josh. xiii. 1 and xiv. 28, cf. Judg. ii. 6, appear at least to be decidedly against the view taken by our author. The subject, however, is obscure and intricate, and not to be entered upon in a foot-note. — Tr.]

<sup>2</sup> The name does indeed occur again in 1 Sam. xi. 8, where Saul numbers Israel in Bezek. But the very fact that Bezek is there used as a place for mustering troops, shows that it is open country, not any thickly peopled spot. It cannot be maintained that both Bezecks must designate the same region. Similar topographical conditions conferred similar or

xv. 653 (Gage's Transl., iii. 114). It was in this tract that the battle was joined, which ended in the defeat of the Canaanite and Perizzite. The name Canaanites passed over from the cities of the Phœnician Lowlands (Canaan), to the inhabitants of cities throughout the land. It designates the population devoted to agriculture and the arts of civilized life. Perizzites may have been the name of tribes of Bedouins, inhabitants of tents, roving at will among the mountains and in the desert. Down to the present time, the eastern part of Judah, adjoining the Dead Sea, is a true Bedouin highway, especially for all those Arabs who press forward from the east and south. The Canaanites and Perizzites unite to meet the common enemy in the desert tract, just as Zenobia united herself with the Saracens of the desert against the Romans. They are defeated, and there fall ten thousand men, i. e. μύριοι, myriads, an indefinitely large number. From the fact that Bezek does not designate a particular place, but the region in general, it becomes plain that verses 4 and 5 do not relate the same occurrence twice. Verse 4 speaks of the first conflict. The second was offered by Adoni-bezek (ver. 5).

Ver. 5. And they came upon Adoni-bezek in Bezek. We can trace the way which Judah took, with Simeon, to the borders assigned him. From Gilgal it proceeded to Beth-hogla (Ain Hajla), through the wide northern plain of the Dead Sea, on its northwestern shore, to the region at present traversed by the Ta'āmirah Bedouin tribes. This region was named Bezek. בֶּזֶק and בָּרָק primarily signify "dazzling brightness;" hence the signification "lightning." It was doubtless the dazzling glare of the ground, produced by the reflection of the sun whether from the white salt-crust of the surface, the rocks,<sup>4</sup> or the undulating sandhills, that suggested the name Bezek for such regions. This primary sense enables us, moreover, also to discover the connection between Adoni-bezek and Bezek. That the latter is not a city, might have been sufficiently inferred from the fact that notwithstanding the victory no record is made here, as in the cases of other cities, of its fall and destruction. To take Adoni-bezek as Prince of Bezek, does not seem advisable. The proper names of heathen kings always have reference to their religion.<sup>5</sup> Since Adoni-bezek, after having been mutilated, was carried by his attendants to Jerusalem, he must have held some relation to that city. Only that supposition enables us to see why Judah and Simeon storm Jebus (Jerusalem), belonging as it did to the tribe of Benjamin, for which reason they make no attempt to hold it by garrisoning it. Already in the 10th chapter of Joshua we meet with identical names. Bene-berak [sons of Berak, Josh. xix. 45, as to the origin and significance of the name compare the commentary on vers. 4 and 5. — Tr.] was in the tribe of Dan. And so a region west of the Jordan, and east of Shechem, so far at least as we can determine the true direction from the narrative [in Sam. xi. 8], seems also to have borne the name Bezek.

<sup>3</sup> According to the interchange of r and s as in בָּרָק and בֶּזֶק (Ezek. i. 14), quaero and quaeso, etc. In Ezek. i. 14, brzek (bazak) denotes a dazzling radiance. Barak, lightning, became a proper name. In the regions of Baros (the desert), the name Baros (Hamilcar) was familiar enough.

<sup>4</sup> "The glitter of the (gravel) surface in the sunshine, is not a little trying to the eyes." — Strauss, Sinai und Gölgotha, iii. 1, 183.

<sup>5</sup> Cf. my Ortsnamen (Erfurt, 1856), i. 118.

Adoni-zedek in Jerusalem, just as in the history of Abraham Melchi-zedek appears there. Adon is a Phœnician designation of the Deity. Adoni-zedek and Melchi-zedek mean, "My God, my king, is Zedek." The names of the kings enunciated their creeds. Zedek (Sadyk, Sydyk), belongs to the star- worship of the Canaanites, and according to ancient tradition was the name of the planet Jupiter. Adoni-bezek manifestly expresses a similar idea. Bezek = Barak is the dazzling brightness, which is also peculiar to Jupiter. His Sanskrit name is "Brahspati (Brihaspati)," Father of Brightness. "My God is Brightness," is the creed contained in the name Adoni-bezek. His name alone might lead us to consider him King of Jerusalem, to which, as if it were his royal residence, his own attendants carry him after his defeat.<sup>2</sup>

Ver. 6. And Adoni-bezek fled, . . . and they cut off the thumbs of his hands and feet, etc. How horrible is the history of human cruelty! It is the mark of ungodliness, that it glories in the agony of him whom it calls an enemy. The mutilation of the human body is the tyranny of sin over the work of God, which it nevertheless fears. The Persian king Artaxerxes caused the arm of his brother, which had bent the bow against him, to be hewn off, even after death. Thumbs were cut off to incapacitate the hand for using the bow, great toes to render the gait uncertain. When in 456 B. C., the inhabitants of Ægina were conquered by the Athenians, the victors ordered their right thumbs to be cut off, so that, while still able to handle the oar, they might be incapable of using the spear (Ælian, Var. Hist., ii. 9). Mohammed (Sura, viii. 12) gave orders to punish the enemies of Islam by cutting off their heads and the ends of their fingers, and blames its omission in the battle of Beder. In the German Waldweisthütern the penalty against hunters and poachers of having their thumbs cut off, is of frequent occurrence (Grimm, Rechtsalterth., 707; Deutsches Wörterb. ii. 346).<sup>3</sup> Adoni-bezek, in his pride, enjoyed the horrible satisfaction of making the mutilated wretches pick up their food under his table, hungry and whining like dogs.<sup>4</sup> Curtius relates that the Persians had preserved Greek captives, mutilated in their hands, feet, and ears, "for protracted sport" (in longum sui ludibrium reservaverant. De Rebus Gest. Alex., v. 5, 6). Posidonius (in Athenæus, iv. 152, d.) tells how the king of the Parthians at his meals threw food to his courtier, who caught it like a dog (τὸ παραβληθὲν κυνιστὶ σιτέται), and was moreover beaten like a dog. The tribe of Judah simply recompensed Adoni-bezek: not from revenge, for Israel had not suffered anything from him; nor from pleasure in the misery of others, for they left him in the hands of his own people.

Ver. 7. As I have done, so has the Deity<sup>5</sup> completed unto me. Many (in round numbers, seventy) are they whom he has maltreated. עֲלֵשׁ

(Piel of עָלַשׁ) is to finish, complete, and hence to requite; for reward and punishment are inseparably connected with good and evil deeds. As the blossom reaches completion only in the fruit, so deeds in their recompense. The Greeks used τελεῖν in the same sense. "When the Olympian (says Homer, Iliad, iv. 160) does not speedily punish (ἐτρέλεσσαν), he still does it later (ἐκ τε καὶ ὕψι τελεῖ)." It was an ethical maxim extensively accepted among ancient nations that men must suffer the same pains which they have inflicted on others. The later Greeks called this the Neoptolemic Tisis, from the circumstance that Neoptolemus was punished in the same way in which he had sinned (Pausanias, iv. 17, 3; Nägelsbach, Nachhom. Theologie, 343). He had murdered at the altar, and at the altar he was murdered. Phaleris had roasted human beings in a brazen bull—the same punishment was inflicted on himself.<sup>6</sup> That which Dionysius had done to the women of his people, his own daughters were made to undergo (Ælian, Var. Hist., ix. 8). Jethro says (Ex. xviii. 11), "for the thing wherein they sinned, came upon them."

And they brought him to Jerusalem. None but his own people<sup>7</sup> could bring him thither, for the city was not yet taken. It was evidently his thumb of hand or foot at 2,000 denarii, "qui faciunt solidos quinquaginta" (Lex Salica, xlix. 3, ed. Merkel, p. 16).

4 [Kitto (Daily Bible Illustrations: Moses and the Judges, p. 299): "This helps us to some insight of the state of the country under the native princes, whom the Israelites were commissioned to expel. Conceive what must have been the state of the people among whom such a scene could exist, — what wars had been waged, what cruel ravages committed, before these seventy kings — however small their territories — became reduced to this condition; and behold in this a specimen of the fashion in which war was conducted, and of the treatment to which the conquered were exposed. Those are certainly very much in the wrong who picture to themselves the Canaanites as 'a happy family,' disturbed in their peaceful homes by the Hebrew barbarians from the wilderness. Behold how happy, behold how peaceful, they were!" — Ta.]

5 Elohim, which is also used of the heathen deity. The speaker speaks in the spirit of heathenism. As regards the seventy kings, it needs no argument to show that עֲלֵשׁ like the Greek ῥύπαρος, is applied to any ruler, even of a single city. Josephus (Ant. v. 2, 2) read seventy-two, which especially in his time, was interchangeable as a round number with seventy.

6 In the Gesta Romanorum, ch. xlviii., this is still adduced as a warning, and with an allusion to the passage in Ovid, De Arte Amandi, l. 663 [Ex Phaleris tauro violenti membra Perilli torruit. Infelix inbuti auctor opus. — Ta.], it is remarked: "neque enim lex æquior ulla, quam necis artifices arte prave sua."

7 Since it is Adoni-bezek who speaks in ver. 7, the word

1 Cf. Bohlen, Altes Indien, II. 248.

2 [Besek is generally regarded as the name of a city or village. The majority of scholars (Le Clerc, Rosenmüller, Reland, V. Raumer, Bachmann, etc.) look for it in the territory of Judah, but without being able to discover any traces of it, which is certainly remarkable; for, if a city, it must have been, as Dr. Cassel remarks, and as the usual interpretation of Adoni-bezek as King of Besek implies, a place of some importance. Others, therefore (as Bertheau, Kell, Ewald, etc.), connect this Besek with that of 1 Sam. xi. 8, and both with the following statement in the Onomasticon: "hodie duae villae sunt nomine Bezech, vicinae sibi, in decimo septimo lapide a Neapoli, descendentes Scythopolin." Then to account for this northern position of the armies of Judah and Simeon, Bertheau supposes them to set out from Shechem (cf. Josh. xxiv. 1, etc.), and to make a detour thence to the northeast, either for the purpose of descending to the south by way of the Jordan valley, or for some other reason; while Kell, without naming any place of departure, suggests that Judah and Simeon may have been compelled, before engaging the Canaanites in their own allotments, to meet those coming down upon them from the north, whom after defeating, they then pursued as far as Besek. Dr. Cassel's explanation is attractive as well as ingenious; but, to say nothing about the uncertainty of its etymology, Besek, as an appellative applied to a definite region, would, as Bachmann remarks, require the article, cf. הַפְּסָרָה, הַשְּׁפִלָּה. — Ta.]

3 Hence, on the other hand, the severe punishment which the ancient popular laws adjudged to him who unjustly cuts off another's thumb. The fine was almost as high as for the whole hand. The Salic law rated the hand at 2,500, the city; for the Israelites follow after, and complete their victory by its capture. The storming of Jerusalem for its own sake could not have formed part of the plan of the tribes, since it belonged to Benjamin. They were led to it by the attack which they suffered from Adoni-bezek. Nor did they take possession of it. They only broke the power of the king thoroughly. He died miserably; his people were put to the sword; the city was consumed by fire (שָׁרַף לְאֵשׁ, to abandon to the flames). Thus the wanton haughtiness of Adoni bezek was terribly requited.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Ver. 3. Believing Israel is also united Israel. Judah and Simeon go forth together, in faith, as one tribe, one heart, and one soul, to the same victory. So united are children, when in faith they return from their father's grave [cf. Hom. Hints on ch. i. 1. — Tr.]. The children of God are good brothers and sisters. They do not quarrel over the inheritance, — they enjoy it in love. Believing Israel is a sermon on unity among families, neighbors, citizens, and nations. Union arises not from without, but from within. Penitence and faith bind together. Unio is the name of a pearl, and pearls symbolize tears. Ex unione lux. E luce unioes.

STARKE: As all Christians in general, so brothers and sisters in particular, should maintain a good understanding, and live together in peace and unity.

[HENRY: It becomes Israelites to help one another against Canaanites; and all Christians, even those of different tribes, to strengthen one another's hands against the common interests of Satan's kingdom. Those who thus help one another in love, have reason to hope that God will help them both.

BACHMANN: It is not incompatible with the obedience of faith, that Judah makes use of the helps placed by God at his disposal; and it is in accordance with the dictates of fraternal love that he makes that tribe the companion of his undertaking whose lot it was made rather to attach itself to others than to equal their independence (cf. Gen.

וַיִּבְיֵאוּ in the same verse cannot refer to the Israelites. Why should they carry him with them? It would indicate the gratification of gratuitous cruelty, a thing inconceivable in this connection. Those who save him are his own servants; but arrived at Jerusalem he dies. Verse 8, therexlix. 7, and also the silence of Deut. xxxiii. concerning Simeon), and whose interests were peculiarly closely connected with his own. — Tr.]

Vers. 4-8. STARKE: In the lives of men, things are often wonderfully changed about, and not by accident, but by the wonderful governance of God (Gen. i. 19).

THE SAME: God requites every one according to his deeds. Wherein one sins, therein he is also punished, — evidence that there is a God, and that He is just, recompensing according to deserts.

[SCOTT: Men often read their crimes in their punishments; and at last every mouth shall be stopped, and all sinners be constrained to admit the justice of God in their extremest miseries. Happy they who justify Him in their temporal afflictions, plead guilty before his mercy-seat, and by repentance and faith seek deliverance from the wrath to come.

JOSEPH MEDE († 1638): As I have done so God hath requited me: 1. God punisheth sin with temporal punishment in this life as well as with eternal in the life to come. 2. God doth not always presently inflict his judgments while the sin is fresh, but sometimes defers that long which He means to give home at the last. 3. These divine judgments by some conformity or affinity do carry in them as it were a stamp and print of the sin for which they are inflicted. 4. The profit and pleasure which men aim at when they commit sin will not so much as quit cost even in this life.

WORDSWORTH: As by this specimen at the beginning of this book, showing what two tribes of Israel could do by faith and obedience against Adoni-bezek, who had subdued and enslaved seventy kings, God showed what the twelve tribes might have done, if they had believed and obeyed him; and that all their subsequent miseries were due to defection from God; — in like manner, also, in the Christian Church, if men had followed the examples of the Apostles, — the Judahs and Simeons of the first ages, — and gone forth in their spirit of faith and love against the powers of darkness, they might long since have evangelized the world. All the distresses of Christendom are ascribable to desertions of [from] Christ, and not to any imperfection (as some have alleged) in Christianity (cf. Bp. Butler, Analogy, Part ii. ch. 1). — Tr.]

fore, commences very properly, not with the mere verb וַיִּבְיֵאוּ, but with a repetition of the grammatical subject: בְּנֵי יְהוּדָה.

The sons of Judah smite the Anakim and take Hebron.

CHAPTER I. 9, 10.

- 9 And afterward [Hereupon] the children [sons] of Judah went down [proceeded] to fight against the Canaanites that dwelt in the mountain [mountains], and in the south, 10 and in the valley [i.e. depression, low country]. And Judah went against the Canaanites that dwelt in Hebron: (now the name of Hebron before [formerly] was Kirjath-arba [The Four Cities<sup>1</sup>];) and they slew [smote] Sheshai, and Ahimai, and Talmai.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 10. This is the nearest we can come in English to Dr. Cassel's Vierstadt, Tetrapolis. Against the common interpretation, "City of Arba," — Arba being taken as the name of a person, — cf. Mr. Grove in Smith's Bib. Dict., s. v. Kirjath-arba. — Tr.]

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

Ver. 9f. Hereupon the sons of Judah proceeded. They advanced, proceeded, וַיֵּצְאוּ. While וַעֲלֶה, "ascendere," was used to express the first attack (ver. 4), the continuation of the conflict is indicated by וַיֵּרָד, "descendere," although they advance mountain-ward. Verse 9 sets forth the full extent of the task undertaken by the tribes. Before advancing into the territory allotted them, they have been obliged to resist the attack of Adonibezek at its border. They divide their work proper into the conquest of the mountains, the occupancy of the southern tract from the Dead Sea to Beersheba, and the seizure of the western lowlands. Details of these undertakings are given us only so far as they concern Caleb and his house. Hence, the conquest of Hebron is first of all related. About this ancient city,<sup>1</sup> where Abraham tarried, and the patriarchs repose in the family-vault, the recollections of the tribe of Judah concentrate themselves. It was of old the dwelling-place of valiant people. The robust vine-dressers of the valley, ages before, supported Abraham in his victorious expedition against the eastern hosts. But on the mountains there dwelt a wild and warlike race, the sons of Anak, before whom the faint-hearted spies of Moses formerly trembled. Only Caleb and Joshua were full of confidence in God. On this account, Caleb received the special assurance of Moses that he should possess the land which he had seen; and therefore at the division of the country by Joshua, he brings forward his claim to it (Josh. xiv. 12). Joshua allows it. It is no lightly-gained inheritance that Caleb asks: "Therefore give me (he says) this mountain, whereof the Lord spake in that day; for thou hast heard that there are Anakim there, and cities great and fenced; perhaps the Lord will be with me that I drive them out" (Josh. xiv. 12). Now, although the conquest of the city, and the expulsion of the Anakim, are already recorded in Josh. xv. 14, that is only an anticipatory historical notice in connection with the description of boundaries. The events actually occur now, in connection with the first efforts to gain permanent possession of the territory. Caleb, it is true, is old; but younger heroes surround him. They defeated the Anakim.

Ver. 10. Hebron, formerly called the Four Cities (Kirjath-arba). It is difficult to see why modern expositors<sup>2</sup> take offense at the idea that in Hebron an earlier Tetrapolis is to be recognized.

<sup>1</sup> Hebron is said to be seven years older than Zoan (Tanis) in Egypt (Num. xiii. 22). The number "seven" is here also to be regarded as a round number. It expresses the finished lapse of a long period.

<sup>2</sup> Ritter's remarks (xvi. 211 [Gage's Transl. III. 292, seq.]), would admit of many corrections. Jerome, it is true, follows Jewish traditions (cf. Pirke, R. Eliezer, ch. xx.) when he thinks that the Civitas Quatuor was so named from the patriarchs who were buried there. It is, however, none the less evident from this, that the Jews of old interpreted Kirjath-arba as meaning "Tetrapolis." Nor does Num. xiii. 22 afford the slightest occasion for doubting the truth of the statement that Kirjath-arba was the former name of Hebron. Ritter seems especially to have followed Robinson (Bibl. Res. II. 88)

The remark, Josh. xiv. 15: "And the name of Hebron was formerly Kirjath-arba, הָעִיר הָאַרְבָּה," cannot furnish the ground; for הָעִיר is here a collective term, like gens, as appears indubitably from Josh. xv. 13, where we have the expression, "Kirjath-arba, the father of Anak (אָבִי הָעִיר), which is Hebron." The Tetrapolis was the ancient seat of powerful tribes, whom the traditions of Israel described as giants. Similar tetrapolitan cities are elsewhere met with. The Indians had a Katurgrāma, the Four Villages (Lassen, Ind. Alterth., I. 72). In Phrygia, Cibyra and three other places formed a Tetrapolis (Strabo, lib. xiii. 1, 17). I am inclined to find in the name Cibyra the same idea as in the Arabic Cheibar<sup>3</sup> and the Hebrew Chebron (Hebron), namely, that of confederation, community of interest. It is a suggestive fact that Abraham's expedition is joined by the brothers Eschcol, Aner, and Mamre (Gen. xiv. 13); concerning Mamre it is remarked, "the same is Hebron" (Gen. xxiii. 19). The Upper City (Acropolis), situated upon the mountains, and the lower cities lying in the fertile valley which these mountains inclose, together constituted the Tetrapolis. At the present day the city in the valley is still divided into three parts.<sup>4</sup> Three sons of Anak are enumerated, manifestly three tribes, probably named after ancient heroes, which tribes coalesced with the mountain city.<sup>5</sup> As late as the time of David, the phraseology is, that he dwelt in "the cities of Hebron" (2 Sam. ii. 3). Probably the name Hebron was originally given to the mountain<sup>6</sup> (the הָר which Caleb claims, Josh. xiv. 12), as forming the common defense, and was then after the suppression of the Anakim, transferred to the whole city. The names of the three families of Anakim do not admit of any certain interpretation.

יְהוֹשֻׁעַ might with most probability be interpreted after the analogy of Achijah (Ahijah or Ahiah), "Friend of God." בְּנֵי, בִּן, is the heathen deity (Isa. lxv. 11), who also occurs in Phœnician inscriptions, in proper names like עַבְד־בְּנֵי, "servant of Meni." The name שֶׁשַׁי, "Sheshai," reminds one of the Egyptian king שֶׁשַׁק, Shishak, Sechonchis, who made war on Rehoboam (1 Kgs. xiv. 25). The name שֶׁשַׁבְּזַר ("Sheshbazzar," Ezra

<sup>3</sup> Cf. my History of the Jews, in Ersch and Gruber's Encyclopadie, II. 27, p. 168.

<sup>4</sup> Robinson, Bibl. Res., II. 74.

<sup>5</sup> In a manner analogous perhaps to the fusion of the Ramnes, Tities, and Luceres, into the one Roma of the Romans.

<sup>6</sup> Ritter (xvi. 228 [Gage's Transl. III. 301]) proves that the ancient Hebron lay higher than the present, which however can refer only to a part of the city. The great importance of the place is explained by its protected situation in the mountains, along whose slopes it extended down into the valley. That fact only adapted it to be the capital of David's kingdom. Cf. Josh. xi. 21 (בְּנֵי הָרָה).

i.8) may also be compared. The third name, Talmi, leaves it doubtful whether it is to be taken primarily as the name of a place or of a person. Stephanus Byzantinus speaks of an Arabic place which he calls Castle Θελαμῶνα. It is possible, however, that analogous mythical ideas come into contact with each other, in the Greek legend concerning Salomoneus,<sup>1</sup> father of Tyro, and husband of Sidero. Hesiod already (in a Fragment, ed. Götting, p. 259) calls him an ἄδικος καὶ ἐνέφθυμος. Josephus (Ant. v. 2, 3) says that the Anakim were a race of giants, "whose bones are still shown to this very day." What stories were current about the discovery of gigantic human remains in Asia Minor and Syria, may be learned from the Heroica of Philostratus (ed. Jacobs, p. 28). A body of gigantic length was found in the bed of the Orontes.

<sup>1</sup> Cf. Hayne on Apollodorus, I. 9, p. 59. The later Jews write הַלְתִּי for Ptolemy. Cf. Ewald, Gesch. Israel's, I. 209, 311.

tes. It was thought also that the bodies of Orestes and Ajax had been seen. The faint-hearted spies had depicted the Anakim as Nephilim, men like the prehistoric Nibelungen of German story; and from this Josephus constructed his giant-tale.

Josh. xv. 14 remarks, "And Caleb drove thence the three sons of Anak." A contradiction has been found therein with what we read here, "And they smote." None really exists. The narrative is actually more exact than is generally supposed. The statement of Josh. xv. 14 refers to Judges i. 20. The tribe of Judah had now indeed taken Hebron, and conquered the Anakim; but for peaceable possession the time had not yet come. Accompanied by Simeon, Judah proceeded onward to gain possession of the whole territory. At Judg. i. 19 the whole campaign is finished. Then they give Hebron to Caleb, and he drives out whatever remains of the Anakim. It was not with three persons, but with three tribes or nations, that they had to do.

Othniel takes Kirjath-sepher, and wins Achsah, the daughter of Caleb.

CHAPTER I. 11-15.

11 And from thence he [i. e. Judah] went against the inhabitants of Debir: and the 12 name of Debir before was Kirjath-sepher: And Caleb said, He that smiteth Kir-13 jath-sepher, and taketh it, to him will I give Achsah my daughter to wife. And Othniel the son of Kenaz, Caleb's younger brother, took it: and he gave him Achsah 14 his daughter to wife. And it came to pass, when she came to him [at her coming;
scil. to her husband's house], that she moved [urged] him to ask of her father a [the] field:
and she lighted from off her ass; and Caleb said unto her, What wilt thou [what is 15 the matter with thee]? And she said unto him, Give me a blessing: for thou hast given me a south land [hast given me away into a dry land<sup>1</sup>]; give me also [therefore] springs of water. And Caleb gave her the upper springs, and the nether springs.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 15. — הַלְתִּי הַקֶּבֶץ הָאֵשׁ: Dr. Cassel's rendering agrees substantially with that of the LXX. and many modern critics. Bertheau says: "הַקֶּבֶץ הָאֵשׁ is the accusative of place. It would be difficult to justify the other and usual rendering grammatically, since הַלְתִּי with the accus. suffix, never, not even Jer. ix. 1, Isa. xxvii. 4, means to give anything to one." Bachmann, however, objects that "הַלְתִּי does not occur of the giving of daughters in marriage, and that the absence of a preposition, say אֶל, before הַקֶּבֶץ הָאֵשׁ would make a hard construction. The suffix ִי is either a negligent form of popular speech, substituted for לִי (cf. Ewald, Ausf. Lehrs. 315 b), or, better, a second accus., such as is quite common with verbs of giving, favoring, etc. (cf. Ewald, 283 b), and from which rule הַלְתִּי is not to be excepted, cf. Ezech. xxi. 32." — Ts.]

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

Ver. 11. And he went against Debir. The position of Debir, hitherto unknown, was recognized not long since by Dr. Rosen, on the hill-top called Dewirbân, near the spring Ain Nunkur, in a southwestern direction from Hebron, between that place and Dura (Zeitschr. der Morgenl. Gesellschaft, 1857, ii. 50-54).

The name of Debir was formerly Kirjath-sepher. In my Ortsnamen (i. 116, note), I already endeavored to show that Debir, Kirjath-sepher, and Kirjath-sannah (קִרְיַת סַנַּח, Josh. xv. 49) philologically express one and the same idea. Fürst well remarks (Lex. s. v. קִרְיַת) that "קִרְיַת is the Phœnician equivalent of the Hebrew קִרְיַת, a material prepared from the skins of animals, and of the Himyaritic for a book written on palm-leaves." From the latter, he says, the Greek διφθέρα was formed, and thus the word passed over to the Greeks and Persians. There is no reason to doubt that the name describes the city as a depository of written traditions, book-rolls. Kirjath-sepher<sup>1</sup> was a Palestinian Hermopolis, city of Thoth, where literature had its seat (cf. Plutarch, De Isid., ed. Parthey, p. 4; the Sept. translates, πόλις τῶν γραμμάτων). Such depositories, where the sacred writings were kept ἐν κίστῃ, in a chest (Plut. l. c.), for preservation, were common to the religion of the Egyptians, Phœnicians, and Babylonians. To this place, that which sheltered the sacred ark of Israel's divine law opposed itself. It was therefore of much consequence to conquer it, as on the other hand its inhabitants valiantly defended it. The different names testify of the different dialects of the tribes who have held Debir.

Ver. 12. And Caleb said, He that smiteth Kirjath-sepher. Caleb is the chief of the tribe of Judah. Hebron has fallen to him as his inheritance, but it does not circumscribe his eager interest. "Caleb said." His personal zeal is the more prominently indicated, because displayed in a matter which involved the general cause, the honor of the whole tribe. At the conquest of Hebron, the phrase was, "and they smote;" at the next battle, fought for Debir, it is, "Caleb said." As the whole tribe assisted in gaining his personal inheritance, so for the honor of the tribe he devotes that which was wholly his, and his alone. He offers the dearest possession he has, as a prize for him who shall storm and take the strong mountain fortress and seat of idolatry. It is his only daughter (cf. 1 Chron. ii. 49) Achsah, born to him in advancing years. He can offer nothing better. Stronger proof of his zeal for the cause of Israel he cannot give. To obtain the daughter of a house by meritorious actions has in all ages been a worthy object of ambition set before young and active men. It was only by a warlike exploit that David obtained Michal who loved him. The Messenian hero Aristomenes bestows a similar reward. When a country maiden rescued him, with heroic daring, from danger involving his life, he gave her his son for a husband (Paus. iv. 19). The conquest of Debir is therefore especially mentioned to the honor of Caleb and his love for Israel. The event was a glorious incident in the hero's family history.

Ver. 13. And Othniel, the son of Kenaz, a younger brother of Caleb, took it. Israel, the nation, was divided into tribes, these into families, these into "houses," and these again into single households. This may be clearly seen from the story of Achan (Josh. vii. 14 ff.). Achan was of the tribe of Judah, the family of Zerach, the house of Zabdi, and the son of Carmi. So Caleb was the son of Jephunneh, of the house of Kenaz; whence, Num. xxxii. 12, he is called the Kenezite. Bertheau (pp. 21, 22) labors under a peculiar error, in that he confounds the family of the Kenezite in the tribe of Judah with the hostile people of the same name mentioned Gen. xv. 19. It is true, Lengerke (Kanaan, p. 204) and others preceded him in this; Ritter also (Erdkunde, xv. 138 [Gage's Transl. ii. 146]) has allowed himself to be misled by it. But a consideration of the important relations in which Caleb stands to the people of God, would alone have authorized the presumption that he could have no connection with a people that was to be driven out before Israel. In addition to this, notice should have been taken of the isolated position of the Kenites, continuing down to a late period; for notwithstanding the peaceful conduct of this people, and their attachment to Israel, their historical derivation from the father-in-law of Moses is never forgotten. The adoption of the celebrated hero into the tribe of Judah must at all events have been explained. But there is absolutely no foundation for any such assumption as that in question. The similarity of names affords so much the less occasion, since the same names were frequently borne by heathen and Israelites, and also by families in the different tribes of Israel. One Edomite is named Kenaz, like the ancestor of Caleb; another Saul, like the king of Israel; a third Elah, like a man of Benjamin (Gen. xxxvi. 41; 1 Kgs. iv. 18). There is an alien tribe named אֲדָרָי; but no one imagines that Israelites of the name אֲדָרָי are to be reckoned to it. The name of the king of Lachish whom Joshua defeated, was Japhia, exactly like that of a son of David (2 Sam. v. 15). Hezron and Carmi, both families of Reuben, are such also in the tribe of Judah. The name Jephunneh is borne also by a man of the tribe of Asher (1 Chron. vii. 38). To this must be added that the Book of Chronicles traces the family of Caleb more in detail, and places them as relatives alongside of Nahshon, the progenitor of David (1 Chron. ii. 9 seq.). Caleb is the son of Jephunneh, of the house of Kenaz. Othniel is his brother. That the latter is not designated "son of Jephunneh," is because he is sufficiently distinguished by means of his more illustrious brother. That he is styled "son of Kenaz," is to intimate that he is full brother to the son of Jephunneh, belonging to the same stock; not, as might be, the son of Caleb's mother, by a husband from some other family. He is so much younger than Caleb, that the latter may be regarded as his second father, who had watched over him from youth up. Why we are here, where the narrative is so personal in its character, to think only of genealogical, not of physical relationships, as Bertheau supposes, it is difficult to perceive. Just here, this would destroy, not merely the historical truth, but also the æsthetic character, of the narrative.<sup>2</sup>

Ver. 14. And it came to pass at her coming.

<sup>1</sup> Attention was again directed to the city from the fact that the first liturgical poet of the modern Jews, Kalir, designates a Kirjath-sepher as his native place. He does not, however, mean this city, but, playing on the word, he translates Καλλιπύργιον in Palestine by Kirjath Shepher, i. e. Beautiful City. This opinion advanced by me in 1845 (Frankel's Zeitschr.) has perhaps lost none of its probability.

<sup>2</sup> [The above view of the relationship between Caleb and Othniel is held by most modern critics. Among its opponents, however, are Ewald and De Wette. The former (Gesch. Israels, ii. 374) deems it "more suitable, in accordance with the view of the oldest narrator, to take Kenaz as the younger brother of Caleb;" the latter, in his excellent German Version, translates: "Othniel, der Sohn des Kenaz, des jüngsten Bruders Calebs." Of ancient versions, the Targum and Peshito leave the question undecided. The LXX. in C. Vat., in all three passages, and in C. Alex. at Josh. xv. 17 and Judg. iii. 9, makes Othniel the nephew, while in Judg. i. 13 C. Alex. makes him the brother, of Caleb The Vulg. invariably: "Othniel filius Cenes, frater Caleb."

Grammatically, both constructions are equally admissible. For that adopted by Dr. Cassel, cf. Gen. xxviii. 5; 1 Sam. xxvi. 6, etc.; for the other, Gen. xxix. 10; 1 Sam. xiv. 3, etc. That the distinctive accent over Kenaz is not incompatible with either construction, or rather does not commit the Masorites to the construction adopted by Dr. Cassel, as Keil intimates, may be seen from Gen. xxiv. 15, etc.

Bachmann favors the alternate rendering—"filius Kenaz fratris Calebi"—on the following grounds: 1. "The fact that elsewhere Caleb is always designated as 'the son of Jephunneh,' while Othniel is always spoken of as 'the Othniel had conquered the stronghold, — the victory was his, and Caleb gave him his daughter. The narrator forthwith adds an incident that marked the peaceful entrance of the young wife into the house of her husband, and afforded an interesting glimpse of her character. Caleb, the head of the tribe, was rich; to him, and to him alone, the fine fields and estates about Hebron had been given. Only Caleb, the son of Jephunneh, had received them, not the whole family (Josh. xxi. 12). Othniel was poor. In the character of a poor, younger son, he had achieved heroic deeds. Not he thinks of goods and possessions; but so much the more does the young Achsah, who has been accustomed to wealth. Such is the course of the world. They are on their way to Hebron, a way which leads through fertile, well-watered fields. Their journey is a beautiful triumphal procession, over which the aged father rejoices. Achsah urges (אֶחְסָה) from (אֶחָד) her husband to seize the opportunity, and petition her father for the noble field through which they are passing.<sup>1</sup> He does it not. He deems it an act unworthy of himself. She, however, like a true woman, too sagacious to lose the proper moment, proceeds herself ingeniously to call her father's attention to the fact that she desires not merely honor, but also property. She slides from her ass — suddenly, as if she fell (וַתִּפֹּל) — so that her father asks, "What is the matter with thee?" Her answer has a double sense: "Thou gavest me away into a dry land, give me also springs." O give me a blessing!

אֶרֶץ יְבֵשָׁה ("land of the south") is land destitute of water. No greater blessing there than springs. They make the parched field flourishing and productive (cf. Ps. cxxvi. 4). Now, just as springs are a sign of abundance and wealth, so yebesh is a symbol of indigence and want. Thou gavest me away, says Achsah, in words full of concealed meaning, into a dry land — to a poor husband; give me also springs to enrich the land — my husband. Caleb understood and gave, the more liberally, no doubt, for the ingenious manner in which she asked. He gave her the upper and lower springs. מַיִם, for springs, occurs only in this passage. It is obviously not to be derived from מָלַךְ, in the sense of rolling, turning, — from which comes מִיָּזָה, "pitcher," so named on account of its round form, — but is connected with old roots expressive, like the Sanskr. gala, "water," of welling, bubbling (cf. Dieffenbach, Wörterb. der Goth.

son of Kenaz," raises a presumption against the supposition that Othniel is the brother of Caleb in the strict sense of the term.

2. Caleb was 85 years old when Hebron was bestowed on him (Josh. xiv. 10, 14); and when he took possession of it, must have been some years older. Accordingly, if Othniel was his brother, even though his junior by from twenty to thirty years, — and a greater difference in age is surely not to be supposed, — it would follow, that the bold hero who won his wife as a prize for storming Debir was at that time from sixty to seventy years of age; that about eighteen years later, he entered on his office as Judge as a man of full eighty years of age; and that, even though he died some time before the end of the forty years' rest (ch. iii. 11), he reached an age of 120 years or more, which is scarcely probable. 8. According to ch. iii. 9, Othniel is the first deliverer of Israel fallen under the yoke of heathen oppressors in consequence of its apostasy to heathen idolatry. Now, since idolatry is said to have become prevalent in Israel only after the generation that had entered Canaan with Joshua and Caleb had died off (ch. ii. 10), it is clear that Othniel is regarded as belonging not to this, but to the Sprache, i. 183). What springs they were which Othniel received, it is difficult to say. Were they those which Robinson found on the way to Hebron, within an hour's distance! Le Clerc wonders why this family history is here related. Most certainly not without intending to make the zeal of Caleb, the unselfishness of Othniel, and the prudence of Achsah, points of instruction. The Jewish exegesis, reproduced by Raschi, is essentially right, when it explains that Othniel was poor in everything but the law, in everything, that is, but piety and solidity of character.<sup>2</sup> History and tradition present many another pair like Othniel and Achsah. The thing to be especially noted, however, is the firmness of Othniel in resisting his wife's enticement to make requests which it is more becoming in her to make. Not many men have so well withstood the ambitious and eagerly craving projects of their wives.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Compare Hom. Hints on ch. i. 17-20.

[SCOTT: It is a very valuable privilege to be closely united with families distinguished for faith and piety; and to contract marriage with those who have been "trained up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord."

THE SAME: Nature teaches us to desire temporal benefits for our children; but grace will teach us to be far more desirous and earnest in using means that they may be partakers of spiritual blessings.

THE SAME: If affection to a creature animates men to such strenuous efforts and perilous adventures, what will the love of God our Saviour do, if it bear rule in our hearts?

THE SAME: If earthly parents, "being evil, know how to give good gifts to their children, how much more will our Heavenly Father give good things to those who ask him!"

HENRY: From this story we learn, 1st. That it is no breach of the tenth commandment moderately to desire those comforts and conveniences of this life which we see attainable in a fair, and regular way. . . . 3dly. That parents must never think that lost, which is bestowed on their children for their real advantage, but must be free in giving them portions as well as maintenance, especially when dutiful.

P. H. S.: Three Lessons from an Ancient Wedding: 1. Caleb's lesson: Pious zeal for God and an heroic character are better than wealth or social rank. To such as possess these qualities let fathers freely give their daughters. 2. Othniel's succeeding generation, which agrees better with the hypothesis that he is the son of a younger brother of Caleb, than that he is such a brother himself. 4. Finally, whatever, in view of Lev. xviii. 12, 13, may be thought of the difficulty of a marriage between an uncle and a niece, that interpretation surely deserves to be preferred which, while it is possible in itself, does not raise the said difficulty at all." — TA.]

1 [WORDSWORTH: "The field: that is, the field which had been given to Othniel when the Book of Judges was written, and which was known to be well supplied with water." This explanation of the article supposes that the words attributed to Achsah in the text, were not the very words she used. — TA.]

2 At an early date, the passage 1 Chron. iv. 10, where Jabez says, "Oh, that thou wouldst bless me indeed, and enlarge my coast, and that thine hand might be with me," was already explained as referring to Othniel (cf. Temura, p. 16, a). Jerome was acquainted with a Jewish opinion according to which Jabez was a teacher of the law (cf. 1 Chron. ii. 65), who instructed the sons of the Kenite, cf. Quest. Hebr. in Lib. i. Paral., ed. Migne, iii. 1370.

lesson: A wife is to be won for her own sake, not as the means of gaining access to her father's wealth. 3. Achsah's lesson: It is the wife's duty to promote the interests and honor of her husband. Wealth is a source of weight and influence, and a means of usefulness. Who knows how much this and similar thoughtful acts of Achsah contributed to shape the subsequent life-work of Othniel as judge of Israel.

THE SAME: It is more honorable to woman to be "sold" (a term entirely inapplicable, however, to the case in hand), than to have a husband bought for her by her father's gold or lands. When a man stormed the walls of a stronghold, or slew an hundred Philistines by personal prowess, or paid fourteen years of responsible service, for a wife, or when, as in the days of chivalry, he ran tilts and courted dangers in her behalf, however grotesque the performance, it indicated not only solidity of character in the wooer, but also a true and manly respect for woman, which is not possessed by all men of modern days.—Tr.]

The Kenites take up their abode in the territories of Judah.

CHAPTER I. 16.

16 And the children [sons] of the Kenite, Moses' father-in-law, went up out of [from] the city of palm-trees with the children [sons] of Judah into the wilderness of Judah, which lieth in the south of Arad; and they [he<sup>1</sup>] went and dwelt among<sup>2</sup> the people.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 16. — He, i. e., the Kenite. The subject of יְהוֹנָדָב is יְהוֹנָדָב, the Kenite, collective term for the tribe. — Tr.]

[2 Ver. 16. — בְּתוֹכָם, with, near, the people, but still in settlements of their own, cf. ver. 21. Dr. Cassel's unter answers to the English among. — Tr.]

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

Ver. 16. And the sons of the Kenite, Moses' father-in-law. Kenite is the name of a heathen tribe, which in Gen. xv. 19 is enumerated among the nations hostile to Israel. In the vision of Balaam it is mentioned in connection with Amalek (Num. xxiv. 21). It is there said of the tribe, "In the rock hast thou put thy nest" (בְּרֹאשׁ הַסֵּלַע, from רֹאשׁ, "nest"). "Strong," indeed, "is their dwelling-place." The Kenites were a tribe of the wilderness, troglodytes, who dwelt in the grottoes which abound everywhere in Palestine, but especially in its southern parts. Barth, in 1847, saw caves at the lower Jordan, "high up in the steep face of the precipitous rock, on the left, inhabited by human beings and goats, though it is impossible to see how they get there" (Ritter, xv. 465). At the Dead Sea, Lynch discovered grottoes in the rocks, the entrance to which, in spite of all proficiency in climbing, could not be found. The name of the tribe, Kenites, is doubtless derived from כֵּן, which means an elevated hiding-place in the rocks, as well as a nest. The term troglodytes, likewise, comes from τρογλή, "grotto," and is applied to both birds and human beings. As Jeremiah (xlix. 16) exclaims, "though thou shouldst make thy nest as high as the eagle," so Æschylus (Choëphoroe, 249) calls the nest of the eagle's brood, σπηνημα, "dwelling-place."

It is from this passage, and from ch. iv. 11, that we first learn that Jethro, the father-in-law of Moses,<sup>1</sup> belonged to one of the Kenite families. Moses, when a fugitive in the desert, found an asylum and a wife in the retirement of Jethro's household. From that time, this family, without losing its independent and separate existence, was closely allied with all Israel. But it was only this family, and not the whole Kenite nation, that entered into this alliance. Else, how could the Kenite be named among enemies in the prophetic announcements of Gen. xv., and with Amalek in the vision of Balaam? Moreover, the text clearly intimates that the sons of the Kenite adhered to Israel, not as Kenites, but as descendants of Jethro, the father-

<sup>1</sup> Earlier scholars (Le Clerc, Lightfoot, Opera, ii. 581) were already struck by the Targum's constant substitution of בְּתוֹכָם, Salmah for Kenite. In this passage also it reads, "the sons of Salmah." Even Jewish authors were at a loss how to explain this. As it affords a specimen of the traditional exegesis of the Jews, already current in the Targum on this passage, I will here set down the explanation of this substitution: The Kenite of our passage is identified with the Kinim of 1 Chron. ii. 55, who are there described as "the families of the Sopherim." But how came the Kenites to hold this office, in after times so highly honored, and filled by men learned in the law (cf. Sanhedrin, p. 104 a and 106 a)? The father-in-law of Moses — (tradition makes him flee from the council of Pharaoh of which he was a member, Sota, 11 a) — is the Kenite who, when the latter wandered in the desert (Ex. ii. 20, 21), gave him bread (lechem) and also, through his daughter, a house (bet). Now, the same chapter of Chronicles, vers. 51, 54, names a certain Salma, and styles him the "father of Beth-lechem." The father of this "Bread-house" is then identified with Jethro. Consequently, the sons of the Kenite are the sons of Salmah, and thus their name itself indicates how they attained to the dignity accorded them. The Targum on Chronicles (ed. Wilna, 1836, p. 3, A) expresses it thus: "They were the sons of Zippora, who (in their capacity of Sopherim) enjoyed, together with the families of the Levites, the glory of having descended from Moses, the teacher of Israel."

in-law of Moses.<sup>1</sup> It is the constant aim of the historian of the conquest of Canaan by Israel, to show that every promise was fulfilled, and that no one who at any time showed kindness failed of his promised reward. Caleb's constancy and courage found their long-promised inheritance in Hebron. A recompense had also been promised to the sons of the Kenite. When Israel was on its journey through the desert (Num. x. 31), and Hobab (on the name, see below, on ch. iv. 11) desired to return to his old place of abode, Moses said: "Leave us not; thou knowest our places of encampment in the desert, and hast been to us instead of eyes. If thou go with us, every good thing with which God blesses us, we will share with thee." The fulfillment of this promise now takes place. The Kenites enter with the tribe of Judah into the inheritance of the latter, as into a domain in which they had always been at home. They share in the blessing bestowed by God on Israel.

They went up from the City of Palms. No other place than the plain of Jericho is ever called the City of Palms in the Scriptures. Although the city was destroyed, the palm-groves still existed. How was it possible to suppose,<sup>2</sup> in the face of Deut. xxxiv. 3 and Judg. iii. 13, that here suddenly, without any preparatory notice, another City of Palms is referred to! The statement here made, so far from occasioning difficulties, only testifies to the exactness of the narrator. Judah's camp was in Gilgal, whence they marched through Bezek against the enemy, and then to Hebron. Gilgal lay in the vicinity of Jericho. When the tribe decamped, the Kenite was unwilling to remain behind. On the march through the desert, their position as guides had of course always been in the van, and, therefore, with the tribe of Judah. They desire to enjoy their reward also in connection with this tribe, and hence the palms of overthrown Jericho cannot detain them. The region in which they were, can therefore be no other place of palms than that from which Judah broke up, namely, Jericho. In fact, the statement that they came from Jericho, proves the correctness of the view given above, that Gilgal was the place from which Judah set out to enter his territory.

Into the wilderness of Judah, which lieth in the south of Arad. But why is the narrative of the Kenite expedition here introduced? It is a peculiarity of Hebrew narrators, that they weave in episodes like this and that of Othniel and Achsah, whenever the progress of the history, coming into contact with the place or person with which they are associated, offers an occasion. Hence we already find events communicated in the 15th chapter of Joshua, which occurred at a later date, but of which the author was reminded while speaking of the division of the land. The history of the conquest of their territory by Judah is very brief. First, the mountain district of Hebron and the northeastern part of the territory was taken possession of. Then, according to the plan laid down ver. 9, they turned to the south. Of this part of their undertaking no details are given; but as they were getting possession of the land in this direction, they came to Arad, where it pleased the Kenites to take up their abode, in close relations with Judah. A king formerly reigned at Arad, who attacked Israel when journeying in the desert (Num. xxi. 1), and was defeated by Moses. A king of Arad was also conquered by Joshua (Josh. xii. 14). After its occupancy by the tribe of Judah, the Kenites resided there. The position<sup>4</sup> of the place has been accurately determined by Robinson (Bib. Res. ii. 101, cf. Ritter, xiv. 121). Eusebius and Jerome had placed it twenty Roman miles, a camel's journey of about eight hours, from Hebron. This accords well with the position of the present Tell 'Arad, "a barren-looking eminence rising above the country around." From this fragmentary notice of the place, we may perhaps infer what it was that specially attracted the Kenites. If these tribes were attached to the Troglodyte mode of life, the Arabs still told Robinson of a "cavern" found there. The Kenites still held this region in the time of David; for from the vicinage of the places named in 1 Sam. xxx. 29 ff., especially Hormah, it appears that they are those to whom as friends he makes presents.<sup>5</sup> It is true, that when the terrible war between Saul and Amalek raged in this region, Saul, lest he should strike friend with foe, caused them to remove (1 Sam. xv. 6). After the victory, they must have returned again.

<sup>1</sup> This view does away with all those questions of which, after earlier expositors, Bertheau treats on pp. 24, 25.

<sup>2</sup> Into this error, Le Clerc has misled later expositors, and among them, Bertheau, p. 26. However, the wholly irrelevant passage of Diodorus (lib. 42), frequently cited to justify the assumption of another City of Palms, was already abandoned by Rosenmüller, p. 24.

<sup>3</sup> Ishak Chelo, the author of Les chemins de Jérusalem, in the 14th century, found Arad sparsely inhabited, by poor

Arabs and Jews, who lived of their flocks. The Rabbi tends his sheep, and at the same time gives instruction to his pupils. Cf. Carnoly, Itinéraires de la Terre Sainte (Bruxelles, 1847), pp. 244, 246.

<sup>4</sup> Cf. 1 Sam. xxvii. 10, where the same local position is assigned to the Kenites, and spoken of by David as the scene of his incursions, in order to make the suspicious Philistines believe that he injures the friends of Israel.

Simeon's territory is conquered, and Judah takes the Philistine cities.

CHAPTER I. 17-20.

- 17 And Judah went with Simeon his brother, and they slew [smote] the Canaanites that inhabited Zephath, and utterly destroyed it [executed the ban upon it].<sup>1</sup> And 18 the name of the city was called<sup>2</sup> Hormah. Also [And] Judah took Gaza with the coast [territory] thereof, and Askelon with the coast [territory] thereof, and Ekron 19 with the coast [territory] thereof. And the Lord [Jehovah] was with Judah; [.]

and he drave out the inhabitants [obtained possession] of the mountain [mountains]; but could not drive out the inhabitants of the valley [for the inhabitants of the low country were not to be driven out],<sup>2</sup> because they had chariots of iron. And they gave Hebron unto Caleb, as Moses [had] said: and he expelled thence the three sons of Anak.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 17. — The וְהָיָה (LXX. ἀνίσταται), in cases like the present, was, as Hengstenberg (Pent. ii. 74) expresses it, "the compulsory devotement to the Lord of those who would not voluntarily devote themselves to him." To render the word simply by "destruction," as is done in the A. V. here and elsewhere, is to leave out the religious element of the act, and reduce it to the level of a common war measure. Cf. Winer, Realwörterb., s. v. Baan; Smith's Bib. Dict. s. v. Anathema. — Tr.]

[2 Ver. 17. — וְהָיָה. Dr. Cassel translates it as if it were plural, and gives it the same subject with וְהָיָה, "they called." Correct, perhaps, as to fact, but grammatically less accurate than the A. V. וְהָיָה is the indefinite third person. Cf. Ges. Gr. 137, 3. — Tr.]

[3 Ver. 19. — Dr. Cassel: denn nicht zu vertreiben waren die Bewohner der Niederung. On the force of וְהָיָה, for (R. V. but), cf. Ges. Gram. § 156, p. 271. — The construction of וְהָיָה is unusual. According to Keil (and Bertheau) "וְהָיָה is to be taken substantively, as in Amos vi. 10, in the same sense in which the later Scriptures use וְהָיָה before the infinitive, 2 Chron. v. 11; Esth. iv. 2, viii. 8; Eccles. iii. 14. Cf. Ges. Gram. § 132, Rom. 1; Ewald, 237 c." Idea and expression might then be represented in English by the phrase: "there was no driving the enemy out." On וְהָיָה, see foot-note on p. 39. — Tr.]

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

Ver. 17. And Judah went with Simeon his brother. The course of conquest by the tribes is regularly followed, but the narrative delays only at such points as are connected with noteworthy facts. When Judah had reached the south, and was in Arad, the statement was introduced that the Kenite settled there. After the conquest of the south, the conquerors turned toward the low country (ver. 9). In order to get there, they must traverse the territory of Simeon. Consequently, Judah goes with Simeon now, to assist him in gaining possession of his land. This expedition also offered an event which it was important to chronicle.

They smote the inhabitants of Zephath, and called the city Chormah. In itself considered, the mere execution of the ban of destruction on a city otherwise unknown, cannot be of such importance as would properly make it the only reported event of the campaign in Simeon's territory. The record must have been made with reference to some event in the earlier history of Israel.<sup>1</sup> The tribes had just been in Arad, where the Kenites settled. Now, according to the narrative in Num. xxi. 1 ff., it was the King of Arad who suddenly fell upon the people in their journey through the desert. The attack was made when the Israelitish host was in a most critical situation, which, to be sure, could not be said to be improved by the ban executed on the cities of the king after the victory was won. Not Arad, — for this retained its name, — but one of the places put under the ban, we are told, received the name Hormah.<sup>2</sup> The vow in pursuance of which this ban was inflicted required its subsequent maintenance as much as its original execution. Thus much we learn from the passage in Numbers. That a close connection existed between Arad and Hormah is also confirmed by Josh. xii. 14, where a king of Arad and one of Hormah are named together. In the same way are the inhabitants of Hormah and the Kenites in Arad mentioned together, upon occasion of David's division of booty (1 Sam. xxx. 29). Since Moses was not able to occupy these regions, the banned city, as appears plainly from Josh. xii. 14, where a king of Hormah occurs, had been peopled and occupied anew. Hence it was the task of the tribe of Simeon, with the help of Judah, to restore the vow of Israel, and to change the Zephath of its heathen inhabitants once more into Hormah. That, in this respect also, the tribes observed the commands of Moses, and fulfilled what was formerly promised, — adjudging to one, reward, as to the Kenite; to another, the ban, as to Zephath, — this is the reason why this fact is here recorded. Robinson thought that there was every reason for supposing that in the position of the pass es-Sufah, far down in the south, the locality of Zephath was discovered (Bib. Res. ii. 181). The position, as laid down on his map, strikes me as somewhat remote from Tell 'Arad; and the name es-Sufah, Arabic for "rock," cannot, on account of its general character, be considered altogether decisive.<sup>3</sup> Moreover, another Zephath actually occurs, near Maresah (2 Chron. xiv. 10), be understood here, as in Gen. xviii 19 and elsewhere, of one place or one city." — Tr.]

<sup>1</sup> Compare Rosenmüller, p. 26, and Hengstenberg, Pent. ii. p. 179, etc.

<sup>2</sup> The King of Arad only is spoken of, Num. xxi. 1, and it is not said that Arad was called Hormah. The "name of the (one) place," it is stated, they called Hormah, whereas they "banned their cities." Since, therefore, Arad and Hormah are distinguished, it is plain that this one place of the banned cities, which was called Hormah, was Zephath. — [Bertheau: "It has been thought, indeed, that the word

וְהָיָה in Num. xxi. 8, in the connection in which it stands, indicates that in the time of Moses the whole southern district received the name Hormah, whereas, according to our passage (i. e. Judg. i. 17) it was given only to the city of Zephath; but וְהָיָה never signifies "region," and must

of the places put under the ban, we are told, received the name Hormah.<sup>2</sup> The vow in pursuance of which this ban was inflicted required its subsequent maintenance as much as its original execution. Thus much we learn from the passage in Numbers. That a close connection existed between Arad and Hormah is also confirmed by Josh. xii. 14, where a king of Arad and one of Hormah are named together. In the same way are the inhabitants of Hormah and the Kenites in Arad mentioned together, upon occasion of David's division of booty (1 Sam. xxx. 29). Since Moses was not able to occupy these regions, the banned city, as appears plainly from Josh. xii. 14, where a king of Hormah occurs, had been peopled and occupied anew. Hence it was the task of the tribe of Simeon, with the help of Judah, to restore the vow of Israel, and to change the Zephath of its heathen inhabitants once more into Hormah. That, in this respect also, the tribes observed the commands of Moses, and fulfilled what was formerly promised, — adjudging to one, reward, as to the Kenite; to another, the ban, as to Zephath, — this is the reason why this fact is here recorded. Robinson thought that there was every reason for supposing that in the position of the pass es-Sufah, far down in the south, the locality of Zephath was discovered (Bib. Res. ii. 181). The position, as laid down on his map, strikes me as somewhat remote from Tell 'Arad; and the name es-Sufah, Arabic for "rock," cannot, on account of its general character, be considered altogether decisive.<sup>3</sup> Moreover, another Zephath actually occurs, near Maresah (2 Chron. xiv. 10), be understood here, as in Gen. xviii 19 and elsewhere, of one place or one city." — Tr.]

<sup>3</sup> Some ruins, named Sepäta by the Arabs, were found by Rowlands (cf. Ritter, xiv. 1084-5; Williams' Holy City, i. 464), two and a half hours southwest of Khaleas (Robinson's Elusa), and have also been identified with Zephath. Their position is very different from that of Tell es-Sufah. They also seem to me to lie too remote from Arad. That the Biblical name Zephath has been preserved, after the Jewish inhabitants for many centuries must have used, not that, but Hormah, does not appear at all probable. In the mountains of Ephraim, Eli Smith came into a village Um-Sufah. "It reminded him of the locality of Hormah near the southern border of Palestine, both of which names [Um-Sufah and Hormah] in Arabic designate such smooth tracts of rock" (Ritter, xvi. 561).

not far from Eleutheropolis, and Robinson (ii. 31) makes it probable that by the valley of Zephath in which King Asa fought, the wady is meant which "comes down from Beit Jibrin towards Tell es-Sâfiéh." In the Middle Ages, a castle existing there, bore the name Alba Specula, Fortress of Observation, which at all events agrees with the signification of Zephath.

Ver. 18. And Judah took Gaza, Askelon, and Ekron. The territory assigned to Judah extended to the sea, including the Philistine coast-land, with their five cities. After the conquest of Simeon's lot their course descended from the hills into the lowlands (Shephelah, ver. 9), most probably by way of Beer-sheba, to the sea. In their victorious progress, they storm and seize Gaza, Askelon, and Ekron, pressing on from south to north. Although Ashdod is not mentioned here, it is natural to suppose, since it was included in the borders assigned to Judah (Josh. xv.), and lay on the road from Askelon to Ekron, that it was also taken, previous to the conquest of Ekron. Josephus, drawing the same inference, expressly includes it. It is said

וַיִּלְכְּדוּ, "they took by storm." They were not able, at this time, so to take and hold these places as to expel their inhabitants. The tribe of Judah, which, as it seems, now continued the war alone, on the sea-coast fell in with cultivated cities, provided with all the arts of warfare. Israel at that time was not prepared for long and tedious wars. In swift and stormy campaigns, their divinely-inspired enthusiasm enabled them to conquer. On the mountains, where personal courage and natural strength alone came into play, they were entirely victorious, and held whatever they gained. It was only in the plains, where the inhabitants of the coast cities met them with the murderous opposition of iron chariots, that they gave up the duty of gaining entire mastery over the land.<sup>1 2</sup>

Ver. 19. For the inhabitants of the low country were not to be driven out, because they had iron chariots.<sup>3</sup> The noble simplicity

<sup>1</sup> Thus an internal contradiction between this verse and the statement of the next that Judah failed to drive out the inhabitants of the low country, as asserted by Baithinger (Herr. Real-Encycl. xi. 554), does not exist.

<sup>2</sup> [The author identifies the נָחַל, the inhabitants of which Judah failed to drive out, with the נָחַל, ver. 9, and hence renders it (see ver. 19) by Niederung, "low country," prop. depression. Against this identification, accepted by Studer, Bertheau, Kell, and many others, Bachmann objects that, with the single exception of Jer. xlvii. 5, a poetic passage in a late prophet, נָחַל is never applied to the Philistine plain. "In accordance with its derivation, נָחַל denotes a valley-basin (cf. Robinson, Phys. Geog. p. 70), broadly extended it may be (Gen. xiv. 9, 10; Josh. xvii. 16; etc.), adapted for battle (Josh. viii. 13), susceptible of cultivation (Job xxxix. 10; Cant. ii. 1; Ps. lxxv. 14; etc.), but still always depressed between mountains and bordered by them. It never means a level plain or lowlands." Cf. Stanley, Sinai and Pal. p. 476, Amer. ed. Bachmann, therefore, looks for the Emek — which, by the way, with the article, is not necessarily singular, but may be used collectively — within or at least very near the Mountains of Judah. "Of valleys affording room for the action of chariots, the mountains of Judah have several; e. g., the Emek Rephaim, Josh. xv. 8, southwest of Jerusalem, one hour long and one half hour broad, known as a battle-field in other times also (2 Sam. v. 18, 22; xlviii. 13); the Emek ha-Elah, 1 Sam. xvii. 1, 2; the broad basins of the valleys of Jehoshaphat and Ben Hinnom near the northern boundary (see Rob. i. 268, 273); the great, basin-like plain of Benai Naim, of the narrative could not show itself more plainly. "The Lord was with Judah, and he gained possession of the mountain district; but לֹא יִדְרֹגוּ, "not to be driven out," etc. The expression לֹא יִדְרֹגוּ, "they could not," is purposely avoided. They would have been quite able when God was with them; but when it came to a contest with iron chariots their faith failed them. The tribes of Joseph were likewise kept out of the low country because the inhabitants had chariots of iron (Josh. xvii. 16); but Joshua said (ver. 18), "Thou shalt (or canst) drive out the Canaanite, though he be strong." Iron chariots are known only to the Book of Judges, excepting the notice of them in the passage just cited from Joshua. The victory of Deborah and Barak over Jabin, king of Canaan, owed much of its glory to the fact that Sisera commanded nine hundred iron chariots. Bertheau rejects the earlier opinion that these chariots were currus falcati, scythe-chariots, on the ground that those were unknown to the Egyptians. He thinks it probable that the chariots of the Canaanites, like those of the Egyptians, were only made of wood, but with iron-clad corners, etc., and therefore very strong. But such chariots would never be called iron chariots. The Egyptian war-chariots which Pharaoh leads forth against Israel, are not so called. To speak of chariots as iron chariots, when they were in the main constructed of a different material, would be manifestly improper, unless what of iron there was about them, indicated their terrible destructive capacities. It has, indeed, been inferred from Xenophon's Cyropædia (vi. 1, 27), that scythe-chariots were first invented by Cyrus, and that they were previously unknown "in Media, Syria, Arabia, and the whole of Asia." But even if this Cyrus were to be deemed strictly historical, the whole notice indicates no more than the improvement<sup>4</sup> of a similar kind of weapon. It does not at all prove that scythe-chariots did not previously exist. The principal improvement which the in the east (see Rob. i. 488 ff.); and others. And that, in general, chariots in considerable numbers might be used in the mountain country, appears, with reference to a region a little further north, from 1 Sam. xiii. 5." Bachmann's view of the connection of ver. 19 with what precedes is as follows: Ver. 9. The battle of Bezek, etc., having secured Judah from attacks in the rear, and left him free to proceed in his undertakings, the theatre of these undertakings is divided by ver. 9 into three parts: the mountain country, the south (negeb), and the plain (shephelah). The conquest of the mountain country is illustrated by a couple of instances in vers. 10-15; that of the south is similarly indicated in vers. 16, 17; and that of the plain in ver. 18. Here, too, Judah was successful in his undertakings. As in the other cases, the places named here, Gaza, Askelon, Ekron, are only mentioned as examples of what took place in the Shephelah generally. The conquest of the western parts of the Shephelah being related, that of the eastern districts, nearer the mountains, was left to be inferred as a matter of course. Then, in ver. 19, the narrative returns to the mountain country, in order to supplement vers. 10-15 by indicating, what those verses did not show, that the conquest of this division, the first of the three mentioned, was not complete. — Ta.]

<sup>3</sup> How properly the readings of the Septuaginta are not considered as authorities against the Hebrew text, is sufficiently shown by the single fact that here they read, "οὐκ ἐπύκαζον διαστειλάτω αὐτοῖς;" which also passed over into the Syriac version. A few Codd. add "καὶ ἄρματα σιδηρὰ αὐτοῖς."

<sup>4</sup> Cf. Joh. Gottl. Schneider, in his edition of the Cyropædia (Lips. 1840), p. 383.

Cyrus of Xenophon introduced, was, that he changed the chariot-rampart, formed perhaps after the manner of the Indian battle-array (akschau-hini),<sup>1</sup> the idea of our game of chess) into a means of aggressive warfare. For this purpose, he changed the form of the chariot, and added the scythe to the axle-tree. But the chariots of our passage must already have been intended for aggressive action, since otherwise the purpose of the iron is incomprehensible. Nor does Xenophon assert that Cyrus was the first who affixed scythes to chariots, although he would not have failed to do so if that had been his opinion. It is, moreover, in itself not probable. Xenophon mentions that the (African) Cyrenians "still" had that kind of chariots which Cyrus invented.<sup>2</sup> And Strabo informs us that in his time the Nigretes, Pharusii, and Ethiopians, African tribes, made use of the scythe-chariot.<sup>3</sup> The changes introduced in the chariot by Cyrus, were made in view of a war against the Assyrians, whom Xenophon distinguishes from the Syrians. But from a statement of Ctesias<sup>4</sup> we learn that the Assyrian armies already had scythe-chariots. The same occasion induced Cyrus to clothe his chariot-warriors in armor. For at all events, Assyrian monuments represent the charioteers encased in coats of mail.<sup>5</sup> It serves to explain the term iron chariots, that Xenophon also speaks of iron scythes (σπέραι αἰδηρά). Curtius (iv. 9, 4) describes chariots which carried iron lances on their poles (ex summo tenone hastæ præfixæ ferro eminebant), for which the form of Assyrian chariots seems to be very well adapted. Representations of them sufficiently indicate the horrors of these instruments of war, by the bodies of the slain between their wheels.

Ver. 20. And they gave Hebron unto Caleb. This statement, even after that of ver. 10, is by no means superfluous. Now, and not before, could Caleb receive Hebron as a quiet possession. Judah must first enter his territory. When the conquest was completed,—and it was completed after the western parts of the mountain region also submitted,—the tribe of Judah entered upon its possessions; and then the aged hero received that which had been promised him. Then also, most likely, transpired that beautiful episode which gave to Othniel his wife and property.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Vers. 4-20. Obedient, believing, united Israel is attended by victory. And in victory it knows

<sup>1</sup> Bohlen, Altes Indien, II. 68.

<sup>2</sup> [On this sentence of our author, Bachmann remarks: "Cassell's explanation that the Cyrenians had 'still' that kind of chariots which Cyrus invented, is the opposite of what Xenophon, l. c., expressly and repeatedly declares, namely, that Cyrus abolished (κατέλυσε) both the earlier (σπέραι σφύραι) Trojan method of chariot-warfare, and also that still in use (ἐν τῇ καὶ νῦν σφύραι) among the Cyrenians, which formerly (πρὶν σπέραι σφύραι) was also practiced by the Medes, Syrians, etc." Bertheau and Bachmann (Kell, too) resist the conversion of "iron chariots" into currus falcatus on the ground that these were unknown before Cyrus, who invented them, Cyropædia, vi. 1, 27, 30. On the Egyptian war-chariot, see Wilkinson, Manners and Customs, I. 360. — Tr.]

<sup>3</sup> Lib. xvii. 8, 7, ed. Paris, p. 708: "ἡρώωνται δὲ καὶ σπέραι σφύραι αἰδηρά."
<sup>4</sup> In the Bibl. Hist. of Diodorus, II. 5.
<sup>5</sup> Cf. Layard, Nineveh and its Remains, II. 335. [For an account of the Assyrian war-chariot, p. 349. On p. 353, Layard remarks: "Chariots armed with scythes are not seen in the Assyrian sculptures, although mentioned by Ctesias as being in the army of Ninus." — Tr.]

STARKE (ver. 16): The children of those parents who have deserved well of the church of God, should have kindness shown, and benefits extended to them before others. For ingratitude is a shameful thing.

THE SAME (ver. 17): Covenants, even when involving dangers, must be faithfully kept by all, but especially by brothers and sisters.

[SCOTT (ver. 19): Great things might be achieved by the professors of the gospel, if they unitedly endeavored to promote the common cause of truth and righteousness; for then "the Lord would be with them," and every mountain would sink into a plain. But when outward difficulties are viewed by the eye of sense, and the almighty power of God is forgotten, then no wonder we do not prosper; for according to our faith will be our vigor, zeal, and success. Love of ease, indulgence, and worldly advantages, both spring from and foster unbelief. Thus many an awakened sinner, who seemed to have escaped Satan's bondage, "is entangled again, and overcome, and his last state is worse than the first." Thus even many a believer who begins well is hindered: he grows negligent and unwatchful and afraid of the cross; his graces languish, his evil propensities revive; Satan perceives his advantage, and plies him with suitable temptations; the world recovers its hold; he loses his peace, brings guilt into his conscience, anguish into his heart, discredit on his character, and reproach on the gospel; his hands are tied, his mouth is closed, and his usefulness ruined. — Tr.]

rus, who invented them, Cyropædia, vi. 1, 27, 30. On the Egyptian war-chariot, see Wilkinson, Manners and Customs, I. 360. — Tr.]

<sup>3</sup> Lib. xvii. 8, 7, ed. Paris, p. 708: "ἡρώωνται δὲ καὶ σπέραι σφύραι αἰδηρά."
<sup>4</sup> In the Bibl. Hist. of Diodorus, II. 5.
<sup>5</sup> Cf. Layard, Nineveh and its Remains, II. 335. [For an account of the Assyrian war-chariot, p. 349. On p. 353, Layard remarks: "Chariots armed with scythes are not seen in the Assyrian sculptures, although mentioned by Ctesias as being in the army of Ninus." — Tr.]

Benjamin is inactive, and allows the Jebusite to remain in Jerusalem. The House of Joseph emulates Judah, and takes Bethel.

CHAPTER I. 21-26.

21 And<sup>1</sup> the children [sons] of Benjamin did not drive out the Jebusites that inhabited Jerusalem: but the Jebusites dwell [dwelt] with [among]<sup>2</sup> the children [sons] of Benjamin in Jerusalem unto this day. And the house of Joseph, they also<sup>3</sup> went up against Beth-el: and the Lord [Jehovah] was with them. And the house of Joseph sent to descry [spy out the entrance to]<sup>4</sup> Beth-el. Now the name of the city before was Luz. And the spies saw a man come forth out of the city, and they said unto him, Shew us, we pray thee, the entrance into the city, and we will shew thee mercy [favor]. And when [omit: when] he shewed them the entrance into the city, [and] they smote the city with the edge of the sword: but they let go the man and all his family. And the man went into the land of the Hittites, and built [there] a city, and called the name thereof Luz: which is the name thereof unto this day.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[<sup>1</sup> Ver. 21. — The ׀ would be better taken adverbially: But. It contrasts the conduct of Benjamin with that of Caleb, ver. 20. — Tr.]

[<sup>2</sup> Ver. 21. — Cf. note 2, on ver. 16, and 8 on ver. 29. — Tr.]

[<sup>3</sup> Ver. 22. — ׀ looks back to ver. 8 ff. and intimates a parallelism between the conduct of the House of Joseph and that of Judah and his brother Simeon. — Tr.]

[<sup>4</sup> Ver. 23. — Dr. Cassel apparently supplies מְבַרֵךְ from the next verse. מְבַרֵךְ, it is true, is usually followed by the accusative, not by ׀. But on the other hand, מְבַרֵךְ is put in the const. state before ׀ (cf. vers. 24, 25); whereas, if we supply it here, we must suppose it joined to ׀ by means of a preposition. It is as well, therefore, to say, with Berthieu, that "the verb is connected with ׀ because the spying is to fasten itself, and that continuously, upon Bethel, cf. ׀ with מְבַרֵךְ and מְבַרֵךְ;" or with Bachmann, that "׀ indicates the hostile character of the spying." מְבַרֵךְ is used as a general expression for any way or mode of access into the city: "Show us how to get in," is the demand of the spies. — Tr.]

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

Ver. 21. And the sons of Benjamin did not drive out the Jebusite. At Josh. xv. 63, at the close of a detailed description of the territory of Judah, it is said, "As for the Jebusites, the inhabitants of Jerusalem, the sons of Judah could not drive them out; and the Jebusites dwelt with the sons of Judah in Jerusalem unto this day." This verse has been thought to contradict the one above. In reality, however, it only proves the exactness of the statements. The boundary line of the tribes of Benjamin and Judah ran through the district of Jerusalem, through the valley of Ben Hinnom, south of the city (Josh. xv. 8). The city already extended outward from the foot of the citadel. The remark of Josephus,<sup>1</sup> that, in the passage above discussed, Judg. i. 8, the tribe of Judah took only the lower city, not the citadel, has great probability on its side. The conquest of the citadel was not their business at the time. It was sufficient for them to pursue the hostile king into his city, and then lay that in ashes. The citadel lay within the tribe of Benjamin. Nevertheless, on account of this fortress, Judah, also, was not able to expel the Jebusites, who continued to live side by side with them in the district of Jerusalem. At all events, the Jebusites in Jerusalem belonged to the territory of Judah so far at least, that the failure to expel them must be mentioned in connection with the boundaries of Judah. Still more necessary was it to repeat this statement in connection with Benjamin, within whose limits the city and fortress of the Jebusites were situated. Their expulsion properly devolved on this tribe. Successful occupation of the stronghold would have greatly increased the honor and consideration of Benjamin. The importance of the place, David recognized as soon as he became king. But Benjamin was content when the Jebusites, humbled by Judah, offered no resistance, left them in possession of the fortress, and lived peaceably together with them. It has been justly observed, that different terms are employed in speaking of the failure of Judah and Benjamin respectively to drive out the Jebusites. Of Judah it is said (Josh. xv. 63), "they could not," because the Jebusites had their stronghold in another tribe. But of Benjamin this expression is not used, because they were wanting in disposition and energy for the struggle that devolved upon them. Cf. on ch. xix. 12.

Ver. 22. And the house of Joseph, they also went up toward Bethel. This action of the house of Joseph is told by way of contrast with the house of Benjamin. The tribe of Benjamin lay between Judah and Ephraim (Josh. xviii. 11); and Bethel, within its limits, formed a counterpart to Jerusalem. Historically, Bethel is celebrated for the blessing there promised to Jacob, and afterwards less favorably for the idolatrous worship of Jeroboam. Geographically, it was important on account of its position and strength. As Jebus and Jerusalem are always identified, so it is everywhere remarked of Bethel, that it was formerly Luz; and as Jebus indicated particularly the fortress, Jerusalem the city,—although the latter name also embraced both,—so a similar relation must be assumed to have existed between Bethel and Luz. Otherwise the border of Benjamin could not have run south of Luz (Josh. xviii. 13), while nevertheless Bethel was reckoned among the cities of Benjamin (Josh. xviii. 22). This assumption, moreover, explains the peculiar phraseology of Josh. xviii. 13: "And the border went over from thence toward Luz (after which we expect the usual addition "which is Bethel;," but that which does follow is:) on the south side of Luz, which is Bethel. It explains likewise the mention, Josh. xvi. 2, of the border "from Bethel to Luz," i. e. between Bethel and Luz. The latter was evidently a fortress, high and strong, whose city descended along the mountain-slope. When Jacob erected his altar, it must have been on this slope or in the valley. One name designated both fortress and city, but this does not militate against their being distinguished from each other. Bethel belonged to two tribes in a similar manner as Jerusalem. The capture of Luz by Joseph would not have been told in a passage which treats of the conflicts of the individual tribes in their own territories, if that fortress had not belonged to the tribes of Joseph. By the conquest of Luz, Joseph secured the possession of Bethel, since both went by that name, just as David, when he had taken the fortress of the Jebusite, was for the first time master of Jerusalem. This deed is related as contrasting with the conduct of Benjamin. Benjamin did nothing to take the fortress of Zion: Joseph went up to Luz, and God was with him. This remark had been impossible, if, as has been frequently assumed,<sup>1</sup> the tribe of Joseph had arbitrarily appropriated to itself the city which had been promised to Benjamin. The view of ancient Jewish expositors, who assume a Bethel in the valley and one on the mountain, does not differ from that here suggested.—Robinson seems to have established the position of the ancient Bethel near the present Beitin, where scattered ruins occupy the surface of a hill-point. A few minutes to the N. E., on the highest spot of ground in the vicinity, are other ruins, erroneously supposed to be Ai by the natives: these also perhaps belonged to Bethel.<sup>2</sup> It cannot, however, be said, that until Robinson this position was entirely unknown. Esthori ha-Parchi, who in his time found it called Bethai, the l having fallen away, was evidently acquainted with it.<sup>3</sup> In another work of the fourteenth century the then current name of Bethel is said to be Bethin.<sup>4</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Ant. v. 2, 2: Χαλεπή δ' ἦν ἡ καθύπερθε αὐτοῖς αἰρεσις, etc.

Vers. 23-25. And the house of Joseph sent to spy out. וַיִּשְׁלַח מִן־בֵּית־יוֹסֵף לְבַחֵן, to travel around, in order to find an entrance less guarded and inaccessible. Luz appeared to be very strong and well guarded, and for a long time the assailants vainly sought a suitable opportunity for a successful assault. When the Persians besieged Sardis, their efforts were long in vain. One day a Persian saw a Lydian, whose helmet had fallen over the rampart, fetch it back by a hitherto unnoticed way. The man was followed, and the city was taken (Herod. i. 84). A similar accident favored the conquest of the fortress. The spies saw a man who had come out of the city. He failed to escape them. They compelled him to disclose the entrance. They promised him peace and mercy on condition of showing them the right way. He did it. It seems not even to have been necessary to storm the city; they fell upon the inhabitants unawares. Only the man who had assisted them, and his family, were spared. They let him go in peace. He was evidently no Ephialtes, who had betrayed the city for money. Doing it under compulsion, and unconsciously serving a great cause,<sup>5</sup> no calamity befell him, and he found a new country. It not only behooves the people of God to perform what they have promised, but Jewish tradition followed persons like Rahab and this man, as those who had furthered the course of sacred history against their own people, with peculiar kindness. This man, like Rahab, is blessed for all time (cf. Jalkut on the passage, p. 8, d).

Ver. 26. And the man went into the land of the Hittites. It evinces a special interest in the man that his fortunes are traced even into a strange land. Greek patriotism relates that Ephialtes fared as he deserved;<sup>6</sup> our history employs the favorable destiny which befell this man, to show that as he did not designedly for the sake of money practice treason, so he was also the instrument of setting a prosperous enterprise on foot. But where is the land of the Chittim (Hittites) to which he went? In nearly all passages in which Scripture makes mention of the Sons of Cheth (חֵת, E. V. Heth), the Chitti (חִתִּי, E. V. Hittite), and the Chittim (חִתִּים, E. V. Hittites), the name appears to be a general term, like the word Canaanite. Especially in the three passages where the Chittim are mentioned<sup>7</sup> (Josh. i. 4; 1 Kgs. x. 29; 2 Kgs. vii. 6), their land and kings are placed between Egypt and Aram in such a way as seems to be applicable only to the populations of Canaan. Movers<sup>8</sup> has successfully maintained that חֵת and חִתִּים refer to the same race of people; but it cannot be accepted that this race consisted only of the Kitim of Cyprus. It must rather be assumed that the Chittim answer to a more general conception, which also gave to the Kitim, their colonists, the name they bore. The historical interpretation of Kitim, which applied it to Ionians, Macedonians, and Romans, would not have been possible, if the name had not carried with it the notion of coast-dwellers,<sup>9</sup> an idea which comparative philology may find indicated. Now, it is unquestionable that the Phœnician cities, with Tyre at

<sup>1</sup> Already by Reland, Palæstina, p. 841.

<sup>2</sup> Robinson, Bibl. Res. i. 448.

<sup>3</sup> Kafoer ve Pherach (Berlin edition), ch. xi. pp. 47, 48. Cf. Zuns, in Ascher's Benj. of Tudela, ii. 436.

<sup>4</sup> Ishak Chelo in Carmoly, pp. 249, 250.

<sup>5</sup> The German traitor Segestes merely alleges that he follows higher reasons, although he knows that "profitores etiam is quos anteposuit inveniunt." Tacit., Annal. i. 58. 2. Israel saw the hand of a higher Helper in such assistance; and hence it had no hatred toward the instruments

<sup>6</sup> Ephialtes was the traitor of Thermopylae, cf. Herod. vii. 218. Traditions are still current of a traitor at Jena (1806), who was obliged to flee into exile.

<sup>7</sup> [That is, where this people is spoken of under the plural form of its patronymic, which happens only five times — at Judg. i. 26, 2 Chron. i. 17, and the places named in the text. — Th.]

<sup>8</sup> Phœnicie, ii. 2, 218, etc.

<sup>9</sup> I have already directed attention to this in the Mag. Alterthümer (Berlin, 1848), p. 281.

their head, are even on their own coins designated by the terms כנען and כנעני. As from its lowlands, "Canaan" became the general popular name of Palestine, so likewise to a certain extent the name Chittim became a general term applied to all Canaanites. When the panic-struck king of Aram thinks that Israel has received support from the kings of Egypt and the Chittim (2 Kgs. vii. 6), this latter name can only signify the coast-cities, whose power, from Tyre upwards, was felt throughout the world. From the fact that our passage merely says that the man went into the land of Chittim,<sup>1</sup> and, presupposes the city built by him as still known, it may reasonably be inferred that he went to the familiarly known Chittim north of Israel. The probability is great enough to justify our seeking this Luz upon the Phœnician coast or islands. A remarkable notice in the Talmud (Sota, 46 b), derived from ancient tradition, may lead to the same conclusion: Luz is the place where the dyeing of תכלת is carried on, where there are hyacinthian<sup>2</sup> purple dyeing-establishments. Down to the most recent times, the coast from Tyre upwards, as far as the Syrian Alexandria, was very rich in purple (Ritter, xvi. 611 [Gage's Transl. iv. 280]). Now, pretty far away to the north, it is true, in the present Jebel el-Aala, at a point where a splendid northwest prospect over the plain to the lake of Antioch offers itself, Thomson<sup>3</sup> found hitherto wholly unknown ruins bearing the name of Kûlb Lousy, with remnants of old and splendid temples. The surname Kûlb<sup>4</sup> might authorize the inference that the dyeing-business was formerly exercised there. The existence of temple-ruins, concerning which the Druses said that they had been without worshippers from time immemorial, explains also another remarkable tradition of the Talmud: that Luz is a city which the conquerors of the land did not destroy, and to which the angel of death never comes, but that they who feel the approach of death, leave the city of their own accord. Traditions like this are characteristic of Sun-worship. In Delos no one was allowed to die or to be buried.<sup>5</sup> To Claros no serpents came. Neither could they penetrate to the land of the Astypæans, on the island Cos. The island Cos is at the same time one of the seats of the ancient purple-trade. In the Syrian city Emesa there was a temple of the Sun, on account of which — as the story still went in Mohammedan times — scorpions and venomous animals cannot live there.<sup>6</sup> Name, ruins, and tradition would therefore tend to identify Kûlb Lousy as the remnant of an ancient city, distinguished like Cos for a specific form of industry and for its sun-worship, if indeed Cos itself (כח) be not understood by it.

Luz is described by its name as a place of almond-trees (Gen. xxx. 37). And indeed, philologically Luz is akin to nux, nut. The Greek καρυον signifies almond (on account of its shape) as well as nut and egg.<sup>7</sup> Eusebius was induced to identify the land of the Chittim with Cyprus, the rather because the Cyprian almonds were celebrated in antiquity.<sup>8</sup> The almond-tree has always abounded in the holy land. The cities are in ruins, but the tree still flourishes.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

The cessation of perfect obedience is attended by the cessation of perfect victory. Benjamin does not expel the hostile Jebusite from Jerusalem because he has lost his first love. The tribes of Joseph, on the other hand, are able to conquer Bethel, because God is with them. Benjamin, the valiant tribe, is alone to blame, if it failed to triumph; for when Bethel resisted the sons of Joseph, the latter were aided by a fortunate incident. Benjamin did not conquer Jerusalem; therefore, not the king out of Benjamin (Saul), but the ruler out of Judah (David), dwelt therein. However, it is of no avail to conquer by faith, unless it be also maintained in faith; for Bethel became afterwards a Beth-aven, a House of Sin.

STARKE: Ill got, ill spent; but that also which has been rightly got, is apt to be lost, if we make ourselves unworthy of the divine blessing, just as these places were again taken from the Israelites.

[WORDSWORTH: Here then was a happy opportunity for the man of Bethel; he might have dwelt with the men of Joseph at Bethel, and have become a worshipper of the true God, and have thus become a citizen forever of the heavenly Bethel, the house of God, which will stand forever. But . . . he quits the house of God to propagate heathenism and idolatry. The man of Bethel, therefore, is presented to us in this Scripture as a specimen of that class of persons, who help the Church of God in her work from motives of fear, or of worldly benefit, and not from love of God; and who, when they have opportunities of spiritual benefit, slight those opportunities, and even shun the light, and go away from Bethel, the house of God, as it were, unto some far-off land of the Hittites, and build there a heathen Luz of their own. — THE SAME: There are four classes of persons, whose various conduct toward the Church of God, and to the gospel preached by her, is represented by four cases in the Books of Joshua and Judges; namely, — 1. There is this case of the man of Bethel. 2. There is the case of the Kenites, in ver. 16, who helped Judah after their victories in Canaan, and are received into fellowship with them. 3. There is the case of the Gibeonites, who came to Joshua from motives of fear, and were admitted to dwell with Israel, as hewers of wood and drawers of water. 4. There is the case of Rahab. She stands out in beautiful contrast to the man of Bethel. He helped the spies of Joseph, and was spared, with his household, but did not choose to live in their Bethel. But Rahab received the spies of Joshua, even before he had gained a single victory, and she professed her faith in their God; and she was spared, she and her household, and became a mother in Israel, an ancestress of Christ (see Josh. vi. 25). — TR.]

<sup>1</sup> Cf. ἀρτί, Cos (the island Cos), castes, costa, côte, Küste.

<sup>2</sup> The Sept. constantly (with barely two exceptions) translate תכלת by βασιλινθος. Cf. Ad. Schmidt, Die griechischen Papyrusrkunden (Berlin. 1842), p. 184.

<sup>3</sup> Cf. Ritter, xvii. 1671. [Thomson, Journey from Aleppo to Mt. Lebanon, in Bibliotheca Sacra, vol. v. p. 667. — TR.]

<sup>4</sup> Cf. Bochart, Hierozycon, II. 740. Aruch (ed. Amsteld.) p. 80, s. v. כלבוס.

<sup>5</sup> On this and the following notices, which will be more thoroughly treated in the second part of my Hierozycon, compare meanwhile, Ælian, Hist. Anim. V. cap. viii.; cap. x. 49.

<sup>6</sup> Cf. Ritter, xvii. 1010.

<sup>7</sup> Cassaubon, on Athenæus, p. 66.

<sup>8</sup> Athenæus, p. 62; cf. Meursius, Cyprus, p. 80.

A list of places in the central and northern tribes from which the Canaanites were not driven out. The tribes when strong, make the Canaanites tributary; when weak, are content to dwell in the midst of them.

CHAPTER I. 27-36.

- 27 Neither did [And]<sup>1</sup> Manasseh [did not] drive out the inhabitants of Beth-shean and her towns [daughter-cities], nor Taanach and her towns [daughter-cities], nor the inhabitants of Dor and her towns [daughter-cities], nor the inhabitants of Ibleam and her towns [daughter-cities], nor the inhabitants of Megiddo and her towns [daughter-cities]; but the Canaanites would dwell [consented to dwell] in that land.
- 28 And it came to pass when Israel was strong, that they put the Canaanites to tribute [made the Canaanites tributary], and [but] did not utterly drive them out.
- 29 Neither<sup>2</sup> did Ephraim drive out the Canaanites that dwelt in Gezer; but the Canaanites dwelt in Gezer among<sup>3</sup> them. Neither<sup>4</sup> did Zebulun drive out the inhabitants of Kitron, nor the inhabitants of Nahalol; but the Canaanites dwelt among
- 31 them, and became tributaries. Neither did Asher drive out the inhabitants of Accho, nor the inhabitants of Zidon, nor of Ahlab, nor of Achzib, nor of Helbah, nor of Aphik, nor of Rehob: But the Asherites dwelt among the Canaanites, the inhabitants of the land: for they did not drive them out. Neither did Naphtali drive out the inhabitants of Beth-shemesh, nor the inhabitants of Beth-anath; but he dwelt among the Canaanites, the inhabitants of the land: nevertheless, [and] the inhabitants of Beth-shemesh and of Beth-anath became tributaries [were tributary] unto them.
- 34 And the Amorites forced [crowded]<sup>5</sup> the children [sons] of Dan into the mountain [mountains]: for they would not suffer them to come down to the valley: But [And] the Amorite would dwell [consented to dwell] in mount Heres [,] in Aijalon, and in Shaalbim: yet [and] the hand of the house of Joseph prevailed [became
- 36 powerful], so that [and] they became tributaries [tributary]. And the coast [border] of the Amorites was [went] from the going up to Akkrabbim, from the rock, and upwards [from Maahleh Akkrabbim, and from Sela and onward].

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 27. — So Dr. Cassel. But the position of the verb at the beginning of the sentence suggests a contrast with what precedes: the House of Joseph took Luz; but drive out the inhabitants of Beth-shean Manasseh (a member of the House of Joseph) did not do. Cf. next note. — Ta.]

[2 Ver. 29. — The ׀ here connects Ephraim with Manasseh, ver. 27: Ephraim also was guilty of not driving out. — Ta.]

[3 Ver. 29. — ׀ בְּתוֹכָם: lit. "in the midst of them." Cf. vers. 16, 21, 30, 32, 33. — Ta.]

[4 Ver. 30. — The "neither" ought to be omitted here and also in vers. 31 and 33. Manasseh and Ephraim are coupled together, cf. notes 1 and 2; but from this point each tribe is treated separately: "Zebulun did not drive out," etc. — Ta.]

[5 Ver. 34. — דָּחַק: to press, to push. From this word Bachm. infers that Dan had originally taken more of his territory than he now held. — Ta.]

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

Ver. 27. And Manasseh did not drive out. The conquest of Luz was achieved by the two brother tribes conjointly. With the exception of this place, the lands allotted to them had for the most part been already conquered by Joshua. The portion of the half tribe of Manasseh lay about the brook Kanah (Nahr el-Akhdar).<sup>1</sup> A few cities, however, south of this brook, which fell to Ephraim, were made good to Manasseh by certain districts included within the borders of Asher and Issachar. This explains why Manasseh did not drive out the inhabitants of these districts. There were six townships of them, constituting three several domains, each of them inclosed in the lands of another tribe (שְׁלֹשֶׁת הַנְּפָתִים, Josh. xvii. 11). The first of these was Beth-shean to the east; the second, the three cities Megiddo, Taanach, and Ibleam; the third, Dor on the sea-coast. The two former were inclosed within the tribe of Issachar; the latter should have belonged to the tribe of Asher. The districts thus given to Manasseh were valuable. Beth-shean (Greek, Scythopolis, at present Beisan) occupies an important position, and has a fertile soil. It formed a connecting link between the two seas, as also between the territories east and west of the Jordan, and was a precious oasis<sup>1</sup> in the Ghôr, the desert-like valley of this stream. It was an important place in both ancient and later times. Esthor ha Parchi, the highly intelligent Jewish traveller of the 14th century, who made this place the central point of his researches, says of it: "It is situated near rich waters, a blessed, glorious land, fertile as a garden of God, as a gate of Paradise" (Berlin ed., pp. 1, 6; cf. Zunz in Asher's Benj. of Tudela, ii. 401). The situation of the three cities Megiddo, Taanach, and Ibleam, in the noble plain of Jezreel, was equally favorable. Concerning the first, it is to be considered as established that it answers to the old Legio, the modern Lejjûn (Rob. ii. 328; iii. 118); although I am not of the opinion that the name Legio, first mentioned by Eusebius and Jerome, is etymologically derived from Megiddo. It appears much more likely that Lejjûn was an ancient popular mutilation of Megiddo, which subsequently in the time of the Romans became Latinized into Legio. Taanach is confessedly the present Ta'annuk (Schubert's Reise, iii. 164; Rob. ii. 316, iii. 117). The more confidently may I suggest the neighboring Jelameh as the site of Ibleam, although not proposed as such by these travellers.<sup>2</sup> Robinson reached this place from Jenin, in about one hour's travel through a fine country (Bib. Res. ii. 318 ff.). Dor<sup>3</sup> is the well-known Dandûra, Tantûra, of the present day, on the coast (Ritter, xvi. 608, etc. [Gage's transl. iv. 278]). Josh. xvii. 11 names Endor also, of which here nothing is said. The same passage affirms that "the sons of Manasseh could not (לֹא יָכְלוּ) drive out the inhabitants." Evidently, Manasseh depended for the expulsion of the inhabitants of these cities upon the coöperation of Issachar, by whose territory they were inclosed. The example of the tribes of Judah and Simeon, the latter of whom was entirely surrounded by the former, does not seem to have been imitated. Issachar is the only tribe concerning which our chapter gives no information. But since in the case of all the tribes, except Judah, only those cities are here enumerated out of which the Canaanites had not been expelled, the inference is that Issachar had done his part, and that the cities within his limits which did not expel their inhabitants, were just those which belonged to Manasseh. The statement that in Beth-shean, Megiddo, Taanach, and Ibleam the Canaanite remained, included therefore also all that was to be said about Issachar, and rendered further mention unnecessary. Issachar possessed the magnificent Plain of Jezreel (μῆρα ῥέδιον), and was on that account an agricultural, peaceable, solid tribe.

<sup>1</sup> [On this identification of the brook Kanah, cf. Grove in Smith's Bib. Dict., s. v. "Kanan, the River." — Ta.]

And the Canaanite consented to continue to dwell. Wherever יִרְדָּה occurs, it seems necessary to take it as expressing acquiescence in offered proposals and conditions. In this sense it is to be taken Ex. ii. 21, where Moses consents to enter into the family of Jethro. Upon the proposals made by Micah to the Levite (Judg. xvii. 11), the latter consents to remain with him. David willingly acquiesces in the proposal to wear the armor of Saul, but finds himself as yet unaccustomed to its use. Manasseh was too weak to expel the inhabitants of these cities. He therefore came to an understanding with them. He proposed that they should peaceably submit themselves. Unwilling to leave the fine country which they occupied, and seeing that all the Canaanites round about had been overpowered, they acceded to the proposition.

Ver. 28. When Israel was strong, they made the Canaanite tributary. The narrator generalizes what he has said of Manasseh, and applies it to all Israel. The Canaanite, wherever he was not driven out, but "consented" to remain, was obliged to pay tribute. This lasted, of course, only so long as Israel had strength enough to command the respect of the subject people. Similar relations between conquerors and conquered are of frequent occurrence in history. The inhabitants of Sparta, the Periæki, were made tributary by the victorious immigrant Dorians, and even after many centuries, when Epaminondas threatened Sparta, were inclined to make common cause with the enemy (Manso, Sparta, iii. i. 167). According to Mohammedan law, the unbeliever who freely submits himself, retains his property, but is obliged to pay poll-tax and ground-rent (cf. Tornau, Das Mosl. Recht, p. 51). When the Saxons had vanquished the Thuringian nobility, and were not sufficiently numerous to cultivate the land, "they let the peasantry remain," says the Sachsenspiegel (iii. 44), and took rent from them (cf. Eichhorn, Deutsche Staats und Rechtsg., § 15). The treatment which the Israelitish tribes now extended to the Canaanites, was afterwards, in the time of their national decay, experienced by themselves (cf. my History of the Jews in Ersch & Gruber, II. xxvii. 7, etc.). The word כֶּסֶף, by which the tribute imposed is designated, evidently means ground-rent, and is related to the Sanskrit mādmeter, to measure. Another expression for this form of tribute is the Chaldee כֶּסֶף (Ezra iv. 20), for which elsewhere כֶּסֶף appears (Ezra iv. 13). The Midrash (Ber. Rabba, p. 57, a), therefore, rightly explains the latter as כֶּסֶף הָאֲדָמָה, ground-rent. The terms mensura and mensuraticum, in mediæval Latin, were formed in a similar manner. The Arabic كَرْنَة, Talmudic כֶּרְנָה, also, as Hammer observes (Länderverwalt. des Chalifats, p. 119), mean tribute and corn.<sup>4</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Its magnificent position is also celebrated in the Talmud, Eruvin, 19 a.; cf. Ketuboth, 112 a. See below on ch. iv.

<sup>2</sup> [According to Bachmann, Knobel had already proposed this identification. Kell, after Schultz, suggests Khirbet-Belameh, half an hour south of Jenin. — Tr.]

<sup>3</sup> Levy (Phœnizische Inschriften, i. 85) thought that he read this Dor on a Sildonian inscription together with Joppa. It is very doubtful whether he has found any one to agree with him.

<sup>4</sup> [On the derivation and radical idea of the word כֶּסֶף, opinions are very much divided. There is no unanimity even as to the usage of the word. Kell (on 1 Kgs. iv. 6, Edinb. ed. 1867) asserts that it "nowhere signifies ecclesiastical, tribute, or socage, but in all places only serf or socager."

But the better view seems to be that although it is sometimes used concretely for socagers or bond-servants, (cf. 1 Kgs. v. 27 (18)), yet its proper and usual meaning is tribute-service. Out of the twenty-three instances in which the word occurs, there is not one in which it can be shown that it means tribute in money or products; while it is abundantly evident that in many cases it does mean compulsory labor, personal service. What kind of service the Israelites here required of the Canaanites does not appear. It may have been labor on public works, or assistance rendered at certain times to the individual agriculturist. This appears at least as probable as Bachmann's suggestion that perhaps "the Canaanite merchants" were expected to furnish certain "commercial supplies and services." Our author's view in favor of "ground-rent," cannot be said to derive the support of analogy from his historical references. For as Bachmann

[But did not drive them out. BERTHEAU: (הוֹרִישׁ לֹא־הוֹרִישׁ): the emphatic expression by means of the infinitive before the finite verb, we regard as indicative of an implied antithesis; but, although Israel, when it became strong, had the power to execute the law of Moses to destroy the Canaanites, it nevertheless did not destroy them.] — Tr.]

Ver. 29. And Ephraim did not drive out the Canaanite that dwelt in Gezer. The situation of Gezer may be exactly determined from Josh. xvi. 3. The border of Ephraim proceeds from Lower Beth-horon, by way of Gezer, to the sea. Now, since the position of Beth-horon is well ascertained (Beit 'Ur et-Tatha), the border, running northwest, past Ludd, which belonged to Benjamin, must have touched the sea to the north of Japho, which likewise lay within the territory of Benjamin. On this line, four or five miles east of Joppa, there still exists a place called Jesôr (Jazour Yazûr), which can be nothing else than Gezer, although Bertheau does not recognize it as such (p. 41; nor Ritter, xvi. 127 [Gage's Transl. iii. 245]). It is not improbable that it is the Gazara of Jerome (p. 137, ed. Parthey), in quarto miliario Nicopoleos contra septentrionem, although the distance does not appear to be accurately given. The Ganzur of Esthor ha-Parchi (ii. 434), on the contrary, is entirely incorrect. The position of Gezer enables us also to see why Ephraim did not drive out the inhabitants. The place was situated in a fine, fertile region. It is still surrounded by noble corn-fields and rich orchards. The agricultural population of such fruitful regions were readily permitted to remain for the sake of profit, especially by warlike tribes who had less love and skill for such peaceful labors than was possessed by Issachar.

Ver. 30. Zebulon did not drive out the inhabitants of Kitron nor the inhabitants of Nahalol. This statement will only confirm the remarks just made. There is no reason for contradicting the Talmud (Megilla, 6 a), when it definitely identifies Kitron with the later Zippori, Sepphoris, the present Seffûrieh. As the present village still lies at the foot of a castle-crowned eminence, and as the Rabbinic name Zippori (Tisp-pori, from צִפּוֹר, "a bird, which hovers aloft") indicates an elevated situation, the ancient name הָאֶרֶץ (from הָאֶרֶץ = הָאֶרֶץ) may perhaps be supposed to describe the city as the "mountain-crown" of the surrounding district. The tribe of Zebulon, it is remarked in the Talmud, need not commiserate itself, since it has Kitron, that is, Sepphoris, a district rich in milk and honey. And in truth Seffûrieh does lie on the southern limit of the beautiful plain el-Buttauf, the present beauty and richness of which, as last noted by Robinson (ii. 336), must formerly have been much enhanced by cultivation. In connection with this, it will also be possible to locate Nahalol more definitely. Philologically, it is clearly to be interpreted "pasture" (Isa. vii. 19). It answers perhaps to the later Abilin, a place from which a wady somewhat to the northwest of Seffûrieh has its name. For this name comes from Abel, which also means pasture. This moreover suggests the explanation why from just these two places the Canaanites were not expelled. They both became tributary, and remained the occupants and bailiffs of their pastures and meadows.

Vers. 31, 32. Asher did not drive out the inhabitants of Achoh, Zidon, Ahlab, Achsib, Helbah, Aphik, Rehob. The whole history of Israel can be nothing else than a fulfilling of the spirit of the Mosaic law. The division of the land of Canaan is a part of this fulfillment. This division therefore cannot have respect only to the territory already acquired, but must proceed according to the promise. The boundaries of the land destined for Israel were indicated by Moses. The territories which they circumscribe must be conquered. Whatever part is not gained, the failure is the fault of Israel itself. The boundaries indicated, were the outlines of a magnificent country. Splendid coast-lands, stately mountains, wealthy agricultural districts, rich in varieties of products and beauty, inclosed by natural boundaries. The whole sea-coast with its harbors — Phœnicia not excepted — was included; the northeastern boundary was formed by the desert, and lower down by the river. The border lines of the land of Israel, drawn Num. xxxiv., are based upon the permanent landmarks which it offers; they are accurate geographical definitions, obtained from the wandering tribes of the land. It seems to me that it is only from this point of view that the hitherto frequently mistaken northern boundary of the land, as given Num. xxxiv. 7-9, can be correctly made out. "And this shall be your north border," it is there said: "from the great sea ye shall take Mount Hor as your landmark; thence follow the road as far as Hamath; and the border shall end in Zedad: thence it goes on to Zipphon,<sup>1</sup> and ends in Hazarenan." The range of Mount Casius, whose southernmost prominence lifts itself up over Laodicea (the present Ladikieh), forms the natural northern boundary of Phœnicia. This is the reason why on coins Laodicea was called אֶרֶץ כְּנָעַן, the "Beginning of Canaan," as it might be translated. It is therefore also from the foot of this range that the northern boundary of Israel sets out. The name Mount Hor is simply the ancient equivalent of Mount Casius and also of the later Jebel Akra, which latter term furnishes a general designation for every mountain since the Greek Akra was explained by the Arabic Jebel. From the foot of this mountain ancient caravan roads (suggested by לְבָא חָמָת) lead to Hamath, and from Hamath to the desert. At present, as in the time of the geographer Ptolemy, who indicated their course, these roads pass over Zedad, at the western entrance of the desert, the modern Sudud (Ritter, xvi. 5 [Gage's Transl. iii. 175]; xvii. 1443, etc.). Thence the border went southward till it ended in Hazarenan, the last oasis, distinguished by fertile meadows and good water (Enan), where the two justly remarks, "the case in which the conquerors of a country leave the earlier population in possession of their lands on condition of paying ground-rent, is the reverse of what takes place here, where a people, themselves agriculturists, take personal possession of the open country, and concede a few cities to the old inhabitants." It is probable, however, that the situation varied considerably in different localities, cf. ver. 31 f. and ver. 34. — Tr.]

<sup>1</sup> Wetstein (Hawan, p. 88) writes: "Of Zipphon (Arab.

Zifran) wide-spread ruins are yet existing. According to my inquiries, the place lies fourteen hours N. E. of Damascus, near the Palmyra road. It has not yet, I think, been visited by any traveller." It is impracticable here to enter into further geographical discussions, but the opinion of Kell (on Num. xxxiv. 7-9), who rejects the above determination, cannot be accepted as decisive, if for no other reason on account of the general idea by which he is evidently influenced.

principal roads from Damascus and Haleb to Palmyra meet, and where the proper Syrian desert in which Palmyra (Tadmor) is situated begins. The name Cechere on the Tabula Peutingeriana, Zoaria (for the Goaria of Ptolemy), at present Carietein, Kuryetein (Ritter, xvii. 1457, etc.), may remind us of Hazor.

Tadmor itself did not lay beyond the horizon of Israelitish views. Whithersoever David and Solomon turned their steps, they moved everywhere within the circle of original claims. Israel was not to conquer in unbridled arbitrariness; they were to gain those districts which God had promised them. Conquest, with them, was fulfillment. The eastern border has the same natural character. From Hazar-enan it runs to Shepham, along the edge of the desert to Riblah (the present Ribleh) "on the east side of Ain" (Rob. iii. 534), along the range of Antilebanon, down the Jordan to the Dead Sea. These remarks it was necessary to make here where we must treat of the territories of Asher and Naphtali, the northwestern and north-eastern divisions of Israel. For it must be assumed that Asher's territory was considered to extend as far up as Mount Hor, — that the whole coast from Accho to Gabala was ascribed to him. This coast-region Asher was not sufficiently strong and numerous to command. The division of the land remained ideal nowhere more than in the case of the Phœnician cities. Nowhere, consequently, was the remark of ver. 32 more applicable: "the Asherite dwelt among the inhabitants of the land;" whereas elsewhere the Canaanites dwelt among Israel, though even that was against the Mosaic commands. Nor can it be supposed that the seven cities expressly named were the only ones out of which Asher did not expel the Canaanites. For who can think that this had been done in the case of Tyre, the "fortified city" (Josh. xix. 29)? The names are rather to be considered as those of townships and metropolitan cities, so that when Zidon is mentioned other cities to the south and north are included as standing under Sidonian supremacy. The express mention of Tyre, in Josh. xix. 29, is due to the fact that the passage was giving the course of the boundaries. For the same reason, Joshua xix. is not a complete enumeration of places; for of the seven mentioned here, two at least (Accho and Ahlab) are wanting there. That Accho cannot have been accidentally overlooked, is evident from the fact that the border is spoken of as touching Carmel, and that mention is made of Achzib. The relation of Asher to the Phœnician territory was in general the following: A number of places (Josh. xix. 30 speaks of twenty-two) had been wholly taken possession of by the tribe. Outside of these, the Asherites lived widely scattered among the inhabitants, making no attempts to drive them out. The seven cities mentioned above, especially those on the coast, are to be regarded as districts in which they dwelt along with the Canaanites. We have no reason for confining these to the south of Sidon. On the contrary, Ethor ha-Parchi (ii. 413-415) was right in maintaining that cities of the tribe of Asher must be acknowledged as far north as Laodicea. The statements in Joshua for the most part mention border-places of districts farther inland, in which the tribe dwelt, and from which the boundary line ran westward to the sea. Thus, at one time the line meandered (עָבַר) to Zidon (xix. 28); then it came back, and ran toward Tyre (ver. 29). Not till the words, "the ends were at the sea, מִחֲבֵל אַחְזִיב," do we get a sea-boundary from north to south. I translate this phrase, "from Chebel towards Achzib:" it includes the whole Phœnician tract. True, the whole enumeration implies that most of the places lay farther south than Zidon, in closer geographical connection with the rest of Israel. But places higher up are also named, for the very purpose of indicating the ideal boundaries. Among these are the places mentioned ver. 30, two of which again appear in our passage. Asher did not drive out the inhabitants of Accho (Ptolemais, the present Akka), but dwelt among them. To the north of this was Achzib (Ecdippa, the present ez-Zib). They dwelt with the inhabitants of Zidon in their dominion. They did not expel the inhabitants of Aphik (Apheca), on the Adonis river (Ritter, xvii. 553, etc.), notwithstanding the ancient idolatry there practiced, on account of which, evidently, it is mentioned. Rehob, since it is here named, must have been a not unimportant place. The Syrian translation of Rehob is פלטיא, פלטיחא, paltia, paltusa (platea<sup>1</sup>). This accounts for the fact that the Greeks and Romans speak of an ancient Paltos, otherwise unknown (Ritter, xvii. 890), and of which the present Beldah may still remind us. Hitherto, this has escaped attention. It was remarked above that the sea-boundary is drawn, Josh. xix., "from Chebel to Achzib." With this Chebel the חֶבֶל (Chelbah, E. V. Helbah), probably to be read חֶבְלָה (Cheblah), of our passage, may perhaps be identified. It is the Gabala of Strabo and Pliny, the Gabellum of the crusaders, the present Jebel, which lies to the north of Paltos, and below Laodicea, and in Phœnician times was the seat of the worship of the goddess Thuro (Ritter, xvii. 893; Movers, ii. 1, 117 ff.). There is but one of the seven cities of which we have not yet spoken, namely, Ahlab, named along with Achzib. It is very probable that this is Giscala, situated in the same latitude with Achzib, but farther inland. In Talmudic times the name of this place was Gush Chaleb; at present there is nothing but the modern name el-Jish to remind us of it.

Ver. 33. Naphtali did not drive out the inhabitants of Beth-shemeah and Beth-anath. The names of both these places allude to an idolatrous worship, and are also found in the tribe of Judah. The name of Beth-anath (בֵּית אֲנַת), "House of Echo," from עָנָה, "to answer," indicates that its situation was that of the present Baniâs, the ancient Paneas. The inscriptions on the grotto called Panium, still point to the echo. One of them is dedicated to the "echo-loving" (φιλοεχον) Pan. The love of Pan for the nymph Echo was a widely-apread myth. Another inscription tells of a man who dedicated a niche (νεκροφυλακή) to the Echo (Commentary on Seetzen's Reisen, iv. 161, 162). The introduction in Greek times of Pan worship in Baniâs, is moreover also explained by the fact that the name Bethanas (th), required only an easy popular corruption to make it Paneas.

<sup>1</sup> Chald., p. 1740), but also in proper names, as Rehoboth Ir, Gen. x. 11.

<sup>1</sup> The Targum also translates חֶבֶל by פלטיחא, not only when used as a common noun (cf. Buxtorf, Lex.

Robinson (Bib. Res. iii. 409) has again taken up the view, already rejected by Ritter (xvii. 229), which identifies Paneas with the repeatedly occurring Baal-gad, and which on closer inspection is simply impossible. Joshua xi. 17 says of Baal-gad that it lay in the Bikath (בִּיקַת) Lebanon, under Mount Hermon. Joshua xii. 7 speaks of it simply as Baal-gad in the Bikath Lebanon. The valley thus spoken of is none other than the Buka'a, i. e. "Hollow Syria." There is no other hollow region that could be thus indicated. The further determination tachath har Chermom indicates, quite consistently with the meaning of tachath, which frequently combines the signification of "behind" with that of "under," the Lebanon valley behind Mount Hermon, i. e. on the northern base of Hermon, for on its southern base there can be no Lebanon valley. This alone would suffice to transfer Baal-gad to the Buka'a. But in Joshua xiii. 5 a Lebanon is spoken of "east of Baal-gad under Mount Hermon." Now, a Lebanon east of Baal-gad there can be only if Baal-gad lies in the Buka'a; and there being a Lebanon on the east, only the northern base of Mount Hermon can be meant by the phrase "under Mount Hermon" (cf. below, on ch. iii. 3). Now, although there ought to be no doubt that Baal-gad lay in the "Hollow," yet, the addition "under Mount Hermon" cannot have been made without a reason. It was intended to distinguish Baal-gad from Baal-bek, which latter, since it lies in the northern part of the Buka'a, could not properly be said to lie on the northern base of Hermon. We scarcely need to hesitate, therefore, to recognize in Baal-gad the position of the later Chalcis (ad Libanum) whose site is marked by fountains and temple-ruins. "The temple which stands on the summit of the northernmost hill, belongs evidently to an older and severer style of architecture than those at Baalbek. Its position is incomparable" (Ritter, xvii. 185; Rob. iii. 492, etc.).

Besides the inhabitants of Beth-anath, the tribe of Naphtali failed to drive out those of Beth-shemesh also. There was a celebrated place of the same name in Judah, and still another, unknown one in Issachar. Concerning the tribe of Naphtali also the remark is made that they dwelt among the Canaanites, the inhabitants of the land. Their assigned boundaries likewise went far up to the north. They inclosed Cælo-Syria, as was already remarked. The peculiar mode in which Beth-shemesh is here spoken of, along with Beth-anath, is doubtless intended to point it out as a remarkable seat of idol worship, whose people nevertheless Israel did not expel, but only rendered tributary. The most celebrated place of the north was the temple-city in the "Hollow," — Beth-shemesh, as later Syrian inhabitants still called it, — Baalbek as we, following the prevailing usage of its people, Heliopolis as the Greeks, named it. The Egyptian Heliopolis also bore the name Beth-shemesh, House of the Sun. Baalbek answers to the name Baalath,<sup>1</sup> to which, as to Tadmor, Solomon extended his wisdom and his architecture.

Vers. 34, 35. And the Amorite crowded the sons of Dan into the mountains. The domains of the tribe of Dan lay alongside of those of Benjamin, between Judah on the south and Ephraim on the north. They should have reached to the sea; but the warlike dwellers on the western plain, provided with the appliances of military art, had resisted even Judah. The plain which we are here told the sons of Dan could not take, seems to have been the magnificent and fertile Merj Ibn Omeir, which opens into the great western plain. This may be inferred from the remark in ver. 35: "The Amorite consented to remain on Mount Heres, in Aijalon, and in Shaalbim." This plain, as Robinson (iii. 144) accurately observes, reaches to the base of the steep mountain wall, on the top of which Sâris is the first place met with. It must be this mountain land that is meant by Mount Heres. Southward of it is the ridge on which Yâlo lies, which is justly considered to be the ancient Aijalon. Perhaps no place answers more closely to the Shaalbim of our passage, than Amwâs (Emmans, Nicopolis), twenty minutes distant from the conical Tell Latrôn. It is evident that שַׁעֲלִיבִים has nothing to do with שַׁעֲלָל, "fox," but belongs to the Chaldaic שַׁלְבָּ, "to connect," שַׁלְיָבָן, "steps,"<sup>2</sup> to which the Hebrew שַׁלְבָּ corresponds. The position of Amwâs is "on the gradual declivity of a rocky hill," with an extensive view of the plain (Rob. iii. 146), "where," as Jerome says, "the mountains of Judah begin to rise." When Jerome speaks of a tower called Selebi, he probably refers to the neighboring castle Latrôn.

<sup>1</sup> 1 Kgs. ix. 18. Others refer this to Baalath in the tribe of Dan. Cf. Kell on Joshua xix. 44, and on 1 Kgs. ix. 18.

<sup>2</sup> Compare the Syrian שלבכא, "anfractus inter duos montes." Cf. Castelli, p. 912.

<sup>3</sup> [BAEHMANN: "That the House of Joseph used its greater strength not to exterminate the Amorite cities, but only to

The sons of Dan were not only unable to command the plain, but also on some points of the hill-country they suffered the inhabitants to remain. Har Heres (הַר הֶרֶס) means the "mountain of the Sun;" but the attempts to bring its position into connection with Ain Shems cannot succeed, since that lies much farther south, in the valley. Heres was the name of the mountain chain which at Beth-horon enters the territory of Ephraim, and on which Joshua was buried. Possibly, the name Sâris or Soris contains a reminiscence of it. This explains the remark, that "the hand of the sons of Joseph became powerful and made the Amorites tributary." That which was impossible for the tribe of Dan, Ephraim from their own mountains performed.<sup>3</sup>

Ver. 36. The border of the Amorite remained from the Scorpion-terrace, from Sela and onward. This peculiar statement is explained by the composition of the whole tableau presented by the first chapter. It had been unfolded how far the tribes of Israel had performed the task appointed by Moses, by taking the territories whose borders he had indicated. For this reason, it had been stated concerning all the tribes, what they had not yet taken, or had not yet wholly nationalized. Neither the eastern, nor the northern and western boundaries had been hitherto fully realized. Only the southern border had been held fast. This line, as drawn Num. xxxiv. 3 ff., actually separated Israel and the heathen nations. Ver. 36 is, as it were, a citation from the original Mosaic document. After beginning the sentence by say- render them tributary, thus benefitting itself more than the tribe of Dan, sets forth the unsatisfactory nature of their assistance, and conveys a just reproach. Meanwhile, however, it seems that the subjugation of the Amorite by the House of Joseph was so far at least of use to Dan as to enable them to reach the coast, in partial possession of which, at least, we find the tribe in ch. v. 17." But cf. our author in loc. — Ta.]

ing, "and the border of the Amorite went from Akkrabbim and Sela," it is brought to a sudden close by the addition וְהָיָה, "and onward, because it is taken for granted that the further course of the border to the "Brook of Egypt" is known from the determinations of Moses as recorded in Numbers. There it was said, "Your border shall go to the south of Maaleh Akkrabbim (at the southern extremity of the Dead Sea), pass through Zin, and its end shall be to the south of Kadesh-barnea." Here, the statement is somewhat more exact, inasmuch as the border is prolonged from Akkrabbim eastward to Sela, i. e. Petra. From Akkrabbim westward it proceeds along the already indicated route, over Kadesh-barnea, Hazar-addar, and Azmon, to the "Brook of Egypt" (Wady el-Arish, Rhinocorura). This course the writer deemed sufficiently indicated by the words "and onward."<sup>1</sup>

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Obedience and love toward God are wrecked on greediness and love of ease. Immediately after the death of Joshua, the children of Israel asked after God. But very soon they ceased to do that which Moses, and, in his name, Joshua had commanded them. Their business was to conquer, and not to tremble at strongholds or chariots of iron. They were to expel, and not to take tribute. But their heart was no longer entirely with their God. They <sup>1</sup> [The foregoing paragraph, rendered somewhat obscure by its brevity, was explained by the author, in reply to some inquiries, as follows: "I endeavored to show that the idea of the passage is, that the original boundary lines of Israel, as drawn by Moses, had nowhere been held against the Amorite, i. e. the original inhabitants, except only in the south. Everywhere else, the inhabitants of Canaan, especially the Amorite, had thus far prevented the Israelites from taking full possession of the land; but in the south the boundary between Israel and the Amorite remained as drawn by Moses. In Num. xxiv. 8. I would ask that in connection with this the remarks under vers. 31, 32, be considered. The whole first chapter is an exposition of the fact that Israel had not yet attained to complete possession of Canaan. It is a spiritual-geographical picture of what Israel had not yet acquired, and what nevertheless it should possess." In other words, Dr. Cassel's idea is, that the main thought of ch. i. may be expressed in two sentences: 1. On the west, north, and east Israel did not actually realize the assigned boundary lines between itself and the original inhabitants — the term Amorite being used in the wider sense it sometimes has. Cf. Gage's Ritter, II. 125. 2. On the south, the Mosaic line was made good, and continued to be held. The first of these sentences is expressed indirectly, by means of illustrative instances, in vers. 4-35; the second, by direct and simple statement, in ver. 36. In that verse, the narrative which in ver. 9 set out from Judah on its northward course, returns to its starting-point, and completes what might be called its tour of boundary inspection, by remarking that the southern boundary (known as southern by the course ascribed to it) corresponded to the Mosaic determinations. Ver. 36, therefore, connects itself with the entire previous narrative, and not particularly with vers. 34, 35.

This explanation labors, however, under at least one very serious difficulty. It assumes that in the expression "border of the Amorite," the gen. is an adjective gen., making the phrase mean the Amoritical (Canaanitish) border, just as we speak of the "Canadian border," meaning the border of the U. S. over against Canada. But in expressions of this kind, the gen. is always the genitive of the possessor, so that the border of the Amorite, Ammonite, etc., indicates the boundary of the land held by the Amorite, Ammonite, etc. It seems necessary, therefore, with Bertheau, Kell, Bachmann, etc., to read this verse in connection with vers. 34, 35, and to find in it a note of the extent of territory held by the Am-forget, not only that they were to purify the land, and alone control it, but also why they were to do this. They were indulgent to idolatry, because the worm was already gnawing at their own religion. They no longer thought of the danger of being led astray, because they were unmindful of the word which demanded obedience. Perfect obedience is the only safe way. Every departure from it leads downhill into danger.

Thus we have it explained why so many undertakings of Christians and of the church fail, even while the truth is still confessed. The word of God has not lost its power; but the people who have it on their tongues do not thoroughly enter into its life. The fear of God is still ever the beginning of wisdom; but it must not be mixed with the fear of men. Preaching is still ever effective; but respect to tribute and profitable returns must not weaken it. Perfect obedience has still ever its victory; but that which does not belong to God comes into judgment, even though connected with Christian matters. Israel still confessed God, though it allowed the tribes of Canaan to remain; but nominal service is not enough. When confession and life do not agree, the life must bear the consequences.

STARKE: We men often do not at all know how to use aright the blessings which God gives, but abuse them rather to our own hurt. — THE SAME: Our corrupt nature will show mercy only there where severity should be used, and on the other hand is altogether rough and hard where gentle-rite. The question then arises, how it is to be explained. We take for granted that the Maaleh Akkrabbim of this verse is the same as that in Num. xxiv. 4 (a line of cliffs, a few miles below the Dead Sea, dividing the Ghôr from the Arabah, see Rob. II. 120), and is not, as some have thought, to be sought in the town Akrah, a short distance S. E. of Nâbulus (Rob. III. 296). The other point mentioned is הַר הַקֵּדָר, the Rock. Commentators generally take this to be Petra, in Arabia Petrea; but the difficulties in the way of this view are insurmountable. In the first place we never hear of Amorites (take it in the wider or narrower sense) so far south as Petra, in the midst of the territories of Edom. In the next place, הַקֵּדָר means upward, i. e. under the geographical conditions of this verse, northward (Dr. Cassel's onward, i. e. downward to the sea, could scarcely be defended). Now, a line running from Akkrabbim to Petra, and thence northward, would merely return on its own track, and would after all leave the Amorite territories undefined on just that side where a definition was most needed because least obvious, namely, the southern. It seems, therefore, altogether preferable (with the Targ., Kurts, Hist. O. Cov. III. 229, Kell, and Bachm.) to take

הַקֵּדָר as an appellative, and to find in it a second point for a southern boundary line. Kurts and Kell identify it with "the (well-known) rock" at Kadesh (the Kudes of Rowlands, cf. Williams, Holy City, I. 463 ff.), from which Moses caused the water to flow, Num. xx. 8. Bachmann prefers the "bald mountain that ascends toward Seir" (Josh. xi. 17), whether it be the chalk-mountain Madurah (Rob. II. 179), or, what he deems more suitable, the northern wall of the Azâzimat mountains, with its masses of naked rock. In the vast confusion that covers the geography of this region, the most that can be said, is, that either view would serve this passage. In either case we get a line running from Akkrabbim on the east in a westerly direction. From this southern boundary the Amorite territories extended "upwards."

But when? Manifestly not at the time of which ch. i. treats, cf. ver. 9-19. The statement refers to the time before the entrance of Israel into Canaan, and is probably intended to explain the facts stated in vers. 34, 35, by reminding the reader of the originally vast power of the Amorite. It was not to be wondered at that an enemy once so powerful and widely diffused should still assert his strength in some parts of his former domain. Cf. Bachmann. — Tr.]

ness might be practiced. — THE SAME: Self-conceit, avarice, and self-interest can bring it about that men will unhesitatingly despise the command of God. When human counsels are preferred to the express word and command of God, the result is that matters grow worse and worse.

[SCOTT: The sin [of the people in not driving out the Canaanites] prepared its own punishment, and the love of present ease became the cause of their perpetual disquiet.

HENRY: The same thing that kept their fathers forty years out of Canaan, kept them now out of the full possession of it, and that was unbelief. — TR.]

SECOND SECTION.

THE RELIGIOUS DEGENERACY OF ISRAEL WHICH RESULTED FROM ITS DISOBEDIENT CONDUCT WITH RESPECT TO THE CANAANITES, AND THE SEVERE DISCIPLINE WHICH IT RENDERED NECESSARY, AS EXPLAINING THE ALTERNATIONS OF APOSTASY AND SERVITUDE, REPENTANCE AND DELIVERANCE, CHARACTERISTIC OF THE PERIOD OF THE JUDGES.

A Messenger of Jehovah charges Israel with disobedience, and announces punishment. The people repent and offer sacrifices.

CHAPTER II. 1-5.

- 1 And an angel [messenger] of the Lord [Jehovah] came up from Gilgal to Bochim, and said, I made you to go up<sup>1</sup> out of Egypt, and have brought you unto the land which I swore unto your fathers; and I said, I will never break my covenant with you. And [But] ye shall make no league [covenant] with the inhabitants of this land; ye shall throw down<sup>2</sup> their altars: but ye have not obeyed [hearkened to] my voice: why have ye done this?<sup>3</sup> Wherefore [And] I also said, [In that case — i. e. in the event of disobedience]<sup>4</sup> I will not drive them out from before you; but they shall be as thorns in your sides,<sup>5</sup> and their gods shall be [for] a snare unto you. And it came to pass, when the angel [messenger] of the Lord [Jehovah] spake [had spoken]<sup>6</sup> these words unto all the children [sons] of Israel, that the people lifted up their voice, and wept. And they called the name of that place Bochim [weepers]: and they sacrificed there unto the Lord [Jehovah].

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 1. — אֱלֹהֵי. KBL: "The use of the imperfect instead of the perfect (cf. ch. vi. 8) is very singular, seeing that the contents of the address, and its continuation in the historical tense (אָמַרְתִּי and אָמַרְתָּ), require the preterite. The imperfect can only be explained by supposing it to be under the retrospective influence of the immediately following imperfect consecutive." De Wette translates, "I said, I will lead you up out of Egypt, and brought you into the land," etc. This supposes that אָמַרְתִּי, or some such expression, has dropped out of the text, or is to be supplied. This mode of explaining the imperfect is favored (1), by the fact that we seem to have here a quotation from Ex. iii. 17; but especially (2), by the אָמַרְתָּ before the last clause of this verse, and the אָמַרְתִּי of ver. 3, which suggest that the same verb is to be understood in ver. 1 a. — Tr.]

[2 Ver. 2. — הִרְסוּם, from פָּרַץ, to tear down, demolish. On the form, cf. Ges. Gram. § 47, Rem. 4. — Tr.]

[3 Ver. 2. — More literally: "What is this that ye have done!" i. e. How great is this sin you have committed! cf. ch. viii. 1. — Tr.]

[4 Ver. 3. — Dr. Bachmann interprets the words that follow as a definite judgment on Israel, announcing that henceforth Jehovah will not drive out any of the still remaining nations, but will leave them to punish Israel. It is undoubtedly true that אָמַרְתִּי may be translated, "therefore, now, I also say;" but it is also true that it is more natural here (with Bertheau, Kell, Cas.) to render, "and I also said." To the citations of earlier divine utterances in vers. 1, 2 (see the Comment.), the messenger of Jehovah now adds another, from Num. xxxiii. 55, Josh. xiii. 18. It is, moreover, a strong point against Bachmann's view that God does not execute judgment speedily, least of all on Israel. We can hardly conceive him to shut the door of hope on the nation so soon after the departure of the latest surviving contemporaries of Joshua as this scene at Bochim seems to have occurred, cf. the comparatively mild charges brought by the messenger, as implied in ver. 2, with the heavier ones in ver. 11 ff. and ch. iii. 6, 7. Besides, if we understand a definite and final sentence to be pronounced here, we must understand ch. ii. 20 f. as only reproducing the same (as Bachmann does), although Israel's apostasy had become far more pronounced when the first Judge arose than it is now. It seems clear, therefore, that we must here understand a warning, while the sentence itself issues subsequently (cf. foot-note 3, on p. 82). — Ta.]

[5 Ver. 8. — Dr. Cassel translates: "they shall be to you for thorns." Cf. the Commentary. The E. V. supplies "thorns" from Num. xxxiii. 55; but it has to change צִיִּים into צִיִּים צְדָדִים or צִיִּים צְדָדִים. — Ta.]

[6 Ver. 4. — Better perhaps, with De Wette: "And it came to pass, as the messenger of Jehovah spake, etc., that the people," etc. On צָ with the infin. cf. Ges. Lex. s. צָ, B. 5, b. — Ta.]

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

Ver. 1. And there came a messenger of Jehovah. Israel had experienced the faithfulness of the Divine Spirit who, through Moses, led them forth from Egypt, and made them a people. In him, they conquered Canaan, and took possession of a noble country. In addition to this, they had the guaranty of the divine word (cf. Lev. xxvi. 44), that God would never forsake them — that the truth on which He had thus far built up their life and nationality, would endure. Reason enough had been given them to fulfill everything prescribed by Moses, whether great or small, difficult or pleasant, whether it gave or took away. They had every reason for being wholly with their God, whether they waged war or enjoyed the fruits of victory. Were they thus with Him? Could they be thus with Him after such proceedings in relation to the inhabitants of Canaan as ch. i. sets forth? Israel's strength consists in the enthusiasm which springs from faith in the invisible God who made heaven and earth, and in obedience to his commands. If enthusiasm fail and obedience be impaired, Israel becomes weak. The law which it follows is not only its rule of duty, but also its bill of rights. Israel is free, only by the law; without it, a servant. A life springing from the law, exhibited clearly and uninterruptedly, is the condition on which it enjoys whatever is to its advantage. To preserve and promote such a life, was the object of the command, given by Moses, not to enter into any kind of fellowship with the nations against whom they were called to contend. The toleration which Israel might be inclined to exercise, could only be the offspring of weakness in faith (Deut. vii. 17) and of blind selfishness. For the sake of its own life, it was commanded not to tolerate idolatry within its borders, even though practiced only by those of alien nations. For the people are weak, and the superstitious tendency to that which strikes the senses, seduces the inconstant heart. It cannot be otherwise than injurious when Israel ceases to be entirely obedient to that word in whose organic wisdom its history is grounded, and its future secured. Ruin must result when, as has been related, the people fails in numerous instances to drive out the heathen nations, and instead thereof enters into compacts with them. Special emphasis was laid, in the preceding narrative, upon the fact that for the sake of tribute, Israel had tolerated the worship of the lewd Asherah and of the sun, in Apheca, in the Phœnician cities, in Banias, and in Beth-shemesh. When the occupation of Canaan was completed — a date is not given — the impression produced by a survey of the whole land was not such as promised enduring peace and obedience to the Word of God. The organs of this word were not yet silenced, however. When the heads of Israel asked who should begin the conflict, the Word of God had answered through the priest; and ancient exegesis rightly considered the messenger of God who now, at the end of the war, speaks to Israel, to be the same priest. At the beginning, he answered from the Spirit of God; at the end, he admonishes by an impulse of his own. There he encourages; here he calls to account. There "they inquire of God;" here also he speaks only as the "messenger of God." He is designedly called "messenger of God." Every word he speaks, God has spoken. His words are only reminiscences out of the Word of God. His sermon is, as it were, a lesson read out of this word. He speaks only like a messenger who verbally repeats his commission. No additions of his own; objective truth alone, is what he presents. That is the idea of the מַלְאָךְ, the messenger, ἄγγελος, according to every explanation that has been given of him. The emphasis falls here, not on who spake, but on what was spoken. God's word comes to the people unasked for, like the voice of conscience. From the antithesis to the opening verse of the Book, where the people asked, it is evident that no angel of a celestial kind is here thought of. Earlier expositors ought to have perceived this, if only because it is said that the messenger —

Came up from Gilgal to Bochim. Heavenly angels "appear," and do not come from Gilgal particularly.<sup>1</sup> The connection of this statement

<sup>1</sup> Nevertheless, Kell also, in loc., has followed the older expositors. [We subjoin the main points on which Kell rests his interpretation: מַלְאָךְ is not a prophet or any other earthly ambassador of Jehovah, as Phinehas or Joshua (Targ., Rabb., Stud., Berth., and others), but the Angel of Jehovah, consubstantial with God. In simple historical narrative no prophet is ever called מַלְאָךְ; such are designated נְבִיא or נָאִם, as in ch. vi. 8, or יוֹשֵׁעַ אֱלֹהִים, 1 Kgs. xii. 22, xiii. 1, etc. The passages, Hag. i. 13 and Mal. iii. 1, cannot be adduced against this, since there, in the prophetic style, the purely appellative significance of מַלְאָךְ is placed beyond all doubt by the context. Moreover, no prophet ever identifies himself so entirely with God, as is here done by the Angel of Jehovah, in his address vers. 1-8. The prophets always distinguish themselves from Jehovah by this, that they introduce their utterances as the word of God by the formula "thus saith Jehovah," as is also done by the prophet in ch. vi. 8. . . . Nor does it conflict with the nature of the Angel of Jehovah that he comes up from Gilgal to Bochim. His appearance at Bochim is described as a coming up to Bochim, with as much propriety as in ch. vi. 11 it is said concerning the Angel of Jehovah, that "he came and sat down under the terebinth at Opbra." The only feature peculiar to the present instance is the coming up "from Gilgal." This statement must stand in intimate connection with the mission of the angel — must contain more than a mere notice of his journeying from one place to another." Kell then recalls the appearance to Joshua, at Gilgal, of the angel who announced himself as the "Captain of the host of Jehovah," and promised a successful issue to the siege of Jericho. "The coming up from Gilgal indicates, therefore, that the same angel who at Gilgal, with the fall of Jericho delivered all Canaan into the hands of the Israelites, appeared to them again at Bochim. In order to announce the divine decree resulting from their disobedience to the commands of the Lord." With this view Bachmann and Wordsworth also agree. It must be admitted, however, that the appearance of the Angel of Jehovah, or indeed of any angel, in the character of a preacher before the assembled congregation of Israel is without a parallel in sacred history. Kell's supposition that he addressed the people only through their with the whole preceding narrative is profound and instructive. The history of Israel in Canaan begins in Gilgal. There (Josh. iv. 20 ff.) stood the memorial which showed how they had come through the Jordan into this land (לְבָנֵי הַיַּרְדֵּן). The name Gilgal itself speaks of the noblest benefit bestowed on them — their liberation from the reproach of Egypt. There the first Passover in Canaan had been celebrated. Thence also begin the great deeds that are done after the death of Joshua. As now the messenger of God comes from Gilgal, so at first Judah set out from thence to enter into his possessions. A messenger who came from Gilgal, did by that circumstance alone remind the people of Joshua's last words and commands. The memorial which was there erected rendered the place permanently suggestive to Israel of past events. From the time that Joshua's camp was there, it never ceased to be a celebrated spot (comp. 1 Sam. vii. 16); but that on this occasion the messenger comes from Gilgal, has its ground in the nature of his message, the history of which commences at Gilgal.

Vers. 2, 3. Why have ye done this? This sorrowful exclamation is uttered by the priest — according to Jewish exegesis, Phinehas, the same who spoke ch. i. 2 — after he has exhibited in brief quotations from the old divine instructions, first, what God has done for Israel, and then what Israel has done in disregard of God. The eternal God has enjoined it upon you, not under any circumstances to enter into peaceful compacts with the idolatrous tribes and their altars among you, thereby authorizing them openly before your eyes to manifest their depravity and practice their abominations — what have ye done! The exclamation is full of sharp grief; for the consequences are inevitable. For God said (Josh. xxiii. 13): "I will not drive out these nations from before you." Israel had its tasks to perform. If it failed it must bear the consequences. God has indeed said (Ex. xxiii. 29, 30), and Moses reiterates it (Deut. vii. 22), "By little and little I will drive out the Canaanite, lest the land become desolate." And this word received its fulfillment in the days of Joshua and subsequently. But when Israel disobeys, God will not prosper its disobedience. It must then experience that which the messenger now with grief and pain announces: Since Canaanites remain among you, who ought not to remain, and whom ye could have expelled, had ye been wholly with your God (Deut. vii. 17 ff.), they will hurt you, though they are conquered. It is not an innocent thing to suffer the presence of sin, and give it equal rights.

They shall be thorns, and their gods shall be a snare unto you. The Hebrew text has לְבָנֵי לָכֶם לְחַיִּים: literally, "they shall be sides unto you." צֵד everywhere means "the side;" and the explanations which make "adversaries, hosts" (Vulgate), "nets" (Luther), "tormentors" (Sachs), out of it, are without any foundation. (Arias Montanus, who gives in lateribus, follows therein the older Jewish expositors; but neither does the idea of "hurtful neighbors" lie in the word. From the fact that the Chaldee paraphrast has מְעַקְרִין, "oppressors," it would indeed seem that he read צָרִים; for in Num. xxxiii. 55 he also renders צָרִים by מְעַקְרִין. The Septuagint rendering συνεχός (the Syriac version of it has the singular, cf. Rödman, p. 69), might seem to indicate a similar reading, although συνεχός occurs perhaps only twice for צָרִים (1 Sam. xxiii. 8; 2 Sam. xx. 3). None the less does it appear to me to be against the language and spirit of Scripture, to read צָרִים here. For not only does צָרִים occur but once in Scripture (Lam. i. 7), but it is expressive of that hostility which arises in consequence of the state of things here described. Only after one has fallen into the snare begins that miserable condition in which one is oppressed by the enemy, while all power of resistance is lost. The following considerations may assist us to arrive at the true sense: Every sentence, from ver. 1 to ver. 4, is in all its parts and words a reproduction of utterances by Moses and Joshua. Verse 1 is composed of expressions found as follows:

מַעֲלָה, etc., Ex. iii. 17; וְחַיִּים, etc., Josh. xxiv. 8; וְשִׁמְעֵתִי, etc., Deut. i. 35; לֹא מִצָּר, etc., Lev. xxvi. 44. Verse 2 likewise: לֹא הִכְרַתִּי, etc., Ex. xxiii. 32, Deut. vii. 2; מִכְחֹתֵיהֶם, etc., Ex. xxxiv. 13, Deut. vii. 5; וְהָתֵצֵן, etc., Num. xiv. 22. The case is similar with ver. 3, and it is to be assumed that the parallel passages may be used to throw light on the text. Now, as the first parallel to the expression, "and they shall be to you for tsiddim (צִידִים)," we have the words in Num. xxxiii. 55: "and they shall be to you for pricks in your eyes and thorns in your sides (לְצִינִים וּצְדִימִים)." Not for "sides," therefore, but for "thorns in the sides;" and we can as little believe that the same meaning would result if the expression were only "sides," as we can imagine the idea to remain unaltered if instead of "pricks in the eyes," one were to say, "they shall be to you for eyes." The second parallel passage is Josh. xxiii. 13: they shall be to you for "scourges in your sides and thorns in your eyes." The enemies are compared, not with "sides" and "eyes," but with scourges and thorns by which sides and eyes are afflicted. Now as our passage as a whole corresponds entirely with those of Numbers and Joshua, save only that it abridges and epitomizes them, the threat which they contain appears here also, and in a similarly condensed form. It was sufficient to say, "they shall be to you for thorns;" accordingly, instead of צִידִים we are to read צָנִים

(tsinnim for tsiddim), a change as natural as it is easily accounted for, since both words occurred not only in each of the other passages, but in one of them were joined together in the same clause. Emendation in this instance is more conservative than retention, for it rests on the internal organic coherence of Scripture.<sup>1</sup> Tsinnah, tsinnim, tsennim, heads or representatives, is against the clear import of vers. 4, 5, and not to be justified by a reference to Josh. xxiv. 1, 2. Besides, an assembly of the heads and representatives, presents the same difficulty as an assembly of all the people. Angels appear only to individuals; to Israel as a nation God speaks through prophets. — Ta.]

1 [Bachmann is not inclined to admire the "conservative" character of this emendation. He holds to the reading of the text, and finds in it a free reference to Num. xxxiii. 55 and Josh. xxiii. 13, by virtue of which "the nations themselves" — for, in his view, the צָנִים (ver. 3) refers are thorns, spine, pointed and stinging. The figure is taken from rural life. Israel, in the conquest, has acted like a slothful gardener. It has not thoroughly destroyed the thorns and thistles of its fields. The consequence will be, that sowing and planting and other field labors, will soon be rendered painful by the presence of spiteful thorns. What will turn the Canaanites into stinging weeds and snares for Israel? The influence of habitual intercourse. Familiarity blunts aversion, smooths away contrarities, removes differences, impairs obedience. It induces forgetfulness of what one was, what one promised, and to what conditions one is subject. Familiar intercourse with idolaters will weaken Israel's faith in the invisible God who has said, "Thou shalt not serve strange gods."

Ver. 4. When the messenger had spoken these words, etc. It is most likely that the few sentences here given, are but the outlines of the messenger's address. But every word rests on the basis of instructions delivered by Moses and Joshua. The people are sensible of the surpassing reality of the blessings which they have received, and for that reason are the more affected by the thought of the consequences which their errors have brought upon them. For the fulfillment of the law of truth as to its promises, guarantees the same as to its threatenings. Their alarm on account of sin is the livelier, the less decidedly active their disregard of the Word of God has hitherto been. They have not yet served the gods whose temples they have failed to destroy — have not yet joined in sin with the nations whom they suffered to remain. It was a weak faith, but not yet full-grown sin, by which they were led astray. God's messenger addresses "all the sons of Israel," for no tribe had formed an exception. In greater or less degree, they all had committed the same disobedience. The whole nation lifted up its voice and wept.

Ver. 5. And they called the name of the place Bochim (Weepers). The messenger of the divine word, when he wished to address Israel, must have gone up to the place where he would find them assembled. Israel had been commanded, as soon as the Jordan should have been crossed, and rest obtained, to assemble for feasts and sacrifices at a sacred place (Deut. xii. 10). This order applied not to Jerusalem merely, but to "the place which the Lord your God shall choose in one of the tribes." Thither they are to go up, trusting in God and dismissing care. It was only at such festal assemblies that Israel could be met. There was the opportunity for preaching and admonition. The chosen place at that time was Shiloh. There the tabernacle had been set up (Josh. xviii. 1); and there the people assembled (cf. Josh. xxi. 2). Thither they went up from far and near, to attend festivals (Judg. xxi. 19), and to offer sacrifices (1 Sam. i. 3). The whole progress of Joshua was a going from Gilgal to Shiloh. Accordingly, the messenger of God can have found Israel at no other place. His discourse produced a general outburst of weeping (cf. 1 Sam. xi. 4). And only because it was a weeping of penitence and shame before God, did the place where it occurred receive and retain the name Bochim. It was not a place otherwise nameless. How could the place where such an assembly was held be without a name! And how could it occur to the people to assemble at such a place! In Shiloh itself, some spot — perhaps that where the priest was accustomed to address the people — received the name Bochim. This name served thenceforth to recall the tears which were there shed. So do they show to-day in Jerusalem the "Jews' weeping-place" (El Ebra, Ritter, xvi. 350 [Gage's Transl. iv. 50]), where every Friday the Jews pray and lament. "And they offered sacrifices there." After repentance and reconciliation comes sacrifice.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Faith and repentance come from preaching. God's messenger preaches, and Israel hears. The people acknowledge their sins, and weep. At that time only a divine admonition was needed to make them sacrifice again to their God. To fall is possible even for one who has received so much grace as Israel had experienced in the lifetime of Joshua and after his death; but he rises up as soon as the messenger of God touches his heart with the preaching of repentance. A generation which experienced divine miracles, and recognized them as divine, can be brought to repentance by that miracle which in the proclamation of the word of God addresses the souls of men.

Therefore, let not the preaching of repentance fail to address all the people. But the preacher must be (1), a messenger of God; and (2), must not shun the way from Gilgal to Bochim, — must not wait till the people come to him in the place for preaching, but must go to them, until he find a Bochim, a place of tearful eyes. But as God's messenger he must give heed that the weeping be not merely the result of affecting words, but of a penitent disposition; that it be called forth, not by the flow of rhetoric, but by memories of the grace of God hitherto experienced by the congregation.

STARKE: How great concern God takes in the salvation of men, and especially in the welfare of His church, appears clearly from the fact that He himself has often reasoned with them, taught them, admonished and rebuked them.

THE SAME: The Word of God has the power of moving and converting men.

THE SAME: To attest our repentance by tears as well as reformation, is not improper; nay, repentance is seldom of the right sort, if it does not, at least in secret, weep for sin.

GERLACH: He reminds them of earlier commands, promises and threats, and shows them how their own transgressions are now about to turn into self-inflicted judgments. The people, however, do not proceed beyond an unfruitful sorrow in view of this announcement.

[HENRY: Many are melted under the word, that harden again before they are cast into a new mould.

SCOTT: If transgressors cannot endure the rebukes of God's word and the convictions of their own consciences, how will they be able to stand before the tribunal of the holy, heart-searching Judge.

THE SAME: The worship of God is in its own nature joy, praise, and thanksgiving, and our crimes alone render weeping needful; yet, considering what we are and what we have done, it is much idea of something cramping, etc., to the simple word "side," which on no other occasion appears with such horrible suggestions of compression and suffocation as Dr. B. would give it here? — TR.]

rather to the nations of the unconquered border districts (cf. ch. ii. 23, iii. 1), than to the scattered remnants of Canaanites within the conquered territories — "are described as sides for Israel, i. e. as cramping, burdensome, tormenting neighbors." But is it quite "conservative" to attach the

to be wished that our religious assemblies were more frequently called "Bochim," the place of the weepers. "Blessed are they that mourn, for they shall be comforted."

WORDSWORTH. The Israelites called the place Bochim; they named it from their own tears. They laid the principal stress on their own feelings, and on their own outward demonstrations of sorrow. But they did not speak of God's mercies; and they were not careful to bring forth fruits of repentance; they were a barren fig-tree, having only leaves. Their's was a religion (such as is too common) of sentiment and emotions, not of faith and obedience.

THE SAME: Reproofs which produce only tears — religious feelings without religious acts — emotions without effects — leave the heart worse than before. If God's rebukes are trifled with, His grace is withdrawn. — TR.]

An extract from the Book of Joshua showing when and through what occasion the religious apostasy of Israel began.

CHAPTER II. 6-10.

- 6 And when [omit: when] Joshua had [omit: had] let the people go, [and] the children [sons] of Israel went every man unto his inheritance, to possess [to take possession of] the land. And the people served the Lord [Jehovah] all the days of Joshua, and all the days of the elders that outlived<sup>1</sup> Joshua, who had seen all the great works of the Lord [Jehovah], that he did for Israel. And Joshua, the son of Nun, the servant of the Lord [Jehovah], died, being an hundred and ten years old. And they buried him in the border [district] of his inheritance in Timnath-heres, in the mount [mountains] of Ephraim, on the north side of the hill [north of Mount] 10 Gaash. And also all that generation were gathered unto their fathers:<sup>2</sup> and there arose another generation after them, which knew not the Lord [Jehovah], nor yet the works<sup>3</sup> which he had done for Israel.

[1 Ver. 7. — וַיִּחְיֶיךָ יָמִים, to prolong one's days, usually means, "to live long;" but here the addition "after Joshua" shows that the expression is not to be taken in this ordinary acceptation, but according to the proper sense of the words: "they prolonged days (life) after Joshua," i. e. they survived him: not, "they lived long after Joshua," cf. the remarks of Bachmann quoted on p. 15. — Ta.]

[2 Ver. 10. — The sing. suff. in וְיָבֹאוּ אֲבוֹתָם, although the verb is plural, arises from the fact that the expression וְיָבֹאוּ אֲבוֹתָם, and others of like import, are generally used of individuals. Habit gets the better of strict grammatical propriety. — Ta.]

[3 Ver. 10. — Dr. Casel: die Gott nicht kannten, und [also] auch seine That nicht; i. e. "who knew not God (Jehovah), nor [consequently], the works." The explanation of this rendering is that he takes "knew" in the sense of "acknowledged," see below; so that the clause gives him the following sense: "they acknowledged not what God had done for them, and of course did not rightly value his works. But, as Bachmann observes, לֹא יָדָעוּ conveys no reproach, but only states the cause of the ensuing apostasy. The new generation did not know the Lord and his work, so. as eye-witnesses (cf. ver. 7, li. 2); they only knew from hearsay." — Ta.]

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

Vers. 6-8. The penitence of the people at Bochim had shown that it had not yet fallen from its obedience to God, that it was still conscious of the blessings which had been bestowed upon it. The promise made to Joshua (Josh. xxiv. 24) had as yet been kept. They still served the Lord. Their position in this respect was the same as when he dismissed the tribes to take possession of their several inheritances. This dismissal introduced Israel to the new epoch, in which it was no longer guided by Moses or Joshua. Hence, the insertion of these sentences, which are also found in Josh. xxiv., is entirely appropriate. They describe the whole period in which the people was submissive to the Word of God, although removed from under the direct guidance of Joshua. The people was faithful when left to itself by Joshua, faithful after his death, faithful still in the days of the elders who outlived Joshua. That whole generation, which had seen the mighty deeds that attended the conquest of Canaan, stood firm. Our passage says, "for they had seen," whereas Josh. xxiv. 31 says, "they had known." "To see" is more definite than "to know." The facts of history may be known as the acts of God, without being witnessed and experienced. But this generation had stood in the midst of the events; the movements of the conflict and its results were still present in their memories. Whoever has felt the enthusiasm inspired by such victories and conquests, can never forget them. The Scripture narrators are accustomed, like the chroniclers of the Middle Ages, to repeat literally what has already been said elsewhere, in cases where modern writers content themselves with a mere reference. While we should have deemed it sufficient to appeal to earlier histories for an account of the death of Joshua, the narrative before us takes the more accurate method of literal repetition. Hence, the interruption of the course of thought commenced vers. 1-5, is only apparent. Vers. 6-10 explain the pious weeping of the people which vers. 4 and 5 recorded. Joshua's death, age, and burial are mentioned, because the writer wishes to indicate that Israel served God, not only after its dismissal by the still living leader, but also after his decease. The less necessity there was for the statements of vers. 8 and 9, the more evident it is that they are borrowed from Josh. xxiv. And we may congratulate ourselves that by this means the name of the place where Joshua was buried, has been handed down to us in a second form.

Ver. 9. And they buried him in Timnath-heres, in the mountains of Ephraim, north of Gaash. In Josh. xxiv. 30, the place is called Timnath-serah (תִּמְנַת־סֶרַח). The most reverential regard for the Masoretic text will not refuse to acknowledge many variations in the names of places, arising especially from the transposition of letters (as חֶרֶשׁ and חֶרֶל Josh. xix. 29).<sup>1</sup> Jewish tradition, it is true, explains them as different names borne by the same place; but the name Cheres is that which, in Kefr Cheres, preserved itself in the country, as remarked by Esthor ha-Parchi (ii. 434) and other travellers (Carmoly, pp. 212, 368, 444, etc.). Eli Smith discovered the place, April 26, 1843. A short distance northwest of Bir-Zeit (already on Robinson's earlier map, cf. the later), near Wady Belat, "there rose up a gentle hill, which was covered with the ruins or rather foundations of what was once a town of considerable size." The spot was still called Tibneh (for Timnath, just as the southern Timnath is at present called Tibneh). The city lay to the north of "a much higher hill, on the north side of which (thus facing the city), appeared several sepulchral excavations."<sup>2</sup> No other place than this can have been intended by the Jewish travellers, who describe several graves found there, and identify them as those of Joshua, his father, and Caleb (Carmoly, p. 387). The antiquity of the decorations of these sepulchres may indeed be questioned, but not that of the sepulchres themselves. Smith was of opinion that hitherto no graves like these had been discovered in Palestine. Tibneh lies on the eastern side of Mount Ephraim, the same side on which, farther south, Beth-horon and Sâris are found. "Mount Heres," which not the tribe of Dan, but only the strength of Ephraim, could render tributary, must have lain near Sâris, east of Aijalon. It is evident, therefore, that the name Heres must have been borne by this whole division of the mountains of Ephraim; and that the Timnath in which Joshua was buried, was by the addition of Heres distinguished from other places of the same name. In this way, the peculiar interest which led Ephraim to administer justice on Mount Heres (cf. on ch. i. 35) explains itself.

Ver. 10. And also all that generation, etc. Time vanishes. One generation goes, another comes. Joshua, who had died weary with years, was followed into the grave by his younger contemporaries. The generation that had borne arms with him, had been buried in the soil of the promised land; and another, younger generation lived.

It had already grown up in the land which the fathers had won. It inherited from them only possession and enjoyment. It already felt itself at home in the life of abundance to which it was born. It could not be counted as a reproach to them that they had not seen the mighty works of God in connection with the conquest (hence it is not said לֹא רָאוּ); but in the triteness of possession they utterly failed to acknowledge (לֹא יָדְעוּ) their indebtedness for it to God. How Israel came into the land, they must indeed have known; but to "know Jehovah" is something higher. They did not acknowledge that it was through God that they had come thither. Their fathers had seen and felt that victory and freedom came to them from the Lord. But they, as they did eat, built goodly houses, and dwelt in them (Deut. viii. 12), forgot God, and said (Deut. viii. 17): "Our power and the might of our hands hath gotten us this wealth." Modern German history furnishes an instructive illustration. The generation which broke the yoke of servitude imposed by Napoleon, "felt their God," as E. M. Arndt sang and prayed. The succeeding age enjoys the fruits and says: "Our skill and arms have smitten him." The living enthusiasm of action and strength, feels that its source is in the living God. It looks upon itself as the instrument of a Spirit who gives to truth and freedom their places in history. The children want the strength which comes of faith in that Spirit who in the fathers accomplished everything—and want it the more, the less they have done. Everything foretold by Moses goes into fulfillment. The later Israel had forgotten (Deut. viii. 14) what God had done for their fathers—in Egypt, in the desert, in Canaan. The phraseology is very suggestive; they "knew not Jehovah, nor, consequently, the works which he had done for Israel." Among the people, the one is closely connected with the other, as is shown by what follows.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

One generation goes and another comes, but the word of God abides forever. It holds good for fathers and children; it judges ancestors and descendants. The new Israel had not beheld the deeds of Joshua and Caleb; but the God in whose spirit they were accomplished, still lived. They had not witnessed the recompense which was visited upon Adoni-bezek; but the Word which promises reward and punishment, was still living. Israel apostatized not because it had forgotten, but because sin is ever forgetful. When the blind man sins, it is not because he does not see the creation which God created, but because sin is blind both in those who see and in those who see not.

Therefore, no one can excuse himself, when he falls away into idolatry. Creation is visible to all, all have come up out of Egypt, all enjoy the favor of their God. Inexperience, satanic arts of temptation, temperament, can explain many a fall; yet, no one falls save by his own evil lusts, and all wickedness is done before the eyes of God (ver. 11).

STARKE: Constantly to remember, and meditate on the works of God promotes piety, causing <sup>1</sup> As חֶרֶשׁ and חֶרֶל, and חֶרֶשׁ and חֶרֶל. Cf. Bochart, Hierozoicon, lib. I. cap. xi. tom. 2, p. 187.

<sup>2</sup> Ritter xvi. 562, Gage's Transl. iv. 246: [Smith's "Visit to Antipatris," in Bibliotheca Sacra for 1843 (published at New York) p. 484. — Tr.] On the desire of the Bedouins to be buried on mountains, cf. Wetstein, Hawran, p. 26.

us to fear God, to believe in Him, and to serve Him. mighty works of God continued alive, so long also did active gratitude, covenant faithfulness, en-

Lisoo: As long as the remembrance of the

The apostasy of Israel during the period of the Judges: Idolatry and its consequences.

CHAPTER II. 11-15.

- 11 And the children [sons] of Israel did evil<sup>1</sup> in the sight of the Lord [Jehovah], and 12 served Baalim: And they forsook the Lord [Jehovah. the] God of their fathers, which brought them out of the land of Egypt [Mitsraim], and followed other gods, of the gods of the people [peoples] that were round about them, and bowed themselves 13 unto them, and provoked the Lord [Jehovah] to anger. And [Yea] they forsook the 14 Lord [Jehovah], and served Baal and Ashtarothe. And the anger of the Lord [Jehovah] was hot [kindled] against Israel, and he delivered them into the hands of spoilers that [and they] spoiled them, and he sold them [gave them up<sup>2</sup>] into the hands of their enemies round about, so that they could not any longer stand before 15 their enemies. Whithersoever [Where-soever]<sup>3</sup> they went out, the hand of the Lord [Jehovah] was against them for evil [disaster], as the Lord [Jehovah] had said, and as the Lord [Jehovah] had sworn unto them: and they were [became] greatly distressed.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 11. — עָרַע: lit. "the evil." The use of the article, however, scarcely warrants the stress laid on it by Dr.

Cassel (see below), as עָרַע, although most frequently used of idolatry, occurs also of sin in general and of other sins, cf. Num. xxxii. 18; 2 Sam. xii. 9; Ps. li. 6. The art. is probably used here as with other words denoting abstract ideas, cf. Ges. Gr. § 109, Rem. 1, c. — Tr.]

[2 Ver. 14. — BACHMANN: "The giving up to the enemy is represented as a selling. The term of comparison, however, is not the price received, but the complete surrender into the stranger's power." — Tr.]

[3 Ver. 15. — The E. V. takes עָלְמָם as the accus. whither, cf. Num. xiii. 27. So also Bertheau, Kell, and most versions and commentators. Dr. Cassel takes עָלְמָם as accus. where, as in Gen. xxiv. 13, 2 Sam. vii. 7. Dr. Bachmann thinks it safer "in accordance with 2 Kgs. xviii. 7 (cf. Josh. i. 7, 9), to understand the whole expression not of the place of the undertaking, but of the undertaking itself (cf. Deut. xxviii. 20: "עָלְמָם מִן הַמִּלְחָמָה, with ver. 19: . . . מִן הַמִּלְחָמָה עָלְמָם): lit. "in all what = for what they went out," i. e. (since the connection points to matters of war) in all undertakings for which they took the field. It is at least safe to say that 2 Kgs. xviii. 7 requires this interpretation of the phrase in question, cf. Thénius in loc. — Tr.]

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

Vers. 11-13. And they did the evil in the sight of Jehovah. In what the evil consisted, we are soon informed: they served other gods, not their God. These other gods of the nations round about them, are national gods. They severally represent the morals, inclinations, and aptitudes, of those nations. The heathen god is the embodiment of the spiritual life and character of the people that worships him. The God of Israel is the very opposite of this. He is the God of the universe, inasmuch as He created heaven and earth; and the God of Israel, inasmuch as He elected them from among the nations in order to be a holy people unto Himself. The law is the abstract representation of that divine morality which is characteristic of the holy nation, as such. Israel forsakes God, when it does not follow this law. It forgets God, when it ascribes to itself that which belongs to Him; when it explains the history of its wars and victories by referring them, not to divine guidance, but to its own strength. Hence also, as soon as Israel forgets God as the author of its history, it falls into the service of other gods, since these are the opposite of the absolute God, namely, the visible embodiment of the nation's own self. The God of Israel is a God on whom the people feels itself dependent; the heathen deity, with its material representation, is the resultant of the popular will. The very moment in which the impatient Israel of the desert forsook God, it worshipped the golden calf, the type of Egypt. Now, in Canaan also, Israel is induced to forget God as its benefactor. It seeks to remove the contrariety which exists between itself and the Canaanites: to cancel the dividing-lines drawn by the law of the invisible God. It can have fellowship with the other nations only by serving their gods. Among the nations of antiquity no leagues found place except on the basis of community in sacred things; for in these the national type or character expressed itself. In the Italian cities, a union for joint-sacrifices was called concilium, and formed the indispensable prerequisite to connubium and commercium. The children of Israel, for the sake of their neighbors, forget their God. To please men, they do "the evil in the sight of the Lord." Evil, רָע, is the opposite of what God wills. Whatever the laws forbids, is "evil." "Ye shall not worship strange gods," is the burden of the first, and the ultimate ground of all commandments. Therefore, when Israel serves them it does what is, not simply "evil," but "the evil" (הָרָע). The trains of thought of the simple sentences, are bound together by a profoundly penetrating logic. The new generation no longer knows the works of God in Israel's behalf. Hence it longs for intercourse with the nations round about. For these have not been driven out. In order to gratify this longing, it serves their strange gods. But thereby it forsakes Jehovah, and provokes Him to anger.

And they served Baalim. Baal (בַּעַל), as deity, is for the nation, what as master he is in the house, and as lord in the city. He represents and impersonates the people's life and energies. Hence, there is one general Baal, as well as many Baalim. The different cities and tribes had their individual Baalim, who were not always named after their cities, but frequently from the various characteristics for which they were adored. The case is analogous to that of Zeus, who by reason of his various attributes, was variously named and worshipped in Greece. The Israelites, as they forgot their own God, apostatized to that form of Baal service which obtained in the tribe or city in which they happened to live, according to the manifold modifications which the service of the idol assumed. Our passage reproduces very closely the words of the Mosaic law (cf. Deut. xvii. 2, 3; xxix. 25 (26)), except that it substitutes Baalim for elohim acherim, other gods. Elohim acherim is of universal comprehensiveness. "Other gods" being forbidden, the false gods of all ages and countries, whatever names they may bear, are forbidden. Acher is "another," not in any sense implying coördination, but as expressive of inferiority, spuriousness. It is used like trespos, posterior, and the German after and aber. (Aberglaube [superstition] is a false glauhe [faith], just as elohim acherim are false gods.<sup>1</sup>) Baalim is here substituted as being the current name of the country for the false god. And in truth the very name of Baal, in its literal signification, expresses the contrast between him and the absolute and true Elohim, Jehovah. For as Baal (i. e. Lord, Master), he is dependent on the existence of him whose Baal he is, just as he is no husband who has not a wife; whereas it is the nature of the absolute God to be perfectly free and independent of every extraneous object. These Baalim were the "gods of the nations who dwelt round about them." Every word of ver. 12 indicates that what now occurred, had been foretold by Moses (cf. Deut. xxviii. 20; xxxi. 16; Lev. xxii. 33). The chief passages which are kept in view, are Deut. vi. 10 ff.; xxix. 25 ff. Ver. 13 begins with the same words as ver. 12, "they forsook God," not to repeat but to strengthen the statement. It must astound the reader that they have forsaken God (עָזַב has the sense of our expression "to ignore one," "not to notice him," as one lets a poor man stand and beg without noticing him), to serve "Baal and Ashtaroth." Israel, the narrator wishes to say, was actually capable of giving up its own glorious God, who brought it up out of Egypt, for the sake of Baal and Ashtaroth! The statements of vers. 11, 12, 13, and 14 form a climax; for sin is not stationary, but sinks ever deeper. Ver. 11 had said that "they served Baalim." Ver. 12 intimates that this was in fact nothing else than that which Moses, in the name of God, had described as the deepest and most radical crime of which the nation could be guilty. Ver. 13 shows the blindness of Israel in its deepest darkness. The people has forsaken its God of truth and purity, for the sake of Baal and Ashtaroth! That has come to pass against which Deut. iv. 19 warned as possible: "Lest thou lift up thine eyes unto heaven, and when thou seest the sun, and the moon, and the stars, all the host of heaven, shouldest bow down to them and serve them." The luminaries of the heavens are the original symbols of ancient idolatry. Baal answers to Zeus, the Greek Light-god. Ashtaroth, in like manner, corresponds to Hera (according to the meaning of her name, a Baalah), the Star-queen. Ashtoreth means "the star" (שֵׁטָרָה, Persian sitrah, ἀστὴρ, star); in the plural her name is Ashtaroth. This plural expresses the Scripture phrase "host of heaven," in one collective conception. As Elohim in its plural form represents the Deity, so Baalim represents Baaldom, and Ashtaroth the shining night-heavens.

(Just as cives and civitas, בְּעָלִים and בְּעָלִיהָ, are used to express all that is included in the idea of the State.) The Greek form of Ashtoreth, it is well known, was Astarte. Hence, names formed like Abdastartus<sup>2</sup> (Servant of Astarte), find their contrast in such as Obadiah (Servant of Jah), formed in the spirit of the Israelitish people. Astarte represents on the coast of Phœnicia the same popular conception, suggested by natural phenomena, which till a very late period Asia Minor worshipped in the goddess of Ephesus. The Greek conceptions of Hera, Artemis, and Aphrodite do not so coalesce in her as to prevent us from clearly finding the common source. From the instructive passages of Scripture, in which the language shows a relation of Astarte to the propagation of flocks (Deut. vii. 13; xxviii. 4), it is evident that as luminous night-goddess she, like Hera, was a patroness of corporeal fertility, an Ilithyia, Lucina, Mylitta. On account of this idea, which is characteristic of both goddesses, the heavenly Hera (Juno caelestis) coincides with Aphrodite Urania, so that Hesychius remarks concerning Belthis (Baalath), that she may be the one or the other. Astarte was worshipped as Ashtoreth, not only in Zidon (1 Kgs. xi. 5; 2 Kgs. xxiii. 13), but throughout Canaan; special mention is made of her temple in Askelon (1 Sam. xxxi. 10). It is evidently this temple of which Herodotus (i. 105) speaks as dedicated to Aphrodite Urania, and which, as the national sanctuary of Askelon, the Scythians destroyed. It was on account of its national character, that the Philistines deposited in it the armor of Saul as trophies. They saw in its goddess the victor over the defeated enemy, just as at Ephesus the repulse of the Cimmerians was attributed to the aid of Artemis. Powers of resistance and defense were ascribed to all those Asiatic goddesses who presided over the principle of fecundity in nature. Their weapons protect pacific nature and that which she cherishes, against the hostility of wild and savage forces. The worship of the Ephesian goddess is founded and celebrated by Amazons. Juno, the celestial, is represented with lance in hand. The same conception is indicated by ancient representations of Aphrodite, in which she appears armed and prepared for battle. Astarte is at all events considered favorable to her nation in war, since trophies of victory hang in her temple, and the capital of the terrible warrior Og bears the name Ashtaroth (Josh. ix. 10; xii. 4). This King Og of Bashan is regarded as a scion of the mighty Rephaim. These latter have their seat at Ashtaroth Karnaim, where they are attacked by the eastern kings (Gen. xiv. 5). Ashtaroth Karnaim points to the horns of the crescent moon, by which also Astarte of Askalon is indicated on the coins of that city (cf. Stark, Gaza, p. 259). The armed Aphrodite in Sparta is the same with Helena or Selene, the moon-goddess, — a fact clearly demonstrative of her identity with Astarte. Moon and stars, the luminaries of the night-sky, are blended in Ashtaroth. She represents the collective host of heaven. Before this "host" Israel bowed down when it forsook its "Lord of hosts." Baal and Ashtaroth stand for the whole national worship of Phœnicia, over against Jehovah, the God of the universe. They are the representatives of their nation's prosperity; and it is therefore a profound conception, which Epiphanius says some held (Hæres. iv. cap. 2), which makes Hercules (Baal) to be the father, and Ashtaroth (or Asteria, ἡ καὶ Ἀστειρά), the mother, of Melchizedek. Thus when Melchizedek bowed himself before Abraham and Abraham's God, the national spirit of Canaan submitted itself. When Israel prostrates itself before such symbols, it cannot fail to provoke the anger of its God.

<sup>1</sup> Cf. my Abhandlung über Wissensth. und Akademien, p. xxviii.

<sup>2</sup> Compare Methuastartus (מֵתוּעֶשְׁתָּרָה), formed like Methubaal, Methusalem, Man of (belonging to) Astarte. Compare אִמַּעֲשֶׁרָה, "my mother is Astarte," on the Sidonian Inscription of Eshmunazar. Rödiger (Zeitschrift d. d. m. Ges., 1855, p. 656) regards it as an abbreviation for אִמַּעֲשֶׁרָה, "maid-servant of Astarte," wherein he is followed by others.

Ver. 14. And the anger of Jehovah was kindled against Israel. A climax appears also in the expressions concerning the displeasure of God. First, that which they do is evil in his sight (ver. 11); then, they provoke Him to anger (ver. 12; cf. Deut. iv. 25; ix. 18); finally, his anger is kindled (ver. 14; also Num. xxv. 3; xxxii. 13).

And He delivered them into the hands of the oppressors [spoilers] — and gave them up into the hands of their enemies.<sup>1</sup> Thus far the phraseology has been literally quoted from Mosaic utterances, except that Baal and Ashtaroth were substituted for sun, moon, and stars. The above words occur here for the first time. They express the historical consequences of Israel's wrong-doing. When Israel forsakes God and his law, it loses the basis of its nationality. With God and God's law, and through them, it is a people; without them, it has neither law nor national power. The gods after whom they run, do not at all belong to them. On the contrary, they are the property of nations who are their enemies. Israel left Egypt a crowd of slaves. It was God's own revelation of Himself, fulfilling his promise to the fathers, that made it free. If it give up this revelation, it has no longer a basis of freedom. Freedom is henceforth impossible; for by serving the gods of other nations, it dissolves its own national existence. Hence, this faithlessness towards God, is the worst folly against itself. For the enemy who gave way before Israel's God and Israel's enthusiasm, will no longer spare the conquerors of Canaan when, like men without character, they kneel at strange altars. When God who elected Israel is not in the midst of the nation as its protector, it is like the defenseless hart which the hunter pursues. Such is the figure which underlies the expression: "and God gave them into the hands of their אֹיְבֵיהֶם." The root

אָבָה, אָבָה, is not found in the Pentateuch, and occurs here for the first time. The shosim are enemies of the property of another, robbers, plunderers, — as the hunter robs his game of life and happiness. The word is kindred to the Greek χάω, with the same meaning, although, to be sure, only the passive χάσμαι is in use. (It seems also that the Italian cucciare and the French chasser are to be derived from this word; but cf. Diez, Lex. der Röm. Spr., p. 79). Israel, having broken its covenant with God for the sake of men, was by these very men oppressed. They robbed it of goods and freedom. For God had "sold it," like a person who has lost his freedom. What but servitude remained for Israel when it no longer possessed the power of God? It cannot stand before its enemies, as was foretold, Lev. xxvi. 37, in somewhat different words. A people that conquered only through the contrariety of its spirit with that of its enemies, must fall when it ceases to cherish that spirit. No one can have power to succeed, who himself destroys his sole vocation to success. Hence, Israel could no more be successful in anything. The measure of its triumph with God, is the measure of its misery without Him. Apostasy from God is always like a return to Egypt into bondage (Deut. xxviii. 68).

Ver. 15. As Jehovah had said, and as he had sworn unto them. By applying to their sin the very words used in the law, the narrator has already emphasized the enduring truthfulness of the divine announcements. Israel is to experience that everything threatened comes to pass; and with reason, for every promise also has been verified. But here he expresses himself still more plainly. The hand of the Lord (Deut. ii. 15) was against them for evil (Deut. xxix. 20), as He "had sworn unto them." No sentence evinces more plainly how closely the narrator keeps to the Mosaic writings. When God is said to swear unto Israel, it is almost always in connection with blessings to be bestowed. Only in two instances (Deut. ii. 14; cf. Josh. v. 6), the Lord is represented as having sworn that to those who had not obeyed his voice, He would not show the land. In these, therefore, the oath is confirmatory of threatened punishment. The double form of expression also, that God spake and swore, is prefigured Deut. xxix. 12 (13).

And they became greatly distressed, וַיִּכְאֻבּוּ. Deut. xxviii. 50–52 describes the plunderers, who

1 [On these words Bachmann remarks: "This does not describe a twofold visitation, either simultaneous or successive: first spoiling, then servitude (P. Mart.), or roving robber bands and regular hostile armies (Schm.); still less (Cajet.) a threefold degree of calamity — spoiling, slavery, flight [the latter indicated by 'they were no longer able to stand before their enemies' — Ta.]; but God in abandoning the people to the relentless violence of their hostile neighbors, does thereby deliver them into the hands of the spoilers." — Ta.]

shall rob them of their cattle and their harvests. "Thou shalt be distressed in all thy gates" (וְהָיָה לְךָ צָרָה בְּכָל שְׁעֵי עָרֶיךָ), is twice repeated in ver. 52. The narrator presupposes intimate acquaintance with the ancient writings, and therefore cites only their salient points.

HOMEILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

After the judgment of the word comes the judgment of the sword. He who ceases to remember the works of God, ceases also to enjoy the power of God. For him who shuts his eyes, the sun affords no light. Men are judged by the truth which they despise, and betrayed by the sin which they love. Israel can no longer withstand the nations over whom it formerly triumphed, because it courts their idols and leaves its own God.

Thus men suffer through the passions which they entertain. They are plundered, when instead of God, they serve Baal-Mammon. The judgment of the word which they forsake, is confirmed. Men lose the freedom of the children of God, when (1) they are no longer grateful to God; consequently, (2) remember Him no more; hence, (3) attend no longer to the preaching of repentance; and despite of it, (4) serve idols.

STARKE: He who engages in another worship, forsakes the true God, and apostatizes from Him. But woe to the man who does this: for he brings himself into endless trouble. THE SAME: God is as true to his threats as to his promises. LISCO: The people whom trouble and bondage had brought to a consciousness of their guilt, sank again into idolatry through levity and commerce with heathen, and thus new chastisements became necessary. GERLACH: The judgment affords a deep glance into God's government of the world, showing how He makes all sin subservient to his own power, by punishing it with the very evils that arise from it.

The interposition of God in Israel's behalf by the appointment of Judges. Deliverance and the death of the Deliverer the occasion of renewed apostasy.

CHAPTER II. 16-23.

- 16 Nevertheless [And] the Lord [Jehovah] raised up judges, which [and they] delivered them out of the hand of those that spoiled them. And yet they would not [But neither did they] hearken unto their judges, but<sup>1</sup> they went a whoring<sup>a</sup> after other [false] gods, and bowed themselves unto them: they turned quickly<sup>b</sup> out of the way<sup>c</sup> which their fathers walked in, obeying<sup>d</sup> the commandments of the Lord [Jehovah]; but they did not so. And when the Lord [Jehovah] raised them up judges, then the Lord [Jehovah] was with the judge, and delivered them out of the hand of their enemies all the days of the judge: (for it repented the Lord [Jehovah] because of their groanings [wallings<sup>e</sup>] by reason of them that oppressed<sup>d</sup> them and vexed [persecuted<sup>f</sup>] them.) And [But] it came to pass, when the judge was dead, that they returned [turned back], and corrupted themselves<sup>g</sup> more than their fathers, in following other [false] gods to serve them, and to bow down unto them; they ceased not from<sup>h</sup> their own [omit: own] [evil] doings;<sup>i</sup> nor from their stubborn way.<sup>j</sup> And the anger of the Lord [Jehovah] was hot [kindled] against Israel; and he said, Because that this people hath transgressed my covenant<sup>k</sup> which I commanded their fathers, and have not hearkened unto my voice; I also will not henceforth [will not go on to] drive out any [a man] from before them of the nations which Joshua left when he died: that through them I may prove [in order by them to prove<sup>l</sup>] Israel, whether they will keep the way of the Lord [Jehovah] to walk therein, as their fathers did keep it, or not. Therefore [And] the Lord [Jehovah] left those [these] nations [at rest<sup>k</sup>], without driving them out hastily [so that they should not be speedily driven out], neither delivered he them [and delivered them not] into the hand of Joshua.

<sup>a</sup> Ver. 17. — פִּי זָכָר, etc., cf. Deut. xxxi. 16.

<sup>b</sup> Ver. 17. — סָרְדוּ מִיָּדָם, cf. Ex. xxxi. 8; Deut. ix. 12.

<sup>c</sup> Ver. 18. — נִשְׁתַּחֲוּם, from נִשְׁתַּחֲוֶה, cf. Ex. ii. 24, vi. 5.

<sup>d</sup> Ver. 18. — וְיָחַד, cf. Ex. iii. 9.

<sup>e</sup> Ver. 18. — וְיָחַד appears here for the first time. Cf. the Greek Stance.

<sup>f</sup> Ver. 19. — Cf. Deut. xxviii. 20.

<sup>g</sup> Ver. 19. — הִשְׁתַּחֲוּהוּ, with reference to Ex. xxxiii. 5, etc., where already Israel is called הִשְׁתַּחֲוּהוּ.

<sup>h</sup> Ver. 20. — Cf. Josh. vii. 11.

<sup>i</sup> Ver. 22. — Cf. Ex. xvi. 4; xx. 20; Deut. viii. 2, 16; xiii. 4 (3).

<sup>k</sup> Ver. 23. — Cf. Num. xxxii. 15.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 17. — Dr. Cassel has denn, "for." "But" is better. On יִּי after a negative, cf. Ges. Gr. p. 272, at top. — Ta.]

[2 Ver. 17. — That is, as often as a Judge had succeeded in bringing them back to the way of their fathers, they quickly left it again. So Bachmann. — Ta.]

[3 Ver. 17. — לְשֹׁמֵעַ: "in that they obeyed." On this less regular, but by no means rare (cf. ver. 19, Pa. lxxviii. 18; 1 Sam. xx. 20; etc.) use of the infin. with לְ, cf. Ew. 280 d. — Ta.]

[4 Ver. 18. — בְּחֹק, only here and in Joel ii. 8. If the clause were rendered: "before those that crowded (יִחְצִי, cf. on ch. i. 34) and pressed upon them," its metaphorical character would be preserved as nearly as possible. — Ta.]

[5 Ver. 19. — The E. V. is correct as to sense; but the Hebrew phrase, filled out, would be, "they corrupted their way," cf. Gen. vi. 12. — Ta.]

[6 Ver. 19. — לֹא הִפְלִיגוּ מִן: lit. "they caused not (sc. their conduct, course of action) to fall away from their (evil) deeds." — Ta.]

[7 Ver. 22. — לִמְעַן בָּרוּךְ. Grammatically this infin. of design may be connected either with לֹא אִסִּיף, ver. 21, בְּיָמָיו, ver. 20, or יִּי. The first construction (adopted by E. V.) is inadmissible, because, 1. It supposes that Jehovah himself continues to speak in ver. 22, in which case we should expect אֲנִי־בָרוּךְ, first per., rather than אֲבִרְדִּיךָ יְהוָה. 2. It supposes that the purpose to prove Israel is now first formed, whereas it is clear from ch. iii. 1, 4, that it was already operative in the time of Joshua. This objection is also fatal to the construction with בְּיָמָיו, adopted by Kell. (That Dr. Cassel adopts one of these two appears from the fact that he reads: "whether they will (instead of would, see farther on) keep the way of Jehovah," but which of the two is not clear.) It remains, therefore, to connect with לִמְעַן, against which there is no objection, either grammatical or logical. "For in such loosely added infinitives of design, in which the subject is not definitely determined, the person of the infin. goes back to the preceding principal word only when no other relation is more obvious, see Ew. 287 b (cf. Ex. ix. 16). But that here, as in the perfectly analogous parallel passage, ch. iii. 4, the design expressed by the infin. is not Joshua's nor that of the nations, but Jehovah's, is self-evident, and is besides expressly declared in ver. 23 and ch. iii. 1. So rightly LXX. It. Psal. Ar. Aug. (ques. 17), Ser. Stud. and many others" (Bachmann). The connection from ver. 21 onward is therefore as follows: In ver. 21 Jehovah is represented (cf. foot-note 8 on p. 62) as saying, "I will not go on to drive out the nations which Joshua left when he died." To this the author of the Book himself adds the purpose for which they were left, namely, to prove Israel, whether they would (not, would) keep the way (אֲבִרְדִּיךָ) of Jehovah to walk therein (בָּהֶם, plur. "in them," constr. ad sensum, the way of Jehovah consisting of the יְהוָה מִצְוֹת, Deut. viii. 2 — Kell), as their fathers kept it, or not. "And so," he continues, i. e. in consequence of this purpose, "Jehovah (not merely Joshua) left these nations (אֲבִרְדִּיךָ, these, pointing forward to ch. iii. 1 ff., where they are enumerated,) at rest, in order that they should not speedily (for that would have been inconsistent with the design of proving Israel by them, but yet ultimately) be driven out, and did not give them into the hand of Joshua." But the "not speedily" of Joshua's time had by Israel's faithless apostasy been changed into "never." — Ta.]

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

The first two chapters indicate, by way of introduction, the laws of historical cause and effect whose operation explains the occurrences about to be related in the succeeding pages. They are designed to give information concerning that most important of all subjects in Israel, — the relation of the will of God to his chosen people. Since prosperity and calamity were both referred to God, it was necessary to explain the moral grounds of the same in the favor or wrath of God. It was most important, in view of the peculiar histories which were to be narrated, that the doubts which might be raised against the doctrine of God's all-powerful and world-controlling direction, should be obviated. The connection between the national fortunes, as about to be related, and the declarations of the Mosaic law, was to be pointed out. The reader was to be informed why the purposes of God concerning the glory of Israel in Canaan, as unfolded to Moses, had been so imperfectly fulfilled. In ch. i. a historical survey of the conquests of the tribes had been given, in order in connection therewith to state how little heed had been given to the behest of the law to expel the nations. In that disobedience the germ of all subsequent misfortunes was contained. For by mingling with the heathen nations, the chosen people fell into sin. With Israel to fall from God was actually to fall back into bondage. In their distress and anguish, God (vers. 15 and 18) mercifully heard their crying, as he had heard it in Egypt (Ex. ii. 24; vi. 5). Now, as then, He raised them up heroes, who through his might smote the enemy, and delivered the people from both internal and external bondage (ver. 16). This, however, did not remove the evil in its germ. Since the judgeship was not hereditary, the death of each individual Judge brought back the same state of things which followed the departure of Joshua and his contemporaries. The nation continually fell back into its old sin (vers. 18, 19). The history of events under the Judges, is the history of ever recurring exhibitions of divine compassion and human weakness. Hence, the great question in Israel must be one inquiring into the cause of these relations. If, the people might say, present relations owed their existence to the temptations occasioned by the remaining Canaanites, he on whom the first blame for not expelling them must fall, would be none other than Joshua! Why did not that hero of God drive them all out of the land? Why did he not secure the whole land, in all its extended boundaries, for a possession to Israel? If only sea and desert had bounded their territories, Israel would have had no temptation to meddle with the superstitions of neighbors. Left to themselves, they would have thought of nothing else than to serve their God. To this vers. 21 ff. reply: God is certainly the Helper and Guide of Israel, its Libera-tor and Conqueror; but not to serve the sinfulness and sloth of Israel. The Spirit of God is with Israel, when the freewill of Israel chooses obedience to God. But the freedom of this choice demonstrates itself only under temptation. Abraham became Father of the Faithful because, though tempted (Gen. xxii. 1), he nevertheless stood firm. Fidelity and faith approve themselves only in resistance to seductive influences. God in his omnipotence might no doubt remove every temptation from the path of believers; but He would not thereby bestow a boon on man. The opportunity for sinning would indeed be rendered difficult; but the evidence of victorious conflict with sin would be made impossible. Had God suffered Joshua to remove out of the way all nations who might tempt Israel, the people's inward sinful inclinations would have been no less, it would have cherished no greater love for God its benefactor, it would have forgotten that He was its liberator (ch. ii. 10); and the faith, the fidelity, the enthusiasm, which come to light amid the assaults of temptation, would have had no opportunity to win the approval of God or to secure the impartation of his strength. Unfaithfulness, to be sure, must suffer for its sins; but faithfulness is the mother of heroes. The Book of Judges tells of the trials by which God suffered Israel to be tried through the Canaanites, of the punishments which they endured whenever they failed to stand the tests, — but also of the heroes whom God raised up because they preserved some faith in Him. The closing verses do not therefore contradict the opening of the chapter. The pious elders weep when from the words of the "messenger from Gilgal" they perceive the temptation. The unfaithful younger generation must suffer the penalty because they yielded to the seduction. Joshua would doubtless have expelled all the nations; but God did not permit it. He died; but in his place God raised up other heroes, who liberated Israel when, in distress, it breathed penitential sighs. Such, in outline, are the author's thoughts as to the causes which underlie his history. He uses them to introduce his narrative, and in the various catastrophes of the history constantly refers to them.

Vers. 16-19. And Jehovah raised them up Judges, שופטים, Shophetim. This word occurs here for the first time in the special sense which it has in this period of Israelitish history, and which it does not appear to have had previously. שופט is to judge, to decide and to proceed according to the decision, in disputes between fellow-countrymen and citizens. Originally, Moses, deeming it his duty to exercise all judicial functions himself, was the only judge in Israel (Ex. xviii. 16). But when this proved impracticable, he committed the lesser causes to trustworthy men from among the people, just as at the outset the Spartan ephors had authority only in unimportant matters. These he charged (Ex. xviii. 21; Deut. i. 16) to "judge righteously between every man and his brother." For the future, he enjoins the appointment of judges in every city (Deut. xvi. 18). Their jurisdiction extends to cases of life and death, to matters of idolatry as all other causes (Deut. xvii. 1-12; xxv. 2); and although the words are "thou shalt make thee judges," the judges are nevertheless clothed with such authority as renders their decisions completely and finally valid. Whoever resists them, must die (Deut. xvii. 12). The emblem of this authority, in Israel as elsewhere, was the staff or rod, as we see it carried by Moses. The root שפ is therefore to be connected with שפף, staff, σκήπτρον, scipio.

שופט is a staff-man, a judge. In the Homeric poems, when the elders are to sit in judgment, the heralds reach them their staves (Il. xviii. 506); "but now (says Achilles, Il. i. 237), the judges carry in their hands the staff."<sup>1</sup> Judicial authority is the chief attribute of the royal dignity. Hence, God, the highest king, is also "the Judge of all the earth" (Gen. xviii. 25). He judges concerning right and wrong, and makes his awards accordingly. When law and sin had ceased to be distinguished in Israel, compassion induced Him to appoint judges again. If these are gifted with heroic qualities, to vanquish the oppressors of Israel, it is nevertheless not this heroism that forms their principal characteristic. That consists in "judging." They restore, as was foreseen, Deut. xvii. 7, 12, the authority of law. They enforce the penalties of law against the sin of disobedience towards God. It is the spirit of this law living in them, that makes them strong. The normal condition of Israel is not one of victory simply; it is a condition in which law and right<sup>2</sup> are kept. For this reason, God raises up Shophetim, judges, not princes (nesim, sarim). The title sets forth both their work and the occasion of their appointment. Israel is free and powerful when its law is observed throughout the land.<sup>3</sup> Henceforth, (as appears from Deut. xvii. 14,) except shophetim, only kings, melakim, can rule in Israel. The difference between them

1 A similarly formed title is that of Bâtonnier, given by the French to the chief of the barristers, and yet very different from the mediæval bastonnier.

2 [Dr. Cassel's words are: Gesetz und Recht. For the latter term, as technically used, the English language has no equivalent. It is Right as determined by law. — Ta.]

3 [Dr. Bachmann (with many others) reaches an entirely different definition of the "Judges." The Judge as such, he contends, acts in an external direction, in behalf of, not on, the people. A Judge, in the special sense of our Book, is first of all a Deliverer, a Savior. He may, or he may not, exercise judicial functions, properly speaking, but he is Judge because he delivers. This view he supports by an extended review of the usus loquendi of the word, and especially by insisting that ch. ii. 16, 18 admits of no other definition. "Why," he asks, quoting Dr. Cassel, "if a Judge is first of all a restorer of law and right, does not ch. ii. 11-19, which gives such prominence to the fact that the forsaking of the divine law is the cause of all the hostile oppressions endured by Israel, lay similar stress, when it comes to speak of the Shophetim, on the restoration of the authority of law, but, on the contrary, speaks of the deliverance of the people from its oppressors?" To which it were enough to reply, first, that ver. 18 intends only to show how Israel was delivered from the previously mentioned consequences of its lawless condition, not how it was rescued from the lawless condition itself; and, secondly, that vers. 18, 19 clearly imply, that while military activity may (and from the nature of the case usually did) occupy a part of the Judge's career, efforts, more or less successful, to restore the supremacy of the divine law within the nation engage the whole. Hence, the Deliverer was rightly called Shophet, whereas in his military character he would have been more properly called שׁוֹמֵר, cf. ch. iii. 9. Dr. Bachmann, it is true, explains the title Judge (as derived from the second of the three meanings of שפ, 1. to judge; 2. to save, namely, by affording justice; 3. to rule) by the fact that the O. T. views the assistance sent by Jehovah to his oppressed people as an act of retributive justice towards both oppressor and oppressor, cf. Gen. xv. 14; Ex. vi. 6, vii. 4; but in such cases Jehovah, and not the human organ through whom He acts, is the Judge. — Ta.]

lies chiefly in the hereditariness of the royal office—a difference, it is true, of great significance in Israel, and closely related to the national destiny. The Judge has only a personal commission. His work is to re-inspire Israel with divine enthusiasm, and thus to make it victorious. He restores things to the condition in which they were on the death of Joshua. No successor were necessary, if without a judge, the nation itself maintained the law, and resisted temptation. Israel has enough in its divinely-given law. Rallying about this and the priesthood, it could be free; for God is its King. But it is weak. The Judge is scarcely dead, before the authority of law is shaken. Unity is lost, and the enemy takes advantage of the masterless disorder. Therefore, Judges, raised up by God, and girded with fresh strength, succeed each other,—vigorous rulers, full of personal energy, but called to exercise judgment only in the Spirit of God. It has been customary, in speaking of the Punic suffetes, to compare them with the Israelitish shophetim. And it is really more correct to regard the suffetes as consules than as kings. Among the Phœnicians also the idea of king included that of hereditariness.<sup>1</sup> The suffetes were an elected magistracy, whose name, like that of the Judges, was doubtless derived from the fact that they also constituted the highest judicial authority. They sat in judgment (ad jus dicendum) when the designs of Aristo came to light (Livy, xxxiv. 61). It is, in general, by no means uncommon for the magistracy of a city (summus magistratus), as in the Spanish Gades (Livy, xxviii. 37), to be styled Judges, i. e. suffetes. As late as the Middle Ages, the title of Spanish magistrates was judices. The highest officer of Sardinia was termed judez.<sup>2</sup> The Israelitish Judges differ from the suffetes, not so much by the nature of their official activity, as by the source, purpose, and extent of their power. In Israel also common shophetim existed everywhere; but the persons whom God selected as deliverers were in a peculiar sense men of divine law and order. They were not regular but extraordinary authorities. Hence, they were not, like the suffetes, chosen by the people. God himself appointed them. The spirit of the national faith placed them at the head of the people.

Ver. 20, etc.<sup>3</sup> I will not go on to drive out a man of the nations which Joshua left when he died. The purport of this important sentence, which connects chapters i. and iii. historically and geographically, is as follows: The whole land, from the wilderness of Edom to Mount Casius and the "road to Hamath," and from Jordan to the sea, was intended for Israel. But it had not been given to Joshua to clear this whole territory. A group of nations, enumerated ch. iii. 3, had remained in their seats. Nor did the individual tribes, when they took possession of their allotments, make progress against them (cf. ch. i. 19, 34). Especially does this explain what is said above, ch. i. 31, of the tribe of Asher. Israel, therefore, was still surrounded by a circle of heathen nations, living within its promised borders, to say nothing of those who with their idolatry were tolerated in the territory actually subjugated (cf. ch. i. 21, 27, 30). These were the nations by whom temptations and conflicts were prepared for Israel, and against whom, led by divinely-inspired heroes, it rose in warlike and successful resistance.

<sup>1</sup> Which Movers (Phœnizier, II. 1, 536)* has improperly overlooked. As those who exercised governmental functions, properly symbolised by the sceptre, the Greek language could scarcely call them anything else than βασιλεις. Some good remarks against Heeren's view of this matter were made by J. G. Schlosser (Aristoteles' Politik, I. 196, 196).

<sup>2</sup> It is only necessary to refer to Du Cange, under Judices. Similar relations occur in the early political and judicial history of all nations. Cf. Grimm, Rechtswörterbuch, p. 750, etc.

<sup>3</sup> [Dr. Cassel, in striving after brevity, has here left a point of considerable interest in obscurity. Ver. 20 reads as follows: "And the anger of Jehovah was kindled against Israel, and he said, Because this people hath transgressed my covenant which I commanded their fathers, and have not hearkened to my voice, I also will not," etc. How is this verse connected with the preceding? Vers. 11-19 have given a bird's-eye view of the whole period of the Judges. They have described it as a period of constantly renewed backsliding, calling down God's anger on Israel, and not permanently cured even by the efforts of the Judges. Thereupon ver. 20 proceeds as above; and the question arises, to what point of time in the whole period it is to be referred. Dr. Bachmann argues that in ver. 20 the narrative goes back to the "sentence" pronounced at Bochim (see ver. 3). "Ver. 20," he says, "adds [to the survey in vers. 11-19] that, before God's anger attained its complete expression in delivering Israel into the hands of strange nations (ver. 14), it had already manifested itself in the determination not to drive those nations out; and with this the narrative returns to the judgment of Bochim." Accordingly, he interprets the וַיֹּאמֶר, "and he said," of ver. 20, as introducing an actual divine utterance, namely, the one delivered at Bochim. Without following the whole course of Dr. Bachmann's argument, it is enough here to say that his conclusion is surely wrong, and that the source of his error lies in the view he takes of the words spoken at Bochim, which are not a "sentence" or "judgment," but a warning, designed to obviate the necessity for denouncing judgment. The true connection, in my judgment (and as

I think Dr. Cassel also conceives it), is as follows: When Joshua ceased from war, there were still many nations left in possession of territory intended for Israel, cf. Josh. xiii. 1 ff. They were left temporarily, and for the good of Israel, cf. Judg. ii. 22, 23, iii. 1, 2. At the same time Israel was warned against the danger that thus arose, and distinctly told that if they entered into close and friendly relations with the people thus left, Jehovah would not drive them out at all, but would leave them to become a scourge to them, Josh. xxiii. 12 ff. Nevertheless, Israel soon adopted a line of conduct towards them such as rendered it inevitable that the prohibited relations must soon be established, cf. Judg. i. Then came the warning of Bochim. It proved unavailing. Israel entered into the closest connections with the heathen, forsook Jehovah, and served Baal and Ashtaroth, ch. iii. 6, ii. 11 ff. The contingency of Josh. xxiii. 12, 13 had actually occurred, and its conditional threat passed over into irrevocable determination on the part of Jehovah. The time of the determination falls therefore in the earlier part of the period of the Judges; but as the moment at which it went into force was not signalled by any public announcement, and as each successive apostasy added, so to speak, to its finality, the author of the Book of Judges makes express mention of it (allusion to it there is already in vers. 14 b, 15 a), only at the close of his survey, where, moreover, it furnished an answer to the question which the review itself could not fail to suggest, Why did God leave these nations to be a constant snare to Israel? why was it, that even the most heroic Judges, men full of faith in God and zeal for Israel, did not exterminate them? The וַיֹּאמֶר of ver. 20, therefore, does not introduce an actual divine utterance. The author derives his knowledge of God's determination, first, from Josh. xxiii. 13, and secondly, from the course of the history; but in order to give impressiveness and force to his statement, he "clothes it in the form of a sentence pronounced by God"

(Kell). The ו in וַיֹּאמֶר denotes logical, not temporal, sequence. On the connection of ver. 22 ff. with ver. 21, see note 7 under the text. — Ta.]

With their enumeration, briefly made in ch. iii. 1-5, the author closes his introduction to the narration of subsequent events. The historical and moral background on which these arise, is now clear. Not only the scene and the combatants, but also the causes of conflict and victory have been indicated.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

The judgments of God are indescribable — his compassion is indefatigable. Whatever God had promised in the law, must come to pass, be it prosperity or distress. Apostasy is followed by ruin; the loss of character by that of courage. Heroes become cowards; conquerors take to flight. Shame and scorn came upon the name of Israel. The nation could no longer protect its cities, nor individuals their homes. In distress, the people returned to the altars which in presumptuous pride they had left. Old Israel wept when it heard the preaching of repentance; new Israel weeps only when it feels the sword of the enemy. And God's compassion is untiring. He gave them deliverers, choosing them from among Israel's judges, making them strong for victory and salvation. But in his mercy He chastened them. For Israel must be trained and educated by means of judgment and mercy. The time to save them by a king had not yet come. Judah had formerly led the van; but neither was the education of this tribe completed. Judges arose in Israel; but their office was not hereditary. When the Judge died a condition of national affairs ensued like that which followed the death of Joshua: the old remained faithful, the young apostatized. The Judges for the most part exercised authority in single tribes. The heathen were not expelled from the borders assigned to Israel; Israel must submit to ever-renewed trials; and when it failed to stand, then came the judgment. But in this discipline, compassion constantly manifested itself anew. The word of God continued to manifest its power. It quietly reared up heroes and champions. The contents of these verses form the substance of the whole Book. Israel must contend, — 1, with sin, and 2, with enemies; it experiences, — 1, the discipline of judgment, and 2, the discipline of compassion; but in contest and in discipline that which approves itself is, — 1, the victory of repentance, and 2, the obedience of faith.

Thus the contents of the Book of Judges afford a look into the history of Christian nations. They have found by experience what even in a modern novel the author almost involuntarily puts into the mouth of one of his characters (B. Abeken, Greifensee, i. 43): "Truly, when once the granite rock on which the church is reared has crumbled away, all other foundations crumble after it, and nothing remains but a nation of cowards and voluptuaries." A glance into the spiritual life shows the same process of chastisement and compassion. The Apostle says (2 Cor. xii. 7): "And lest I should be exalted above measure through the abundance of the revelations, there was given to me a thorn in the flesh, the messenger of Satan, to buffet me, lest I should be exalted above measure. For this thing I besought the Lord thrice, that it might depart from me. And he said unto me, My grace is sufficient for thee: for my strength is made perfect in weakness." A recent philosopher (Fischer, Gesch. der neueren Philos., i. 11) defines philosophy to be, not so much universal science, as self-knowledge. If this be correct, repentance is the true philosophy; for in repentance man learns to know himself in all the various conditions of apostasy and ruin, reflection and return, pride and penitence, heart-quickenings and longing after divine compassion.

STARKE: Fathers, by a bad example, make their children worse than themselves; for from old sins, new ones are continually growing, THE SAME: Although God knows and might immediately punish all that is hidden in men, his wisdom employs temptation and other means to bring it to the light, that his justice may be manifest to his creatures. THE SAME: Through tribulation and the cross to the exercise of faith and obedience, prayer and hope. And all this tends to our good; for God tempts no one to evil. THE SAME: Though God permit, He does not approve, the unrighteous oppressor of the unrighteous, but punishes his unrighteousness when his help is invoked. LISCO: God's judgment on Israel is the non-destruction of the heathen. GERLACH: From the fact that the whole history does at the same time, through scattered hints, point to the flourishing period of Israel under the kings, we learn that these constantly-recurring events do not constitute a fruitless circle, ever returning whence it started, but that through them all, God's providence conducted his people, by a road wonderfully involved, to a glorious goal.

Enumeration of the heathen nations left to prove Israel.

CHAPTER III. 1-4.

- 1 Now these are the nations which the Lord [Jehovah] left [at rest], to prove Israel by them, (even as many of Israel as had not known [by experience] all the wars of Canaan;
- 2 Only that the generations of the children [sons] of Israel might know to teach them
- 3 war, at the least such as before knew nothing thereof; )<sup>1</sup> Namely, five lords [principalities] of the Philistines, and all the Canaanites, and the Sidonians, and the Hivites that dwelt [dwell] in mount Lebanon, from mount Baal-hermon unto the entering in of
- 4 [it. unto the coming, i. e. the road to] Hamath. And they were to prove Israel by them, to know whether they would hearken unto the commandments of the Lord [Jehovah], which he commanded their fathers by the hand of Moses.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 2. — Dr. Cassel renders this verse freely: "Only that to give experience to the generations of the sons of Israel, they might teach them war which they did not formerly learn to know." He supplies a second לְמַעַן before לְלִמְדָם (see the exposition below), and in a note (which we transfer from the foot of the page), remarks: "Ver. 2 contains two subordinate clauses dependent on the subject of the principal sentence in ver. 1, which is 'Jehovah.' In the first of these clauses (each of which is introduced by לְמַעַן), the subject is 'Israel' (fully, הָאֱלֹהִים בְּיָרִיִּשׁ); in the second, 'the nations.' The first expresses the result of the second; that which Israel experiences is, that the nations teach it war." Keil (who follows Bertheau) explains as follows: "only (כִּי, with no other view than) to know the subsequent generations (דִּירוֹת, the generations after Joshua and his contemporaries) of the sons of Israel, that He (Jehovah) might teach them war, only those who had not learned to know them (the wars of Canaan)." But, 1, if דִּירוֹת were in the accus., the author could hardly have failed to remove all ambiguity by prefixing אֵלֶיךָ to it. 2. An infin. of design with לְ, following one with לְמַעַן, without ו to indicate coördination, can only be subordinate to the preceding. Thus in the English sentence: "We eat in order to live to work," "to work," would be at once interpreted as subordinate to "to live." A second לְמַעַן might indicate coördination even without the assistance of ו, cf. in English: "We eat in order to live, in order to work;" where we feel at once that "to live" and "to work" are coördinate so far as their relation to the principal verb is concerned. Hence, Dr. Cassel inserts a second לְמַעַן; but this is an expedient too much like cutting the Gordian knot to be satisfactory. Bachmann, who in the main agrees with our author, avoids this by treating לְלִמְדָם as a gerundive adverbial phrase. As for דִּיעַת it is not indeed impossible that, remembering what he said in ch. ii. 10 (לֹא יָדָעוּ, etc.), and just now substantially repeated in ver. 1 b, the writer of Judges uses it here absolutely, to indicate briefly the opposite of the condition there described, in which case Dr. Cassel's rendering would be sufficiently justified. But since דִּירוֹת בְּיָרִיִּשׁ (ver. 2 a) clearly represents the אֵת קְלִיפָתָם of ver. 1 b, it seems obvious that the דִּיעַת of ver. 2 in like manner resumes the עֲלִימִלְחָמוֹת בְּנָעֻן of ver. 1. We may suppose, therefore, that the pronoun "them" is here, as frequently, omitted after דִּיעַת, and translate, freely, thus: "And these are the nations which Jehovah left to prove Israel by them — all that Israel which did not know all the wars of Canaan, in order that the after generations of Israel (they also) might know (understand and appreciate) them (i. e. those wars), in that he (i. e. Jehovah, or they, the nations) taught them war, (not war in general, however, but) only the wars which (or, such wars as) they did not formerly know." The first כִּי, as Bachmann remarks, limits the design of Jehovah, the second the thing to be taught. As to the last clause of ver. 2, if the accents be disregarded, the only difficulty in the way of the rendering here given is the plural suffix ם; but this probably arises from the fact that the writer's mind at once recurs to the "wars of Canaan." The לְקִיָּים, of old, is used from the point of time occupied by the "after generations," as was natural to a writer who lived so late as the period of kings, and not from that in which the הִקְיָה of ver. 1, and its design, took place. The masculine ם to represent a fem. plur. is not very unfrequent, cf. 2 Sam. xx. 8; 2 Kgs. xviii. 18. Dr. Bachmann connects the last clause with דִּיעַת, respects the accents (which join לְקִיָּים with אֲשֶׁר, not with יָדָעוּ לֹא), and renders: "that Israel might learn to know . . . war, namely, only those (wars) which were formerly, they did not know them = only the former wars which they did not know." The sense is not materially affected by this change. — Tr.]

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

Ver. 1. All who had not experienced the wars of Canaan. These are they of whom it was said, ch. ii. 10, that they "knew not the works of the Lord." This younger generation, after the death of Joshua and the elders, enjoyed the fruits of conquest, but did not estimate aright the greatness of the dangers endured by the fathers, and therefore did not sufficiently value the help of God. The horrors of war, to be known, must be experienced. As if the conquest of Canaan had been of easy achievement! It was no light thing to triumph over the warlike nations. Was not the tribe of Judah, although victorious, obliged nevertheless to abandon the valley to the iron chariots? But of that the rising generation no longer wished to know anything. They did not know what "a war with Canaan signified."

Ver. 2. Only that to give experience to the generations of the sons of Israel they might teach them war, with which they did not before become acquainted. The construction of the sentence is difficult, and consequently has been frequently misunderstood (among others, by Bertheau). The book which the narrator is about to write, is a Book of Wars; and it is therefore incumbent upon him to state the moral causes in which these originated. God proves Israel for its own good. With this in view, "He left the nations in peace, to prove Israel by them." How prove Israel? By depriving it of rest through them. They compel Israel to engage in conflict. In defeat the people learn to know the violence of Canaanitish oppression, and, when God sends them heroes, the preciousness of the boon of restored freedom. Only for this; the emphasis of the verse falls on only (לְיָחִיד), which is introduced twice. Between אֶרֶץ and לְיָחִיד a לְמַעַן<sup>1</sup> is to be supplied. The Hebrew usus loquendi places both clauses (לְמַעַן לְיָחִיד and אֶרֶץ לְיָחִיד), each beginning with לְיָחִיד, alongside of each other without any connective, whereby one sets forth the ground of the other. God leaves the nations in peace, "in order that they might teach the Israelites what war with Canaan signified, — in order that those generations might know it who had not yet experienced it." It is not for technical instruction in military science that He leaves the heathen nations in the land, but that Israel may know what it is to wage war, that without God it can do nothing against Canaan, and that, having in the deeds of contemporary heroes a present counterpart of the experience of their fathers, who beheld the mighty works which God wrought for Israel through Moses and Joshua, it may learn humility and submission to the law. This reason why God did not cause the Canaanites to be driven out, does not, however, contradict that given in ch. ii. 22. Israel can apostatize from God, only when it has forgotten Him. The consequence is servitude. In this distress, God sends them Judges. These triumph, in glorious wars, over victorious Canaan. Grateful Israel, being now able to conceive, in their living reality, the wonders by which God formerly raised it to the dignity of nationality, has learned to know the hand of its God. Cf. ver. 4.

Ver. 3. Five principalities of the Philistines. Josh. xiii. 2, seq., enumerates the nations which were to remain, with still more distinctness. There, however, the reason, given in our passage, why God let them remain, is not stated. The principalities of the Philistines must be treated of elsewhere. The Canaanites and the Zidonians are the inhabitants of the Phœnician coast. The importance of Zidon has already been pointed out in ch. i. 31. The districts not under Zidonian supremacy, are referred to by the general term "Canaanite." The Hivite, here mentioned as an inhabitant of Mount Lebanon, does not occur under that name in Josh. xiii. 5. He is there spoken of under the terms, "land of the Gibletes (Byblus, etc.) and all Lebanon;" here, a more general designation is employed. The name אֶרֶץ indicates and explains this in a manner highly interesting. The LXX. render אֶרֶץ by Ebaïos, as for אֶרֶץ, the mother of all the living, they give Eba. The word אֶרֶץ, to live, whence אֶרֶץ, includes the idea of "roundness, circularity of form." So the óvov, ovum, egg, is round, and at the same time the source of life. Consequently, אֶרֶץ and אֶרֶץ came to signify battle-array or encampment (cf. 2 Sam. xxiii. 11) and village (Num. xxxii. 41), from the circular form in which camps and villages were disposed. The people called Hivite is the people that resides in round villages. Down to the present day — marvelous tenacity of national custom! — the villages in Syria are so built that the conically-shaped houses form a circular street, inclosing an open space in the centre for the herds and flocks.

Modern travellers have found this style of building still in use from the Orontes to the Euphrates (Ritter, xvii. 1698). It distinguished the Hivite from the other nations. And it is, in fact, found only beyond the boundary here indicated; on northern Lebanon, above Mount Hermon. This therefore also confirms the remarks made above (at ch. i. 33), on the parallel passage, Josh. xiii. 5, where we find the definition "from Baal-gad under Mount Hermon," whereas here we read of a "mount Baal Hermon." Baal Hermon, according to its signification, corresponds exactly with the present name Jebel esh-Sheikh, since on the one hand Sheikh may stand for Baal, while, on the other, Hermon derived its name from its peculiar form. אֶרֶץ is a dialectic equivalent of the Hebrew אֶרֶץ. אֶרֶץ is the height, the highlands:

אֶרֶץ the prominent point, the commanding fortress. Hermon, as the southern foot of Anti-Libanus, is its loftiest peak. It towers grandly, like a giant (cf. Ritter, xvii. 151, 211), above all its surroundings, — like a silver-roofed fortress of God. This is not the only instance in which Hermon is apparently the name of a mountain. It is probable indeed that to the Greeks the Hermæan Promontory (Ἐρμῆα ἄκρα, Polyb. I. xxxvi. 11; cf. Munter, Geogr., x. ii. 512) suggested only some reference to Hermes. But the greater difficulty of seeing why Hermes should give names to mountain peaks, the more readily do we recognize a אֶרֶץ, not only in this but also in the promontory of Lemnos, the Hermæan Rock (Ἐρμῆα ἄκρα) mentioned by Greek poets (Æschyl. Agam., 283). It accords with this that Ptolemy specifies a Hermæan Promontory in Crete also. It is evident how appropriately Hermon, in its signification of Armon, "a fortress-like, towering eminence," is used to denote a promontory. The Greek ἄκρα also has the twofold signification of fortress and promontory; and Mount Hermon itself may to a certain extent be considered to be both one and the other.

It is evident that when in Josh. xiii. 5 the boundary of the hostile nations is defined as running from "Baal-gad under Mount Hermon," and here as extending "from Baal Hermon" onward, the same sacred locality is meant in both passages, and that Baal Hermon is identified with Baal-gad. This is further confirmed by the following: The Talmud (Chulin, 40 a) speaks of the sinful worship which is rendered דְּבַר לֵבָיָהּ, to the God of the mountain, i. e. as Raschi explains, the angel like unto Michael, who is placed over the mountains of the world. Moses ha-Cohen advances an equally ancient conception, current also among the Arabians, when he states (ap. Ibn Ezra, on Isa. lxx. 11), that Baal-gad is the star Zedek, i. e. Zeus. For Zeus is in fact the Hellenic deity of all mountain-peaks,<sup>2</sup> the Great Baal Hermon. Hence it was customary among the Hellenes also to prepare sacrificial tables in the service of Zeus; and with Isa. lxx. 11 we may profitably compare Paus. ix. 40, where we learn that in Cheronea, where the sceptre of Zeus was venerated as a palladium, "a table with meat and pastry was daily" prepared. At the birth of a son to her maid, Leah says (Gen.

(Mythologie, I. 170), were erected to other gods only excep- tionally. As for the temple of Hermes on Mount Cithæra (Paus. viii. 17, 1), it could perhaps be made probable that here also the name of the mountain suggested the worship of Hermes.

<sup>1</sup> Cf. Josh. iv. 24. [Compare the note under "Textual and Grammatical." — Tr.]

<sup>2</sup> Cf. Preller, Gr. Mythol., I. 77. He is such as ἀκραιός, ἀκραιος, etc. That ἀκραιότης also has no other meaning. Preller shows elsewhere. Mountain temples, says Welcker

xxx. 11):  $\text{גָּד גָּד}$ ; which the Chaldee translators already render by  $\text{גָּד גָּד}$  (Jerus. Targ.) and  $\text{גָּד גָּד}$  (Jonath.).  $\text{גָּד גָּד}$  (cf. 2 Kgs. xxiii.

5), means, star;  $\text{גָּד גָּד}$  is the good star that appears, — fortune, as the Septuaginta render  $\text{τύχη}$ . Two planets, Jupiter and Venus, were  $\text{ἀγαθούροι}$  (Plutarch, De Is. et Os., cap. xlviii.), bearers of what is good, — fortune-bringers. Hence, Gad, as "Fortune," could be connected both with Astarte (cf. Movers, Phæn., i. 636), and with Baal (Jupiter).

$\text{גָּד}$  is manifestly the same as the Persian  $\text{גָּד}$  (cf.  $\text{גָּד}$  and  $\text{גָּד}$ ,  $\text{גָּד}$  and  $\text{גָּד}$ , etc.), Ghoda, which signifies god and lord, quite in the sense of  $\text{גָּד}$  (cf. Vullers, Lex. Pers. Lat., i. 660). If there be any connection between this term and the Zendic Khadhata, it is only that the latter was used to designate the constellations. In heathen views of life, fortune and good coincide. To enjoy the good things of life is to be fortunate.  $\text{Ἀγαθὴ τύχη}$  is the Hellenic for happiness. The Syriac and Chaldee versions almost uniformly render the terms  $\text{גָּד גָּד}$  and  $\text{μακάριος}$ , blessed, which occur in the Old and New Testaments, by  $\text{גָּד גָּד}$ , good (cf. my work Irene, Erf. 1855, p. 9). In  $\text{גָּד}$  the ideas God and Fortune coexist as yet unresolved; subsequently, especially in the Christian age, they were separated in the Germanic dialects as God and Good. For there is no doubt that in Gad (God), the good (fortunate) god and constellation, we find the oldest form, and for that reason a serviceable explanation, of the name God, which, like Elohim, disengaging itself from heathen conceptions, became the sacred name of the Absolute Spirit. At the same time it affords us the philological advantage of perceiving, what has often been contested (cf. Dieffenbach, Goth. Lex. ii. 416; Grimm, Myth. pp. 12, 1199, etc.), that God and Good actually belong together. Baal-gad was the God of Fortune, which was held to be the highest good.<sup>1</sup> — The meaning of  $\text{גָּד גָּד}$  has been indicated above (p. 46).

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

[Compare the Homiletical Hints of the preceding section. — KEIL: In the wars of Canaan under Joshua, Israel had learned and experienced that the power which subdued its enemies consisted not in the multitude and valor of its warriors but in the might of its God, the putting forth of which however depended upon Israel's continued faithfulness towards its Possessor. . . . Now, in order to impress them with this truth, on which the existence and prosperity of Israel, and the realization of the purpose for which they had been divinely called, depended; in other words, in order to show them by the practical lessons of experience that the People of Jehovah can fight and conquer only in the strength of their God, the Lord had

<sup>1</sup> Movers (Phæn. ii. 2, 515) thinks that he can explain the name of the Numidian seaport Cirta from  $\text{גָּד גָּד}$ , which is doubtful. On the other hand, when the Etymolog. Magnum, under Tábeqa, expresses the opinion that Gades in Spain was so named because "γὰρ νηπ' αὐτοῖς τὸ suffered the Canaanites to be left in the land. Necessity teaches prayer. The distress into which Israel fell by means of the remaining Canaanites, was a divine discipline, by which the Lord would bring the faithless back to Himself, admonish them to follow his commands, and prepare them for the fulfillment of his covenant-engagements. Hence, the learning of war, i. e. the learning how the People of the Lord should fight against the enemies of God and his kingdom, was a means ordained by God of tempting or trying Israel, whether they would hearken to the commands of their God and walk in the ways of the Lord. When Israel learned so to war, it learned also to keep the divine commands. Both were necessary to the People of God. For as the realization by the people of the blessings promised in the covenant depended on their giving heed to the voice of the Lord, so also the conflict appointed for them was necessary, as well for their personal purification, as for the continued existence and growth of the kingdom of God on earth. — BERTHEAU: The historian cannot sufficiently insist on the fact that the remaining of some of the former inhabitants of the land, after the wars of Joshua, is not a punishment but only a trial; a trial designed to afford occasion of showing to the Israelites who lived after Joshua benefits similar to those bestowed on his contemporaries. And it is his firm conviction that these benefits, consisting chiefly of efficient aid and wonderful deliverances in wars against the remaining inhabitants, would assuredly have accrued to the people, if they had followed the commands of Jehovah, especially that on which such stress is laid in the Pentateuch, to make no league with the heathen, but to make war on them as long as a man of them remains.

HENRY: It was the will of God that Israel should be inured to war. — 1. Because their country was exceeding rich and fruitful, and abounded with dainties of all sorts, which if they were not sometimes made to know hardship, would be in danger of sinking them into the utmost degree of luxury and effeminacy, — a state as destructive to everything good as it is to everything great, and therefore to be carefully watched against by all God's Israel. 2. Because their country lay very much in the midst of enemies, by whom they must expect to be insulted; for God's heritage was as a speckled bird; the birds round about were against her. . . . Israel was a figure of the church militant, that must fight its way to a triumphant state. The soldiers of Christ must endure hardness. Corruption is therefore left remaining in the hearts even of good Christians, that they may learn war, keep on the whole armor of God, and stand continually on their guard.

WORDSWORTH: "To teach them war." So unbelief awakens faith, and teaches it war; it excites it to contend earnestly for the truth. The dissemination of false doctrines has led to clearer assertions of the truth. Heresies have produced the creeds. "There must be heresies," says the Apostle, "that they who are approved among you may be made manifest" (1 Cor. xi. 19). — TR.]

ἐκ μακρῶν ἐπεδοκίμασαν," there is evidently no reference to  $\text{גָּד גָּד}$ , but to Gad in the sense of Fortune. For the stress is laid not on the small beginnings, but on the good for tune, which from a small city made it great. This on Movers, ii. 2, 621, not. 89 a.

PART SECOND.

THE History of Israel under the Judges: a history of sin, ever repeating itself, and of Divine Grace, constantly devising new means of deliverance. Meanwhile, however, the imperfections of the judicial institute display themselves, and prepare the way for the Appointment of a King.

FIRST SECTION.

THE SERVITUDE TO CHUSHAN-RISHATHAIM, KING OF MESOPOTAMIA. OTHNIEL, THE JUDGE OF BLAMELESS AND HAPPY LIFE.

Israel is given up into the power of Chushan-rishathaim on account of its sins: Othniel is raised up as a Deliverer in answer to their penitence.

CHAPTER III. 5-11.

5 And the children [sons] of Israel dwelt among [in the midst of] the Canaanites, 6 Hittites, and Amorites, and Perizzites, and Hivites, and Jebusites: And they took their daughters to be their wives, and gave their daughters to their sons, and served 7 their gods. And the children [sons] of Israel did evil<sup>1</sup> in the sight of the Lord [Jehovah], and forgot the Lord [Jehovah] their God, and served Baalim, and the 8 groves [Asheroth]. Therefore [And] the anger of the Lord [Jehovah] was hot [kindled] against Israel, and he sold them [gave them up] into the hand of Chushanrishathaim, king of Mesopotamia [Aram-naharaim]: and the children [sons] of Israel 9 served Chushan-rishathaim eight years. And when [omit: when] the children [sons] of Israel cried unto the Lord [Jehovah], [and] the Lord [Jehovah] raised up a deliverer to the children [sons] of Israel, who [and] delivered<sup>2</sup> them, even 10 Othniel the son of Kenaz, Caleb's younger brother. And the Spirit of the Lord [Jehovah] came [was]<sup>3</sup> upon him, and he judged Israel, and went out to war: and the Lord [Jehovah] delivered Chushan-rishathaim king of Mesopotamia [Aram] into his hand; and his hand prevailed [became strong]<sup>4</sup> against Chushan-risha-11 thaim. And the land had rest forty years: and Othniel the son of Kenaz died.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 7. — Literally, "the evil," as at verse 12 and frequently. On the use of the article compare the "Grammatical" note on ch. ii. 11. Wordsworth's note on the present verse is: "They did that evil which God had forbidden as evil." — Tr.]

2 Ver. 9. — יִשְׁעָם (יִשְׁעָם) (from יָשַׁע), here, without any preposition, with אֶת עֲחָדָם; on the other hand, at 2 Kgs. xiv. 27, עֲחָדָם is inserted. [De Wette, in his German Version, also takes Jehovah as subject of יִשְׁעָם, which seems to be favored by the position of אֶת עֲחָדָם, which according to the common view would be separated from its governing verb by another verb with a different and unexpressed subject. But Dr. Cassel is certainly wrong when he supplies "through" instead of the "even" of our E. V., and so makes "Othniel" the medium by whom Jehovah delivered. That would be expressed either by עֲחָדָם or by עַל, cf. Hos. i. 7; 1 Sam. xiv. 6; xvii. 47. The words אֶת עֲחָדָם are in apposition with מִיָּשָׁע. — Tr.]

[3 Ver. 10. — So do Dr. Cassel and many others render יָרָדָה; but the rendering "came" is very suitable, if with Dr. Bachmann, we assume יָרָדָה, etc., to be explanatory of יָרָדָה, etc., in ver. 9. — Tr.]

4 Ver. 11. — יָרָדָה, from יָרָדָה. [On the vowel in the last syllable, see Ges. Gram. 67, Rem. 2. — Tr.]

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

Ver. 5. And the sons of Israel dwelt. The introduction is ended, and the author now proceeds to the events themselves. Fastening the thread of his narrative to the relations which he has just unfolded, he goes on to say: Israel (therefore) dwelt among the Canaanite, Hittite, Amorite, Perizzite, Hivite, Jebusite. The last of these tribes he had not in any way named before; nor, apparently, is it accurate to say that Israel dwelt among the Jebusites. But the passage is a deeply significant citation. Deut. xx. 17 contains the following: "Thou shalt utterly destroy the Hittites, and the Amorites, the Canaanites, and the Perizzites, the Hivites, and the Jebusites, as Jehovah thy God hath commanded thee; that they teach you not to do after all their abominations." But, says the narrator, the contrary took place; Israel dwells among them, and is consequently, as Moses foretold, initiated into the sins of its neighbors. Hence, just as in that passage, so here also, only six nations are named. At Deut. vii. 1 the Gergashites are added. The most complete catalogue of the nations of Canaan is given in Gen. x. 15 ff. Another one, essentially different, is found Gen. xv. 19-21. Here, the writer does not intend to give a catalogue; he names the nations only by way of reproducing the words of Moses, and of manifesting their truthfulness.

Vers. 6, 7. And they took their daughters.

Precisely in this consisted the "covenant" (ברית) which they were not to make with them. The reference here is especially to Deut. vii. 2 ff.: "Thou shalt make no covenant with them. And thou shalt not make marriages with them; thy daughter thou shalt not give unto his son, nor his daughter shalt thou take unto thy son. For it would turn away thy child from me, and they will serve false gods." All this has here come to pass. We read the consequence of intermarriage in the words: "and they served their gods." The same passage (Deut. vii. 5) proceeds: "Ye shall destroy their altars, and break down their images, and cut down their Asheroth." But now Israel served "Baalim and Asheroth." It bent the knee before the altars of Baal and the idols of Astarte. Asherah (see below, on ch. vi. 25) is the idol through which Astarte was worshipped. The altar was especially consecrated to Baal, the pillar or tree-idol to her. Hence the Baalim and Asheroth of this passage answer perfectly to the Baal and Asheroth of ch. ii. 13. Instead of destroying, Israel served them. עָבַד is to render bodily and personal service. It is not a matter of thought or opinion merely. He who serves, serves with his body, — he kneels, offers, prays. The ancient translators are therefore right in generally rendering it by λειτουργεῖν. Among the Hellenes, liturgy (λειτουργία) meant service which, as Böckh shows, differed from all other obligations precisely in this, that it was to be rendered personally. Hence, also, liturgy, in its ecclesiastical sense, corresponded perfectly with abodah (עֲבֹדָה), and was rightly used to denote the acts of divine service. Now, when in this way Israel performed liturgy before idol images, that took place which Deut. vii. 4 foretold: "the anger of the Lord was kindled." Whenever Israel, the people called to be free, falls into servitude, it is in consequence of the anger of God. It is free only while it holds fast to its God. When it apostatizes from the God of freedom, He gives it up to tyrants, as one gives up a slave (עֶבֶד).

Ver. 8. He gave them up into the hand of Chushan-rishathaim. The explanation of Rishathaim, adopted by Bertheau, which derives it from רָשָׁע, and gives it the sense of "double injustice" or "outrage," is not to be thought of. To say nothing of its peculiar form, there is no reason whatever why this title should be given to Chushan and not to the other tyrants over Israel. Had it been intended to describe him as peculiarly wicked, he would have been called רָשָׁע, as in the analogous case of Haman (Esth. vii. 6). The Midrash alone attempts an explanation, and makes Rishathaim to mean Laban. The "double sin" is, that Aram (of which, in the spirit of the Midrash, Laban is the representative) formerly injured Jacob, and now injures his descendants (cf. Jalkut, Judges, n. 41). The renderings of the Targum and Peshito sprang from this interpretation. Paul of Tella, on the other hand, follows the Septuagint, which has χουσαρσθαίμ; he, and others of later date, write Χουσαν Ρεσαθθαίμ (ed. Rödman, p. 74). (Synceus, ed. Bonn. i. 285, has χουσαρσθαίμ.) Rishathaim is manifestly a proper name, and forms the complement of Chushan, which does not conceal its national derivation. At all events, at Hab. iii. 7,* where it stands parallel with Midian, it is used to designate nationality.<sup>4</sup> Now, ancient Persian tradition, as found in the Schahnameh of Ferdousi, contains reminiscences of warlike expeditions from the centre of Iran against the West.

One of the three sons of Feridoun, Selm (שלם), is lord of the territories west of the Euphrates. The nations of those countries are hostile to Iran. Mention is also made of assistance from Gangi Jehocht (as Jerusalem is several times designated) in a war against Iran (cf. Schack, Heldens. des Ferdusi, p. 160). The Iranian heroes, on the other hand,

Sam, Zal (זל), and Rustem, who carry on the wars of the kings, east and west, are from Sedjestan. Sedjestan, whose inhabitants under the Sassanides also formed the nucleus of the army (cf. Lassen, Indische Alterth. ii. 363), derives its name from the Sacæ (Sacastene). The name Sacæ, however, is itself only a general ethnographic term, answering to the term Scythians, and comprehended all those powerful nations, addicted to horsemanship and the chase, who made themselves famous as warriors and conquerors in the regions east and west of the Tigris. All Scythians, says Herodotus, are called Sacæ by the Persians. The term Cossæans was evidently of similar comprehensiveness. As at this day Segestan (or Seistan) is still named after the Sacæ, so Khuzistan after the Cossæans (cf. Mannert, v. 2, 495). Moses Chorenensis derives the Parthians from the land of Chushan (ed. Florival, i. 308-311). In the Nakshi Rustam inscription (ver. 30) we read of Khushiya, which certainly appears more suggestive of Cossæi, as Lassen interprets, than of Gaudæ, as passage, is already found in the older Jewish expositors. From any objective, scientific point of view, this view can scarcely be concurred in.

* [That is to say, the term expresses ethnological, not local relations. — Ta.]

1 [The "Crime-committing (frevelnde) Chushan." See Bertheau in loc. — Ta.]

2 Josephus has χουσαρσθος. On other readings see Haverkamp, ad Josh., i. 286, not. x.

3 The opinion of Bertheau that the prophet alludes to our

Benfey explains (Die Pers. Keilinschr., p. 60). That they are quite like the Parthians, Scythians, Sacæ, in the use of the bow and the practice of pillage and the chase, is sufficiently shown by the passage of Strabo (ed. Paris, p. 449, lib. xi. 13, 6). Like Nimrod (Gen. x. 8), all these nations, and also the princes of the Sacæ, Sam, Zal, and Rustem, are represented as heroes and hunters. Nimrod descends from Cush, and rules at the rivers. So here also Cush is a general term for a widely-diffused family of nations. It does not indicate their dwelling-place, but their mode of life and general characteristics.<sup>1</sup> Even the reference in the name of this Chushan to darkness of complexion is not to be overlooked. A centaur (horseman) is with Hesiod (Scut. Herc. 185) an asbolos. "Asbolos," says Eupolemus (in Euseb., Præp. Ev. ix. 17; cf. Niebuhr, Assur und Babel, p. 262, note 2), is translated χρύσις by the Hellenes. The second Chaldee king is called Chomasbelos by Berossus (Fragmenta, ed. Müller, Paris, p. 503; Niebuhr, p. 490; Syncellus, i. 147, ed. Bonn); while in one passage (Lam. iv. 8) the LXX. translate shechor, "black," by σφόδρα. Syncellus is therefore improperly censured by Niebuhr for comparing Evechios, and not the son of Chomasbelos, with Nimrod. He could compare none but the first king with him who was likewise held to be the first. Accordingly, it cannot appear surprising that kings and heroes beyond the Euphrates are named כושן, "Chushan."<sup>2</sup> One of the most famous of the primitive kings of Iran was named כיש, Kai Kaous. Persian tradition tells of wars and conquests which he carried on in Mesi, Sham, and Rum, i. e. Egypt, Syria, and Asia Minor (cf. Herbelot, Or. Bibl. ii. 59). They also relate misfortunes endured by him. In his wars in the West,<sup>3</sup> he was defeated and taken prisoner. His hero and deliverer was always Rustem (רשתם or רשתם, also רשתם, רשתהם, cf. Vullers, Lex. Pers. ii. 32). Now, since it is obviously proper to compare these names with כושן רשתהם, "Chushan-rishathaim" (for the ש as well as the pointing of the Masora dates from the Rabbinic Midrash), there is nothing to oppose the idea that the celebrated Rustem of the East, the hero of Kaous, whom Moses Chorenensis calls the Saces, is actually mentioned here. It would enhance the interest of the narrative to find the hero of the Iranian world brought upon the scene of our history. Profane history would here, as so frequently elsewhere, receive valuable illustration from Scripture. An historical period would be approximately gained for Kai Kaous. On the other hand, such conflicts were sufficiently memorable for Israel to serve as testimonies first of God's anger, and then of salvation wrought out by Him.

And they served Chushan-rishathaim, כושן רשתהם. God is served with sacrifices; human lords with tribute (cf. ver. 15). Hence the expression כושן

כושן, when a people became tributary. The "eight years" are considered in the introductory section on the Chronology of the Book.

Ver. 9. And the sons of Israel cried unto Jehovah. וַיִּצְעֲקוּ is the anxious cry of distress. So cried they in Egypt by reason of their heavy service (Ex. ii. 23). They cry to God, as children to their father. In his compassion, He hears them. However, Jeremiah (xi. 11) warns the people against that time "when they shall cry (וַיִּצְעֲקוּ) unto God, but he will not hearken unto them."

And He delivered them through Othniel the son of Kenaz. The Septuagint gives his name as Γοθονιήλ, while Josephus has Θοθονιήλος. Jerome (De Nominibus, ed. Migne, p. 809) has Athaniel, which he translates "my time of God" (tempus meum Dei). This is also the translation of Leusden in his Onomasticon, who however unnecessarily distinguishes between a Gothoniel (1 Chron. xxvii. 15) and Othniel. Gesenius derives the name from the Arabic, and says it means "lion of God." How carefully Josephus follows ancient exegesis, appears from his inserting the story of Othniel only after the abominations of Gibeah (ch. xix.) and those of the tribe of Dan (ch. xviii.); for these occurrences were regarded as belonging to the time of servitude under Chushan (Talkut, Judges, n. 41). But his anxiety to avoid every appearance of improbability does not allow him to call Othniel the brother of Caleb. He speaks of him as "τῆς Ἰούδα φυλῆς τις, one of the tribe of Judah" (Ant. v. 3, 3); for he fears lest the Greek reader should take offense at finding Othniel still young and vigorous enough to achieve victory in the field, and render forty years' service as Judge. But the narrator adds emphatically, "the younger brother of Caleb,"—in order to leave no doubt that the conqueror of Kirjath-sepher and the victor over Aram were one and the same person. Nor is there any foundation for the scrupulosity of Josephus. In Israel the men capable of bearing arms were enrolled upon the completion of their twentieth year (Num. xxvi. 2, seq.). Now, if Othniel was twenty-five years of age when he conquered Kirjath-sepher, and if after that a period of twenty years elapsed, during which a new generation grew up, he would be fifty-three years of age when as hero and conqueror he assumed the judicial office,—a supposition altogether natural and probable. Caleb in his eighty-fifth year still considered himself fully able to take the field. Besides, it is consonant with the spirit which animates the history here narrated, that it is Othniel who appears as the first Shophet. Not merely because of the heroism which he displayed before Kirjath-sepher; but a new dignity like this of Judge is easily attracted to one who is already in possession of a certain authority, which was evidently the case with Othniel. He was one of those who, in part at least, had shared the wars with Canaan. He was the brother and son-in-law of the celebrated Caleb, and hence a head of the tribe of Judah, to which in this matter authority which Othniel already possessed. He who is exempt from this necessity, escapes many a temptation.

<sup>1</sup> We cannot enter here on a full illustration of the genealogy of Cush, as given Gen. x. For some excellent remarks see Knobel Die ethnogr. Tafel, p. 251. Where he read Cush, in Wagners's edition of Petachia, Carmoly's edition, probably less correctly, has Acco. Where Benjamin of Tudela, ed. Asher, p. 83, has כושן, other manuscripts have כושן. Cush (Reck. xxxviii. 5) may also pass for the African.

<sup>2</sup> One of the worst enemies of Kai Kaous was Deo Sefid, i. e. the White Fox. At the birth of Rustem's father, Zal, it was considered a misfortune that his head was white. He was therefore exposed (cf. Schack, Firdusi, p. 175).

<sup>3</sup> Some call him ruler of Arabia, others of Syria. Cf. Malcolm, Hist. of Persia, i. 27.

Thus Othniel is a type of sons descended from good families, and of inherited position. From him such may learn their duty to use life and strength for their country. His life shows that to lead and judge is easier for them than for others. There are many "Caleb-relatives" who squander the glory of their name; but yet there have never been wanting Christians who, historically among the first men of their country, have borne aloft the banner of truth. Joachim von Alvensleben composed his Confession of the Christian Faith (printed at Stendal, 1854), that he might acquit himself of his "paternal office" to his family, warn them faithfully, and preserve them from apostasy; so that Martin Chemnitz prays the "good and kind God to preserve hoc sacrum depositum in its purity, everywhere in his church, and especially in nobili hac familia" (Brunswick, March 1, 1566). The spirit of Othniel clearly manifested itself in Zinzendorf; and he rendered useful service not only in spite of his distinguished name, but especially in his own day, because he bore it. His life, while it testifies that in the spirit of the gospel everything can be turned into a special blessing, shows also that no gift of Providence is to be suppressed, — least of all, one's family and origin (cf. Otto Strauss: Zinzendorf, Leben und Auswahl seiner Schriften, etc., iv. 147, etc.). This spirit of Othniel was in the Minister Von Pfeil, in his life and work, confessing and praying. In his own words: —

"Knight of heaven Jesus made me,
Touched me with the Spirit's sword,
When the Spirit's voice declared me
Free forever to the Lord."

STARKE: What great depravity of the human heart, that men so easily forget the true God whom they have known, and voluntarily accept and honor strange gods, whom neither they nor their fathers knew. THE SAME: God is at no loss for means; He prescribes bounds to the aggressions of the enemy. But in the spiritual warfare also men must be bold. We do not conquer by sitting still. LISCO: The spirit of the Lord is the originator of everything good and of all great achievements.

[HENRY: Affliction makes those cry to God with importunity, who before would scarcely speak to him. THE SAME: Othniel first judged Israel, reproved them, called them to an account for their sins, and reformed them, and then went out to war; that was the right method. Let sin at home be conquered, that worst of enemies, and then enemies abroad will be more easily dealt with. BISHOP HALL: Othniel's life and Israel's innocence and peace ended together. How powerful the presence of one good man is in a church or state, is best found in his death. — TR.]

SECOND SECTION.

THE SERVITUDE TO EGLON, KING OF MOAB. EHUD, THE JUDGE WITH THE DOUBLE-EDGED DAGGER. SHAMGAR, THE DELIVERER WITH THE OX-GOAD.

Eglon, King of Moab, reduces Israel to servitude, and seizes on the City of Palms: they are delivered by Ehud, who destroys the oppressor.

CHAPTER III. 12-30.

- 12 And the children [sons] of Israel did evil again [continued to do evil] in the sight of the Lord [Jehovah]: and the Lord [Jehovah] strengthened [encouraged:] Eglon the king of Moab against Israel, because they had done [did] evil in the 13 sight of the Lord [Jehovah]. And he gathered unto him [having allied himself with] the children [sons] of Ammon and Amalek, and went and smote Israel, and [they]
14 possessed [took possession of] the city of palm-trees. So [And] the children [sons]
15 of Israel served Eglon the king of Moab eighteen years. But when [And] the children [sons] of Israel cried unto the Lord [Jehovah], [and] the Lord [Jehovah] raised them up a deliverer, Ehud the son of Gera, a Benjamite [Ben-jemini], a man left-handed [weak<sup>2</sup> of his right hand]: and by him the children [sons] of Israel
16 sent a present unto Eglon the king of Moab.<sup>3</sup> But [And] Ehud made him a dagger which had two edges, of a cubit [gomed] length: and he did gird it under his 17 raiment upon his right thigh. And he brought the present unto Eglon king of Moab:
18 and Eglon was a very fat man. And when he had made an end to offer the present, 19 he sent away [dismissed<sup>4</sup>] the people that bare the present. But he himself turned again [turned back] from the quarries [Pesilim] that were by Gilgal, and said, I have a secret errand<sup>5</sup> unto thee, O king: who said, Keep [omit: keep] silence.

- 20 And [thereupon] all that stood by him went out from him. And Ehud came [drew near] unto him; and he was sitting in a summer parlour [now he, i. e. the king, was sitting in the upper story of the cooling-house<sup>1</sup>], which he had for himself alone [his private apartment]: and Ehud said, I have a message from God [the Deity] unto thee. And
- 21 [Then] he arose out of his seat. And [immediately] Ehud put forth his left hand, and
- 22 took the dagger from his right thigh, and thrust it into his belly: And the haft also went in after the blade: and the fat closed upon [about] the blade, so that he could not [for he did not] draw the dagger out of his belly; and the dirt [the dagger<sup>2</sup>] came
- 23 out [behind]. Then [And] Ehud went forth through the porch [went upon the balcony], and shut the doors of the parlour [upper story] upon him [after him], and
- 24 locked them. When he was gone out, his [the king's] servants came; and when they saw that [and they looked, and] behold, the doors of the parlour [upper story] were locked, [and] they said, Surely [doubtless], he covereth his feet in his summer-chamber [chamber of the cooling-house]. And they tarried till they were ashamed [waited very long]: and behold, he opened not [no one opened] the doors of the parlour [upper story], therefore they took a [the] key and opened them: and behold, their
- 26 lord was fallen down dead on the earth. And [But] Ehud [had] escaped while they tarried; and [had already] passed beyond the quarries [Pesilim], and
- 27 [had] escaped unto Seirath [Seirah]. And it came to pass when he was come [when he arrived], that he blew a [the] trumpet in the mountain [mountains] of Ephraim, and the children [sons] of Israel went down with him from the mount
- 28 [mountains], and he before them. And he said unto them, Follow [Hasten] after me: for the Lord [Jehovah] hath delivered your enemies the Moabites into your hand. And they went down after him, and took the fords of Jordan toward Moab,
- 29 and suffered not a man to pass over. And they slew [smote] of Moab at that time about ten thousand men, all lusty,<sup>3</sup> and all men of valour: and there escaped not a
- 30 man. So Moab was subdued that day under the hand of Israel: and the land had rest four-score years.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 12. — יִחְזֹק: the same word is used Ex. iv. 21. etc., Josh. xi. 20; but is here, as Bachmann remarks, to be explained not by those passages, but by Ezek. xxx. 24. It implies here the impartation not so much of strength as of the consciousness of it. — Ta.]

[2 Ver. 15. — מִנְחָה: Dr. Cassel, schwach, weak. "Impeded" would be the better word. Against the opinion of some, that Ehud's right hand was either lamed or mutilated, Bachmann quotes the remark of Schmid that it would have been a breach of decorum to send such a physically imperfect person on an embassy to the king. It may be added that this explanation of מִנְחָה is at all events not to be thought of in the case of the 700 chosen men mentioned in ch. xx. 16. — Ta.]

[3 Ver. 15. — Dr. Cassel translates this clause: "when [als; i. e. Jehovah raised up Ehud as a deliverer, where] the sons of Israel sent a present by him to Eglon, the king of Moab." But it is altogether simpler and better to take the clause as an independent progressive sentence, as in the E. V. So Bachmann also. — Ta.]

[4 Ver. 18. — יִשְׁלַח: dismissed them by accompanying them part of the way back, cf. Gen. xii. 20; xviii. 16; etc. — Ta.]

[5 Ver. 19. — דְּבַר סֵתֶר: Dr. Cassel translates, "a secret word." But "errand" is better; because like דְּבַר, it may be a word or message, or it may be a commission of a more active nature. Bachmann quotes Chytrius: res, negotium secretum habeo apud te agendum. So, he goes on to remark, in ver. 20 "דְּבַר אֱלֹהִים לִי אֵלֶיךָ" is not necessarily, 'I have a word from God to say to thee'; but may mean, 'I have a commission from God to execute to thee.'" It would be preferable, therefore, to conform the English Version in ver. 20 to ver. 19, rather than the reverse. — Ta.]

[6 Ver. 20. — The rendering given above is Dr. Cassel's, except that he puts the verb (יָשַׁב) in the pluperfect, which can scarcely be approved. He translates מִבְּקֶרֶת הַמְּצִלָּה by Obergeschoss des Kühlhauses, which we can only represent by the awkward phrase: "upper story of the cooling-house." It would be better, however, to take מִבְּקֶרֶת as containing an adjective idea, descriptive of the 'alijah: "cool upper story." Cf. Bachmann. — Ta.]

[7 Ver. 22. — The term מִבְּקֶרֶת occurs only here, and is of exceedingly doubtful interpretation. Bachmann assumes that the מִבְּקֶרֶת which precedes it has Ehud for its subject, and then — by a course of reasoning far too lengthy and intricate to be here discussed — comes to the conclusion that מִבְּקֶרֶת denotes a locality, which in the next verse is more definitely indicated by מִבְּקֶרֶת. The latter term, he thinks, is best understood "of the lattice-work by which the roof was inclosed, or rather of the inclosed platform of the roof itself." Accordingly he conceives the text to say that Ehud issued forth from Eglon's private apartment "upon the flat roof, more definitely upon the inclosed platform or gallery." — Ta.]

[8 Ver. 29. — Dr. Cassel: angeschene Leute, cf. the Commentary; but it seems better to hold fast to the E. V. The expression is literally: "fat men," i. e. well-fed, lusty men, of great physical strength. So Bachmann also. — Tr.]

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

Vers. 12-14. And Jehovah encouraged Eg-lon, king of Moab. The second attack on Israel came likewise from the east, but from a point much nearer home than that from which the first by Aram had come. A warlike prince of Moab had formed a league for the occasion with neighbors north and south of him. For the sons of Ammon dwelt beyond the Jordan, east of the Dead Sea, above the Moabites; while the hosts of Amalek roved lower down, to the southwest of Moab. Hitherto no actual conflict had occurred between Moab and Israel. But the order that "no Ammonite or Moabite shall enter into the congregation of Jehovah" (Deut. xxiii. 4 (3)), sufficiently marks the antagonism that existed between them. The Moabites longed for the excellent oasis of the City of Palms. Jericho, it is true, was destroyed; but the indestructible wealth of its splendid site attracted them. They surprised Israel, now become dull and incapable. Neither in the land of Benjamin, where the battle was fought, nor from the neighboring tribes of Judah and Ephraim, did they meet with any energetic resistance. From the words "and they took possession of," in connection with the following narrative, it appears that Eg-lon had fixed his residence in the City of Palms.<sup>1</sup> This renders it probable that Eg-lon was not the king of all Moab, (whose principal seat was in Rabbath Moab,) but a Moabitish chieftain, whom this successful expedition placed in possession of this fair territory west of the Jordan.

Ver. 15. And Jehovah raised them up a deliverer, Ehud, the son of Gera, a Ben-jemini, a man weak of his right hand. יְהוָה; for which the LXX. read ἄδωδ, Aod (Jerome has Eud). It seems to me that the older derivation of this name from הוֹד, giving it the sense of "one who praises," or "one who is praised" (gloriam accipiens, Jerome), is to be unqualifiedly preferred to the later, proposed by Fürst, from a conjectural root אָד. יְהוָה is related to הוֹד, הוֹד, as אֶחָד to be bright, is to הָלַל, and אֶחָדוֹן (Arabic, Hārūn) to הָרַר. Elsewhere I have already compared hod with the Sanskrit vad, वद, वद, and the Gothic audags (Irene, p. 6, note.) At all events, as Ehud belongs to hod, so such names as Audo, Eudo, Heudo, seem to belong to audags (cf. Förstemann, Namenbuch, i. 162, 391).

He was a Ben-jemini, of the tribe of Benjamin, as the Targum expressly adds. When the son of Jacob was born, his dying mother named him Benoni, "son of my sorrow;" but his father, by way of euphemism, called him Ben-jamin, "son of good fortune" (Gen. xxxv. 18). Jamin came to signify "good fortune," only because it designated the right side. The inhabitants of the holy land had the sea (jam<sup>2</sup>) on the right, hence called that side jamin, literally, sea-side; and the high-lands of Aram (or Sham, cf. Magyar, Altherth., p. 228) on the left, hence seml, the left, from Sam. Different nations derived their expressions for right and left from conceptions peculiar to themselves. Thus δεξιός and dexter<sup>3</sup> are based on the idea of showing, pointing, with the right hand (δεκνυμι); sinister, from sinus, on the action of laying the right hand on the side of the heart. The left hand has everywhere been regarded as the weaker, which, properly speaking, did not wield arms. When oriental custom placed the stranger on the left, it assigned him the seat of honor in so far as the left side seemed to be the weaker and less protected (cf. Xenoph. Cyrop. viii. 4; Meiners, Ueber die Versch. der Menschennaturen, ii. 588). From the idea of weakness, sprang such terms as λαός, lævus, Ger. link, [Eng. left], because that side is harmless, smooth, and gentle (cf. ῥητός, lævis). Hence also the custom among Asiatic nations of inclining toward the left side, and resting on the left hand, when seated, (Meiners, iii. 213): the right hand was thus left free. It was by a euphemism that the name of Jacob's son was Ben-jamin. Among the Greeks also the "left" was euphemistically called εὐδαιμόνιος, good-omened, because it was wished to avoid the ominous ἀπιστερός. A similar custom must have obtained in Israel, since just in the tribe of Benjamin there were, as we are informed Judg. xx. 16, large numbers of men who, like Ehud, were

יְמִינִי, יְמִינִי, i. e. left-handed, — the sons of the right hand being thus most addicted to the use of the left. But for the very reason that it seems to have been a habit of the tribe to use the left hand, it cannot be supposed that יְמִינִי is meant to indicate lameness of the right hand. The LXX. felt this when they rendered the phrase by ἀμφιδέξις, "double right-handed." The same consideration influenced those more recent scholars who instanced (as Serarius already did, p. 84) the Homeric Asteropæus, who fought with both hands. However, this also contradicts the spirit of the narrative, and, as the peculiarity occurs only in Benjamin, the name as well. Those Ben-jemini, who, like Ehud, use the left hand, do it in contrast with others, who make use of the right without any lameness in the left. That which Stobæus (Eclogæ Physicæ, ed. Heeren, i. 52, 992) relates of certain African nations, might also be said of the Benjamites: that they are "good and for the most part left-handed fighters (ἀπιστερομάχους), and do with the left hand whatever others do with the right." These are manifestly the same tribes of whom Stephanus of Byzantium (ed. Westermann, p. 128) speaks as an Egyptian people near Ethiopia, and whom he styles Ἐσσυμύτραι (thus designating them, like Benjamin, by the euphemistic term for left-handed). Accordingly יְמִינִי means no more than "unpracticed, weak, awkward, with the right hand," as other people are with the left. They are such as among other of the mountains was the right, and the north side the left. The same idea prevailed among the Greeks. That in Roman augury "to the left" was more favorable than "to the right," originated only in another view of the object which was supposed to produce good fortune. The sea-side was the free side.

<sup>3</sup> Cf. Bensley, Griech. Grammat., i. 240.

<sup>1</sup> [It certainly appears that he had done so temporarily, but by no means that he had done so permanently. — Tr.]

<sup>2</sup> The importance of this observation has been overlooked with reference to other lands as well as Palestine. The general fact that the sea-side was the right side, has been constantly ignored. That was the reason why Jacob Grimm (Gesch. der Deutschen Sprache, p. 980, etc.) failed to understand why among the Indians, Romans, etc., the south side nations the people frequently called Linketatz, Link-fuss [literally, "left-paw," "left-foot"] (Frisch, i. 616), in France gauchier [lit. "left-hander"; cf. the English awk, gawk, and their derivative forms]. It is remarkable that in the Roman legend the hero, who, like Ehud, undertakes to kill the enemy of his country, is also named Scævola, left-handed. The traditional explanation that he was so named because he burned his right hand, is not very suitable; he should in that case, be named "one-handed." Still, no one will agree with Niebuhr (Röm. Gesch., i. 569), who, following Varro, proposed an altogether different derivation. The tradition must refer to an actually left-handed hero. Scævus, says Ulpian (Digester, lib. i. tit. 1, 12, 3), does not apply to one who is maimed; hence, he who cannot move the right hand is called mancus. As such a left-handed person we are to consider Laïus (Adios), the father of Œdipus (Oiðipous).

Ver. 16. And Ehud made him a dagger [German: DOLCH] which had two edges, a gomed long. The word dolch [dagger, dirk] has passed over into the German, from the Slavic, since the sixteenth century, and was not yet known to Luther.<sup>1</sup> It answers to דלח in this passage, better than "sword" would do, because it has become quite synonymous with stichdegen (dirk or poniard). Oriental daggers have always been double-edged and short-handled (ver. 22). Gomed is translated σπυδαή by the Septuaginta. Among the Greeks, the σπυδαή was half an ell, i. e. twelve digits or three fourths of a foot (cf. Böckh, Metrolog. Untern., p. 211). With this measure, gomed, in its general sense of cubitus, which is also given in the garmida of the Targum, corresponds. The dagger of Ehud was not curved, as the sica usually were and as the daggers of the Bedouins still are (cf. Jos. Ant. xx. 10). Its length could only be such as was consistent with concealment.

And girded it under his raiment. "To the presence of Dionysius the Tyrant, glided Moeros, the dagger in his garment," sings our poet; and is withal perfectly historical, even though the Fable (n. 257) of Hyginus does not expressly say this. With such daggers in their garments the Sicarii raged among the crowds at the fall of Jerusalem. Prudentius (Psychomachia, 689) sings of Discordia: "sicam sub veste teget!" Rothari, the would-be murderer of the Longobard king Luitprand, wore coat of mail and a dagger beneath his clothing (Paulus Diaconus, Hist. Lomb. vi. 37). Ehud had to wear the dagger on his right side because he was left-handed. However, among German warriors who were not left-handed, the dagger was also frequently worn on the right, because the sword hung on the left, as may be seen in old pictures and on gravestones (Klemm, Waffen und Werkzeuge, Leipzig, 1854, p. 173).

Ver. 17. And Eglon was a very fat man. Considering the sense of חָמֵן wherever it occurs in Scripture, there can be no doubt that it is intended here to express the corpulency of the king. The LXX. in giving ἀρτεῖος, follow another interpretation. They do not (as Bochart thought, Phaleg, p. 534) take it as descriptive of a handsome man, nor do they imagine that all urbani, on account of their comfortable mode of living, have a tendency to become fat (cf. Serarius, p. 87); but since the statement "and Eglon was a fat man" is closely connected with the narrative of the presentation of the gifts, they make it refer to the manner in which the king received the presents.<sup>3</sup> Ἀρτεῖος is friendly, accessible (Plato, Phaed., 116 b.). In Egypt, where the translators lived, it was probably still a matter of present experience, that presentations of tribute and gifts to the rulers did not always meet with a gracious reception.

Ver. 18. When the presentation of the present was over, he dismissed the people. Menschen (Nov. Test. ex Talm., p. 971) very properly observes that נָחַם, here employed to express the presentation of gifts to a king, is elsewhere used to denote the bringing of oblations to God, hence נָחַם, offering. It was not lawful to appear before an Asiatic king without bringing a gift<sup>4</sup> (Seneca, Ep. xvii.); only in this way, therefore, could Ehud inform himself of the situation and humor of the king. The presentation of gifts is a lengthy ceremony. The tenacious adherence of oriental nations to ancient customs, enables us to depict the present scene by the help of Persian descriptions of similar occasions. Our narrator properly speaks of the bearers of the present as נָחִימִים, the people; for the more numerous the persons who carried the gifts, the more honored was the king. "Fifty persons often bear what one man could easily carry," says Chardin (Voyage, iii. 217). At this ceremony Ehud had no opportunity to attempt anything, for he neither came near the king, nor saw him alone; nor yet was he willing, among so many bystanders, to involve his companions in the consequences of a possible failure. On the contrary, he accompanied them back to the borders, in order to be sure that he was alone when making the dangerous attempt. Whether he suffered or escaped, he wished to be unhindered by their presence, and also to appear as acting without their concurrence.

Ver. 19. But he himself turned back from the boundary-stones. This is evidently the sense in which בְּסֵילִים is to be taken. בְּסֵילִים is always a carved image, γλυπτόν. The entire number of instances in which this word is used by Scripture writers fails to suggest any reason for thinking here of "stone-quarries," a definition which moreover does not appear to harmonize with the locality. But as the connection implies that the borders of Eglon's territory, which he had wrenched from Israel, were at the pesilim, we must understand by them the posts, στήλαι, stones, lapides sacri, which marked the line. In consequence of the honors everywhere paid them, these were considered Pesilim, idol images, just as at a later time the Hermæ, (ἑρμᾶες, heaps of stone) were prohibited as idolatrous objects (cf. Aboda Sara, Mischna, 4). With this, the interpretation of the Targum, בְּמִזְבְּחֵי, heaps of unhewn stones, may also be made to harmonize.<sup>5</sup> This border line was in the vicinity of

<sup>1</sup> This is the opinion of Grimm (Deutsch. Wörterb., ii. 1222). However, the view of Klemm (Waffen und Werkzeuge, p. 172) may nevertheless serve to find the original etymology of the word. [Luther has Schwert, sword. — Ta.]

<sup>2</sup> [Schiller, in his ballad entitled Die Bürgschaft. — Ta.]

<sup>3</sup> Hence they also translate חָמֵן by ἀρτεῖος, Ex. ii. 2, where, to be sure, it rather signifies "beautiful."

<sup>4</sup> Transferred to God, Ex. xxiii. 15: "None shall appear before me empty."

<sup>5</sup> [To this interpretation of the pesilim, Bachmann (who agrees with our author in rejecting the commonly received "stone-quarries") objects that it is not in accordance with Gilgal, which had not fallen into the hands of Moab. Ewald has rightly insisted upon it that Gilgal must have lain northeast of Jericho (Gesch. des Volkes Israel, ii. 317). That this was the relative position of Gilgal, and its direction from Jericho, has already received confirmation from the first chapter of our Book.

And said, I have a secret message. It could not be matter of surprise that Ehud did not make this request until his return. The ceremony of the public audience did not allow it to be made at that time. The presentation of the presents must have been so conducted as to impress the king with the conviction that Ehud was especially devoted to him. Signs of discontent and ill-will on the part of the subjugated people cannot have escaped the conqueror. The more highly would he value the devotion of one of the Israelitish leaders. That Ehud had sent his companions away, and had not returned until they had crossed the border, was easily explained as indicating that he had a matter to present in which he did not wish to be observed by them. All the more eager, therefore, was Eglon to hear that which Ehud seemed to hide from Israel. It was only by such a feint that Ehud could succeed in approaching the tyrant and obtaining a private interview. Israel's deliverer must first seem to be its betrayer. The same artifice has been used by others. When the Persians wished to destroy the pseudo-Smerdis, and doubtfully considered how they could pass the guards, Darius said that he would pretend to have a secret commission, concerning Persia, from his father to the king; adding, as Herodotus (iii. 72) says: "For when lying is necessary, lie"!

Who said, Silence! Thereupon all that stood by him went out. Ehud does not demean himself as if he wished that those present would depart. He appears to be on the point of telling his secret before them all. But this Eglon will not permit. Oriental manners could not be more perfectly set forth. The king's injunction of silence (סָתַם, 'st!) on Ehud, is of itself a sufficient command to those present to leave the room. Eglon must therefore have expected matters not to be heard by all ears. All who "stood" about him, went out. They were his servants (ver. 24), who do not sit when the king is present. "Happy are these thy servants," says the queen of Sheba to Solomon, "who stand continually before thee, and hear thy wisdom." In the Tutinameh (translated by Rosen, i. 42, 43) it is said: "The King of Khorassan was once sitting in his palace, and before his throne stood the pillars of the empire, the servants of the crown, high and low, great and small," etc.

Ver. 20. Now, he had seated himself in the upper story of the cooling-house. To understand what part of the house is thus indicated, we have only to attend to the description of oriental architecture given by Shaw, in his Travels (i. 386, Edinb. edit. 1808). Down to the present day many oriental houses have a smaller one annexed to them, which sometimes rises one story higher than the main building. In Arabic as in Hebrew this is called alijah, and serves for purposes of entire seclusion or rest. "There is a door of communication from it into the gallery of the house, besides another which opens immediately from a privy stairs, down into the porch or street, without giving the least disturbance to the house." The alijah of Eglon consisted of an inner chamber, opening on an exposed balcony (מַסְדֵּרֶן), from which a door led into the house itself (at present called dor or bait). Within the door of the alijah there was however still another apartment (חֲדָר, ver. 24), which served the purpose of a necessary-house. Being high and freely accessible to currents of air, the alijah was a cool retreat. Similar purposes were subserved in Germany by the pergule, balconies, galleries, arbors (Lauben); hence Luther's translation, Sommer-laube (summer-arbor or bower). He followed the rendering of the LXX. who have τῆς θερμῆς, while the Targum gives more prominence to the idea of repose (בֵּית מְנוּחָה, koln). The public reception of the gifts had taken place in the house. Afterwards, while Ehud accompanied his companions, the king had betaken himself to the alijah "which was for himself alone" (his private chamber). When Ehud returned he was received there, as he had anticipated.

And Ehud said, I have a message from the Deity unto thee. Then he arose from his seat.

וַיֵּלֶךְ אֵלֶיּוֹם is a commission from a higher being. He does not say Jehovah, for this is the name of the Israelitish God, with whom Eglon has nothing to do. We are not however to assume that the God of Eglon is meant; for what can Ehud the Israelite announce from Chemosh! It is therefore probable that by Elohim a superior prince is to be understood, whose liegeman or satrap Eglon was, as was already intimated above, — a human possessor of majesty and authority. As it is not to be supposed that the capital of Moab was transferred from Rabbah to the small bit of territory which had been acquired across the Jordan, Eglon in Jericho is not to be looked on as lord of all Moab. The relation in which he stood to the mother-country was most likely that of a vassal or feudal baron. That he is styled king does not contradict this. The potentates of single cities were all called "kings," as the Greeks called them τύραννοι, without on that account being anything more than dependents of more powerful states and princes.<sup>1</sup> It suits the rôle which Ehud wishes to be ascribed to him, that he should also have relations with the transfluvial Moab, a fact which of course must be kept profoundly secret. Thus Eglon's rising is explained. The same honor was due to a message from the superior lord as to his presence. Like reverence was shown to royal letters even, as appears from the narrative of Herodotus concerning a message to Oroetes; and from it, the fidelity of those whom the message concerned was inferred (Herod. iii. 128). The same mark of honor was paid to parents and aged persons. From this custom the ecclesiastical usage of standing during the reading of the Gospel, is also to be derived.

Eglon rises out of respect for the וַיֵּלֶךְ אֵלֶיּוֹם. This has been the constant explanation. The diverging view of Bertheau<sup>2</sup> does not commend itself. The Talmud — understanding the words, the usual meaning of the word. He thinks that the pesilim were idolatrous images set up either by the apostate Israelites themselves, or by Eglon, "as boundary-marks of the territory immediately subject to him, and as signs of his supremacy." He seems inclined to prefer the latter alternative, because of "the fact that Ehud does not feel himself and those with him secure until he has passed the pesilim." — Ta.]

<sup>1</sup> Thus the king of Hasor was king paramount over all the kings of his vicinity (Josh. xi. 10).

<sup>2</sup> [Bertheau says: "Divining the purpose of Ehud, he rose up to defend himself." — Ta.]

however, of the God of Israel — already deduces from them the lesson, that if a stranger thus rose up to receive a message from God, much more is it the duty of an Israelite so to do (Sanhedrin, 60 a).

Vers. 21-24. Immediately Ehud put forth his left hand. Ehud made use of a pretext, in order to cause Eglon to rise. He was surer of his thrust if his victim stood. Eglon's attention must be wholly diverted, that the attack, entirely unresisted, might be the more effective. In such sudden assaults, bulky people like Eglon are at a disadvantage. Cimber pressed closely on Cæsar, as if to make most urgent entreaty for his brother (Plut., Cæsar, 86). Parmenio was stabbed by Cleander, while cheerfully reading a letter (Curtius, vii 2, 27). The instance most like Eglon's case, is that of King Henry III. of France. Clement, to secure an interview, had provided himself with a commission from a friend of the king. When he arrived, the king was sitting on his close-stool. Hoping to hear of an understanding with his opponents, Henry bade the messenger draw near; whereupon the monk stabbed him in the abdomen (cf. Ranke, Franks. Gesch., i. 171). Ehud's thrust, though left-handed, was powerful. The dagger, together with its short handle, buried itself in the fat of the man, and came out behind.

כֶּלֶב signifies a flame; then the blade of a sword, which glitters and burns like a flame. In a medieval writing, the following words occur: "Stn swert flammieret an stner hant" (Müller's Mittelh. Wörterb., iii. 336). In technical language we also speak of flaming blades (geflaminten klingen).

And came out behind, הִפְּרִשְׁתָּהּ. The ancient doubt as to this word, which occurs but once, and about which opinions are still divided, appears from the divergent renderings of the Septuagint and the Targum. It is certain, however, in the first place, that the Greek rendering παρορδία, can have little weight; for it arose from the similarity of the word in the text to פְּרִיכָה, current at the time, and meaning παρορδία, vestibule. In the second place, the addition of Ehud after the second הִפְּרִשְׁתָּהּ (ver. 23), shows that another subject begins, and that therefore the first הִפְּרִשְׁתָּהּ can refer only to the sword, not to the man. Further, since הִפְּרִשְׁתָּהּ is provided with ה local, it manifestly denotes that part of the body toward which the course of the sword was directed, while הִפְּרִשְׁתָּהּ testifies to the actual perforation of the body. Now, as the sword was thrust from before into the abdomen (בְּטֶנְיָהּ), there would be no doubt as to the part where it emerged, even if the etymology, which has here to deal with an onomatopoeic word, did not make this perfectly plain. Parshedon is the Greek παρσέδον, and belongs to the same family as the Lithuanian persti, Lettish pirst, Polish pierdziec, Russian perdjet, Greek πέρσειν, Sanscrit pard, Latin pedere, Gothic fairtan, Old High German fēran (cf. Pott, Etymolog. Forsch., i. 245; Grimm, Wörterb., iii. 1335). The sword emerged behind through the fundament. The king fell down without uttering a sound. Ehud did not delay, but went out unhindered through the balcony. The attendants had entirely withdrawn from the alijah: Ehud takes advantage of this circumstance, and locks the door to it, in order to delay the moment of discovery. The heedless conduct of the unsuspecting attendants supports his boldness. As soon however as they see him go out, — an earlier return to their lord is not lawful, — they endeavor to enter the alijah. Ehud had gone away so calmly, that they suspect nothing. They are not even surprised when they find the doors fastened. Serarius has properly directed attention to the aversion felt by the ancients to the least degree of exposure when complying with the necessities of nature. This applies especially to kings, inasmuch as subjection to these necessities, too plainly proved them men. Of Pharaoh, the Jewish legend says that he wished to appear like a god, above the need of such things. "He covers his feet," is a euphemism, taken from the descent of the long garments (cf. Bochart, Hierozoicon, i. 677).

Vers. 25-30. And they waited long, יָצְוּ.

יָצְוּ. These words add the notion of displeasure and ill humor to the idea of waiting (cf. 2 Kgs. ii. 17; viii. 11). At length they comprehend that something extraordinary must have taken place. They procure another key, with which they open the doors, and find their lord — dead. Ehud's artifice, however, had succeeded. While they delayed (מְדַמְּיָהֶם), from מְדַמְּיָה, morari, is onomatopoeic), he had got beyond the border, as far as Seirah. This place, which according to ver. 27 belonged to the mountains of Ephraim, is unknown. It bounded the territories of Benjamin on the north. Ehud reached it by way of the border which ran by Gilgal, which shows that both these places were north of Jericho. It is evident that he had agreed with the Israelites to give the signal there, in case he were successful. His trumpet-blast was transmitted among the mountains. Israel flocked together, and heard of the unprecedentedly fortunate deed. The people saw in it the firm resolve, which gives victory. The plan of battle had also been already determined by Ehud. It was of the last importance to cut the terrified and leaderless Moabites off from the assistance of their transjordanic friends. Hence, the first care of Israel is to seize the ford of the river. The ford in question was manifestly no other than that which, directly east of Jericho, half an hour north of Wady Heshban, is still in use. Setzen called it el-Mukhlāa, Robinson el-Helu (Ritter xv. 484, 547, Gage's transl. iii. 4, 49). That the occupation of this ford decides the victory, proves clearly that Eglon was not king of all Moab, but only of the Moab on this side of the Jordan. It was a terrible retribution, a sort of "Sicilian vespers," which Israel, rising up after long subjection, inflicted on Eglon and his people. The falling foes were men of might. אִישׁ שָׁמָן expresses the distinction (das Ansehn), אִישׁ חַיִּל the warlike character and abilities, of the smitten enemies. Moab was southeast of Jericho, a short distance north of W. Heshban. — Tr.]

§ [BERTHEAU: "שָׁמָן, the fat, i. e. (in contrast with persons of starved appearance) the well-fed and opulent man; cf. Latin optimus; hence, the man of consequence." But compare note 8 under "Textual and Grammatical." — Tr.]

1 ["His sword flamed in his hand." — Tr.]

2 [Robinson's map locates El-Helu not directly east, but southeast of Jericho, not north but south of Wady Heshban (cf. Bibl. Res. i. 585). It appears that the words "directly east" belong to Setzen, and must in Ritter's opinion be made to conform to Robinson's location of El-Helu. Cf. Gage's Ritter, iii. 49. Van de Velde's map places El-Helu thoroughly vanquished, and Israel had rest for eighty years.

The exploit of Ehud doubtless surpasses all similar deeds of ancient history in the purity of its motive, as well as in the energy and boldness of its execution. Harmodius and Aristogiton, however celebrated by the Athenians, were moved to kill Hipparchus by private interests (cf. Thucyd. vi. 56). Blind warrior-fury fills Mucius Scaevola, as also Theodotus (Polyb. v. 81), the would-be murderer of Ptolemæus, and they fail of success. Ehud was equally bold and pure. He risked his life for no interest of his own, but for his people. And not merely for the external freedom of his nation, but for the maintenance and honor of its divine religion, which was inseparably linked with freedom. It was against the mortal enemy of Israel—against one lying under the ban, and shut out from the congregation of Israel—that he lifted up his sword. He exposed himself to a fearful peril, in order, if successful, to give therewith a signal of courage and comfort to his people. To be sure, if he did not succeed, the hatred and oppression of the enemy would increase in violence. But for that very reason men saw the more clearly that God had raised him up to be a deliverer. And yet, where in Israel are those praises of Ehud, which in Athens resounded for centuries in honor of Harmodius? Scaevola's deed<sup>1</sup> is celebrated as one of the nation's heroic performances. The historian makes him say (Livy, xi. 12): "As an enemy have I slain the enemy." It is true, the remarkable act has had the honor of being minutely handed down, even to the least details of its progress. But all this was to point out the sagacity and energy of the strong left-handed man. Not one word of praise is found. On the contrary—and this fact deserves attention—the remark usually made of other Judges, is here wanting: it is not said that "the Spirit of Jehovah was upon him." Nor is it said, as of Othniel, that he "judged Israel." Neither are we told that the rest and peace of Israel were connected with his life and death. Subsequent exegesis called him the Wolf, with which Benjamin is compared (Midrash, Ber. Rabba, cap. 89, p. 87 a). As the wolf throws himself on his prey, so had Ehud thrown himself on Eglon. They saw in Ehud's deed the act of a mighty man, influenced by zeal for God; but the "Spirit of Jehovah" inspires neither such artifice nor such murder. So much the less could the act of Ehud, however brilliant under the circumstances, be made to exculpate similar deeds. So much the less could the crimes that defile the pages of Christian history, such as those committed against Henry III. and Henry IV., use it as a cover for themselves.<sup>2</sup> Although Eglon was a heathen, a foreigner, a tyrant, an enemy actually engaged in hostilities, the Scripture speaks of Ehud only as a deliverer, but never of his deed as sprung from the Spirit of God. How much more disgraceful are murder and treason against one's own king, countrymen, and fellow Christians! It was an insult to Christianity, a sin against the Holy Ghost, when in answer to Clement's question, whether a priest might kill a tyrant, it was determined that "it was not a mortal sin, but only an irregularity" (Ranke, Franz. Gesch., i. 473); or when Pope Paul V. exclaimed, with reference to the murder of Henry IV. by Ravallac: "Deus gentium fecit hoc, quia datus in reprobum sensum." Worse than the dagger is such doctrine.<sup>3</sup>

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Ehud, the Judge with the two-edged sword.—
1. Israel was again in bondage on account of sin. And the compassion of God was not exhausted, although no deliverer came out of Judah. In the kingdom of God, the great and rich may indeed become instruments of God's will; but his power is not confined to them. If no one arises in Judah, some one in Benjamin does. If it be not Othniel, Caleb's nephew, it is some unknown person who comes to rescue his people. Neither the name, nor the physique, is material. Deliverance may be begun with the left hand.

2. Ehud kills Eglon, the tyrant of Israel; yet he is not properly a murderer, but only a warrior. However, it is better to conquer as Othniel and Gideon conquered. He did it, not for private revenge, nor from fanaticism, but for the just freedom of Israel and its religion. He did it against Moab, and not against one who shared his own faith and country. God raised him up; but yet the Word of God does not approve his deed. He was a deliverer of Israel; but there hangs a shadow nevertheless over his official activity. Therefore, no murderous passion can appeal to him. By him no tyrant-murder, no political assassination, is exculpated. And this not simply because in Christian states and churches there can be no Eglons or Moabs.—STARKE: "The Jesuit principle that it is right to put an heretical prince out of the way, will never be valid until a person can be certain of having such a calling from God to it, as Ehud undoubtedly had."—His cause was pure; which cannot be said of any other assassination in history.—Christian history not excepted,—down to the murder of the North American President Lincoln; not even of those instances which remind us (as Mallet, Altes und Neues, p. 92, so beautifully did with reference to G. Sand, the murderer of Kotzebue) of the words of the Lord: "Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do."

GERLACH: We are not to think that the deed

<sup>1</sup> In Plutarch's Parallels of Greek and Roman History (n. 2), the same history is given of a Greek, Neocles, who made an attempt against Xerxes like that of Scaevola against Porseus.

<sup>2</sup> Excellent remarks are found in the work of Hugo Grotius, De Jure Belli et Pacis, lib. i. cap. iv. (ed. Traj., 1773), p. 178. Serarius declines to treat the subject, under the feeble pretext of lack of time, p. 82. (Compare Bayle, Dictionnaire, s. v. Mariana, li. 2061, s.)

<sup>3</sup> [WORDSWORTH: "Some have raised objections to this act of Ehud, as censurable on moral grounds: and they have described him as a 'crafty Israelite,' taking an unfair advantage over an unwieldy corpulent Moabite; others have apologized for it, on the plea that it is not to be measured by what they call the standard of our 'enlightened modern civilization' compared with what they term the 'barbarous temper of those times.' But surely these are low and unworthy motives." He then quotes with approbation from Bp. Sanderson and Dr. Waterland, the gist of whose remarks (Sanderson's however being made with immediate reference to the act of Phinehas, Num. xxv.) is, that the Lord raised up deliverers for Israel, and divinely warranted their actions, which actions, however, form no precedents for those who have not similar divine authority. But it is surely not an improper question to ask, whether, when God raised up a hero, endowed him with faith and zeal, with strength and energy, to secure certain results, He also, always and necessarily, suggested or even approved the methods adopted not only as a whole but even in detail.—Tr.]

of Ehud, in the manner of its accomplishment, is set before us as an example; but we must also beware lest, because the manner is no longer allowable, we be led to deny the operation of the Holy Ghost by whom this deliverer of his people was impelled.

3. Because Ehud's cause was pure, his deed was followed by peace and freedom. That can be said of no other similar deed. He first searched out the enemy in his hiding-place, and then triumphed over him in the battlefield. He shows himself, — 1, a true Israelite by faith; 2, a true son of Benjamin, who was compared with the wolf, by his strength. He drew his sword, not for the sake of war, but of peace. Therefore, Israel had peace through him until he died.

Ehud may not improperly be considered a type in spirit of him who likewise sprang from Benjamin — of Saul who first ravened like a wolf, but became patient and trustful like a lamb; of the Apostle who called the Word of God a two-edged sword that pierces through the conscience; of Paul, whose symbol in the church is the sword through which as martyr he lost his own life, after he had saved the lives of thousands by the sword of the Spirit.

Shamgar smites six hundred Philistines with an ox-goad.

CHAPTER III. 31.

31 And after him was Shamgar the son of Anath, which [and he] slew [smote] of the Philistines six hundred men with an ox-goad; and he also [he, too,] delivered Israel.

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

After him. After his example. Following Ehud's example,<sup>1</sup> Shamgar smote the Philistines. That the expression is not to be taken of time, as if on the death of Ehud Shamgar had succeeded him, is evident from ch. iv. 1. Moreover, if that were the meaning, a statement of the years of Shamgar would not be absent. The hypothesis of Josephus, that he governed one year, is untenable. Accordingly, the other Jewish expositors have properly assigned the exploit of Shamgar to the time of Ehud, i. e. to the period of eighty years.

Shamgar,<sup>2</sup> the son of Anath. To what tribe he belonged, is not stated. If it be correct to connect שִׁמְגָר with אֶנַּח, Anathoth (cf. Kaplan, Erets Kedumim, ii. 142), it will follow that like Ehud he was of Benjamin, and defended the territory of that tribe in the west against the Philistines, as Ehud did in the east against the Moabites. His whole history, as here given, consists of a single heroic exploit, in which he repulsed an attack of the Philistines with extraordinary strength.<sup>3</sup> handle, stiva, that part which the ploughman holds in his hand, and with which he guides the plough.<sup>4</sup> More correct, however, is the rendering "ox-goad" (cf. Bochart, Hierozoicon, i. 385);

With an ox-goad. The Septuagint gives ἀπορροούς, by which it evidently means the plough-

פִּרְשׁ הַתְּרֵימָה, as the Targum has it. It was the "prick" against which the oxen "kicked," when struck with it. The Greeks called it βουπληξ. With such an instrument, King Lycurgus is said to have attacked the wandering Bacchus and his followers<sup>5</sup> (Il. vi. 135). There is a tradition in Holstein that in the Swedish time a peasant armed with a pole put to flight a multitude of Swedes who had entered his garden and threatened to burn it (Müllenhoff, Sagen, etc., p. 81).

He delivered Israel. He procured victory for them, and assisted them over the danger of present and local subjugation. But to "deliver" is not to "judge." Nor is there any mention of the "Spirit of the Lord" in connection with him.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Shamgar the deliverer with the ox-goad. Courageous examples find worthy followers. Shamgar

1 [Bachmann observes that this and similar interpretations of this expression, militate against the analogy of ch.

x. 1, 8; xii. 8, 11, 13, in all which passages שִׁמְגָר refers to the duration of the official or natural life of the previously mentioned person. Appealing to ch. v. 6, where the "days of Shamgar" are described in such a way as to exclude the supposition that they belonged to the period of "rest" obtained by Ehud, he makes them synchronous with some part of the Canaanite oppression under Jabin. While the Canaanites subjugated the northern part of the land, the Philistines attempted to extend their power in the south, which occasioned the conflicts of Shamgar with them. — Tr.]

2 שִׁמְגָר. The ancients translated it: Nomen Alienum, "Name of a stranger." Ehud was the son of a certain אֶנַּח. Perhaps Shamgar also is somehow related to that name.

3 [BACHMANN: "We are undoubtedly to think here of a marauding band like those brought to view in 1 Sam. xxx. 1 ff. and Job i. 15, against whom Shamgar, either engaged at the moment in ploughing, or else seizing the first weapon that came to hand, proceeded with an ox-goad, with such effect as to strike down six hundred of them." — Tr.]

4 This interpretation of the LXX. has nothing to do (as Bertheau thinks) with the reading שִׁמְגָר הַתְּרֵימָה, found by Augustine.

5 This legend is copiously treated by Nonnus, on the basis of Homer's version of it. It is remarkable that although the scene is laid in "Arabia," Nonnus nevertheless transfers the above-mentioned event and the city of Lycurgus to Carmel and the Erythraean Sea. It is doubtless true, as Köhler observes (Die Dionysiake von Nonnus von Panopolis, Halle, 1858, pp. 76, 77), that by Βουπληξ Nonnus appears to have understood an axe. The Roman poets also give an axe to Lycurgus.

trode in Ehud's footsteps. One triumphs with a sword, the other with an implement of peace. Hence we may infer, says Origen, that a judge of the church need not always carry a sword, and be full of severity and admonitions to repentance, but should also be like a husbandman, "who, gradually opening the earth with his plough, prepares it for the reception of good seed."

STARKE: When God wishes to terrify the enemy, He needs not many men, nor strong defence and preparation for the purpose. — GERLACH: Shamgar's deed is probably to be viewed only as the effect of a sudden outbreak of holy enthusiasm, under the influence of which he seized the first best weapon, and put to flight the enemy whom some terror from God had scared.

[HENRY: 1. God can make those eminently serviceable to his glory and the church's good, whose extraction, education, and employment are very obscure. He that has the residue of the Spirit, could, when he pleased, make ploughmen judges and generals, and fishermen apostles. 2. It is no matter what the weapon is, if God direct and strengthen the arm. An ox-road, when God pleases, shall do more than Goliath's sword. And sometimes He chooses to work by such unlikely means, that the excellency of the power may appear to be of God. — TR.]

THIRD SECTION.

THE SERVITUDE TO JABIN, KING OF CANAAN. DEBORAH, THE FEMALE JUDGE OF FIERY SPIRIT, AND BARAK, THE MILITARY HERO.

Ehud being dead, Israel falls back into evil-doing, and is given up to the tyranny of Jabin, king of Canaan. Deborah, the Prophetess, summons Barak to undertake the work of deliverance.

CHAPTER IV. 1-11.

- 1 And the children [sons] of Israel again did [continued to do] evil in the sight
- 2 of the Lord [Jehovah:] when [and] Ehud was dead. And the Lord [Jehovah]
- 3 sold them [gave them up] into the hand of Jabin king of Canaan that reigned in
- 4 Hazor, the captain of whose host was Sisera, which dwelt in Harosheth of the Gen-
- 5 tiles [Harosheth-Hagojim]. And the children [sons] of Israel cried unto the Lord
- 6 [Jehovah]; for he had nine hundred chariots of iron; and twenty years he mightily
- 7 oppressed the children [sons] of Israel. And Deborah, a prophetess, the wife of
- 8 Lapidoth,<sup>1</sup> she judged Israel at that time. And she dwelt [sat<sup>2</sup>] under the palm-tree
- 9 of Deborah, between Ramah and Beth-el in mount Ephraim: and the children [sons]
- 10 of Israel came up to her for judgment. And she sent and called Barak the son of
- 11 Abinoam out of Kedesh-naphtali, and said unto him, Hath not the Lord [Jehovah
- 12 the] God of Israel commanded [thee], saying. Go, and draw toward mount Tabor,<sup>3</sup>
- 13 and take with thee ten thousand men of the children [sons] of Naphtali, and of the
- 14 children [sons] of Zebulun? And I will draw unto thee, to the river [brook]
- 15 Kishon, Sisera the captain of Jabin's army, with<sup>4</sup> his chariots and his multitude;
- 16 and I will deliver him into thine hand? And Barak said unto her, If thou wilt go
- 17 with me, then I will go: but if thou wilt not go with me, then I will not go. And
- 18 she said, I will surely go with thee: notwithstanding [but] the journey that thou
- 19 takest [the expedition on which thou goest] shall not be for thine honour; for the
- 20 Lord [Jehovah] shall sell [give up] Sisera into the hand of a woman. And Deborah
- 21 arose, and went with Barak to Kedesh. And Barak called Zebulun and Naphtali
- 22 to Kedesh; and he went up with ten thousand men at his feet:<sup>5</sup> and Deborah went
- 23 up with him. Now Heber the Kenite, which was of the children [sons] of Hobab
- 24 the father- [brother-] in-law of Moses, had severed himself from the Kenites, and
- 25 pitched his tent unto the plain of Zaanaim [near Elon-Zaananim], which is by
- 26 Kedesh.<sup>6</sup>

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[<sup>1</sup> Ver. 4 — לִפְדֹּת לְפִדּוֹת: Dr. Cassel, taking the second of these words as an appellative, renders, — ein Weib von Feuergeist, a woman of fiery spirit, cf. his remarks below. The possibility of this rendering cannot be denied; but

It is at least equally probable that the ordinary view which regards Lapidoth as a proper noun is correct. Bachmann points out that the succession of statements in this passage is exactly the same as in "Miriam the prophetess, the sister of Aaron," "Huldah the prophetess, the wife of Shallum," "Anna, a prophetess, the daughter of Phanneel," etc. These instances create a presumption that in this case too the second statement after the name will be one of family relationship, which in the absence of positive proof the mere grammatical possibility of another view does not suffice to counter-vail. The feminine ending of Lapidoth creates as little difficulty as it does in Naboth, and other instances of the same sort. Of Lapidoth we have no knowledge whatever. The mention here made of him does not necessarily imply that he was still living. Cf. Ruth iv. 10; 1 Sam. xxvii. 8; etc. — Ta.]

[2 Ver. 5. — יוֹשֶׁבֶת: Bachmann also translates "sat" (sess), although he interprets "dwelt"; cf. ch. x. 1: Josh. ii. 15; 2 Kgs. xxii. 14. "As according to the last of these passages the prophetess Huldah had her dwelling (יְהוֹיָדָה) in the second district of Jerusalem, so the prophetess Deborah had her dwelling (יְהוֹיָדָה) under the Palm of Deborah." — Ta.]

[3 Ver. 6. — וַיִּשְׁלַח יְהוֹשֻׁעַ: Dr. Cassel, — Zieht auf den Berg Tabor, proceed to Mount Tabor. So many others. For וַיִּשְׁלַח with a verb of motion, cf. Ps. xxiv. 8. But inasmuch as וַיִּשְׁלַח recurs immediately in ver. 7, and is there transitive, Bachmann proposes to take it so here: go, draw sc. an army, to thyself or together, on Mount Tabor. Cf. the Vulgate. — Ta.]

[4 Ver. 7. — וְאֶת־דִּרְכָּו: properly, "and (not, with) his chariots," etc., although Cassel also has mit. אֶת is the sign of the accusative, not the preposition, as appears from the fact that it has the copula "and" before it. — Ta.]

[5 Ver. 10. — בְּרִנְגָלִי: If the subject of בְּרִנְגָלִי be Barak, as the E. V. and Dr. Cassel take it, בְּרִנְגָלִי can hardly mean anything else than "on foot," as Dr. Cassel renders it; cf. ver. 15. But the true construction — true, because regular and leaving nothing to be supplied — is that which De Wette adopts: "and there went up, בְּרִנְגָלִי, ten thousand men." In this construction, which harmonizes perfectly with the context, בְּרִנְגָלִי evidently means "at his feet," i. e. as De Wette renders, "after him." — Ta.]

[6 Ver. 11. — Dr. Cassel's translation adheres strictly to the order of the original: "And Heber, the Kenite, had severed himself from Kain, the sons of Hobab, the brother-in-law of Moses, and had pitched his tent near Elion-Zaanannim, by Kedesh. On the rendering "brother-in-law," instead of "father-in-law," cf. Kell, on Ex. ii. 18; Smith's Bibl. Dict. s. v. Hobab. — Ta.]

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

Ver. 1. And Ehud was dead: i. e. For Ehud was no more. That the eighty years of rest were also the years of Ehud's government is not indeed expressly stated, but seems nevertheless to be indicated in this verse. For "rest" is always coincident with "obedience towards God;" and obedience is maintained in Israel through the personal influence of the Judge. When he dies, the weakness of the people manifests itself anew. Hence, when we read that the people "continued to do evil, and Ehud was dead," this language must be understood to connect the cessation of rest with the death of Ehud. Shamgar — no mention being made of him here — must have performed his exploit some time during the eighty years. The standing expression וַיִּסְפֶּי, "and they continued," is to be regarded as noting the continuance of that fickleness which obtains among the people when not led by a person of divine enthusiasm. They always enter afresh on courses whose inevitable issues they might long since have learned to know. The new generation learns nothing from the history of the past. "They continued," is, therefore, really equivalent to "they began anew."

Vers. 2, 3. And Jehovah gave them up into the hand of Jabin, king of Canaan, etc. Joshua already had been obliged to sustain a violent contest with a Jabin, king of Hazor. He commanded a confederation of tribes, whose frontier reached as far south as Dor (Tantāra) on the coast, and the plains below the Sea of Tiberias. The battle of Jabin with Joshua took place at the waters of Merom (Lake Hulah); and from that fact alone Josephus inferred that "Hazor lay above (ὑπερκεῖται) this sea." But its position was by no means so close to the lake as Robinson (Bibl. Res., iii. 365) wishes to locate it, which is altogether impossible. The course of Joshua makes it clear that it lay on the road from Lake Merom to Zidon. For in order to capture Hazor, Joshua turned back (וַיָּשָׁב, Josh. xi. 10) from the pursuit. It appears from our passage, and also from Josh. xix. 37, that it must have been situated not very far from Kedesh, but in a direction that from it the movements of Israel toward Tabor, on the line of Naphtali and Zebulun, could not be readily observed or hindered: that is to say, to the west of Kedesh. That its position cannot be determined by the similarity of modern names alone, is shown by the experience of Robinson, who successively rejected a Hazireh, a Tell Hazûr, and el-Hazûry (for which Ritter had decided). For a capital of such importance as Hazor here and elsewhere appears to be, an elevated situation, commanding the lowlands (בְּלִי-דִּבְרָן), must be assumed. It must have been a fortress supported by rich and fertile fields. These conditions are met by Tibnin, as is evident from Robinson's extended description of it (ii. 451 ff.; iii. 57 ff.). The similarity of name is not wanting; for the Crusaders must have had some reason for calling it Toronum. William of Tyre (Hist. lib. xi. 5; in Gesta Dei Francorum, p. 798) described the place as adorned with vineyards and trees, the land fertile and adapted for cultivation. It lies midway between Tyre and Paneas, and is of immense importance for the control of the country. Robinson has justly remarked, that a fortress must have been on this spot long before the time of the Crusaders; nor does it raise any great difficulty that William of Tyre reckoned it to the tribe of Asher, on whose borders, at all events, it lay.<sup>1</sup> — The Jabin, king of Hazor, of our

1 [Bachmann identifies "Hazor with Hüzür or Hazireh, two hours W. of Bint Jebell, in the heart of Northern Galilee, on an acclivity with extensive ruins and a sepulchral vault of great antiquity," cf. Rob. iii. 62. He remarks that for Tibnin nothing speaks except its importance from a military point of view, which of itself is not sufficient evidence. "The similarity of the mediæval name Toronum (= Hazor?) is wholly illusory." — Ta.]

passage, evidently cherished the design of regaining, in some favorable hour of Israeliish supineness, the territory taken from his ancestors by Joshua. With this object in view, his general-in-chief, Sisera, kept the languishing nation under discipline at another point. The name of Sisera's residence was Harosheth Hagojim. It may perhaps be possible to fix this hitherto wholly unknown place also. The power of the present Jabin must have extended as far as that of the earlier one (i. e. to Tantura and the region south of the Sea of Tiberias); since otherwise the battle with Barak would not have been fought at the Kishon. Moreover, Naphtali, Zebulun, and Issachar were all interested in the war against him (ch. v. 15). This being the case, it is certainly probable that Sisera's residence was in this southern part of Jabin's dominions. Sisera was commander of an army dreaded chiefly for its nine hundred iron chariots. But these were of consequence only on level ground. That is the reason why, Josh. xvii. 16, such prominence is given to the fact that just those Canaanites who lived in the plains of Beth-shean (Beisân) and Jezreel, through which latter the Kishon flowed, had iron chariots. The name itself of Harosheth Hagojim suffices to suggest its connection with iron chariots. Harosheth (Heb. Charosheth) is the place where iron was worked (charash, the smith). It is only natural to look for it in the plains just named. But the residence of Sisera is called Harosheth Hagojim, the Harosheth of the Gogim. By Gogim we must understand a race different not only from Israel, but also from the Canaanite, Aram, Edom, Moab, etc. The Targum translates Harosheth Hagojim by fortress or city of the Gogim (פְּרִי עִירָא), and thus refers us to Gelil Hagojim (Isa. viii. 23 [E. V. ix. 1]), which is translated in the same way (פְּרִי עִירָא stands often for עִיר, city). The prophet in the passage referred to, locates this Gelil of the Gogim on this side of the Jordan, in the neighborhood of the Lake of Tiberias. It is clearly erroneous to make this Gelil cover the whole district of Galilee; for that included Zebulun, Naphtali, and the shore of Lake Tiberias, which the prophet mentions separately. If it be proper to interpret the passage geographically, Gelil Hagojim must lie south of Lake Tiberias, where subsequently Galilee began. Joshua himself also conquered a king of the Gogim in "גִּלְגַּל" (Josh. xii. 23). From the position given to this king in the catalogue, no geographical inference can be drawn, since the enumeration is made without any regard to the situation of localities. The passage becomes clear only when גִּלְגַּל is taken as גִּלְיָל, making Joshua victorious over the king of the Gogim in Gelil. Now, it cannot escape notice that among the kings conquered by Joshua, no king of Beth-shean is found, although in Josh. xvii. 16 this place appears so important, and its territory must have been conquered, and although the cities in the plain of Jezreel are named. The conjecture, therefore, is plausible that Beth-shean is represented by the king of the Gogim. Beth-shean was the starting-point of the later Galilee (cf. Lightfoot, Opera, i. 216, etc.); it was the city of iron chariots; its population was always of a mixed character (Canaanites, Gogim, Jews, Judg. i. 27; Chulin, 6 b). From the date of the first Greek notices of it (in the Septuagint, Josephus, etc.; cf. Ritter, xv. 432 [Gage's Transl. ii. 335]), it appears under the name Scythopolis, city of the Scythians. On the question how this name originated, we are not to enter here. Thus much is certain, that it is not unsuitable to take the term Scythians as equivalent to Gogim; especially when we compare Gen. xiv. 1, where Tidal, king of the Gogim, is named in connection with Elam, Shinar, and Ellasar. Although our historical data are not sufficient to raise these probabilities to certainties, several considerations suggested by the narrative are of some weight. If Harosheth Hagojim is to be looked for in the vicinity of Beth-shean, the whole geography of the war becomes quite plain. Jabin and Sisera then occupy the decisive points at the extremities of the kingdom. The southern army of Sisera is the most oppressive to Israel, and its dislodgement is the main object. Barak is not to attack Hazor, for that is surrounded and supported by hostile populations, which it is impracticable as yet to drive out. Deborah's plan is to annihilate the tyrannical power, where it has established itself in the heart of Israel. Tabor is the central point, where Naphtali and Zebulun can conveniently assemble. A straight line from Kedesh to that mount, runs through the territories of both. Sisera must fight or allow himself to be cut off. His overthrow is Israel's freedom. His army is Jabin's only hold on those regions. Hence, Sisera's flight from the Kishon is northward, in order to reach Hazor. On the way, not far from either Hazor or Kedesh, his fate overtakes him.<sup>1</sup>

Ver. 4. And Deborah a prophetic woman,

אִשָּׁה נְבִיאָה. According to Num. xi. 25, the prophetic gift has its source in the "Spirit of Jehovah." Its office answers to its origin: it preaches God and speaks his praises. Cause and effect testify of each other. Every one, whether man or woman, may prophecy, on whom the "Spirit of Jehovah" comes. The prophetic state is a divine ecstasy, a high poetic enthusiasm (δευροσυστασις, from θεός), under the influence of which the praises of God are spoken. On this account, the prophet resembled at times the Greek μάντις (from μαντομαι); compare especially Jer. xxix. 26 מְנַאֲנֵץ וְהָרְבֵּנָה;

נָבִי, connected with nabi, in the same chapter, ver. 8, is actually rendered μάντις by the LXX.). In itself, however, both as to derivation and meaning, nabi, niba, is to be compared with θεός. The prophet utters the θεός, in which the Spirit of Jehovah manifests itself; he declares the greatness and glory of God. He is a spokesman of God and for Him. Hence Aaron could be called the nabi of Moses (Ex. vii. 1). He was the ready organ of the spirit which resided in Moses. Doubtless, in the highest sense, Moses was himself the nabi. With him, God spake mouth to mouth, not in visions and dreams and enigmas (Num. xii. 6-8); not, that is, as He announced himself to Aaron and

<sup>1</sup> [To our author's identification of Harosheth ha-Gogim with Beth-shean, Bachmann objects that the latter city is known by its usual name to the writer of Judges; cf. ch. i. 27. He is "inclined to adopt the view of Thomson, The Land and the Book, ch. xxix., who finds Harosheth in Har-othlah, a hill or mound at the southeastern corner of the Plain of Akka, close behind the hills that divide this plain from that of Jezreel, on the north side of the Kishon, yet so near the foot of Carmel as only to leave a passage for the river. This mound is covered with the remains of old ramparts and buildings."—Ta.]

